"If he be in earnest, as doubtless he is, we recommend him to move for the appointment of a State tailor, charged with the duty of making clothes for the clergy according to the pattern approved by the Bench of Bishops and the Lower House of Convocation. To complete the good work there must be a State milliner, bound, under heavy penalties, to provide only such vestments for services in Church as shall carry out the views of Evangelical clergymen. But all this will be useless without a clause enacting that any clergyman who shall wear garments obtained from other than the duly authorised persons shall be inhibited from saying public prayers for three months."

A correspondent of the same paper, showing what voluntarism has done, says:

"Notwithstanding all the disadvantages to which Nonconformists have been exposed, they have increased and multiplied much more than the Established Episcopalians. A little more than 200 years ago they had scarcely a church in the country, and now more than half the places of worship belong to them, and more than half the attendants at worship attend with them, though they have not half the rank and wealth of the country. What, then, might they not have done, if they had not been compelled to support the Establishment which, in various ways, has always hampered and opposed them, and had they not been so long deprived of civil rights for their nonconformity? Indeed the Episcopalians themselves have already discovered that there is a wonderful power in voluntarism. Thence the Bishop of London's Fund, and all the other funds which have been raised, or are being raised in the church, to overtake the spiritual wants of the metropolis and large provincial towns, &c. And if we go to America, where there is no Establishment, we shall find that this giant has done more than any Establishment ever did in any country to provide religious accommodation for the people, notwithstanding the difficulty of meeting the wants of a constant flux of emigrants from all parts of the world. And in Ireland also, though some of us have not done our duty in its evangelisation, and must admit it with shame, voluntarism triumphs; for do not the millions of Irish Roman Catholics support their own religion with the liberty and zeal which are worthy of a better cause, and which Protestants might imitate with advantage?"

The Rev. Edward Stuart, of Munster Square, Regent's Park, replying to a charge of Sir J. Awdry, in the Guardian, says:

"I have 'attacked' no 'person'; but I have attacked a sham which much needed attack and exposure. A year or two ago the Bishop of London spoke of 'the faith of the Reformation.' I felt inclined at that time to write and ask 'What is the faith of the Reformation? Is it the Catholic faith or is it not? If it is, why not call it so? If it is not, then it is a damnable heresy.' If we mean 'the Catholic faith,' let us say 'the Catholic faith.' What possible good can come of trying to perpetuate such an absurd contradiction in terms as 'the Protestant faith?' There is no such thing."

The Daily News remarks that Mr. Gladstone's Church-rate Bill has a vitality which such bills have not before exhibited. The Select Committee of the Lords have transformed it, but cannot be said to have deformed it. It comes from their hands as effective for its purpose as it was before; and though one or two clauses are added which will require modification, the principle of the abolition of compulsion is maintained intact. One or two additions to the bill are, however, quite inconsistent with its principle. It is proposed to allow bodies corporate, trustees, companies, &c., to pay any church rate if they choose, and to deduct the amount from any accounts which they may have to render. This is a direct permission to them to pay the rate with other people's money. The bill abolishes the worst element of discord in the parishes, but by this clause it will open a door to it into corporate bodies. One other new clause provides for the appointment of a body, to be called the "Church Trustees," to hold all moneys which accrue from rates, donations, and bequests, and to hand them over to the churchwardens to be spent for church purposes. These trustees are to be the incumbent, as chairman, and two other persons—one to be appointed by the patron of the living, the other by the Bishop. This is hardly consistent with parochial self-government. It is an arrangement which the parishes will be sure to resent, and which will, in many cases, be fatal to a voluntary rate. If the rate is henceforth to be a voluntary one, it should be completely so, and nobody should have the power of paying it out of another's money; and if there is still to be a rate at all under a voluntary assessment, it cannot be left too entirely to the disposal of those who consent to give it.

The Bishop of Oxford, in the House of Lords, on Friday night, declared that the Bishop of Natal had always met "from his seniors at home kindness, brotherly counsel—the tenderest and kindest counsel"—and that to assert the reverse was to make "a statement diametrically opposite to fact," and "made in absolute ignorance of the subject." As examples of what Sam Oxon. regards as "kindness," "brotherly friendship," and "tender counsel," "Anglicanus," in the Pall Mall gives the following:

"In one episcopal address the Bishop of Natal is said to be 'a miserable man, doing actively the Devil's work;' in another to have conducted himself like 'a successful fiend;' in another it is declared that the whole Episcopal Church regards his criticisms 'only as the offspring of an evil heart of unbelief;' in another, the writer 'has not read or examined the book,' but 'is thankful that it has called forth so strong a feeling of indignation;' in another, his writings are treated as 'childish,' 'heretical,' 'blasphemous,' 'abominable,' 'unhappy,' 'blind,' 'daring,' he is an 'instrument of Satan,' 'poor Bishop Colenso.' In Convocation he has been called by one 'the unhappy man in Natal;' by another, he has been described in the Scripture language applied to Judas; it has been declared by another that Christian burial would be denied him. Thus much for the words of 'brotherly counsel.' The art of 'brotherly friendship' has been lost (to use the language of the Bishop of St. David's); he has been condemned 'under a usurped jurisdiction, by the mockery of a trial in which the accused was assumed to acknowledge the jurisdiction against which he protested, and was condemned in his absence upon charges and speeches which had the advantage of being heard without a reply.' Examples of such words and acts of 'tenderness and kindness' might be multiplied indefinitely."

At the dinner of the Cobden Club, last week, Mr. Villiers gave the following quotation from that clear-sighted statesman on the Irish Church:

"So long as the Church of England possesses the whole of the revenues of Ireland, there cannot, and ought not to be, peace or prosperity for its people. What is of still more importance, there can be no chance of the dissemination of religious truth in that country."

In some remarks upon the debate on the Suspensory Bill in the Lords, when Lord Carnarvon on his own side of the House stood almost alone, the Guardian truly observes:

"But the battle is not ended with the rejection of the bill in the House of Lords. He is now in advance of his own friends, and may hear some hard things from some of them. But he is only bolder and more clear-sighted than many more who think with him more than they know themselves, and who will come to see, as he sees, that the right and wise course is not to stand up in defence of what is indefensible, and to contend that it must be sound and strong because it has not been seriously assailed before, but to trust to reason and justice on our own side while admitting their claims on the other; and to put forth our strength and efforts, not in resisting a change which is right as well as inevitable, but in securing that it shall be made fairly and wisely, in regard to those great interests which are greater even than the interests of States, and are never in so much danger as when they are mixed up and confounded with considerations of policy."

In the same debate, the Bishop of Oxford, who, spite of the terrible consequences to arise from disestablishing the Irish Church, was in a most facetious mood, took upon him, we can hardly say with questionable taste, to read out two passages of Mr. Spurgeon's, for the purpose of refuting one by the other, in the conventional "snuffle" or "nasal twang" which Church dignitaries assign to Dissenting ministers. This has called forth a good letter from Mr. Spurgeon, in which he thus handles his prelatical mimic:—

"I am happy to have afforded some little mirth to the grave and reverend Bishop, and would willingly share in it, but I am quite unable to see the point of the joke. Perhaps a parallel case may render my obtuseness less remarkable. If the Bishop of Oxford, after having in such a becoming manner, with such solid reasoning, defended the union of Church and State, should, nevertheless, be found at some future day pleading for starving curates, or even preaching for the excellent society which relieves distressed clerks in holy orders with pecuniary grants and bundles of cast-off clothing, or if we should hear him deploring that a clergyman should, according to advertisement in the Rock, be subsisting upon buttermilk and potatoes, would his lordship be charged with inconsistency, and would it be commendable for some humorous member of the venerable bench in tones of mimicry to make him the subject of public ridicule? The case is precisely parallel to mine, but if there were any fun in it it would surely lie in the folly of the person who should imagine the non-existent inconsistency. The poverty of some Dissenting ministers is only an argument against the voluntary principle as far as the extreme distress of a considerable number of the Anglican clergy is an argument against State support. The painful evil of clerical poverty exists under both forms of maintenance, and it ought not to be made the ground of mutual attack or recrimination, but should be deeply deplored and manfully grappled with. . . . If I advocate the voluntary system must I shut my eyes to its failures, or be impeached for folly? Must I defend its working as absolute perfection, or else be grossly unreasonable in preferring it? If I point out its shortcomings in order to amend them am I self-convicted of inconsistency? It may seem so to the Bishop of Oxford, but I claim the right to differ from him without being ridiculous. One illustration, and I will not further occupy your space. Suppose that two farms in Ireland are put in comparison. I declare my preference for No. 2, and yet regret that it is much depreciated in value by a piece of incorrigible bog. A gentleman who vehemently advocates the superiority of farm No. 1, hearing my two statements, resolves to make me his laughing-stock at the next agricultural dinner, and, being in the full swing of his oratory, exclaims, 'This Mr. Spurgeon, to whom some people look up so much, has spoken in a certain letter most glowingly of the farm which he is weak enough to admire, and yet I will read to you from a document in which he admits that there is a horrible and irreclaimable bog upon it. Ladies and gentlemen, the absurdity is manifest even to the blind; but what a prospect is before you if his judgment is followed! What say you to universal quagmires? How would you feel if your homesteads and estates were all turned into quivering morasses, and if the fine property of his lordship in the chair should be transferred into a vast Slough of Despond?' In some uncivilised rural nook there may be a benighted population sufficiently moonstruck to admire the logic and applaud the humour of such observations; but even with so congenial an audience the acclamations would soon be silenced when the conveniently forgetful orator was reminded that his own favourite farm, about which he could not utter sufficient laudation, was afflicted with a bog equally bottomless with that which he so much decried. It is probable that our imaginary orator would scarcely have sense enough to wish that he had not spoken; in this only does his case differ from that of Mr. Samuel Wilberforce."

Of the six prelates who spoke in the debate, the Spectator justly says:

"Not one evinced the shadow of a tenderness for Roman Catholic feeling; not one protested his willingness to share with the Roman Catholics the national property which is a stumbling-block and rock of offence to the Roman Catholics, or to resign it. Not one strove to place himself in the Catholic point of view. Not one strove to act to the Roman Catholics as he would have wished that Roman Catholics should, in like circumstances, act to him. Not one but took, with more or less emphasis, the hard landlord's view of proprietary rights. Not one but trusted, and trusted only, in the rivalry of the 'wise things of the world and the things which are mighty,' for curbing the ambition of Rome. Not one that, as far as we can see, uttered a single Christian sentiment towards the religion of the great mass of the Irish people. Not one that spoke of a religious question in a religious spirit."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—XI.

SUBJECT: Imagery of a future life among the Hebrew writers.

Read Isaiah xxvi. 12—19. In the first part of this passage the writer seems to allude to the eastern doctrine of a life in the grave, which he makes use of when he attempts to paint a wretched fate for the nation's tyrant conquerors. He cries out of them, "They are dead beings, they shall not live. They are departed spirits, they shall not rise." The writer then turns to his own people, "Thou hast increased the nation, O Jehovah," and he foretells for them a more cheering future. "Thy dead shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing ye that dwell in dust. For thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead."

This picture of two distinct places of abode after death may be compared to the vulgar notion in our own country of a heaven and hell, one for the good and the other for the bad. It was not properly Jewish. Something more usual among them may be seen in the preceding chapters, where we have a day appointed for punishment and for happiness, but it is less clearly explained that it is to take place after death. For this read Isaiah xxiv. 21—23, and xxv. 6—8. It shall come to pass on that day that Jehovah shall punish the high ones and the kings of the earth upon the earth. They are to be gathered together as prisoners are gathered into the pit, and after many days they are to be punished. Jehovah of Hosts is to reign himself on Mount Zion gloriously. His people are to enjoy all sorts of plenty on this mountain; and He shall swallow up death in victory, and shall wipe away tears from off all faces.

REVIEW.

British Quarterly Review. July, 1868.

AN article on "The Old London Dissenters" is written in that easy and pleasant style which forms such an agreeable relief in the pages of this Review to the essays on severer subjects. It points out that Dissent was strong among the merchants of London at the beginning of the last century. They exercised at that early period the right of presenting an address to the throne, which they still retain; for, "on March, 1702," says Narcissus Luttrell, in his diary, "the Dissenting ministers, to the number of 127, attended Her Majesty with an address, and were admitted to kiss her hand." This implies that there were probably 100 congregations, and from 20,000 to 30,000 adult Dissenters, at that time in London. The aldermen were often Dissenters, and one Lord Mayor attended at Mr. Howe's church. This was Sir Thomas Abney, well known from his connection with the celebrated Dr. Watts.

These old ministers waged fearlessly the battle of their faith with the literary weapons of sermon and pamphlet, till Government wreaked its vengeance upon Daniel Defoe, but signally failed in the effort; for the pillory proved for him "a very platform of honour. There he stood, garlanded with laurels, drank to from silver tankards in the choicest Burgundy, while, instead of cabbage stalks and oyster shells, pretty Nonconformist maidens pelted him with flowers. A wholesome dread of the pillory did the High Church party feel from that day."

They seem to have been cheerful, happy folk, those old London Dissenters. They kept Saturday as a half-holiday, and Sunday with a certain jollity. "Sunday fare" was almost an institution. The "added pudding was never wanting, nor the well-dressed joint; for the connection between piety and cold mutton never entered our forefathers' minds. . . . Sir Thomas Abney's four long-tailed horses duly drew his carriage to Silver-street each Sabbath day." Yet they left the cheerful board to attend the afternoon service, as well as the morning worship, taking their children with them; even the youngest being encouraged to keep its eyes open during the "regulation" sermon of an hour in length, by cake or sugar plum from its mother's hand, for "it was no unwise policy of our great grandmothers when they linked the remembrance of sweet cake and long sermon together. . . . The pleasant old gentleman in the next pew, who patted the child's head, and the kind lady who took his little hand so lovingly in the aisle," made the chapel a home-like place to the child of those days. Charity was inculcated too, for if Sunday fare was better than week-day dinners, it was freely shared with others. Some poorer member of the church, or minister from the country sat down to table with the family, while the kitchen had its humbler guests, and additional plates, brought to the table, would be well filled, covered with a clean napkin, and sent away to old servants or aged invalids.

But there was no lack of religious instruction, too. Mathew Henry took his turn in the Sunday evening lectures at various places, which were more common than is often thought. His "Lord's-day evening lecture, at Salter's Hall," was continued to as late a period as about 40 years ago. There were plenty of week-day lectures, too. A well-studied sermon was regarded as an intellectual treat; and "these week-day lectures seem to have been just as popular as the religious meetings of the present day—they were probably quite as improving. To listen intelligently to a well-studied lecture involved, we think, a rather higher amount of mental effort than to hear some half-dozen speakers advocate a cause, the merits of which we never called in question."

Discussions of various kinds were carried on with pleasure. Dissenters were obliged to give attention to the religious controversies of their day, and so were often more intelligent than the Churchmen. The metaphysical inquiries of the time awoke no common degree of interest in the Dissenting world. They laboured to have a learned ministry, and maintained with liberal contributions various academies for the education of students. The book-closet was an institution in the layman's house, while the ministers aimed at collecting good libraries. Those of Dr. Lazarus Seaman, Dr. Jacob, and Dr. Bates, which last was purchased by Dr. Williams, and forms part of his library now, were sold for large sums. If the Dissenter objected to the theatre and to games of chance, and if the clubs were gradually neglected from the growing tendency to hard-drinking, the Dissenters established "societies" at coffee-houses, where a debate on some appointed subject followed after moderate refreshments, instead of the pipe, the punch-bowl, and the song, usually introduced at the club. These were held both in London and the outskirts. At Highbury Barn, they assembled to amuse themselves with out-door games in the summer, and "conversations on given subjects" during the winter.

They built their chapels with boldness under the protection of the Toleration Act, but yet with caution, lest a change should occur in the policy of the country. Many of them were secure from parochial molestation within the boundary walls of the grounds of the City Companies. Some stood on the borders of two parishes; so that "if the constables entered at one door, the congregation walked quietly out at the other, fearless of pursuit." If the old red-brick meeting-houses were destitute of architectural beauty, the chief members of the congregation often built themselves handsome mansions, adorned with wall paintings and handsome carvings indoors, and with garden plot, trees, and flowers outside. In Queen Anne's reign, they began to build in the outskirts, at Islington, Hackney, Stepney. At Stoke Newington, "Thomas Gunston, Esq.—doubtless to be near his friends the Hartopps and the Fleetwoods—built his stately house—that house which, afterwards, as the residence of his sister, Lady Abney, and the home of Dr. Watts, became almost a Mecca to two generations of Dissenters." Watts was tutor to Sir John Hartopp's son, and assistant preacher to Dr. Chauncey. An illness of his own was followed by a severe loss in the death of his friend Thomas Gunston. In rapid succession he published his "Horæ Lyricæ;" "Hymns for Divine Worship, and Version of the Psalms;" "Divine and Moral Songs." On these rest his chief reputation, excepting his works on "Logic" and the "Improvement of the Mind." His hymns both for young and old have proved an inestimable boon to his own and succeeding generations.

But, as time passed on, the union of the three denominations grew colder; "the Independents and the Baptists felt that the Presbyterians were no longer brethren who, like the Baxters and Calamys of old, would go 'to prison and to death' with them, pledged to hold forth to the world the self-same 'glorious Gospel,' for they were no longer 'brethren in faith and hope.'" With Dr. Watts and Dr. Lardner, who survived for two or three years, the race of the old Dissenters passed away.

An article on Stanley's Westminster Abbey hardly falls within our range of notice, but had space remained, we might have given a longer account of a Review of Montalembert's Monks of the West, which, after tracing Monasticism to an eastern origin in Buddhistic Monasticism, enters largely into the advantages and disadvantages of the system, pointing out that its celebrated missionary labours have been rivalled by the efforts of Protestant ministers in the South Sea Islands, and concludes by discussing the vexed questions connected with the early history of Christianity in our own island.

PRAYER TO CHRIST.

SOME time ago the Bishop of Natal produced a fresh sensation in the orthodox body, by omitting all hymns addressed to Christ in a new edition of "Hymns, Ancient and Modern;" a proceeding which he afterwards defended in a correspondence with a professor of divinity, by maintaining that addressing prayers to Christ was neither in conformity with the practice of the Christian church in its earliest and purest times, nor sanctioned by the authority of Christ, who gave his disciples very particular directions as to how they should pray.

Plain common sense asked the pertinent question: Since Dr. Colenso does not believe that prayers should be addressed to Christ, how can he, with any conscience, read a Litany every Sunday filled with expressions such as these: "From our enemies deliver us, O Christ!" "O Son of David, have mercy upon us!" "Both now and ever vouchsafe to hear us, O Christ!" "Graciously hear us, O Christ! graciously hear us, O Lord Christ!" The Bishop, however, was considered so hopelessly heterodox on other and graver questions, and had been so often pronounced anathema maranatha by the whole Christian church, that this comparatively trifling inconsistency was but little taken notice of. It was put down as one of those things which men will do without compunction when conscience becomes hardened through an habitual disregard of its admonitions. But the Dean of Westminster is a very different man. Though constantly mixing in the controversies of the day, in which he has always been among the foremost on the Liberal side, he has never been condemned by Convocation, nor threatened with proceedings in the Court of Arches. Great caution, and an extraordinary command of language—by which he is able to put his thought into words easily capable of an orthodox interpretation, though conveying a very different impression to the ordinary reader—has gained him the reputation of a moderate man, of one who may be considered the fairest representative of the Broad Church school. It was, therefore, with peculiar interest that we turned to an article on the Litany, in the current number of Good Words, by the Dean of Westminster. After giving a history of the service, he proceeds to apologise for the prayers that are therein addressed to Christ:

"I turn from the occasion and growth of the Litany to the form in which it is expressed. That form is very peculiar, and its explanation is to be sought in the occasion of its first introduction. The usual mode of addressing our prayers, both in Scripture and in the Prayer-book, is to God our Father through Jesus Christ. This is the form of the Lord's Prayer, after which manner we are all taught to pray. This is the form throughout the New Testament, with two exceptions, which shall be noticed presently. This was the general mode of prayer throughout the early ages of the church. Even those earlier forms of prayer, which are most like the Litany, are for the first three hundred years of the church always addressed direct to God the Father. In conformity with this is the plan adopted in almost all the collects and prayers in the other parts of the English Prayer-book. Most important is this, both because only by so doing do we fulfil the express commands of Christ our Lord, and also because it thus keeps before our minds the great truth, which the Scriptures never allow us to let go, of the unity of Almighty God. Most fully, too, have the greatest ecclesiastical authorities on this subject recognised both the doctrine and the fact that, as a general rule, prayer ought to be addressed, and has in the usual form of ancient Catholic devotion been always addressed, only to God the Father. But there are, as I have said, exceptions. No rule, even in these sacred matters, is so rigid as not to admit some variations."

To this latter opinion we entirely demur. There may be exceptions to any rule that man makes, on account of our limited capacities unable us to foresee all possible contingencies, but there can be no exceptions to a rule that God makes. In the rules by which the material world is regulated, both in the minute and in the vast, there is no such thing as a variation or exception. Oxygen and hydrogen combine, in certain definite proportions, to form water, all the world over. By no possible means could we unite those constituents so as to have a larger proportion of either element in the composition of that fluid. From the law of "chemical equivalents" there is never any deviation. For a long time people used to think that the perturbations in the orbit of the planet Uranus indicated an exception to the acknowledged law of gravity, until Mr. Adams discovered Neptune and fully accounted for them. Until very recently we were accustomed to fancy that the brilliant meteors streaming over the November sky were nought but stray waifs of the universe wandering beyond the realms of order, exceptions to the great cosmic law; but now we are beginning to perceive that those evanescent globes of light have their orbits and their periods just as fixed and regular as any of the planetary bodies moving round the sun. In short, it is only our ignorance that allows us to imagine that there can be any exceptions to the laws of the universe. Now the unity of plan and the invariability of law, which we find in all spheres of the material world, obliges us to think that the spiritual world is regulated on similar invariable principles. We cannot get an answer to prayer without fulfilling certain needful spiritual conditions, just as we cannot get a physical result without supplying the necessary material conditions. No doubt one man may pray with a concentration of thought and an intensity of feeling of which another is entirely incapable. Nevertheless there is but one law for all—each one's highest and best. When Christ gave his disciples directions how to pray, so that their prayers might be answered, he was either right or wrong. To suppose that occasions might occur in which an exception should be made, entirely deprives the direction of its Divine character. If his rule does not hold in all times and circumstances, in our opinion, it was not from God. What is right once must be right always, in any world regulated by an Infinite Intelligence. But Dr. Stanley proceeds to justify this exception to our Lord's rule for prayer, by making a distinction between urgent prayers and ordinary prayers—a distinction which appears to us to cut at the root of all real devotion. Prayer is not prayer at all, unless it is the most earnest, urgent aspiration of the soul that the person at the time is capable of. All else is a mere saying of prayers—an exercise of no service whatever in procuring spiritual results, but serving only to delude those who have adopted it. However, we must let the Dean speak for himself:

"When the soul is overwhelmed with difficulties and distresses, it seems to be placed in a different posture from that of common life. We knock, as it were, more earnestly at the gate of heaven—'we thrice beseech the Lord,' and the veil is for a moment withdrawn, and the Son of Man is there standing to receive our prayer.

"It was in the Litanies of the Middle Ages that we first find the invocations not only of Christ our Saviour, but of those earthly saints who have departed with him into that other world. These we have now, with a wise caution, ceased to address. But the feeling which induced men to call upon them is the same in kind as that which runs through this whole exceptional service," (the Litany) "namely, the endeavour, under the pressure of strong emotion and heavy calamity, to bring ourselves more nearly into the presence of the Invisible. We justly acquiesce in the practice of our reformed church, which has excluded these lesser mediators. But this one remarkable exception of the Litany, in favour of addressing our prayers to the one great Divine Mediator, may be surely allowed, if we remember that it is an exception, and understand the grounds on which it is made. In the rest of the Prayer-book we follow the ancient rule, and our Saviour's own express command by addressing our Father only. Here in the Litany, when we express our most urgent needs, we may well deviate from that general rule, and invite the ever-present aid of Jesus Christ, at once the Son of Man and Son of God."

Now, we believe that the great use of prayer is to bring our souls into the most intimate union possible with the Supreme Spirit—to become, for the time, one with Him, thereby deriving light and strength to aid us in striving after the blessed life; and that whatever means is best adapted to attain that end should be exclusively adopted in our prayers.

Passing over, without further comment, the strange doctrine that when our needs are very urgent we should seek the aid of Christ, but that in ordinary circumstances God the Father will suffice, we are constrained to ask, why don't these Broad Church clergy, who talk so much about a "truly national Church," capable of comprehending all parties within its pale—agitate for a reformed Liturgy, for which there will be no need to apologise, and which may be accepted by those who take their Christianity from Christ and his Apostles, and not from the monks of the Middle Ages? What has been the effect of all this straining of old dogmas to admit of new interpretations, and that tampering with conscience, which this practice inevitably obliges? Has it tended to widen the portals of the Church, or to draw the scattered sheep any nearer to the fold? Let the proceedings of Convocation, and the thousands who have petitioned that the Bishop of Natal be deprived of his see, give an answer to these questions.

The fact seems to be that opinion progresses on a path so irregular and complicated, that it is impossible for mortals to foresee the ultimate tendency of those empirical experiments by which they hope to accelerate the movements of society; and that, under the cloud in which the laws of the moral cosmos are at present involved, the safest and wisest course is to be truthful and honest, faithful to the light that we possess, leaving the rest to Him who disposeth all things according to the good pleasure of His will.

The increased attention which this doctrine, discussed by Dean Stanley, is sure ere long to attract, must be my apology for trespassing so much upon your space in bringing it before your readers.

A. M. CREEBY.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, JULY 10, 1868.

MORALS AND CUSTOMS.

A REMARKABLE series of leading articles and letters from correspondents has recently appeared in the Daily Telegraph on Marriage and Celibacy. We need not dwell upon the painful occurrence which gave rise to this animated discussion, but there is one aspect in which it seems to bear so directly upon the general religious tone of the country, that we wish for a moment to call the attention of our readers to it.

It is noticeable throughout this controversy, and in many another of a similar kind, how completely the moral precepts of both the Old and the New Testaments are not only set at naught, but quietly passed by as something quite out of date. How little can a young man marry upon, with a reasonable expectation of satisfying the demands of a genteel life? Genteel life! though in the smallest of houses, and with the possibility of occasionally going to the opera; this, by-the-bye, seems to be one of the *sine quâ non*s of respectable life, according to the London pattern. No young man, says one warning mentor, should venture to marry under at least one hundred and fifty pounds a year; and a great fool if he marries upon that, writes a more experienced Benedict, who says he has tried it, and found it not at all the sort of thing he had anticipated; children and illnesses, besides the thousand petty exigencies attending upon a semi-fashionable life, had shown him that a hundred and fifty a year was but a small thing to spend, though a great thing to earn.

Now, most men of the present day work fairly hard for their living; from eight or nine in the morning to six or seven at night is the lot of most of those who pass their working lives in offices. Here, then, we have from eight to ten hours a day of work, and this with the regularity of a clock from year's end to year's end. This expenditure of labour, surely, ought to enable a man to marry and bring up a family. But it doesn't, is the practical reply; it only produces £150 per annum. We must seek the answer elsewhere. Are persons in this class of life underpaid? According to abstract views of the case, or the opinions of sympathising friends, they may be so; but, as a matter of fact, if one such situation becomes vacant, there are twenty applicants ready to take it at the same salary. We suppose, therefore, that they receive as much as they are worth. Next, then, we must examine the £150. What prevents a man and his wife and family living upon that? The answer is simple, and sad too, so sad that we cannot help wishing that the problem were capable of some happier solution than it is. Who does not wish to see young people happy—happy to the fullest extent of their desires? But when young people want to live on £150 per annum after the manner of those who have £300, it must be confessed the problem is a very difficult one. The wish is so very natural, and so very desirable in every way, if it were only possible, that whilst we shake our heads and say that it can't be done, we put our hands a little deeper in our pockets to see if at the bottom there be not some FORTUNATUS's purse to help them out of the scrape; but there isn't. It is only in fairy stories that the impossible is always the nearest way to happiness; in real life £150 is just the half of £300, and will purchase just half as much if judiciously applied. But then, says pleading youth, LILIAN is such a delicate, lady-like girl, so nice in all her tastes, so refined in all her habits, it would be a perfect shame to degrade her by making her undergo the sordid cares and the mean shifts of a poor home. Yes, we admit it. Those delicate fingers would be sadly spoilt by washing up greasy dishes; those pretty eyes could not have been meant for darning stockings. LILIAN will make a beautiful little lady, but certainly not a good poor man's wife; she is scarcely of the right stamp for a twenty pound house, six children, and an Irish maid-of-all-work. It is sad to say it, but LILIAN must marry money, or truly she will be a wretched creature all her days. And this brings us back to where we started from, and a crowd of anxious youth swarm around us, crying out, "Oh, ye old married people, tell us, for you know, how can we marry our LILIANs on £150 a year and be happy ever after?" But the old married people shake their heads, for they know that it cannot be done anywhere, except in the land of the Do-as-you-likes, where fools are fed upon flap-doodle.

The fact is, that our morals and our customs are incompatible, and seem in a fair way to become yet more so. SOLOMON says "A virtuous woman is a crown to her husband;" and Jesus assures us that "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." These are the great moral laws, the observance of which leads to family happiness and national strength. But modern custom has become so strong that it imposes other laws far more difficult of fulfilment than these—so difficult that eight hours of work per diem cannot keep a wife and family. Let us "hark back," as the hunters say; we are evidently off the scent. Our customs are leading us all astray; and, in the midst of abundance of this world's blessings, a natural and healthy life is becoming an impossibility to one-half of our population. Our young men and our girls are not over refined; but they are refined with the refinement of custom, and not of a pure morality. They are just refined enough to want to do things in the style of those who are richer. They forget that a cottage is not the twentieth part of a palace, but something essentially different; so different, that to make life endurable, the customs of the inhabitants must be essentially different also. Let our LILIANs be pure in heart and gentle in spirit; these are the graces which make the Christian home happy; but let them also be so educated to the necessary business of daily life that they can make home comfortable on small means, so that they can be industrious without being vulgar; and once more they will be able to marry those whom they love, and not be compelled by their over refinement to sell their love for the sake of luxury.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

OUR BABY.

BY G. S. BURLEIGH.

Oh! have you seen her? You should see
Our baby-girl, our little one,
An opening bud of mystery,
An everlasting hope begun!

Our baby is a sunny thing,
A sunny thing of love and light,
A little blossom of the spring,
A tiny lily, sweet and white.

Her eyes are of the softest blue,
And in the whiteness of her face
Are just like sky-gaps breaking through
A pearly cloud in summer days.

Our baby's arms are little wings
That flutter plumeless in the air;
And in her infant crowing sings
The angel music unaware.

A sweetness clings to all her flesh
Like early grasses steeped in dew,
And in her silky hair the fresh
Faint odours that from heaven she drew.

A thousand things our baby knows,
A thousand things she cannot tell;
For she remembers Eden's rose,
And sunny banks of asphodel.

And she has not forgotten quite
The glory of her home above;
She sees it in the smile of light,
She sees it in the smile of love.

Our baby answers them in smiles,
As full of light and love as they,
And draws our elder hearts with wiles
Of sweetness to her infant play.

And oh! as thus she brings us back
To childhood's simple truth and love,
Be ours to keep her shining track
As sinless to her home above!

KING THEODORE.

DR. BLANC, one of the rescued Abyssinian captives, gives the following interesting account, in the Pall Mall Gazette, of the household and private life of the King, who put us to so much trouble and expense:

Theodore had all the dislike of the roving Bedouin for towns and cities. He loved camp life, the free breeze of the plains, the sight of his army so gracefully encamped around the hillock he had selected for himself; and preferred to the palace the Portuguese had erected at Gondar for a more sedentary king, the delights of roaming about incognito during the beautiful cool nights of Abyssinia. His household was well regulated; the same spirit of order which had introduced something like discipline into his army showed itself also in the arrangements of his domestic affairs. Every department was under the control of a chief, who was responsible to him directly, and answerable for everything connected with the department entrusted to him. These officers, all men of position, were the superintendents of the tej makers, of the women who prepared the large flat Abyssinian bread, of the wood carriers, of the water girls, &c.; others, like the "Balderafs," had charge of the royal stud, the "Azage" of the domestic servants, the "Girowond" of the treasury, stores, &c., the Agafaris or introducers, the Likamqas or chamberlain, the Afa Negus or mouth of the king.

Strange to say, he preferred as his personal attendants those who had served with Europeans. His valet, the only one who stood by him to the last, had been a servant of Barouni, the vice-consul at Massowah. Another, a young man named Paul, was a former servant of Mr. Walker; others had at one time been in the service of Plowden, Bell, and Cameron. Except his valet, who was almost constantly near his person, the others, although they resided in the same inclosure, had more specially to take care of his guns, swords, spears, shields, &c. He had also around him a great number of pages; not that I believe he required their presence, but it was an "honour" he bestowed on chiefs entrusted with distant commands or with the government of remote provinces. Almost all the duties of the household were performed by women; they baked, they carried water and wood, and swept his tent or hut, as the case might be. The majority of them were slaves whom he had seized from slave dealers, at the time he made "manly" efforts to put a stop to the trade. Once a week, or more often as the case required, a colonel and his regiment had the honour of proceeding to the nearest stream, and wash the Emperor's linen and that of the imperial household. No one, not even the smallest page, could under penalty of death enter his harem. He had a large number of eunuchs, most of them Gallas, or soldiers and chiefs who had recovered from the mutilation the Gallas inflict on their wounded foe. The queen or the favourite of the day had a tent or house to herself, and several eunuchs to attend upon her; at night these attendants slept at the door of her tent, and were made responsible for the virtue of the lady entrusted to their care. As for the ordinary women, the objects of passing affections or of deeper passions that time had quenched, a tent or hut in common for ten or twenty, one or two eunuchs and a few female slaves for the whole was all the state he allowed these neglected ladies.

Theodore was more bigoted than religious. Above all things he was superstitious; and that to a degree incredible in a man in other respects so superior to his countrymen. He had always with him several astrologers, whom he consulted on all important occasions—especially before undertaking any expedition—and whose influence over him was unbounded. He hated the priests, despised them for their ignorance, spurned their doctrines, laughed at the marvellous stories some of their books contain, but still never marched without a tent church, a host of priests, defferas, and deacons, and never passed near a church without kissing its threshold.

Though he could read and write, he never condescended to correspond personally with any one, but was always accompanied by several secretaries, to whom he would dictate his letters; and so wonderful was his memory that he would indite an answer to letters received months, nay years, before, or dilate on subjects and events that had occurred at a far remote period. Suppose him on the march. On a distant hillock arose a small red flannel tent—it is there where Theodore pitched his tent and those of his household. To his right is the church tent; next to his the queen's or the favourite of the day. Then came the one allotted to his former lady friends, who travelled with him until a favourable opportunity presented itself of sending them to Magdala, where several hundreds were already dwelling in seclusion, spinning cotton for their master's shamas and for their own clothes. Behind were several tents for his secretaries, his pages, his personal attendants, and one for the few stores he carried with him. When he made any lengthened stay at a place he had huts erected by his soldiers for himself and people, and the whole was surrounded by a double line of fences. Though not wanting in bravery, he never left anything to chance. At night the hillock on which he dwelt was completely surrounded by musketeers, and he never slept without having his pistols under his pillow and several loaded guns by his side. He had a great fear of poison, taking no food that had not been prepared by the queen or her "remplacant," and even then she and several attendants had to taste it first. It was the same with his drink; be it water, tej, or arrack, the cup-bearer and several of those present at the time had first to drink before presenting the cup to His Majesty. He made, however, an exception in our favour one day that he visited Mr. Rassam at Gaffat. To show how much he respected and trusted the English, he accepted some brandy; allowing no one to taste it before him, he unhesitatingly swallowed the whole draught.

He was a very jealous husband. Not only did he take the precautions I have already mentioned, but (except in the last months of his life, when it was beyond possibility for him to do otherwise) he never allowed the queen or any other lady in his establishment to travel with the camp. They always marched at night, well concealed, with a strong guard of eunuchs; and woe to him who met them on the road, and did not turn his back on them until they had passed. On one occasion a soldier who was on guard crept near the queen's tent, and taking advantage of the darkness of the night, whispered to one of the female attendants to pass him a glass of tej under the tent. She gave him one. Unfortunately, he was seen by a eunuch, who seized him, and at once brought him before His Majesty. After hearing the case, Theodore, who happened to be in good spirits that evening, asked the culprit if he was very fond of tej; the trembling wretch replied in the affirmative. "Well, give him two wanchas full (a wancha is a large horn cup) to make him happy, and afterwards fifty lashes with the giraf (large hippopotamus whip) to teach him another time not to go near the queen's tent." Evidently, Theodore, with a large experience of the beau sexe of his country, was profoundly convinced that his precautions were necessary. On one of his visits to Magdala, one of the chiefs of that amba made a complaint to him against one of the officers of the imperial household, whom he had caught some time before in his lady's apartment. Theodore laughed, and said to him, "You are a fool. Do I not look after my wife? and I am a king."

Theodore was always an early riser; indeed, he indulged in sleep but very little. Sometimes at two o'clock, at the latest before four, he would issue from his tent and give judgment on any case brought before him. Of late his temper was such that litigants kept out of his way; he nevertheless retained his former habits, and would be seen long before day-break sitting quite alone on a stone, in deep meditation or in silent prayer. He was also very abstemious in his food, and never indulged in excesses of the table. He rarely partook of more than one meal a day, which was composed of sujera (the pancake loaves made of the small seed of the teff) and red pepper during fast days; of wât, a kind of curry made of fish, fowl, or mutton, on ordinary occasions. On feast days he generally gave large dinners to his officers, and sometimes to the whole army. At these festivals the "brindo" would be equally enjoyed by the Sovereign and by the guests. At these public breakfasts and dinners the King usually sat on a raised platform at the head of the table. No one has ever been known, except perhaps Bell, to have dined out of the same basket at the same time as Theodore; but when he desired specially to honour some of his guests he either sent them some food from his basket, or had others placed on the platform near him, or, what was still a higher honour, sent to the favoured one his own basket with the remains of his dinner.

Unfortunately for Theodore, he had for several years before his death greatly taken to drink. Up to three or four o'clock he attended to the business of the day, and till then was generally sober; but after his afternoon's siesta he was invariably more or less intoxicated. In his dress he was generally very simple, wearing only the ordinary shama (white cotton cloth, with a red border, woven in the country), native-made trousers, and a European white shirt, no shoes, no covering to the head. His rather long hair—for an Abyssinian—was divided in three large plaits, and allowed to fall on his neck in three plaited tails. Of late he had greatly neglected his hair; for months it had not been plaited; and to show the grief he felt on account of the "badness" of his people, he would not allow it to be besmeared with the heavy coating of butter in which Abyssinians delight. On one occasion he apologised to us for the simplicity of his dress. He told us that during the few years of peace that followed the conquest of the country he used often to appear in public as a King should do; but since he had been, by the bad disposition of his people, obliged to wage constant war against them, he had adopted the soldier's raiments as more becoming his altered fortune. However, after his fall became obviously certain, he had on several occasions clad himself in gorgeous costumes, in shirts and mantles of rich brocaded silks, or of gold-embroidered velvet. He did so, I believe, to influence his people. They knew that he was poor, and though he hated pomp in his own attire, he desired to impress on his few remaining followers that, though fallen, he was still "the King."

During the lifetime of his first wife and for some years afterwards, Theodore not only led an exemplary life, but forbade the officers of his household and the chiefs more immediately around him to live in concubinage. One day in the beginning of 1860 Theodore perceived in a church a handsome young girl silently praying to her patron, the Virgin Mary. Struck with her beauty and modesty, he made inquiries about her, and was informed that she was the only daughter of Dejjatch Oubié, the Prince of Tigré, his former rival, whom he had dethroned, and who was then his prisoner. He asked for her hand, and met with a polite refusal. The young girl desired to retire into a convent, and devote herself to the service of God. Theodore was not a man to be easily thwarted in his desires. He proposed to Oubié that he would set him at liberty, only retaining him in his camp as his "guest," should the Prince prevail on his daughter to accept his hand. At last Woizero Tournish ("you are my sister") sacrificed herself for her old father's welfare, and accepted the hand of a man whom she could not love. This union was unfortunate. Theodore, to his great disappointment, did not find in his second wife the fervent affection, the almost blind devotion, of the dead companion of his youth. Woizero Tournish was proud; she always looked on her husband as a "parvenu," and took no trouble to hide from him her want of regard and affection. In the afternoon, Theodore, as it had been his former habit, tired and weary, would retire for rest in the Queen's tent. But he found no warm welcome there. His wife's looks were cold and full of pride; and she even went so far as to receive him without the common courtesy due to her King. One day when he came in she pretended not to perceive him, did not rise, and remained silent to his polite inquiries as to her health and welfare. She was holding in her hand a book of Psalms, and when Theodore asked her why she did not answer him, she calmly replied, without lifting up her eyes from the book she held, "Because I am conversing with a greater and better man than you, the pious King David."

Theodore sent her to Magdala, together with her new-born son, Alamayou ("I have seen the world"), and took as his favourite a widowed lady from Gedjow, named Woizero Tamagno (a rather coarse, lascivious-looking person, the mother of five children by her former husband), who soon obtained such an ascendancy over his mind, that he publicly proclaimed "that he had divorced and discarded Tournish, and that Tamagno should in future be considered by all as the queen." "Il n'y a que le premier pas qui coûte." Soon Woizero Tamagno had numerous rivals; but she was a woman of tact. Far from complaining, she rather encouraged Theodore in his debauchery, and instead of being displeased, she would always receive him with a smile. One day she said to her fickle lord, who felt rather astonished at her forbearance, "Why should I be jealous? I know you love but me; what is it if you stoop now and then to pick up some flowers to beautify them by your breath?"

Alamayou was the only legitimate son Theodore had; but he had several other children. The eldest, a lad of about 22, called Prince Meshisha, is a big, idle, lazy fellow. Though at Zaga, Theodore introduced him to us, and desired us to make him a friend with the English, he did not like him; the young man was indeed so unlike the King that I can well understand Theodore having had serious doubts of his being really his son. The other children, five or six in number, the illegitimate offspring of some of his numerous concubines, resided at Magdala, and were brought up in the harem. He seems to have taken but very little notice of them; but every time he passed through Magdala he would send for Alamayou, and play with the boy for hours. A few days before his death he introduced him to Mr. Rassam, saying, "Alamayou, why do you not bow to your father?" and after the audience he sent him with us to accompany us back to our quarters.

Woizero Tournish, Alamayou's mother, never made any complaint; though forsaken by her husband, she remained always faithful to him. She spent usually the long days of her seclusion reading the books she delighted in—the Psalms, the lives of the saints and of the Virgin Mary—and bringing up by her side her only son, for whom she had a deep affection. Although she had never loved her husband, in difficult times she bravely stood by his side. When Maisha, the King of Shoa, made his demonstration before the amba and treachery was feared, she sent out her son and made all the chiefs and soldiers swear fidelity to the throne. Two days before his death Theodore sent for the wife he had not seen for years, and spent part of the afternoon with her and his son.

After the storming of Magdala Woizero Tournish and her rival, Woizero Tamagno, were told to come to our former prison, where they would meet with protection and sympathy. It fell to my lot to receive them on their arrival; and I did my utmost to inspire them with confidence, to assuage their fears, and to assure them that under the British flag they would be treated with scrupulous honour and respect.

On the 18th of April, 1866, Theodore, still powerful, had treacherously seized us in his own house; and strange to say, on the 18th of April, two years afterwards, his dead body lay in one of our huts, while his wife and favourite had to seek shelter under the roof of those he had so long maltreated.

Both queens and Alamayou accompanied the English army on its march back. Woizero Tamagno left with feelings of gratitude for the kindness and attention she had received at the hands of the English commander-in-chief, as soon as she could with safety return to her native land, Gedjow. But poor Tournish died at Aikulet; freedom and liberty were not to be her lot. Her child, Alamayou, the son of Theodore, and grandchild of Oubé, has now reached the English shore, an orphan, an exile, but not uncared for.

CHINESE MAXIMS.

NOTHING abridges life like false steps, idle words, and vain thoughts.

Study profiteth little, if it does not teach us to avoid disputation.

Who is the true hero? He who has the most courage in resisting himself.

We should ask those who are well how we ought to die, and those who are dying how we ought to live.

We need wisdom most when we deal with them who have least.

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN AND UNITARIAN FUND SOCIETIES.

THE anniversary service and meetings in connection with these societies took place on Thursday, the 2nd inst., at the Church of the Saviour, Southampton. The Rev. Robert Spears led the devotional service, and the Rev. Dr. BELLINGS preached from John xii., 26th and 29th verses. After service, the members of the congregation resolved themselves into a business meeting, the Rev. H. HAWKES in the chair, when the reports from the Unitarian churches in the Southern district were read by the SECRETARY (the Rev. E. KELL), which contained gratifying accounts of success, and were passed unanimously. Business concluded, a cold collation was served up in the committee-rooms of the church. In the evening a tea was held, followed by a public meeting, over which the Rev. E. KELL, the pastor of the church, presided. After the sentiment of "The Queen," the Chairman gave "Prosperity to the Southern Unitarian and Southern Unitarian Fund Societies"—(applause)—and explained that the first of these was established in 1801, for the promotion of religious knowledge and the practice of virtue, by the distribution of books and tracts, while the second, the "Southern Unitarian Funds Society," sought to diffuse Unitarianism by aiding in the provision of the means for preaching, and by the support of small congregations. The usefulness of this society had been felt by his own congregation, and he also referred to the case of Poole, which he warmly commended to the interest of the Unitarian body. He concluded by calling upon Mr. WM. COLFOX, of Bridport, to give the sentiment, "Civil and religious liberty all the world over." There never was a time when there was more need to give it, and also to feel it. (Applause.) There was a gentleman among them whose ancestors had been long distinguished as supporters of civil and religious liberty. He referred to William Colfox, Esq., of Bridport—(applause)—and he begged to call upon that gentleman to speak to the sentiment.

Mr. COLFOX said this sentiment was more an accomplished fact with our American friends than it was with us, though he had no doubt they felt great sympathy with us in our wishes to extend civil and religious liberty, not only here but all the world over. He thought it must be patent to every one that the present time was more favourable to the extension of civil and religious liberty than had been the case for many years past. When they looked at the great advances made within the last few months, even in the question of the disestablishment of the Irish church that must commend itself to the hearts and feelings of all of them as a grand step towards the extension of religious liberty; and when they looked, in political matters, at the extension that would be practically given to civil liberty in the course of the present year by the operation of the Reform Bill, they found that the extension for which they sought was not only coming but had to a great extent come among them. There was yet another thing. The division in the House of Commons on the previous night was another proof of the extension of the ideas of religious liberty among them. He alluded to Mr. Coleridge's proposition to open the doors of the National Universities; endeavouring to make them what they were not now, national property; making them, in point of fact, instead of being sectarian institutions, which they had been too much hitherto, the foci of national life. (Applause.)

THE CHAIRMAN then proposed a very cordial greeting to Dr. Bellows, which was seconded by Rev. ROBERT YELLAND.

THE Rev. Dr. BELLINGS, who was very warmly received on rising, said he was very greatly indebted to the chairman and to that assembly for the way in which his name had been received there; and still more for the kind appreciation which the chairman had so happily expressed of what was promising and hopeful in the country from which he came. There was no country in the world, he was very sure, which it was so safe to praise as America, because, happily, all that was good in her had been derived, in a great degree, from another country where the seed was first matured. With regard to civil and religious liberty in America, every one knew it was virtually perfect, but then they had their own difficulties there. They were not difficulties that grew out of legal restrictions; but they were difficulties that grew out of sectarian jealousies. With regard to religious usages and customs, there were customs which the Americans understood, and which Englishmen could not be expected to understand, growing out of what was even right and true in their institutions. For instance, sects had a tendency there to survey and organise themselves according to social laws rather than theoretical distinctions and opinions. He could tell in many instances to what place of worship a man would go, according to his station in society. A man would be an Episcopalian under certain circumstances, and another would be a Presbyterian, not after the English fashion, but a high Calvinist. Another person he could be sure would be a Methodist, another a Baptist, another a Unitarian, and so on. There was a tendency in America, growing out of their very democracy, to make people a little jealous of associating with others who were not precisely in the same social attitude and position as themselves. So he was afraid that in America there was a little danger that the time would come when the rich and the poor would not worship together, and feel that the Lord was the maker of them all; and he confessed that he sometimes looked upon the English parish organisations—upon the old Episcopal churches, with rich and poor worshipping in one place—with a certain sort of envy, though when he came to reflect more deeply, and found that what he mentioned was more true in Catholic than in Protestant countries, he thought it better to let things go on in America as they were going, and leave them to correct themselves in due time. In reference to the Unitarian cause in America, it was very flourishing, and had been particularly so for the last five or six years. Up to that time they had, indeed, always held their own and a little more, and they were always improving; but he confessed, however, that during his ministry it had always been a matter of great surprise to him that their cause did not advance faster, for it seemed to him to be one singularly in accordance with scriptural teaching and educational and social progress. But then it had been and still was a hundred years ahead of the public mind. The Unitarian principles, however, were progressing every day and hour, whilst they slept, the cause was advancing, and it must eventually triumph. In reference to specific organisations, such as those present represented by their societies and their church, they were also advancing in America. Their principles were extending through all the relations of society, so that really, when they went into the churches of some of the other religious bodies, they had almost to inquire whether they were not in a Unitarian Church. Not that these preachers professed themselves to be Unitarians, or thought themselves to be so. They would not insult them by charging them with being so! No doubt they intended to be something else, and they kept their dogmatic system locked up, and produced it once a year, or oftener, just to show it was all right; but there were many clergymen and ministers of all denominations, who had much practical sympathy with them in their religious opinions, and especially to the application of religion to the life of man. Their dogmatic principles, however, remained distinct, and he should convey to them a false impression if he led them to understand that they were not wholly out of the Unitarian body, and felt it consistent with themselves to be so. Their Unitarian organisation in America had been more complete during the past few years than it was. For many years they seemed to be in a very painful state of self-criticism. They took up their tree every morning to see how it was growing; they complained of the soil, thought it was not in a healthy situation, and removed the tree somewhere else. Then they thought the tree was growing too much like somebody else's tree, and they would transplant it, and one and another lopped off a branch. In fact, they were asserters of their individual rights and liberty, and so to maintain that liberty they wasted nearly their whole time in that business. But they got sick of it. They used to meet together and abuse themselves and each other, and talked in a discouraging way of Unitarianism, until everybody got tired of it, and agreed to stop off that sort of conversation, and try to go to work and do something for the promotion of their cause. About four years ago they attempted to complete a better organisation than they ever had, and succeeded, contrary to everybody's warnings, in getting nearly all their churches represented officially in a conference which was held in New York, where 600 delegates came together and founded a national conference, which had already had two sittings, and, there being only a meeting once in two years, that conference originated plans which had succeeded in dividing the whole Unitarian district—in fact, the whole of the United States—into local conferences, which corresponded very much with such societies as those they had assembled to promote, and they met once a quarter in their respective districts, where the details of the workings of the churches were discussed, and work set on foot. After many years of painful discussion, mutual suspicion, and jealousy, and great divisions, vicissitudes, and anxieties, they raised one new society every week, for forty or fifty weeks from the date of the convention to the time when he left the States, and from what he saw in the newspapers, he believed that, instead of a falling off, there had rather been an increase in the zeal and success in Church formations since he left the country. It would not surprise him at all if, in ten years from this time, the number of Unitarian churches in America should be doubled. They now numbered, perhaps, about 400, and he anticipated that in about ten years they would have 800 churches in America. The moment a religious denomination ceased to be a missionary organisation, that moment it might prepare to die, while he believed if they increased the missionary spirit ten-fold in America, that a proportionate blessing would attend them. He knew for a fact that the churches which did the most at home, by building schools and supporting in a liberal manner their own ministers and their own institutions, were the churches who did the most for others; and it was not all an uncommon thing in American churches to give from 30,000 dollars to 50,000 dollars a year for religious purposes. When the church of St. Louis was about to be re-erected some twenty-five years ago by the Unitarian Fund Society, many persons grumbled, on the ground that the society would have to lend them 500 dollars, perhaps, to build it. Yet that society had built a church which cost 100,000 dollars, and had given during the last twenty-five years about half a million of dollars to Unitarian institutions, while an University had been set up in St. Louis, which was unsectarian in character, but was chiefly Unitarian, and which had an endowment of half a million of dollars, and from 40,000 to 50,000 dollars a year were given by the society to various organisations in the United States. (Applause.) He wanted to say a few words to those present as to the vital importance of the position they occupied relative to the religious condition of this country at the present time. There were two dangers here in England which it seemed to him were rapidly ripening. One of these dangers was a reaction in favour of sacerdotalism, which, perhaps, when the Irish Church was disestablished, and also the English Church, would turn out to be a sort of Anglican Catholicism, the difference between it and the Roman Church being that one would have a connection with the Pope while the other would not; the other reaction, if it could be so called, was the tendency to the secularisation of the moral and spiritual thought and feeling of the time, and it seemed to him that this was a matter for more serious consideration than the English people seemed to be aware of. There was the same tendency in America, only in England there were more dangers woven around it; but he felt bound to say that some of the ablest, and, in many respects, the most interesting men he had seen in England belonged to that class of people. He thought, therefore, they should be a body of rational Christians standing firmly forward in defence of the right of thinking, and yet manifesting a believing spirit in regard to Christianity itself—a practical and honest religion. He believed the Unitarian body had it in their power to fashion a mould for the mind of the people, and that both in England and America; and he concluded by exhorting the Unitarians in that part of England to increase in zeal as a missionary body, and to stimulate each other to good works. (Loud applause.)

THOMAS COLFOX, Esq., then proposed—"That this meeting expresses its cordial wishes for the prosperity of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and begs to return to the committee its best thanks for having favoured this meeting with a deputation in the person of their esteemed secretary, the Rev. Robert Spears." (Applause.)

The CHAIRMAN said, as this association had lately had a considerable sum of money left to it—he thought to the amount of about £2,000—and as it had also received an impetus in other ways, he hoped it would do some great good with this money, and that some new churches would be raised, and assistance given to struggling churches.

The Rev. ROBT. SPEARS responded in a speech replete with information on the present state of the Unitarian cause in the country, and strongly urged the duty of its professors to increased zeal in its support, especially pleading the cause of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The Rev. H. HAWKES then gave "The youth of our schools and congregations, their spiritual growth and culture."

"The prosperity of the congregation at Wareham on their new connexion with the Rev. J. B. Lloyd" was responded to by that gentleman.

The Rev. W. HARGRAVE, B.A., responded to "Our friends from a distance."

Other sentiments having been proposed and acknowledged, thanks were accorded to the chairman, on the motion of the Rev. ROBERT SPEARS.

INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM FREE CHRISTIAN SOCIETY, LOWER FAZELEY-STREET.—The annual treat to the scholars of the Sunday and evening schools was held on Tuesday last at Lapworth. About 400 were present, and a great variety of games were enjoyed. An excellent tea was provided, and a brass band accompanied the party. All passed off satisfactorily.

CHORLEY.—On Sunday, June 28th, two sermons were preached in Park-street Chapel, by the Rev. Jas. Black, M.A., of Stockport, after which collections were made on behalf of the Sunday school, amounting to £11. 10s. The chapel was decorated for the occasion with flowers.

CYMBACH.—The annual meeting of the South Wales Unitarian ministers was held in Abernantygroes Chapel, on Wednesday and Thursday, the 1st and 2nd instant. The introductory services took place on Wednesday evening. Mr. D. Davies, student, Carmarthen, led the devotions. The Rev. W. Rees, Rhydygwin, preached from Luke v. 31; and the Rev. T. Thomas, Pantydeafid, from Matthew v. 48. On Thursday morning, Professor Evans, Carmarthen, opened the services—the preachers were Professor Hunter, Carmarthen, and the Rev. W. Thomas, Llandyssul, the former preaching on Matthew xxii., 42, the latter on the Temptation of Christ. In the evening the Rev. Kees C. Jones, Bridgend, led the devotional services. The sermons were preached by the Rev. J. Evans, Gillyonien, and Professor Evans, Carmarthen, the former discoursing on 1 John ii., 17, the latter on John xvii., 1, 2, from which he urged the doctrine of the final destruction of the wicked. After the morning service a conference of ministers was held; in the afternoon the annual business was transacted. At each of the services there was a large attendance; many friends were present from great distances. The number of ministers present was also large.

PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, CARMARTHEN.—On Monday, the 22nd ult., and the three following days, the annual examination of the students of this institution was conducted by a deputation from the Presbyterian Board, consisting of the Rev. R. B. Aspland, M.A., and John Warren and Joseph T. Preston, Esqrs., assisted by the Revs. Edward Higginson and Thomas Thomas, of Pantydeafid. The subjects of examination included the several branches of a classical, mathematical, and theological education, adapted to students who have devoted themselves to the ministry among the Protestant Dissenters. These several studies are pursued in the Carmarthen College by students of widely different theological opinions, and under the direction of teachers differing from each other in the same degree, in complete harmony. At a numerous social meeting of the friends of the college, of different religious denominations, the principles of free thought and free speech, on which it is conducted, were once more received with the fullest approbation and harmony, and with all the best principles of Christianity and promotion of them. On Friday, the prizes were distributed to the successful competitors of the several classes, with some kind words of approval and encouragement to each, by the Rev. R. B. Aspland, who concluded the business of the session with an address to the students, in which, with great power, he reproved the negligent, encouraged the timid, and commended the diligent and faithful, while he insisted on the importance of their several studies in connection with their efficiency in after life as Christian ministers.

SUNDERLAND.—On Sunday week, the annual school sermons were preached by the Rev. Joseph

Smith, of Idle, and collections made in aid of the school fund. In the afternoon a children's recital and religious service was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. J. Whitworth, who delivered an address, chiefly to parents and friends. On Monday evening, a tea meeting was held in the same place, upwards of one hundred present. After tea the proceedings were commenced by the chairman, the Rev. J. Whitworth, reading a report (the first of the kind) of the school work during the past year, and the officers for managing the school were appointed. During the evening addresses were delivered by the Chairman, the Revs. E. W. Hopkinson, and J. Smith, and Messrs. Taylor, Knott, and Metcalf.

WALSLEY.—On Sunday last, two sermons were preached in behalf of the Sunday schools by the Rev. John Wright, B.A., of Bury, when the sum of £42. 15s. 8d. was collected for the support of said schools.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. W. C.—D.—J. D.—H. Y. J. T.—Received.

MILE END.—We have received several letters of explanation in reference to an advertisement which appeared in our last impression, headed "Caution!" It is sufficient to say that Mr. Wells, by whom the advertisement was signed, wishes it withdrawn. The circumstances are sufficiently explained by the statement in the recent report of the London District Unitarian Society, that two congregations were likely to spring out of the effort at Mile End, one part remaining there, and the other commencing a new effort at Stepney.

QUERY—"THE NEEDLE'S EYE."—A correspondent asks if any of our readers can refer him to authority for the explanation of the passage about a camel going through the eye of a needle, viz., that the "needle's eye" is a name anciently, and still given in the East, to the small doorway by the side of the great gates of a city.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

To the Editors.—In the account of the proceedings at the meeting of June 18th, published in your paper, it is reported that Major Coppock "charged the secretary (Rev. John Wright) with sending out circulars drawn up so as rather to discourage than encourage congregations to appoint delegates." It is necessary that the following facts, which are not mentioned in the report of the meeting, should be made public:—

1. I stated (what was confirmed by the President and other members of the committee) that every circular issued since I was secretary has been presented to and approved by the committee before it has been sent out.

2. I produced the circular for the present year, and requested Major Coppock to point out what there was in it that could be complained of. He was unable to do so, and withdrew his charge, as far as this year is concerned.

3. I mentioned the fact that the circular for 1867 was prepared at a committee meeting, at which Major Coppock was present, and that its wording was framed according to his own express wish.

4. I challenged Major Coppock to prove any instance in which I have, as secretary, failed to perform my duties in a straightforward and honourable manner. The Major made no reply.

The office of Provincial secretary involves some labour. It ought not also to subject the person holding it to imputations of dishonourable conduct. When such imputations have been publicly made, they ought either to be substantiated or to be publicly withdrawn with an apology.—Yours faithfully, JOHN WRIGHT.

NEW TESTAMENT GREEK MADE EASY.

To the Editors.—Having, in my Cassell's Lessons on English, Latin, and Greek, published in The Popular Educator, attempted to aid upward striving young persons among the humbler classes to acquire the rudiments of a learned education, I have long desired to give similar assistance in regard to the Greek of the New Testament to any that may be willing to accept it. Mr. Sharpe's praiseworthy attempt to elevate the tone of Sunday-school instruction has revived the feeling; which is the stronger in me, because, if something is not done to restore the now all but lost taste for Biblical studies among laymen, the sacred cause of Christ will lack one of its strongest buttresses. Influenced by these considerations, I offer to do what I can to make the Greek of the New Testament easy, by a course of systematic lessons delivered in the Memorial Hall. As what costs nothing is generally considered worth as little as it costs, I intend to take a small fee. My proposal is to divide the year into three parts or trimesters, each three months in duration; to give, in the evening, one lesson a week, and to charge ten shillings each trimester, Sunday-school teachers five shillings, to be paid in advance. The manuals required will not cost more than six shillings and sixpence. In two years, a diligent student would be able to read the New Testament grammatically and readily. If fifty persons send me in their names as willing to form a class, I will call them together, and get to work.

The attention of ministers and superintendents of Sunday schools in and around Manchester is respectfully invited to this announcement.—Yours truly, JOHN R. BEARD.

[ADVT.]

"CLERKENWELL AGAIN."

To the Editors.—I have no doubt the above remark will be made by many of your readers when they cast their eyes down your advertising columns and behold the appeal from the Clerkenwell teachers; but there is no help for it.

When Aladdin—of old lamp notoriety—was in difficulties, he had a ring which commanded the services of a genii, who was enabled to assist him; but the Clerkenwell teachers, having no such valuable jewellery, they cannot raise anything on that. True, like Aladdin, they have an old lamp at the mission, but nobody considers it worth a new one; and if they were to rub it from morning till night it would only be served by the lamplighter. Clerkenwell's wants, then, being irrepressible, there is no other resource than to ask each of your readers to play the part of a friendly genii by sending a small contribution towards the proposed school treat.—Yours, &c., F. A. WIRDHOFFT.
29, Cross-street, Islington.

THE COMING WEEK.

Birmingham: CHURCH OF THE MESSIAH.—On Sunday, morning and evening, the Rev. Dr. Bellows will preach.
Penmaenmawr: PENDEFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A.
Bolton: BANK-STREET CHAPEL.—On Sunday, morning and evening, school sermons by the Rev. P. W. Clayden. In the afternoon an address by Mr. Geo. Smith.

Births.

ALLEN.—On the 7th inst., the wife of the Rev. E. Allen, of Lydgate, of a son.
BARMBY.—On the 3rd inst., the wife of the Rev. Goodwyn Barmby, of Wakefield, of a daughter.
MORLEY.—On the 28th ult., at Lelcoester, the wife of Mr. J. H. Morley, of a daughter.
THORNELY.—On the 7th inst., at Oakland Cottage, Godley, the wife of Frank Thorneley, Esq., of a daughter.

Marriages.

DORRINGTON—DAVIS.—On the 7th inst., at the Unitarian Church, Newhall Hill, Birmingham, by John Green, Albert, son of Thos. Dorrington, to Emma, daughter of Thos. Davis, all of Summer Lane, Birmingham.
THOMAS—ROEBUCK.—On the 4th inst., at the Fitzwilliam-street Church, Huddersfield, by the Rev. John Thomas, B.A., brother of the bridegroom, William Edward, second son of Mr. Robert Thomas, Stockport, to Sarah Northrop, only child of Mr. Henry Roebuck, Huddersfield.

Deaths.

McGOWAN.—Drowned at Seacombe, Cheshire, July 4th, Nina Elizabeth Clorinici Jane, second daughter of R. McGowan, Esq., M.D., late of Tandragee, county Armagh, Ireland, and grand-daughter of W. Spackman, Esq., of Belfast.
STEPHENS.—On the 7th inst., at Exeter, Harold James, only child of James and Emily Stephens, aged five years.

TEVERSHAM'S Boarding House, Commercial and Private, 22, Ironmonger Lane, Cheap-side, London.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at 11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED.

We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, clean-flavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY, WINE MERCHANTS,

26, MARKET-STREET,

And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool. MANCHESTER

NOW READY FOR INSPECTION.

WILLIAM MOSS wishes to call the attention of his Friends and Customers to his large Stock of WOOLLENS from the London, Scotch, and West of England Markets, consisting of the choicest designs for Trousers, Bannockburn Tweeds for Suits, and the "Alexandra" Cloth for Coatings.

FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

LONDON. SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL,

37, Queen's Square, Bloomsbury.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Beds from 1s. 6d. per Night.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Plain Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. For Home Comfort.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. not only speaks for itself, but hundreds of Visitors from all parts of Her Majesty's dominions have left most favourable Testimonials in the Visitors' Book, which is constantly on the coffee-room table.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. The motto of which is, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

LONDON: 37, QUEEN SQUARE, BLOOMSBURY.

SCARLETT FEVER, &c.

S. WHITEFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application. VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM HARRIS, of Aspley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, (Newham Hill), at his printing offices, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 73, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, July 10, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 377.

FRIDAY, JULY 17, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	Page
What the Churches are Doing.....	228
What is Saying on Church Matters.....	228
Advice to the Pope.....	229
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XII.....	229
Review: The Rise, Growth, and Danger of Socialism.....	229
Uniformity of Public Worship Bill.....	230
Misleading Signs of the Times.....	231
Ministers' Salaries Committee Report.....	231
Fire-side Readings: The Shady Limetree by the Way.....	232
The Shakers.....	232
Western Unitarian Association.....	233
Intelligence: Bolton, Lye Waste, Tamworth.....	234
Correspondence.....	234
The Coming Week.....	234

Post-office Orders to be made payable to Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester, to whom all orders and business communications should be addressed.

SWINTON CHAPEL.—The ANNUAL SERMONS in aid of the Sunday School will be preached by the Rev. JEFFERY WORTHINGTON, of Bolton, on Sunday, July 19th. Service at 3 and 6.30 p.m.

MILES PLATTING.—On Sunday, July 26th, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached; in the afternoon by the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, and in the evening by the Rev. G. H. WELLS, M.A. Afternoon service at three o'clock; evening at 6.30. Collections after each service in aid of the School Funds.

CHOWBENT.—SUNDAY-SCHOOL SERMONS, on Sunday next, at 10½ a.m. and three p.m. Preacher: Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL.

OLD CHAPEL, GREAT HUCKLOW.—On Sunday, July 19th, the TRIENNIAL SERMONS in aid of the Sunday and Week Evening Schools connected with the above Chapel will be preached by Rev. R. L. LLOYD. Service at half-past two and six. Collections after each service.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.—Full Information as to the Subjects in which Candidates for Admission to the above Institution will be examined may be obtained on application to the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A., George-street, Chestham Hill, Manchester. Applications from Candidates must be sent in, as above, before 1st September next.

UNITARIAN MINISTERS.—Ministers in the country, willing during the summer months to spend a few weeks in London or its suburbs, and undertake Pulpit Duty, are requested to furnish the undersigned with their names, and also with particulars as to the Sunday on which they will be at liberty. The necessary expenses will be provided for if an engagement is made.

R. BROOK ASPLAND,
ROBERT SPEARS.

SOUTHPORT, July, 1868.—The Committee of the Portland-street Unitarian Church appeal to the general Unitarian public to assist in paying off the debt contracted in the erection of their Church, which still amounts to about £700. They beg to remind their friends that the Church has been erected to supply a want which is participated in by visitors from the neighbouring towns, as well as by the inhabitants of Southport. While gratefully acknowledging the liberal help they have already received they again appeal with confidence to the generosity of those who sympathize with them in the support of a liberal and enlightened Christianity.

Subscriptions already received towards the payment of

D. B. L., London, per Rev. E. S. Howes.....	£1 1 0
Friends in Chester.....	2 18 0
Henry Long, Esq., Knutsford.....	3 3 0
Fellowship Fund, Halifax.....	2 2 0
Jas. Whitaker, Huddersfield.....	1 1 0
Fellowship Fund, Cross-street, Manchester.....	5 0 0
Joseph Ashworth, Esq., Manchester.....	1 1 0
R. T. Heape, Esq., Rochdale.....	1 0 0
T. Holland, Esq., Southport, 2nd donation.....	5 0 0
Thos. Standring, Esq., Manchester.....	5 0 0
J. Francis, Esq., ditto.....	1 1 0
J. Pearce, Esq., ditto.....	1 1 0
E. Aspin, Esq., ditto.....	1 1 0
Thos. Ashton, Esq., ditto 2nd donation.....	5 0 0
Francis Greg, Esq., ditto.....	2 0 0
Messrs. Horton and Bridgford, Manchester.....	5 5 0
Miss Blackburn, Manchester.....	5 0 0
Messrs. Bowden, Edwards, and Foster, Manchester.....	11 18 0
Subscriptions will be received by the Secretary, EDWARD JOHNSON, 6, New Promenade, Southport; the Treasurer, HOLBROOK GASKELL, Birksdale, Southport; Rev. THOS. HOLLAND, B.A., Belmont-street, Southport.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH AND SCHOOLS, STEPNEY, LONDON.

By a Sub-committee of the London District Unitarian Society assembled in Conference with the Committee of the Rev. J. Phillips's Congregation, on Tuesday, 12th May, 1868, at Stamford-street Chapel, it was resolved that assistance should be rendered to that congregation in obtaining a Permanent Place of Worship at Stepney Green.

In pursuance of such resolution, and through the kind instrumentality of members of the Sub-committee, a suitable site has been obtained on which to erect a Church, School, &c., at Stepney Green.

It has been determined at present to erect a neat and substantial Schoolroom, capable of accommodating about 250 persons, and that religious worship shall be conducted therein till the funds are raised for the Church.

The Congregation, consisting for the most part of working men, appeal most earnestly to the Unitarian public to supplement their efforts to open the School free of debt.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by
Mr. GEORGE RITCHIE,
84, Bread-street, London, E.C.;
Mr. F. M. WALLER,
100, Turner's Road, Burdett Road, London, E.;
And
The East London Bank, Cornhill, E.C.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—SATURDAY
TO MONDAY AT MATLOCK.—Every Saturday until the end of October, 1868, RETURN TICKETS, at the following low fares, will be issued from the under-mentioned Stations to MATLOCK BATH, by the Midland Company's New Route, by any of the ordinary trains on Saturday, available for return by any train on the following Sunday or Monday.

Stations.	First Class.	Second Class.
Manchester.....	9s. 6d.	7s. 0d.
Guide Bridge.....	9s. 0d.	6s. 6d.
Stockport (Teviot Dale Station).....	8s. 6d.	6s. 0d.

In Manchester, Tickets will be issued at Cook's Excursion Office, 43, Piccadilly, and at the Midland Booking Office, London Road Station.

Derby, May, 1868. JAMES ALLPORT, General Manager.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—CHEAP TRIPS TO SOUTHPORT, LYTHAM, BLACKPOOL, FLEETWOOD, and BELFAST, every Monday and Saturday; and to LIVERPOOL every Saturday until further notice.

From	a.m.	To Liverpool, B'pool, or F'wood.	To Lytham.	To Belfast, for 15 days.
Radcliffe.....	6 40
Bacup.....	6 25
Colene.....	7 0	8s.	3s.	8s.
Burnley.....	7 20
Accrington.....	7 55
Blackburn.....	8 20
Preston to Liverpool (Southport only).....	8 15	8s.	2s.

Returning same day from Liverpool at 5.40 p.m.; Southport, 6.15; Blackpool, Fleetwood, and Lytham, 6.25 p.m.
Return tickets for 14 days by same trains at low fares.
Also Excursions to Windermere, Furness Abbey, Isle of Man, Wales, &c.
For particulars see handbills. By order.
Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, Manchester, June 5, 1868.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—SUMMER EXCURSIONS, every Wednesday and Saturday, to HARROGATE and SCARBOROUGH, and every Saturday to BRIDLINGTON, FLEY, and WHITBY, until further notice, commencing on Saturday, June 27, 1868.

From a.m. Fares There and Back.

Bacup.....	10	Scarborough.
Preston (E.L.).....	11 25	To Harrogate. Bridlington, Fley, or Whitby.
Blackburn.....	11 50	.. 6s. 0d. 8s. 0d.
Colene.....	11 15
Accrington.....	12 5
Burnley (L.Y.).....	12 25

And other stations, as per bill.—Age three to twelve, half fare.
Returning any Thursday or Monday for nine days from date of ticket, as follows:—From Scarborough at 8.30 a.m.; Harrogate, 9.20; Whitby, 5.20; Bridlington, 8.20; and Fley, 8.56 a.m.
Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, By order.
Manchester, June 16, 1868.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—SUMMER EXCURSIONS, on SATURDAY AFTERNOONS, to WHALLEY, CLITHEROE, and CHATBURN.—The public are respectfully informed that a SPECIAL TRAIN will run as under, every Saturday during the summer, commencing Saturday, June 20, 1868:

STATIONS.	Time.	Whalley.	Clitheroe.	Chatburn.
	p.m.	1 cl. 3 cl.	1 cl. 3 cl.	1 cl. 3 cl.
Victoria (ordinary).....	1.30	4 0 2 6 4 0 2 6 4 0 2 6
Bolton (special).....	2 5
Bromley Cross.....	2 15	3 0 2 0 3 0 2 0 3 0 2 6
Chapel Town.....	2 20
Over Darwen.....	2 30
Lower Darwen.....	2 37	2 6 1 6 2 6 1 6 2 6 1 9

Returning from Chatburn at 8, Clitheroe at 8.5, and Whalley at 8.15 p.m. Children under 12 years of age half fares. No luggage allowed.

OBJECTS OF INTEREST.—Whalley, for Stonyhurst College, ruins of the Abbey, Milton Church, Clerk Hill, the Nab, &c. Whalley is one of the loveliest and most agreeable spots where parties can spend a delightful summer day. Clitheroe, for its Old Castle, where views of the unexcelled scenery can be seen. Chatburn, for Fendle Hill, Sawley Abbey, the banks of the Ribbles, Slaidburn, Grindleton, and many other places of interest.

Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, Manchester, June, 1868.

METROPOLITAN DRINKING FOUNTAIN AND CATTLE TROUGH ASSOCIATION.

115 Fountains and 93 Troughs for Animals have been erected, and are kept in repair, and supplied with water, by this Society. The Committee are urgently in need of Funds to enable them to sustain and extend the work, and they earnestly appeal for help to all who are anxious to promote habits of temperance or to alleviate the sufferings which are experienced by horses, dogs, sheep, and oxen in the streets of London from thirst.

JOHN LEE, Secretary.
Office, 1, Shorters Court, Throgmorton-street, E.C.
Banks—Messrs. Ransom, Bouvier, and Co., 1, Pall Mall East, S.W.; and Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, Tritton, Twiss, and Co., 54, Lombard-street, E.C.

MUSIC.—Mr. THOMAS RAWSON will RESUME his Instructions on Pianoforte, Organ, and in Singing, on Monday, the 27th Inst.
Ceeli House, Broughton Lane, Manchester.

MISS O'DWYER'S SCHOOL will be RE-OPENED Tuesday, August 4.
Northgate, Wakefield.

SOUTHPORT: ALBERT ROAD.—Mr. MILLSON will RE-OPEN his SCHOOL on Monday, August 3rd. He has three Vacancies.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.—The NEXT QUARTER BEGINS on Tuesday, August 4th.—During the erection of new premises, address 18, Regent-street.
EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Principal.

BROOK HOUSE, KNU TSFORD.—Miss CARBUTT expects to see her Pupils on Saturday, the 8th August.

THE CONIGRE, TROWBRIDGE, WILTS.—The PUPILS of the Misses MARTIN will RE-ASSEMBLE after the Midsummer vacation, on Thursday, July 30th.

LANCASTER.—The Rev. D. DAVIS, B.A., will RE-OPEN SCHOOL on Friday, August 7.—No vacancy.

MISS PILCHER'S SCHOOL, 3, Cavendish Place, near All Saints', Manchester, will RE-OPEN on Tuesday, July 28th. Results of examinations, terms, &c., on application.

THE Rev. JOHN and Mrs. OWEN wish to receive two or three Ladies or Gentlemen as BOARDERS during the season.

HIGH SCHOOL, 126, MUCH PARK-STREET, COVENTRY.—The Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., having taken extensive premises, is prepared to RECEIVE BOARDERS. Terms: 30 to 40 Guineas per annum. Full prospectus on application.

STAND GRAMMAR SCHOOL, NEAR MANCHESTER.—Head Master, Rev. JOHN DAVIES, M.A.—House large and commodious, locality healthy, playground attached, and number of pupils limited. Terms per annum: For Boarders under 14 years of age, £25; for Boarders above 14 years of age, £40. Day Scholars admitted at 12 guineas a year each. Full particulars on application.
N.B.—A Preparatory School for Little Boys and Girls, by Mrs. DAVIES. Terms: For Boarders, £25; for Day Scholars, four guineas a year.
The NEXT QUARTER will COMMENCE on Tuesday, August 4, 1868.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmshaw.

WANTED, a Situation, as NURSE, or Upper Nurse.—S. S., 33, Glengall Road, Cubitt Town, Poplar, E., London.

WANTED, by a Young Man (25), a Situation in an Office, Warehouse, or Mill, where he can be actively employed.—Reference, Rev. Brooke Herford, Higher Broughton, Manchester.—Address L. M., Herald office.

WANTED, an experienced middle-aged WIDOW, of economical habits, and her Daughter or Niece, to assist in the work of a small, quiet household, two gentlemen (one an invalid) and a lady. It is expected that no other aid will be needed than what the household so constituted will afford for all its work. Travelling expenses to town will be paid, and liberal wages will be given to a competent person, increasing annually with the daughter. Good character indispensable.—Application, stating particulars and giving references to be made, in the first instance, by letter addressed M. B., Mornington Library, Mornington-street, Camden Town, London, N.W.

NEW EDITION OF DR. EPHRAIM PEABODY'S "CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS."
Just published, neatly printed, and bound in bevelled boards, with red edges, price 3s. 6d., a new edition of
CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS.
By EPHRAIM PEABODY, D.D.
London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME
of the late
GEORGE BROWN,
Barrister-at-Law.
Containing 17 sermons preached by him in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle.
Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A., with
Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 8s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to
Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Barnard Castle.

Now ready, enlarged, stitched, and in coloured wrapper, No. 2 of DAYBREAK! A Journal of Facts and Thoughts in Relation to Spirit-Communion. Price 1d.
London: C. Fox, 67, Paternoster Row, Manchester: John Heywood, Deansgate. "Daybreak" may be obtained of all Booksellers.

In three vols. cloth, price 7s. 6d.
THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES. Translated by SAMUEL SHARPE. Being a Revision of the Authorised English Old Testament. "Superior to any preceding revision of our English translation."—Athenaeum.
E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

Nearly ready.
"THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK," price 4s. 6d.
TUNES TO ALL MARTINEAU'S HYMNS.
London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Friends' missionaries in Madagascar send home encouraging accounts of their progress. They had left the capital to visit some districts which white men have seldom, if ever, traversed. Here they met with a very hearty welcome from the natives. At Sakalava, in particular, their arrival excited general interest. Messengers were despatched far and wide to announce the visit of the strangers, and a large company speedily assembled. The two Quakers addressed the people in the Malagassy language, formed a Bible-class, and spent the remainder of the day in replying to the questions put to them on various portions of Scripture by the native converts.

Heber C. Kimball, second president of the Mormon Church, died at Salt Lake City, Utah, on Sunday, June 21. He was a native of Vermont, born June 14, 1801, and in 1832 became a convert to Mormonism. His wives and children numbered at last accounts sixty persons. The New York Times says that he illustrated the more striking peculiarities of the Mormon leaders, "their energy and astuteness, their self-sacrifice, their devotion to the church, and their power over its devotees." It had been generally expected that the sect would be broken up by the advance of civilisation westward, and that the Pacific Railroad now approaching Utah would especially injure it. But within the last few weeks Brigham Young has not only declared in favour of the completion of the line to Salt Lake City, but has taken a large contract for making it, and sent three of his sons, with several thousand Mormon labourers, to push forward the works. The exodus of Latter-day Saints, too, from this country still continues, and several vessels have been chartered by them at Liverpool for their conveyance to America.

Some of the large towns in Hungary have protested against the Papal Allocution. The Lloyd of Pesth says:

"We shall no more tolerate the interference of Rome in our legislation than we did that of Vienna. We shall tremble as little before a council of churchmen in Rome as we did before a council of war in Vienna. A nation which has passed without wavering through the fusillades of Haynau will be able to defend its independence against the thunders of the Vatican."

The Roman Catholics have had a meeting in London, at which Monsignor Talbot (the Pope's Chamberlain) and three or four Bishops were present, to promote the collection of funds for completing the church of St. Thomas, in connection with the English College at Rome. Archbishop Manning, who presided, said it was doubly important to honour this particular saint just now, as he died a martyr to the principle of the liberation of the Church from State control.

The heat of the weather seems to be getting into the Pope's temper, and he is described as having been for several weeks in a state of great excitement, which keeps up a panic in his household, and causes uneasiness to his physicians. He adopts the most rigorous measures against all who are suspected of liberal views, and is alienating and even banishing his best friends. He has summoned the Archbishop of Turin to appear before him, and answer for his conduct in announcing a plenary indulgence in honour of the marriage of Prince Humbert, which indulgence was repudiated in the Giornale di Roma.

The publication of the Bull convoking the General Council which is to heal the world's disorders, was the occasion of a curious ceremony. A pulpit was placed in the atrium of St. Peter's from which the Bull was read by a protonotary, accompanied by the sound of trumpets, while the college of apostolic protonotaries sat on benches below. Two copies of the Bull were then posted on the columns of the vestibule, and the same ceremony was repeated at four other places. The Pope afterwards solemnised high mass at the altar of St. Peter's, and a plenary indulgence was granted to the crowd that was present.

One day last week, in the French Legislative Chamber, M. Gueroult drew attention to the singular relations existing between Church and State, and advocated their separation on the ground that the Church of Rome condemned those principles of liberty on which the French Government was founded. At another sitting, the coming Ecumenical Council was discussed, when M. Ollivier expressed the opinion that, though the Government should throw no obstacles in the way of the publication in France of the Bull convoking the Council, it was advisable for it to abstain from taking any part in its proceedings, and argued that the Government should prepare a law for the separation of Church and State. M. Baroche, Minister of Public Worship, in reply, said that the Government had to regulate its conduct with regard both to the Concordat and the principles of '89. It had not yet decided whether France should be represented at the Ecumenical Council or not, and whether the decisions of the Council should be totally or partially admitted in France. With reference to the separation of Church and State, M. Baroche said it was necessary to leave time to solve that delicate question.

The Churchman says that Dr. Pusey has addressed a challenge "to an appropriate quarter," courting a prosecution with regard to some of the heretical doctrines of which he is looked upon as the chief exponent, and pledging himself not to interpose any technical or legal difficulties in the way of a full discussion of the case on its merits. The challenge (it is added) will no doubt be accepted.

The committee appointed by the General Assembly of the Scotch Kirk on the subject of patronage, has issued two sets of queries, one to the Presbyteries and the other to the elders, with a view to obtain information as to the working of Lord Aberdeen's Act for the regulation of patronage and the settlement of ministers, and whether any alteration of the law is expedient or necessary.

Dr. Norman Macleod is preparing for publication, in an enlarged form, the address delivered before the General Assembly, on the subject of missions in India, from which we gave one or two extracts at the time.

There has been a correspondence between the Rev. D. J. Vaughan, vicar of St. Martin's, Leicester, and the High Sheriff of that county, as to the right of the former to forbid the chaplain of the latter preaching the Assize sermon in his church—the said chaplain being Dr. Lee, the author of the "Directorium Anglicanum." The end of the correspondence is that the High Sheriff waives what some hold to be the right of the sheriff's chaplain to preach in the pulpit of any church where the judges are officially present, merely reminding the vicar that "Dr. Lee is, like himself, a beneficed clergyman of the Church of England, holding also a formal permission from three Bishops of the same Church to preach in their dioceses," and also "a distinguished member of a school as old as Laud and Andrewes, which at the present day is rapidly gaining ground in the English Church." The hostility between the rival parties in the Establishment is daily becoming more bitter, and this is only a specimen of the kind of family quarrels which are likely to disturb it for some time to come.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In a letter to the New York Watchman and Reflector, Dr. Pressensé gives a painful account of the progress of Materialism and Atheism in France. M. Sainte Beuve has raised the standard of Voltairianism with an energy and boldness which indicate that he has thousands of adherents after him. His popularity is immense, because he assails that priestly bigotry which is the grand antipodal of intelligent France. He has scarcely been answered except from the standpoint of the champions of Ultramontanism, who put forth their most insolent pretensions. Not a word of true liberty and true Christianity has been heard, nor a noble voice been found to speak at once for Christianity and liberty. It awakens poignant grief, under such circumstances, to see the Protestant Church divided, humbled, exhausted by intestine struggles. At all hazards, the institutions which prolong such a state of things must be broken up. Anything is better than stagnation; and M. Pressensé prays for and blesses the storm which shall deliver France from the union of Church and State—which shall break the fatal alliance that clips the wings of true faith.

On Friday night, Mr. Synan remarked in the House of Commons that the Government had scratched their original favourite, "Catholic University," and had elected to run "No Popery" for the "Election Cup." This horse, no doubt, has won some important stakes, and will be ridden by a knowing jockey, but the general opinion seems to be that its day is gone by.

The Record, with its usual charitable spirit, brands the Daily News as "seized with the leprosy of scepticism," because it gave a high character to the men who signed the petition for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Our Evangelical contemporaries say:

"We had hoped that this new candidate for popular favour would be saved from falling into the great spiritual apostasy which is at work, and the fact that an eminent Nonconformist [Mr. Samuel Morley], deservedly held in highest estimation, is named as chief proprietor, seemed to furnish a guarantee against any countenance being given to the Essayists and Reviewers, and other Rationalists and sceptics, or men of avowed heterodoxy. We grieve to say that we are mistaken, and that the Daily News is, like the Pall Mall Gazette, apparently taking the broad road of enmity to the doctrines of those who observe the commandment of our Lord and Master, and strive to enter in at the strait gate by the narrow way which leads to life eternal."

We take the following from the English Independent, and leave our readers to make their own comments upon it:

"The New York Herald has an amusing account of the inauguration of a 'Free Religious Association' in the United States. 'A number of prominent religionists, representing the majority of sects and denominations in America,' met at Boston 'just a year ago' to arrange preliminaries, and on the 29th of May just past 'a miscellaneous gathering of apostles of both sexes' took place at Boston to set the new movement fairly going. The proceedings were opened by the Rev. O. B. Frothingham, whom we have been accustomed to think of as a leading Unitarian minister of New York, but he must have advanced beyond that position now from his definition of free religion; he described Christianity as 'a sect not included in the great religions.' Their new association was to include something much wider than Christianity, for 'Christianity is a complex term, but religion is a perfectly simple term, and is understood all over the globe.' The association must not, however, be supposed to be a vague affair; 'any one,' says Mr. Frothingham, 'who has taken a part in the formation of this association knows perfectly where he stands, and has a definite will and purpose marked out.' The promoters had three sessions. Several spiritualist ladies and others of 'women rights renown,' took their turn on the tribune. Mr. Wendell Phillips lent his oratory for the occasion, and the proceedings were agreeably diversified by 'the vocal efforts of the Hutchinsons.' All this makes fine fun for leader writers in search of the grotesque, but minus the ladies and the vocal efforts of the Hutchinsons it has its parallel close to our own doors. 'Just a year ago' a 'number of prominent religionists of various sects and denominations,' met in London to devise a free religious association. Lest we should misrepresent the matter, we will take the description of the gathering from our contemporary, the Inquirer:—Representatives of various churches, or at least of various schools of theological thought, were called together to consider whether the time had not arrived to form something like a catholic union of religious men, and, if so, to devise some means for its expression in a corporate or organic form. Several addresses were delivered on the occasion by Mr. Thom, Mr. Martineau, Mr. Kirkus, Sir John Bowring, Mr. W. Miall, and other gentlemen, all approving, in a general way, of the union movement, and promising co-operation. They ultimately resolved upon the title of 'Free Christian Union,'—though, if our memory serves us, not without considerable opposition to the word 'Christian,' from some gentlemen who wished to include Jews, Mahomedans, and Buddhists; but they had, notwithstanding, 'a definite purpose,' and this very definiteness seems to be the hindrance to the movement. It has not yet attained to such proportions as to justify a great gathering: these 'movements' do not acquire impetus so rapidly as they do in the States; but we learn from the journal we have already quoted that its promoters had a meeting on Friday week, so that we may expect to hear something more of it shortly. The Inquirer is not sanguine. It thinks its friends 'seek too much, and that they do not set about it in the right way.' It has much less faith in special organisation to produce Christian union than in common work, and instances the practical Christian union exhibited the other day at Cheshunt as something much better than schemes for 'free union.' Depend upon it, 'Free Religious Associations' will not answer if they are to be fettered by anything so narrow as Christianity, nor unless they include both the strong-minded ladies and the vocal efforts of the Christy Minstrels. At least, so much will be needed to make them popular in England."

Mr. Spurgeon gave another little hit at "Mr. Samuel Wilberforce" in his sermon last Sunday but one. He said:

"We heard it said the other day that the religion of Jesus Christ could not be expected to prosper unless it had a fair start given to it, and, strange to say, that observation did not, as you might suppose, come from an infidel, but it absolutely came from a Bishop. A fair start, indeed! Put up the religion of Jesus Christ anywhere, and it asks for nothing. It only wants its own inherent strength to be developed, and to be let alone by the kings and princes of this world. To be let alone, did I say? Yes. Let these kings and princes oppose it if they like, only let them withdraw from it that deadly thing, their patronage, and the truth of God will always prevail, against every obstacle."

The Examiner concludes an article on the Bishop's speech by asking the following questions:

"What sort of faith in religion is this, which refuses to back it to win without heavy odds in its favour? Is our good Lord of Oxford thinking of changing his name? Or would he hereafter tempt men to call him Bishop Bewildered force?"

The Bishop's treatment of him is not likely to lessen Mr. Spurgeon's zeal for ecclesiastical freedom, as is shown by a vigorous speech which he delivered the other day at Stowmarket. He thus replied to the notion that a State Church makes a nation religious:

"Then this nation was a godless nation already, for the colonies, the major part of the population ruled by the Queen, had no national religion. He asked were the United States a godless nation? They were as religious a nation as any under heaven, and we ought to be proud of it. The Americans maintaining their religious institutions were as abundantly generous and as religious, he took leave to say, as this country was even in the palmy days of Laud, when the clergy had it all to themselves. He contended that a nation in which all the sects were compelled to subscribe to the support of one favoured sect did not look like a godly nation, whilst one of which all the various denominations conscientiously obeyed the Divine law as they understood it, and all cheerfully and without compulsion gave each according to his means to the cause of God, must be a godly nation."

We mentioned, two or three weeks ago, that Dr. Raleigh had been taken to task by some of his coreligionists for certain expressions in his Address to the Congregational Union, which were thought to savour of heresy. In two letters to the English Independent, he clearly and boldly defends what he had said, that there are "mistakes" in the Bible, and that "fallible men wrote the several parts of it." He has thought much and long on the subject, and he cannot make more of it than this:—

"That on the one hand we have the Book with its glorious message from God—from Him, by variety and strength of evidence altogether overwhelming—and that, on the other hand, we have in and about the Book certain human qualities and characteristics which are inconsistent with any theory of rigorous and infallible guidance of the authors and writers down to the minutest particulars."

In answer to a list of passages which one of his critics had brought to bear upon him, to prove the "dogmatic authority" of the apostles, he confesses to a "distrust of an argument which runs continuously through a long chain of Scripture passages;" and shows what a strong, and we should say unanswerable, objection to anything beyond a moderate presentation of doctrinal authority arises from the fact or right of individual liberty in the interpretation of the Scriptures, taken in connection with the corresponding fact that Christian people, in the exercise of this right, have arrived at diametrically opposite conclusions in regard to not a few points of what is supposed to be Scriptural dogmatic teaching. He rejoices to believe that there is "a common faith, answering to the objective truth that is most vital, in the universal Christian heart, underlying all outer diversities of sentiment and opinion"; but still, he says:

"If that inner substance of a common faith, that delicate essential thing, could be perceived and analysed by human thought, it would be found to lie close upon the facts, and to be but little dispersed among the doctrines. The facts, as I said, would have some doctrines in the heart of them, without the apprehension of which no man knows the facts truly. One word more. 'Authority' granted, although we differ in the conception and definition of it, there is a question yet remaining—How is it presented to us in the Scriptures themselves? Does it make appeal to our will for complete submission? or to our reason for rational consideration and acceptance? Are we to submit to it first, and then see it? or are we to see it first, and then submit to it? I dare say we should be agreed that the appeal is to both faculties; but the question is as to priority, and it seems to me that the general answer of the Scriptures themselves to the question may be condensed into this one word, 'I speak as unto wise men; judge ye what I say.'"

The Free Churchman has an essay on the position of Congregationalism to the working classes. Nothing is more clear than that the Established Church has utterly failed in its mission to them, and Congregationalism has gained more power over the middle classes than over the artisans. The fault has not been with the system, but with its adher-ents, who have been content with boasting of the elasticity of their institutions, without availing themselves of the advantages which that elasticity confers. The writer conceives that there is need of special work to be done among the labouring classes, and refers to certain points of Congregationalism which render it peculiarly fitted to bear an important part in that work—such as the assertion of individual right to responsibility in the Church of Christ; "the recognition of the fullest liberty and the maintenance of deep spiritual unity in the midst of many diversities, both in creed and ritual." As regards the kind of preaching best suited to working men, the writer thinks that the weak "simplicity" which some favour is only likely to offend manly artisans, who are not children, and should not be treated as such. Nor are they caught by mere sensationalism, and, much as they love anecdotal illustration, they do not care about it as mere garnish to vulgar, rough addresses. "They do not want elaborate dissertations, nor do they care for great precision and elegance of language. They desiderate force rather than beauty, true pathos more than poetic expression, the word that strengthens and quickens rather than that which charms the ear for a time, and leaves nothing but the lingering echo of a pleasant voice behind." Conferences, like those which were held a short time ago, are recommended; but, as far as we have been able to see, no particular good resulted from them, and they merely afforded an opportunity to a few lovers of notoriety to air their stock objections to religion and its professors.

At a meeting of the Church Union, the other day, Dr. Pusey took a bold stand against those who would degrade the Church into the mere creature of the State. He said:

"The English people will never be persuaded that we, the Church, sincerely worship our God if, while we stretch out one hand to Him, we stretch out the other to the world. We cannot at once retain our birthright and grasp at the mess of pottage. Erastian politicians will, in return for the votes of the parochial clergy, speak of Church and State,—maintain, perhaps, our endowments as long as they can; but our spiritual liberties, such as Magna Charta secures to us, such as the Church of old enjoyed, not one. But by how much the things of God are higher than the things of the world; by how much things eternal are of more moment than things of time; by how much the souls of men, purchased by the blood of Christ, are of more value than gold and silver; by how much the faith is dearer than life; by so much, it may be, will the things which we should have to give up be of more value than the things retained."

Referring to Mr. Gladstone's proposals respecting the Irish Church, and those which Mr. Disraeli is likely to make, he said:

"The Government has pledged itself, I believe, to accept the recommendation of the Commission, which recommends a reduction of the Irish Establishment. Who shall say beforehand what will be the difference between the two policies? Both propose reduction. Who knows that the difference may not turn out to be that Mr. Gladstone proposes reduction with freedom, and that the opposite proposal may be reduction with slavery? Better disestablish not the Irish Church only, but the English Church,—better undergo the loss of all things temporal, than that a Minister should have power to treat our clergy as civil servants."

ADVICE TO THE POPE—

DON'T TAKE TOO MUCH ROPE.

POOR dear Pio Nono! I prithee take warning, Nor good advice, though it is Punch's, be scornning. Take up what'er hobby may please Antonelli: Take to scouring your back, or to starving your belly—

To hair shirts or Chassepots, to Zouaves or penitents—

To preaching at women in tunics, or men i' tents— To holding your toe to be kissed by young 'Merica— To consigning King Victor to—let us say—Jericho— To putting down Campagna-cub-hunts or chignons— To gagging free speech, clipping freethinkers' pinions—

To sending gold roses to Queen Isabella, And making believe that she's all that you tell her— To threatening damnation to Austria's kaiser— To laying mare's nests for our own Advertiser— To cramming canards for our wonderful Whalley— Giving Orangemen points for a row and a rally— To sainting or sinning, blessing or banning— Finding texts for a Murphy, or truths for a Manning—

Bringing down Peter's keys, bringing up Peter's pence—

Putting truth in the Index, and banishing sense— Anything, in a word, that is commonly foolish—

And in mere Papal measure mistaken or mulish— But, as you your good would achieve and renounce ill, Have nothing to do with a General Council: The Council, I mean, that is called "Œcumenical," For which to Rome's bishops the earth o'er you pen a call.

Pan-Anglican Synods may look Lilliputian, To the crowd that obeys your world-wide allocution,

But, from small things to great, by that Synod take warning, Which left its foes laughing, and its friends in deep mourning.

For as sure as too many cooks spoil the broth, The Church will be spoiled by too much of "the cloth."

For proof I appeal to the deliberations— Conciones ad clerum—of our Convocations. No work they get through, not a question they settle:

'Tis but clerical pot pounding clerical kettle: Or if e'er they unite to direct Church's thunder, 'Tis to back an injustice or bolster a blunder. What'er your Episcopal Council proposes, For putting down Luther, or backing up Moses, They have no more chance of o'er-bishoping men so Than has Convocation of muzzling Colenso. Be wise, then, and stick to encyclic and syllabus, To mumming and mass in pontificabilibus, Prove Papal misdoings mere Protestant scandal, Excommunicate monarchs with bell, book, and candle,

Intone "Miserere" and chaunt "Dies Ira," O'er bishops and cardinals prone to inquiry, Trust Cullen in Ireland, or Manning in London— Their zeal may be checked, or their blundering undone—

But would you as Pope still direct fasts and feasts, 'Ware General Councils, especially priests'!

Punch.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—XII.

SUBJECT: The misleading doctrine of sins of ignorance among the Hebrews.

Read Lev. iv. 27—35, where we are told what animal must be brought as a burnt-offering to Jehovah by any one of the people who "sins through ignorance." The writer explains that when a man "doeth somewhat against the commandments of Jehovah concerning things which ought not to be done;" that is to say, transgresses one of the priestly ordinances, this, although done innocently and unawares, will make him guilty to a certain degree of wrong-doing, and as soon as he finds out his mistake, he is to bring his offering to make atonement. In the Book of Numbers, chap. xv., offerings for the same unreal sin are in a like way commanded. The confusion of mind thus caused between real doing wrong and this fictitious fault, would of course lead to quibbling. We find the writer of the Book of Ecclesiastes, chap. iv. 6, admonishing his readers that when they have done wrong they "say not before the preacher that it was an error" [better translated, a sin of ignorance]; that is to say, that they should not conceal their real fault by passing it off for one of these omissions of the ceremonial law. On the other hand, a man of a sincere mind would feel that this doctrine spread entanglements in the path of duty, and he might sorrowfully exclaim with the psalmist, Ps. xix., "Who can understand his errors [sins of ignorance]? Cleanse thou me from secret faults."

For an example of the many passages that may be found among the Prophets wholly opposed to this false doctrine, read Isaiah i. 10—20. Jehovah reproves the multitude of the uselessness of the Hebrew sacrifices; He cannot endure them, they are a trouble to Him. But "wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil, learn to do well." Show the fruits of a real repentance, and leave alone the rest.

REVIEW.

The Rise, Growth, and Danger of Socinianism. By Fr. Cheynell, late Fellow of Merton College. Quarto. London, 1643. pp. 75.

We have the authority of the Rock, the Record, and other comic papers, for asserting that Protestantism is in a dying state; and, disturbed as she is by Ritualistic chants on the one side, and the music of the Sunday bands on the other, the old lady's last moments are by no means peaceful ones. Our Prime Minister (in spite of the friendship he used to show for Austria and the Papacy, a few years ago) stands indeed in the ranks of the faithful; and it is a satisfaction to reflect that a Jew, whatever may be his errors, is, at any rate, not a Papist. Fortified by his sturdy support, our Irish Bishops may, for a few years longer, continue their interesting occupation of turning the strait and narrow path into an episcopal gold mine; and of finding a godly and wholesome doctrine in the Athanasian Creed, as interpreted by the able comment of an ample banking book. Yet it is rumoured that even a Disraeli has been so led away by considerations of mere worldly finance, as to suggest—to the terror of the Hibernian faithful—an increase in the duty on pepper. A fearful blow! which would render it impossible to supply with the present profuseness that pungent soup which is now the cheap support of Irish Protestantism. And in England, alas, things are almost as bad. Heretics and Ritualists are claiming the preposterous right of worshipping their Creator in the way which their consciences dictate. True Protestants are meeting them with the puny weapons of fines, suspensions, and prosecutions, instead of those more powerful arguments of fire and fetters which are alone warranted by the spirit and example of our early reformers. We trust that the book now under review will wake these timorous Boanerges to a more vigorous and consistent course.

From Cheynell's dedicatory epistle we find that, at the time of Lord Say and Sele's mission to Oxford, "there was notice given of a pestilent book very prejudicial both to truth and peace, and upon search made, the book was found in the chamber of Mr. Webberly, who had translated this Socinian masterpiece into English for his own private use, as he pretended; to which vain excuse I replied that I made no question, but he understood the book in Latine; and therefore had he intended it only for his own private use, he might have saved the pains of translating it. Besides, the frontispiece of the book under Mr. Webberly's own hand did testify to his face that it was translated into English for the benefit of this nation. Moreover there was an epistle to the reader prefixed before the book; (I never heard of any man yet that wrote an epistle to himself) and therefore sure he intended to print it." Webberly was a B.D. and Fellow of Lincoln College. As a prelude to a complete answer to him, Cheynell published the work before us. He opens his first chapter with the glowing remark that "The Socinians have raked many sinks and dung-hills for those rags and that filth wherewith they have patched up and defiled that leprous body which they account a complete body of pure religion." After admitting that Antitrinitarianism had supporters "even in the Apostles' time," he traces it down to the time when Servetus "did stubbornly maintain his cursed blasphemies for thirty years together," and found followers even after he had been burned, greatly to the disappointment of the enterprising Senate of Geneva, who "were in good hope by this exemplary punishment upon Servetus to crush this cockatrice's egg and kill the viper." (p. 6.) He remarks that though the heresy was most prevalent in Poland and Transylvania, yet it came originally from Italy. The Italian Church at Geneva did not realise the gentle hint that was given to them by Servetus's fate, and one of their members, Valentine Gentilis, having suffered imprisonment and divers other things from the Senate for his heresies, fled to Lyons, where he was again imprisoned for 50 days, but on his explaining that his only crime had been the opposing Calvin in theological controversy, "the Anti-Christian spirit which reigns in the bosom of Papists did incline them to forgive and release him." (p. 11.) Thence Valentine went to Poland, where he stayed two years, "but at last the King of Poland took notice of them, and intended to have published an edict against their heretical blasphemies, but then the anti-Christian spirit stirred up Cardinal Hosius to suggest another course to his Majesty." In spite, however, of this insidious priest, "God moved the King to banish all strangers and innovators in doctrine." (p. 11.) Whereupon he returned to Geneva, where, "by Divine Providence," a bitter personal enemy, "though it was not his turn, was Governor. . . . Valentine thought it his best course to put a good face upon the matter, and challenge any man to dispute with him, but the Governor, well-knowing that he had been very often disputed with, and fairly admonished, cried Nat quod justum est, and clapt him up close prisoner." Upon his examination before the Senate of Berne, to whom he appealed, "he complained that those churches which were called evangelical or reformed churches were still too much enslaved to the Pope; and yet when he was among the Papists he saw his own confession of that which he called his faith passed current enough." (p. 12.) The Swiss Reformers, however, valued the Protestant right of private judgment too highly to allow any one but themselves to possess it, and accordingly put Valentine to death—"his deserved punishment."

Cheynell then passes on to the lives of Lælius and Faustus Socinus, the latter of whom worked hard to spread the opinions which his uncle had taught with more wariness. Cheynell exposes the unchristian laxity of Faustus who (p. 20) "would account them brethren who counted him an heretic and held his opinions to be pernicious, upon condition they did their best to live in obedience to Christ's precepts, and sought in a fair way to convince him by Scripture. Explic cap. prim. Jeh., p. 4. But though he pretended to be ruled by Scripture, it is most evident that all his art was to withdraw men from hearkening to the plainest texts of Scripture which do contradict blinde carnall reason." Strange to say, many men were led away by these impudent heresiarchs. Cheynell's second chapter begins (p. 21) with the sad reflection, "Ill weeds thrive apace; Lælius had sown his errors as hath beene already shewen in some five or sixe yeares, within ten yeares space there were whole congregations submitted themselves to the Socinian yoke in Salmatia, as Dr. Calovius assures mee. Consid. Th. Soc. Proemial, p. 65. And this heresy did spread so fast in Transylvania that within twenty yeares after there were some hundreds of congregations infected. Ut via triginta elapsis annis aliquot centuriæ catulum talium ibidem numeratæ fuerint. Ibid." His third chapter on "The Danger of Socinianisme" not only shows the impossibility of calling these abandoned men Christians, but, upon quoting the bold assertion of Smalcus (Contra nova monstra), "A man may be a Christian who denies the divine essence of Christ," he adds (p. 24), "I cannot but blot out Smalcus his name out of the white roll of Christians, if it were but for that one blasphemy," which seems a little severe. He faithfully exposes the un-Protestant spirit of the Socinians, and their readiness to dethrone "the received interpretations of fathers or councils" that they may "set their own private spirit or judgment in the chair, which is, indeed, to make every man a Pope"—a presumptuous heresy, too well calculated, alas! to please the multitude, "for every one would faine have his reason, his fancy, to sit judge in all controversies. . . . Every one desires to give a toleration or a dispensation to himself, that he may be allowed to maintain such opinions . . . as are generally condemned by the judgment of learned and pious men." (p. 26.) "There is another quarrel that they pick with the Reformed Churches, and that is, for extolling their doctors too highly, such as Luther, Brentius, Melancthon, Bucer, Chemnitius, Calvin, Beza, Zuinglius, and the rest; but they [the Socinians] would pardon this error, if they [the churches] did not oblige other men to stand to the judgment of these and such like reverend authors; if they"—Popish traitors!—"might but have their liberty of prophesying according to their own private spirit or judgment, they would be content; but the cause of the quarrel is that the churches," exercising the lawful authority of infallible Protestants, very properly "pass their censures upon such as dissent from the most received interpretations of fathers, councils, and the reformed divines."

Cheynell afterwards proceeds to expose the Socinianising tendencies of various High Church and Latitudinarian divines of that day. Our readers may remember that he attended at Chillingworth's funeral, to fling into the grave the incomparable "Religion of Protestants," with a savage prayer that it might "rot with its author." In the work before us, he (p. 30) exposes Chillingworth, who had dared (Section 29) to speak of the Socinians as Christians, and had added, "They explicate the lawes of Christ with more rigour and less indulgence to the flesh than the Papists do"—which Cheynell remarks "is true, but not much for their commendation, because they thereby disgrace the moral law of God and say it was imperfect till Christ gave new laws."

He exposes Acontius, who had urged the advisability of re-uniting all Christians on the basis of fundamental agreement, and whose work (the "Stratagems of Satan") had, sad to say, been actually reprinted at Oxford. He, ferrible to relate, "thought nothing else fundamental but obedience to Christ's precepts," and actually "conceived Abraham to have been ignorant of those heads of divinity which we count articles of faith."

But (p. 49) he reveals the existence of a Socinian alliance in a quarter where we should never have suspected it. "What practices there have been by the Popish party for the promoting of the Socinian heresies, I could show at large, if it were not too manifest to be proved. Faustus Socinus writ a most pestilent book On the authority of Scripture, and this book he did privately leape about in writing to his friends. Dominicus Lopez, a Jesuit, it seems was a great friend of his, and the book coming to his hand, he thought fit to publish it for the common good. Mr. Webberly, in the Appendix or Sixth Book of his Translation, shows that the two great articles which offend the Romanists and Racovians are—1. The total exclusion of all kind of good works from justifying a man before God; and 2. The total negation of man's freewill in doing good."

When we reflect that the Record's time is taken up with superintending the souls and insulting the religious opinions of all its fellow-Christians in Catholic countries, and the majority of those in Protestant ones, we can hardly hope that it will have that leisure for the history of Protestantism which it has never yet had for Whately's "Logic" or Lindley Murray's "English Grammar." I may, however, peruse this slight memorial of those reforming heroes who, in the name of conscience and God, burned His image and the Pope's Bull with equal triumph. If so, it may see the necessity of consistency with its party traditions. We may shortly see Dean Stanley condemned by the Evangelical Alliance to imprisonment for life in Exeter Hall, and escaping thence to the Birmingham Oratory, where we have no doubt that Dr. Newman, "with the anti-Christian spirit which reigns in the bosom of Papists," would at once "forgive and release him." Or, on the other hand, a truer conception of the principles of the Reformation may prevail. The pious may cease to maintain that "The Confessional Unmasked," and it only, is the religion of nineteenth century Protestants. The creeds and dogmas of Popish ages may give place to the grand old German watchword of "The Rights of Conscience." And we perhaps may be deemed not heretics, but true and consistent Protestants, for taking as the best motto of our faith, "God and Liberty." CYRIL.

UNIFORMITY OF PUBLIC WORSHIP BILL.

In an article on the debate upon Lord Shaftesbury's Bill, the Pall Mall, while feeling that nothing can be more paltry than the particular points at issue about vestments, incense, and the like, considers that it was of great interest, as showing the sort of result towards which we are tending in ecclesiastical affairs.

The substantial question which the Ritualists are raising is nothing less than this: Who is to be master in the Church of England, the clergy or the laity? A thousand symptoms make it perfectly clear that the Ritualist movement is almost entirely confined to a comparatively small section of the clergy, supported by a very small minority of the laity. Amongst others, we may notice the fact that not one of the speakers in the House of Lords the other night supported the Ritualists on the ground that they were right. The only remark made in their favour was made by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and was to the effect that the bill, if passed, "would be simply an act of the Legislature, without any reference to the feelings, views, or opinions of the Church" (by which the Archbishop obviously means not the nation at large, but the clergy of the Church of England, or at most the clergy supported by clerically-minded laymen), "an act which might perhaps override the opinions of the clergy," and which the Archbishop thought "would effectually lead to disruption." That the introduction of Ritualism as an indirect way of teaching several of the characteristic doctrines of Popery is thoroughly unwelcome to the great bulk of the laity of the Church of England, and that it has a tendency to alienate some Protestant Dissenters, and in particular the Wesleyans, from the Church of England, is vigorously asserted by Lord Shaftesbury, and is, we think, manifestly true. The practical question is, what under such circumstances ought to be done? Several answers are given. One is that, whereas liberal comprehensiveness is the peculiar characteristic of the Church of England, the variety of opinion and practice which Ritualism denotes should be left undisturbed. Another, which is perhaps the same answer in another shape, is that the risk of disruption is so great that it ought to be avoided at the price of submitting to the existence of an evil, if Ritualism is to be regarded as one. A third answer is that the case is one for legislation, and that, if legislation drives the Ritualists out of the Church of England, and creates one sect the more in a country which is already full of them, it will do very little harm. This last opinion we most incline to; and though there may be more or less weight in the objections already noticed, we think that the advantages of legislation would far outweigh them. As to the theoretical objection founded on the liberalism of the Church of England, it is founded upon a misapprehension of the nature of the liberalism of the Church of England. It is an institution supported and governed by Parliament for certain purposes, one of which is the celebration of public worship in a manner judged to be on the whole desirable, and another the maintenance of a class of men who will study and teach theology. In order that they may study and teach theology to good purpose, it is desirable that they should be free to choose between a variety of theological systems, and this freedom they accordingly possess, though, as every one knows, it is not altogether unlimited; but the question how public worship shall be conducted, what is the true theory of it, and what practice ought to be founded upon that question, are matters upon which the governing body of the Church—that is, Parliament, and not the individual officers of the Church, the parochial clergy—must decide. The liberalism consists not in flinching from the responsibility of forming an opinion and acting upon it, but in assigning its proper place and due prominence to the opinions formed by others. People rarely fall into any confusion upon this subject in lay matters. For instance, take the case of law. Judges, barristers, and attorneys are permitted freely to criticise the law of the land, to declare their opinion that for such and such reasons it is objectionable and ought to be altered in such and such respects; but they are bound both to know it, obey it, and administer it with unhesitating submission; nor does any one see any inconsistency or indecency in this. If Parliament or if the Admiralty are of opinion that ships of war should be built in a certain manner, the dockyard authorities are bound to build them according to orders, though they may publish pamphlets and write letters to the papers to show that they ought to be built otherwise; but no one calls Parliament or the Admiralty intolerant for deciding how they shall be built, or for compelling their subordinates to build them so and not otherwise. So with public worship. How it is to be conducted, and on what principles, is a question for the legislature of the Church—that is to say, for Parliament—and it is no more illiberal for Parliament to decide whether the Church service shall be so conducted as to recognise and typify the truth of the sacramental theory, than it is for Parliament to decide whether ships shall have broadside guns or turret guns. Whether the sacramental theory is true or false is a matter about which people will probably dispute for a long while, but a great public institution ought to be conducted either on the principle that it is true, or else upon the principle that it is not true, for most certainly it is either a truth of unspeakable importance or a most pernicious superstition. To allow individual clergymen to regard it as either, and to defend and propagate their views in their personal capacity, is necessary as being the only known security for truth. To allow clergymen in their official capacity to act upon a view opposed to that which prevails amongst those who govern the institution, is mere weakness and timidity, of which we have had far too much in the management of Church affairs from the Reformation downwards. It is highly desirable in our opinion that the English people should prove by an act of ownership that they are the masters of the Church of England, and that the clergy are their servants, and that those who do not like the service may leave it. As for the immediate loss and gain of such a measure it is no doubt worth the counting. There would no doubt be some loss, but the gain, we think, would largely preponderate. The first effect would probably be the formation of a small free Church, but such a body would be no more considerable than its deserts. Many of its members would, no doubt, become Roman Catholics, for it would consist only of the most earnest and vigorous Ritualists; the waverers, the moderate men, would, upon one ground or another, stand by the endowments. An earnest and vigorous Ritualist, finding himself excluded from the Church of England, would soon feel that the Church of Rome was the real place for him, and the result would simply be to deepen, strengthen, and reassert the Protestant character of the Church of England at the expense of adding to the number of Roman Catholics a certain number of people who hold as it is the most objectionable parts of the Roman Catholic creed. On the other hand, if the Church of England were once to take up frankly and decisively a Protestant position, it would become apparent to the great body of Dissenters in England and foreign Protestants elsewhere that the differences between them and the English Church were in truth imperceptible, and that the points of sympathy between them were deep, numerous, and important. Two centuries ago the Church of England might have been made truly national if it had not been for the High Churchmen of that day. Great changes will assuredly be made in it before long. When the time for them comes, their nature and direction will depend very much upon the question whether the Ritualists still form a powerful party in the Church or not. It must never be forgotten that this whole subject is one which will settle itself if it is not settled by the Legislature. It is needless to say what are the reasons why Church Establishments are on their trial in this country at all events. If the law does not deal with Ritualism, the people will deal with it after this fashion. They will say sooner or later, this kind of Church suits us as little as the Protestant Establishment suited the Irish, and sooner than see Popery brought back under an alias we will break up the whole institution.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, JULY 17, 1868.

MISLEADING SIGNS. OF THE TIMES.

OUR own columns present, week by week, certain signs of the times. We see there records of the more prominent instances of narrowness and liberality throughout the churches. And we must sadly confess that too often the narrowness seems to predominate; and our hearts are saddened from time to time as we think we see indications that the great power of orthodoxy is still all-pervading and unbroken. We sigh, "How long?" How long will it be before the iron rule is broken, and freedom and light prevail?

But now we would say that we may be too apt to misinterpret these signs of the times; and because we see so few signs of liberal movement, because we do not hear more often the voices of the larger and freer minds in convocation, and church meeting, and similar places, we are apt to fancy the liberal movement immeasurably less than it is. If, however, we reflect a little, we shall be assured that there must be an immense current of liberal religious thought slowly but irresistibly moving beneath the surface of society, deepening and broadening, and gathering strength from day to day. Let us believe a little in human nature. Our fellow-men have the same faculties and aspirations that we have, and they have only to be put under the influences that have made us what we are to become very much like ourselves. And thousands and tens of thousands of the young men who have during the last few years been entering the pulpits, and of those who will enter them in years to come, have been brought up under influences very much akin to those in which we have rejoiced. They have grown up in that new world of thought which has spread in society. It has been as impossible to shut them from it as to shut them from the atmosphere. It has been around them like the palpable air. It has pervaded the popular literature, has met them in the newspaper, has been kept constantly before their thoughts in the great questions of the day. Let us be assured that among so large a portion of our fellow-creatures there will be no small band of minds large enough and strong enough to gather strength and freedom from such influences to be the leaders of the future. They have been like men turned out on the free moors and mountain slopes, breathing the fresh breezes and inhaling at every pore the all-quickenening light. Those who have vitality in them, we may be sure, will grow strong under such experience. It is only the hopelessly weak, for whom the breezes are too strong, and for whose feeble eyes the light is too overpowering, that, shutting themselves up in their own retreats, will remain unchanged. Trusting to effects from studying causes, then, we should say that there is a body of the younger men in all Protestant churches gradually growing and gathering strength, who are deeply touched by the liberal thought of the age. That we should not hear much of these men is exactly what we ought to expect. They are too scattered—too little organised at present—to venture to make any very public manifestation. And then, again, they have little to say on the great platforms of society; it is the noisiest, and loudest, and most fanatical among the sects that lift up their voices there. Their work is a very different one. It is in their own circles, and by quiet persevering toil to cause the nobler views of God and life to permeate their portion of society, trusting that before such views the old errors will gradually die away. They do not, perhaps, feel that their work is to come forward as Iconoclasts to rouse the whole army of the ignorant and the fanatical against them by attacking their errors. They feel, it may be, that the best way to expel darkness is to let in the light.

Again, the minds that hold correct theological views to be all-important, and who, never having doubted, hold sharply-defined doctrines, easily expressed, are those most naturally to be found at the surface of society. They have doctrines and systems to defend. They do not, cannot feel that the spirit of the age is on their side, and so they must fight with all their strength to hold their own. The great body of liberal thinkers are yet in a state of transition, they have not built up their thoughts into a clear and sharply-defined system. And then they are content to bide their time, knowing that the tendency of the age is sweeping irresistibly on in their direction.

One thing they find it possible almost everywhere to do—without proclaiming war with the orthodox system—to select out of its vast store of heterogeneous materials those views of the love of God and the beauty of goodness which are in accordance with their own thoughts. We may depend upon it that if we could drop into church or chapel all over the land, here and there, not unfrequently we should hear views preached identical with our own. The hearers do not suspect they are listening to Unitarianism, because no denials are made, no prejudices are directly attacked, and only doctrine is set forth which is theoretically held by the Christian world at large. This state of things will become more and more common, and as the old generation of orthodox minds passes away, the voices which plead for narrowness and bigotry will be more and more seldom heard. And in a few years the minds that will bear religious sway in England will be of those who are quietly working and thinking, and making no noise at present.

MINISTERS' SALARIES COMMITTEE REPORT.

We publish, at the request of the committee who have so long had this subject in hand, the subjoined report, which was presented at the last meeting of the Provincial Assembly:

It will be in the remembrance of this Assembly that in presenting their report for 1866-7, the committee did not ask for re-appointment. It was, however, considered desirable that they should continue the agitation of the subject for another year at least. During the past twelve months your committee have held only two meetings, inasmuch as they had come to the conclusion that the only mode of operation which remained to them was a series of papers in the periodical Unitarian newspapers. Considerable difficulty arose in carrying this into effect, inasmuch as it unfortunately happens that the laity have been very much dependent on the ministry for the agitation of most subjects, and are therefore often at a loss how to put forth their own ideas and views in a manner calculated to enforce on others the convictions which they entertain. In the present instance, the peculiar position of our ministers rendered impossible a general appeal to them for assistance. The committee, however, have succeeded in getting written a series of articles, which have appeared in the Unitarian Herald. These, they hope, may be productive of good results, and aid in fixing firmly in the minds of their fellow-Unitarians the conviction of the absolute necessity for an increase of salaries, and of an earnest and individual working for this end. Your committee would call attention once more to the facts which they have elicited as to the exceeding smallness of remuneration, the average being only about £120 a year; to the fact that the amount contributed by individuals is pretty generally in inverse ratio to the amount of endowment; that the number of our more highly-trained ministers does not increase in the same proportion as our congregations and mission stations increase. If we are to look around among the ranks of our younger ministers, there are comparatively few on whom our body would unanimously fix as worthy to succeed our older ministers when they enter into their rest. The committee also believe that no stronger argument in favour of an increase of salary can be adduced than this—that the higher standard of education amongst our laity necessitates a higher culture in our ministers, if they are hereafter to retain the prominent and influential position they hitherto have held amongst us.

The committee also beg unreservedly to state that in any argument they have brought forward in favour of a higher education of students, they do not intend in the slightest degree to find fault with those of our ministers who may be considered rather as active workers than as quiet students. To both of these classes the committee consider that the increase ought to be extended. Both are eminently useful, and neither can do well without the other. The object of the committee has been, by promoting an increase of salaries, to give time to the minister for a prosecution of those studies or of that work which is best fitted to his sphere of usefulness, and in either case to allow him to pursue this course without those pressing and harassing cares which a narrow income forces upon every one.

The committee would also call attention to their conviction that the increase of ministers' salaries must not be one arising from a temporary and spasmodic effort, but must result from exertion steadily and constantly made; that they ought to be augmented in somewhat the same proportion as the income of other classes in society, whether mercantile or professional, have been increased, in order that the minister may maintain, relatively, the same position with respect to his congregation that he did in days of old. It has been objected by some that an increase of salary is not the one thing needed; that it is religious zeal and earnestness in the minister, and with those qualities salary is a secondary object. Whilst the committee fully and freely admit that learning alone cannot make a minister, they still must decidedly and distinctly state that in their opinion it is not a question of inducing men deficient in the above qualities to enter the ministry, but it is a question of simple justice that the laity should place in a position of ease and comfort those who devote to their best interests talents of a high order, and qualities of head and heart which would enable them to take a good position either in commercial or professional circles. Thus, whilst not tempting unfit men into the ministry, yet they would not deter them, when competent, from entering it by the fear of poverty, not only to be endured by themselves, but which must be shared by those whom they hold closest and dearest to them. Your committee may be pardoned for adverting to the unquestionable facts that, shortly after the commencement of their agitation, a new and wide-spread interest developed itself in many other religious bodies on the question of ministers' remuneration. In the Independent Connexion this has been the case in a marked degree; as it has also amongst the Methodists, the Scotch Presbyterians, and other denominations. It is worthy of remark that in America the same effort has been observable as in our own country to induce the laity to contribute more heartily to the support of their ministry, and no longer to give "that which costs them nothing" to the agencies on which mainly depend the religious education of themselves and children.

In looking back over the labours of five or six years, your committee rejoice to discern some evidence that the cause they have sought to promote has made progress. If it were expedient, they could specify several congregations—some large and influential, and others of comparatively limited numbers and resources—in which a material advance has been effected in the salaries previously paid to their ministers. But besides these cheering facts, they have reason to believe that the efforts they have made to arouse attention and quicken conscientious action in this matter have been not unsuccessful in many other quarters, and that seed has been sown which in after years must prove productive.

The committee feel that they cannot now, in deference to the principles which they have enunciated, further carry on the agitation with effect; and in taking leave of this Assembly, they would entreat of them, and of the Unitarian body at large, to remember that on each one of them individually depends whether we are to take, in the future, as we have done in the past, a lead in all that conduces to the enlargement of civil and religious liberty and to the progress of true religion; or whether we are to rest satisfied with what our forefathers have done for us, and quietly enjoy that inheritance without striving to leave it increased and enlarged and purified to our children. And they would earnestly entreat every one forthwith to contribute to the utmost of his power for this most desirable object, and diligently to enforce upon others the conviction of its necessity.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE SHADEY LIMETREE BY THE WAY.

BESIDE the hot and dusty way,
Upon a summer's burning day,
A youth, footsore and travel-stained,
I passed into the shade so cool—
'Twas bathing in an airy pool—
The shadow of the limetree gained.
Instant adown I threw the load
Borne many a mile along the road,
And then my body down I threw,
Spread on the grass each burning palm,
And felt the cool refreshing balm—
Life, life returning in soft dew.
The coolness of the grassy shade
Began my body to pervade
Through every pore from sole to crown;
Unbooted feet, uncovered brow,
Beneath the shadow of the bough
Were cooling down—were cooling down.
A dream of friends I'd left behind,
Of friends I hoped ere long to find,
Who knew not of the way-worn boy:
Over my fevered spirit came,
With the cool shade dew on my frame,
Distilling drops of gentle joy.
There passed no creaking, rumbling wain,
No frocked and heavy-footed swain,
No country girl, coy, half afraid,
No farmer on his old slow mare,
No rustic urchin with a stare—
Nought roused the refter in the shade.
There was no song of singing bird,
No voice of sheep or kine was heard,
No rippling, murmuring brook passed by,
There was no sound of waterfall;
Hot noon had seeming silenced all—
Brook, bird, and beast—'twas all bright sky.
So with the dream my eyelids closed,
And there I lay as if I dozed
Upon the shady grass outspread;
Anon I opened my eyes, and lo!
Myriads of blossoms in full blow,
With the soft hum of bees o'erhead.
The blossoms in long traces hung,
The bees alighting, sipped and swung
On blossoms delicate and chaste:
A world of beauty and soft din,
With constant passing out and in,
Of winged visitors in haste.
At length I rose, took up my load,
And stepped into the dusty road,
And with a blessing left behind
The shady limetree by the way,
With blossoms hanging on each spray,
And hum of bees—to me so kind.
O, that the traveller way-worn
On life's hot, dusty road forlorn,
Could ever find on grassy sod
A shady limetree by the way,
Where he might halt and down him lay,
Unloaded, unbonneted, unshod!

Stand. JOHN DAVIES.

THE SHAKERS.

MR. HENRY VINCENT, in a letter to the Star, gives the following account of a visit to the Shakers:

On the north-western border of the State of New York, within a mile of the dividing line of Massachusetts, and about 150 miles from the city of New York, is the summer retreat of Lebanon Springs. Hills, mountains, and valleys, trees, gardens, farm-houses, and farms spread around and above you in ever-varying beauty, reminding one of the hills and valleys of Llangollen in Wales. On the side of one of the mountains—Mount Lebanon—commanding a fine view of the whole panorama, cluster three distinct portions of that singular body of people called by the vulgar, "The Shakers." This "society of believers" is the product of that mighty upheaving of the mind and soul that manifested itself in England and Europe during the greater part of last century. Wesley, Whitfield, the French Prophets, Emanuel Swedenborg, and others, all represented, with more or less truth and power, the yearning of living souls for light, life, and salvation. In this great awakening, as in the time of the Commonwealth, many strange doctrines and new sects rose and fell, and among these we must class the people called Shakers. About the year 1758, Ann Lee, of Manchester, England, came under strong religious convictions, and, joined by six or eight brethren and sisters, under the guidance of a vision, left England for America, settling in this country. After working separately for a living, and suffering much persecution and hardship for many years, the little band gathered into a religious society in the woods of Waterylist, near Albany, in 1776. In 1779 a great revival of religion occurred in New Lebanon, and in other towns and villages, and many of these people were gradually impressed by Ann Lee and her friends that the time had come to gather themselves out of the world, and in the power of the Holy Spirit "to crucify all worldly lusts"—and to enter into the spiritual Millennium Church, in the practice of perfect chastity, temperance, charity, brotherly and sisterly love—abandoning all private property for the common good, and having, like the early Christians, "all things in common." From their great fervour in preaching—their tremblings and quakings—they were spoken of as "Shakers," which name they are by no means ashamed to adopt. Their progress was necessarily slow, as they took up a cross too heavy to be borne by ordinary men and women of the world. The Shaker communities are divided into families. Within sight of each other at Mount Lebanon are three of these families—North Family, Church Family, and South Family. The first numbers sixty brethren and sisters; the second 120. In the New Lebanon Society there are altogether eight of these families—in all 500 brethren and sisters. This New Lebanon Society owns 6,000 acres of land—a large proportion of which is devoted to fuel, timber, and sheep. This people also possess garden seeds, herbs, and fruits, which are everywhere famed for their quality. Throughout the Union there are eighteen flourishing Shaker societies, sacredly living a celibate life, and enjoying a perfect community of worldly goods.

We reached North Family about seven o'clock, and were welcomed with modest grace by an elderly sister, and we soon grasped the warm hands of Elder Frederick Evans, who, some months ago, courteously invited me to share "the simple hospitalities" of the society. We were soon introduced to other brethren, and found ourselves at home and at ease with our hearty friends. The brethren and sisters at North Family occupy three neat and substantial houses. There is no restraint other than the restraint of good breeding and true Christian propriety. Brethren and sisters at North Family occupy the same houses, the sleeping accommodation being at opposite parts of the dwellings. They rise at half-past four o'clock in the morning, breakfast at six, dine at noon, supper at six in the evening, and retire to rest about ten. At meals the women occupy one end of the table, the men the other. Before meals they all kneel down, and offer thanks and prayers in solemn silence. My friend and I took our meals in a small neat room alone. We were waited upon most attentively by one of the sisters, who constantly left the room, returning to inquire if anything was wanted. A Shaker meal is a wholesome feast. A room beautifully clean, a plain, clean table, good white and brown bread, sweet fresh butter, rich milk and cream, well-cooked meat, plain vegetables, preserved fruits; but all served in the simplest, neatest, and most economical way. We occupied two bedrooms that opened one into the other. The beds are sweet and clean, and you sprawl in them with a perfect delirium of lazy delight. All the rooms of the houses are cleanliness and neatness to perfection. Round about are the gardens, orchards, farms, workshops, barns, and storehouses. The large barn is the most perfect model for space, convenience, and ventilation. It consists of three storeys, the lower storey being appropriated for stalling cattle. It is built on the side of a hill, so you can drive wagons into the third storey from the road on the side of the hill. The men and women gravitate towards the work they can most easily perform; and all are busy from morn until night, working with a joyous will. The men dress as the early Quakers dressed. The women with the same Quaker-like neatness—and they are all simple but hearty in their manners. On Saturday night we attended worship for the first time. The men and women stood in three lines in the presence of each other. A brother read a hymn, which they all joined in singing. This was followed by other exercises in song. Elder Evans then gave a powerful exhortation from the words, "There is therefore now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus." He was followed by a brief exhortation from one of the sisters. A line was then formed in the centre of the room, three brethren and three sisters standing face to face. The remainder formed in a circle round the room. The brethren and sisters in the centre of the room sang hymns, while the rest moved round in a kind of dance, moving their open hands as though waiting to catch a blessing. All was gravely performed, with an evident sense of awe. On Sunday this worship was repeated, with the addition of a more lively spiritual song and dance. The Shakers hold to the example of Miriam and King David, and other members of the ancient church, in manifesting their joy and gratitude at the goodness of God towards them by spiritual songs and dances. Although the ceremony was new to me, I felt no levity, but was gravely impressed by the deep solemnity of what I saw.

PADHAM.—On Sunday last, the school sermons were preached by the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., of Gorton, and the collections amounted to £55.13s.0qd.

WESTERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE seventy-seventh annual meeting of the West of England and South Wales Unitarian Book and Tract Society was held in Exeter on Wednesday, July 8th. In the morning there was a service in the fine old chapel, George's Meeting, South-street, where a large congregation assembled. There were visitors from Crediton, Moreton, Honiton, Colyton, Taunton, Bridport, Bridgewater, Bristol, &c. Dr. BELLINGS, of New York, preached the sermon. The Rev. W. JAMES, of Bristol, conducted the preliminary service. The preacher took as his text Romans x. 2—"For I hear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge." Dr. Bellows referred to the state of religion in America, and dwelt on the zeal and superstition prevalent amongst professing Christians. He believed that liberal Christianity, lived out—he blessed God that one day it should be lived out—would have an all-pervading warmth and attractiveness which would command the faith, admiration and following of the world.

In the afternoon the supporters of the society and their friends dined together at the Royal Public Rooms. Mr. NORRINGTON, in the absence (through the indisposition of Lady Bowring) of Sir John Bowring, was called to the chair. There were present the Rev. Dr. Bellows, Mr. Bellows, jun., Rev. W. James, Rev. R. L. Carpenter, of Bridport; Rev. J. Taplin, Crediton; Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, Taunton; Rev. T. W. Chignell; Rev. W. Robinson, Crewkerne; Rev. J. C. Street, Newcastle; Rev. J. E. Carpenter, Clifton; Rev. H. Calloway, Bridport; W. Colfox, Esq., Bridport; J. Melhuish, Esq., J.P., Tidcombe; Rev. T. H. Dodson, Tidcombe; T. Colfox, Esq., Bridport; John Baker, Esq., Taunton; W. Blake, Esq., J.P., Ilminster; R. Cuff, Esq., Crewkerne; C. Baker, Esq., Seaton; J. Murch, Esq., Honiton; — Bromhead, Esq., Crediton; John Baker, jun., Ilminster; Dr. Barham, and Messrs. Collins, Shute, Mortimer, Murch, Welsford, Edwards, E. Tozer, Pope, Upright, J. Brown, S. W. Preston, (Taunton), Parr, Easton, jun., Harris, Winsor, Bonney, Chalk, Bailey.

Dinner over, the CHAIRMAN proceeded to propose the usual loyal toasts. In doing so he referred to Sir John Bowring, whose absence he sincerely regretted, because he was so well known for his long acquaintance with the congregation, his acute intellect, his extraordinary memory, and, more than that, for a long life of adherence to principle. (Hear, hear.)—The Chairman next proposed the sentiment of "Civil and Religious Liberty," to which the Rev. R. L. CARPENTER, of Bridport, responded. The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, of Taunton, also responded.—The Rev. T. W. CHIGNELL proposed the health of Dr. Bellows and his son, Russell Bellows, in a speech full of hearty expressions of welcome and gratitude for the eloquent discourse with which the learned doctor had favoured them that morning. That sermon, he said, had raised the pulse of the free Christians of the West of England.

Dr. BELLINGS, in acknowledging the compliment, expressed in eloquent terms the gratitude with which, as an American citizen and an humble representative of the Unitarian body in America, he received from them and from all Unitarians in England their kindly sympathy and generous affection for their brethren and sisters over the water. In America, he said, Unitarians were more prosperous than in England. The spiritual children, who had carried the work and the inspiration of their fathers into more propitious fields, had reaped somewhat larger harvests. The soil was worked more easily; it was less sickly, and required less patience on the part of the husbandman. He looked with unspeakable respect upon those faithful ministers in England who laboured on with a patience and fidelity which ordinarily belonged only to those who were constantly crowned with success; and he was rejoiced to find that sturdy English feeling, that adherence to their principles and fidelity to their convictions, which rendered them in some degree independent of visible and immediate success. Success was often long and dreadfully delayed. But they would find that, though the morning clouds might seem to promise only a laggard day, and every auspice was unpropitious, yet all at once the glorious luminary of prosperity would burst forth and make the day radiant with the illumination of their splendid principles. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. RUSSELL BELLINGS also replied, and in a speech full of thoughtful earnestness showed how much there was yet to be gained by more frequent and intimate intercourse between the great communities of the civilised world.

Mr. MORTIMER proposed the health of the visitors, coupling with the toast the name of Dr. Barham, of Newton Abbot, and eulogising the efforts which he has made in that town in behalf of free religious thought. (Cheers.)

Dr. BARHAM, in reply, said when he first went to Newton he was compelled to attend the services at the Established Church, where he generally went in the afternoon, when there was no danger of hearing the Athanasian Creed. (Laughter.) But after a while he was convinced that this course was not consonant with what he believed to be the truth, and, an opportunity arising, he purchased the humble chapel where he now teaches. The congregation was small, but they held their ground.

If they did not go ahead so much in Newton as in Exeter, it was no doubt owing to the fact that in Exeter they had a better guide and cultivator in their able minister, Mr. Chignell. (Cheers.)

The Rev. T. W. CHIGNELL offered a few words of congratulation to the venerable doctor, of whose presence in the room he was previously unaware. He then proposed the healths of his friends the Revs. W. James, of Bristol, and J. E. Carpenter, of Clifton.

The toast was acknowledged by the Rev. J. E. CARPENTER.—Mr. JAMES proposed the health of "The Chairman," to which Mr. NORRINGTON responded, and the meeting then separated.

THE EVENING MEETING.

In the evening a second meeting was held, over which the Rev. T. W. CHIGNELL presided. There was a very large attendance.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the business, said they were met to celebrate the 77th birthday of a venerable institution, which had done considerable service. At Bristol she had a large magazine of ammunition with which to attack the theological superstitions of the age, and also a large reservoir of real alimant for the mind. Altogether this society was a very useful one. To-day they had secured for her advocacy the services of an illustrious American citizen; and they had had the pleasure of meeting him and through him reviving their sympathies with the sister country. America was near and dear to Englishmen, and to-day they had shaken hands with her, and looked into her face through their friend, Dr. Bellows. (Hear, hear.)

After referring to the numerous gathering of the day, the chairman remarked that there were a large number of persons who held free and enlightened views of Christianity, but who were as yet unable to avow them. Men and women, by means of science, historical criticism, and general reading, had been emancipated from the thralldom of narrow religious dogmatism; but they could not expose the tender buds of their new religion, because the north-east wind of cold contumely was against their development. But let them wait. The winter would be rolled back, the sharp frost would relent, and these men and women would by-and-by uncover their convictions to the open day, and they would be hailed as brothers and sisters to a new freedom—richer and broader than the Lutheran and Cromwellian freedom of old. (Applause.)

The people of Exeter, he continued, on passing the building in South-street, were accustomed to say, "Oh, that is a Unitarian Chapel; of course we don't go into it." He would tell them, however, that the man who preached there was not bound to utter one word that he did not believe. (Hear, hear.) A clergyman of the Established Church might often have a fresh and devout heart, and could pray with the freshness of the song of a bird; but he dare not utter a single syllable that was not compiled for him three centuries ago, and in language that did not answer to the devout and poetic piety of the 19th century. (Hear, hear.) This was cruel, cruel tyranny. Moreover, the clergyman was obliged to preach a doctrine that he could not believe; but the preacher in South-street was under no such compulsion. There was no such liberty as this in England, except among Unitarians. None of the other sects of Dissenters—even the Independents, who had approached nearer than all the others to an enlightened religious liberty—enjoyed such freedom as this. (Hear, hear.) Let them, then, bless Heaven sometimes for the freedom and enlightenment which they enjoyed in the Unitarian connexion. Again, if he looked at one of the more intelligent hearers in this place of worship, what kind of religion did he see? Why, he saw a man believing that human beings spring up fresh from God as any product of Nature. He saw a man believing that the whole of human nature is stamped with the Creator's divine stamp—one who looked upon the earthly inclinations of man, when innocently exercised, as divine. (Hear, hear.) Moreover, he saw a man who believed that divine inspiration is a necessity of human nature—who saw that man is dear to God from his very nature, that God cannot but be encompassing man wherever he is, and that inspiration is as natural and as necessary a part of man's being as the inhaling of the life-breath by which our lungs and our frames live. (Hear, hear.) This was the kind of religion permitted within Unitarian walls, and it was worth every intelligent man's attention. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Chignell remarked in continuation upon the changes which were taking place in the various forms of religious belief, observing that the Bible was now being looked at with different eyes than it once was. But the Bible was divine as ever—nay, diviner. He believed that the modern historical criticism brought to bear on the Bible had only redeemed a divine thing, that was fast tending to become a museum of extinct fossils, and had raised it into a new world of living, breathing, divinely melodious objects. This was what modern criticism had done for the Bible. (Hear, hear.) But modern criticism looked upon it as upon a literature—not dropping down from heaven, but rising up from the earth, the accumulated literature of a great nation now extinct. And this modern criticism brought to bear all the historical, geographical, and scientific light which it could upon this reservoir of Hebrew literature, in order to trace its growth, and to show how foreign elements become mixed with it, and how legend and imagination played with its historic facts. (Hear, hear.) The chairman then went on to speak of the difficulties respecting science and faith, and continued by observing that the topics which he had touched on were the great questions of the day. We need not, he said, fear to dig to the bottom. The rule of science which affirms that there is not a globe or an atom which is not pervaded by unalterable law was only the modern expression of the old affirmation of the Hebrew poet: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? There shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall uphold me." (Applause.) He might here allude to the ghastly spectres of materialism which haunted the air, and sometimes froze the very marrow of our bones. There was secularism, for instance, which said, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die, and there's an end of us." And there was a materialism, more scientific, which said, "We are the last link in the long chain of animals, and when we die there's an end of us,"—that the soul, love, beauty, and God were all a fancy. He mentioned these things simply to indicate the new work cut out for the free Christian preacher of to-day. In conclusion, he would say, let them never be afraid of investigating every question, and inquiring into every doubt that the human mind might raise, and let them never lose their faith in the great Mystery of Existence—dark with excess of light, unanalysable and indissoluble, whose great arms were about us everywhere. (Applause.)

The Rev. W. JAMES (of Bristol) read the annual report, which set forth the progress of the society during the long period of 77 years. It stated that this was the eighth occasion on which the anniversary had been held in Exeter. The society circulates nine different classes of books, and its catalogue comprises 608 of the best works in the English language. The number of members is 460, sixteen of whom are Exonians. Last year 4,000 tracts were circulated. The report warmly recommended the society to the support of Unitarian churches.

The Rev. J. C. STREET moved the adoption of the report in a vigorous speech. He spoke of the value of the works circulated by the society, and stated that a large parcel of books which he recently received for distribution had proved of immense value. He suggested that, as a supplement to preaching, books should be exposed for sale and given away in their churches. (Hear, hear.) He showed that the miners of the North-country were readers of Theodore Parker and Dr. Channing; and gave instances of some glorious out-door meetings, which he had addressed in his missionary capacity. These meetings, he remarked, were characterised by much thoughtful attention and critical observation on the part of the hearers, and the absence of anything like ignorant revivalist excitement was most marked.

The Rev. J. TAPLIN, who seconded the resolution, spoke of the usefulness of the society's tracts in another respect. The society, he said, had had a long and useful career in the promotion of Christianity. It was brought into existence at Crediton, the first sermon on its behalf being preached in 1793, in the speaker's present pulpit. It was not, he feared, sufficiently known. Some took objection to the title "Unitarian." But with that objection he had no sympathy. To the name Unitarian he had clung from his childhood—many pleasant memories clustered round it. He held that the Bible was its own interpreter, and that it was to be read with candour, judgment, and a free mind. He claimed the right of individual unrestricted thought on all theological subjects.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The CHAIRMAN then invited his audience to become subscribers to the society, and during the evening several persons gave in their names.

Mr. W. MORTIMER proposed a vote of thanks to the officers of the society for their services during the past year.

This was seconded by Mr. JOHN POPE, and carried. Mr. NORRINGTON then proposed that a vote of thanks should be given to Dr. Bellows.

Mr. S. W. PRESTON (Taunton) seconded the resolution, which was carried by acclamation.

Dr. BELLINGS was received with loud cheers on rising to acknowledge the compliment. He thanked them heartily for the over kind way in which they had been disposed to accept what had cost him no sacrifice, indeed what had been an indulgence of his own inclination, and went on to speak of the condition and prospects of Unitarianism in America, setting forth, in language of the most beautiful and withal simple character, the great principles on which its churches are founded. Unitarianism, he said, was much more prosperous in America than here, as far as numbers were concerned; and he believed there was a glorious future in store for it. The cause had made within the past few years encouraging and courageous progress. Led by an observation like this to look back some thirty-five or forty years, the rev. doctor called up many pleasant associations connected with the labours of such men as Dr. Channing, the great living thinker and writer Emerson, Henry Ware, Ephraim Peabody, and others, each of whom he referred to in graphic and affectionate terms. He contended strongly for organisation in connection with their churches, showing clearly and forcibly that the religious wants of the people, equally as much as their other requirements, must be met by special provisions. Dr. Bellows' speech was continued until long after darkness had fallen upon his hearers, but so intense was the interest created that the fact was scarcely remarked until he himself referred to it. The speaker resumed his seat amid loud applause.

A formal alteration in the society's rules having been carried, votes of thanks were awarded to the chairman and the Rev. W. James, and the meeting separated.

INTELLIGENCE.

BOLTON.—The annual school sermons were preached in Bank-street Chapel on Sunday last, by the Rev. P. W. Clayden, of Nottingham. The congregations were large at both morning and evening services, it being necessary at the latter to place forms along the passages of the gallery. In the afternoon Mr. George Smith, of Manchester, delivered an address in the schoolroom to a numerous gathering of scholars, teachers, and parents. The day's collections amounted to £111. 2s. 6d.

LYE WASTE.—The annual treat to the day and Sunday schools connected with this place was given on Monday last, when T. Pargeter, Esq., threw open the beautiful fields adjoining his house for their enjoyment. Refreshments were provided for the scholars, and Mr. Pargeter's family kindly provided tea for teachers and friends. The day was delightfully spent.

TAMWORTH.—On Tuesday, the 7th inst., a meeting of "Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and the neighbouring counties" was held at Tamworth—an event which had not taken place in that town for twenty years previously. Divine service was celebrated in the Unitarian Chapel; the Rev. J. Kedwards, of Lye Waste, read the introductory service, and an impressive sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Cotton, missionary to the "Midland Christian Union." The ministers, with a few lay friends, were kindly entertained at dinner by Mr. Samuel Spence, a member of the congregation, and a very pleasant day was spent.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. C.—The trustees have had plans under consideration, but there were some difficulties in carrying them out satisfactorily, which, it is hoped, may in a short time be removed.

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY.

To the Editors.—The Rev. John Wright, in his letter which appeared in your publication of the 10th instant, quotes from your report of the proceedings of the Assembly that I charged him "with sending out circulars drawn up so as rather to discourage than encourage congregations to appoint delegates to the Provincial Assembly," and adds that "when such imputations of dishonourable conduct have been publicly made they ought either to be substantiated or to be publicly withdrawn with an apology."

As regards your report of the proceedings of the Assembly, I am not answerable for the same. I did not think it was such a report as would illustrate what really occurred at the meeting.

I did not charge Mr. Wright individually; I charged the secretaries to the Assembly, from the period when Mr. Martineau carried the present organization of the Assembly. I had all the circulars from that time convening the Assembly before me, but the impatience of the meeting, the determination of certain parties who acted up to the declaration which I heard before the meeting made by an influential, and by no means young minister in reference to Mr. Darbishire's resolutions, "Oh, we shall make short work of them," prevented my reading the circulars; and Mr. Wright's getting up, and very irregularly interrupting me, caused me to ask the chairman to read the circular convening the then meeting, and on his doing so I at once, and without any qualification, withdrew all imputation against Mr. Wright as regards that meeting.

I am more accustomed to meetings of laymen than I am to such meetings as the one in question, and I must confess that when, early in the meeting, I asked whether the announcement in the secretary's circular that "The committee empower me to state that no names will be entered on the roll that are not sent to me by June 10th," was within the authority of the committee, I was surprised at the secretary's warmth of expression, which included a threat of resignation. I was obliged to the chairman who, though at first, holding with the secretary, did after consideration decide that I was right, and that no delegate could be excluded by any resolution of the committee.

No one regrets more than I do the excitement of the last Assembly, but I have generally found that "to make short work with a question" generally tends to embitter and prolong the same.

I very much object to our meetings for business being held in a place of worship. Too often with the vantage ground of the pulpit our ministers are but imperfectly heard; but in speaking from a pew, desirous of being heard, the speaker renders himself open to the charge (which your reporter makes against me) of making a vehement speech.

I found myself before an unwilling audience, in the unfortunate position of moving an amendment on a resolution of the chairman's; I therefore must claim some indulgence for my shortcomings. The necessities of railway speculation have introduced a mode of procedure making the chairman move the resolution as if he were (as he there is) a partisan instead of the moderator of the meeting.

I am glad to apologise in the most effectual manner to the Rev. John Wright for having even fancied that he was against the delegate system, and especially for having raised a suspicion in his mind that I intended to charge him with having used his office of secretary "in any dishonourable manner." The phrase is his, not mine. I thought I had sufficiently apologised at the meeting, but he must have either misapprehended what I said, or, in the vast space of the chapel, which each speaker in vain attempted to fill, my words must have escaped his attention. Nevertheless, I had before me the circular of May, 1865, signed by Mr. Wright, in which is the following: "If your congregation decline to appoint delegates, be so good as to inform me of the fact." It is true that, on my objection in 1867, this sentence was withdrawn from the circular, and had I been allowed to go through the circulars this would have been explained; but Mr. Wright's haste fixed upon me the making of a personal imputation as against himself, which I never intended to make, and which I immediately withdrew at the meeting.

As I have had no communication from Mr. Wright since the meeting requesting the withdrawal of any imputation (not withdrawn at the meeting), I think he has rather unkindly rushed into a newspaper correspondence. I hope in future the lay element in the Assembly will assert its independence, and prevent the Assembly from being, as your reporter deprecates, "turned into an ecclesiastical bear garden."*

In conclusion, whether it were better to have two days' meeting, one for the religious purposes of the Assembly, and the other for its business, the general body of Unitarians in the Province must determine; but I hold that union is strength; that the ministers can do nothing except the laymen are heartily with them; that organisation is requisite to give full effect to our denominational influence, and that the reveries of philosophers, however profound, are valueless otherwise than so far as they act upon and direct the active energies of man.—Yours respectfully, HENRY COPPOCK.

Stockport, 13th July, 1868.

[* NOTE BY THE EDITORS.—We cannot consent to our comment being thus ingeniously twisted into the exact opposite of what our readers (if they have the article before them) will see as our perfectly unmistakable meaning. The whole sentence read thus: "The few men who, for some years past have been most prominent at the Assembly have been laymen; and the result of their efforts, no doubt made with the best intentions, has been to turn the meetings into little short of an ecclesiastical bear garden."]

MISS CARPENTER'S FUND.

To the Editors.—There are, I make no doubt, a number of persons who desire, as I do, to contribute something to the fund now being raised for Miss Carpenter's mission to the women of India, but whose mites cannot be paid into the treasury in a subscription list. For the sake of these, and for the mission itself, allow me to suggest the propriety of a collection being made in the various Unitarian chapels throughout the country for the fund in question. The ministers and trustees would surely rejoice in a movement of this kind, and take the necessary steps to make it successful.—Yours obediently, THOMAS CHAMBERS.

July 14.

THE COMING WEEK.

Chowbent.—On Sunday, morning and afternoon, school sermons by the Rev. S. A. Steinhilf.
Great Hucklow.—On Sunday, afternoon and evening, triennial school sermons by the Rev. B. L. Lloyd.
London: STOKES NEWINGTON GREEN.—On Sunday morning, a discourse by the Rev. J. K. Applebee, on "Christ's truth and Christ's freedom."
Pennmaeswarr: PENDRYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. E. B. Aspland, M.A.
Swinton.—On Sunday, afternoon and evening, school sermons by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington.

Birth.

PRESTON.—On the 10th inst., at 89, Camden Square, the wife of Alfred Preston, Esq., of a daughter.

Marriages.

HOLLAND-SCHWANN.—On the 8th inst., at Little Portland-street Chapel, London, by the Rev. W. H. Channing, Arthur Holland, M.A., second son of Charles Holland, Esq., of Liscaud Vale, Cheshire, to Mary Catherine Barbara, only daughter of Frederick Schwann, Esq., of Gloucester Square, Hyde Park, London.—No cards.
OTLEY-WOOLLEN.—On the 13th inst., at the Upper Chapel, Sheffield, by the Rev. J. L. Short, Mr. T. S. Otley, second son of Mr. T. Otley, manufacturer, Meadow Works, to Annie Maria, second daughter of Mr. C. Woollen, all of Sheffield.
PARSONS-GALE.—On the 14th inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, Bridport, by the Rev. R. L. Carpenter, B.A., James Parsons to Hannah Gale, both of Bridport.
SCHOFIELD-BRADBURY.—On the 13th inst., at the Free Christian Church, Mossley, by the Rev. D. Berry, John Schofield to Sarah Bradbury, both of that town.

WATHALL-GRACE.—On the 5th inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, Belper, by the Rev. Rees L. Lloyd, Mr. Thomas Wathall, of Belper, to Miss Elizabeth Grace, of Holbrook.
WRIGLEY-HORTON.—On the 6th inst., at the Free Christian Church, Mossley, by the Rev. Daniel Berry, Joseph Edward Wrigley, of Lees, near Mossley, to Mary Hannah Horton, of that town.

Deaths.

BUTCHER.—On the 11th inst., at Plumpton, near Lewes, Mr. Richard Butcher, in the 63rd year of his age.
CLEPHAN.—On the 13th inst., at Stockton-on-Tees, Mr. Wm. Clephan, aged 57 years.
HARDING.—On the 15th ult., at Role Hall, Tamworth, Chas. Harding, Esq., aged 85, a regular attendant at the Unitarian Chapel until his health failed him. In middle life he built a small organ and presented it to the congregation, besides compiling a hymn-book for their use.
MEYER.—On the 8th inst., at Tunbridge Wells, Ida Henrietta, fourth daughter of the late M. S. Meyer, Esq., of Smedley New Hall, near Manchester.
WORTHINGTON.—On the 15th inst., at Sale Hall, Cheshire, aged 63, Robert Worthington, Esq.

PRESENT Condition of Unitarian and Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 3d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

THE "HOME PAGES" TRACT SERIES.

The whole series of 238 Tracts (with the exception of one or two of the earliest) are kept in stock. All orders must now be sent direct to Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, Higher Broughton, MANCHESTER.

	Single Tracts.	Per dozen.	Per 100.
4 pp. Tracts....	6d.	4s.	2s.
8 pp. "....	1s.	6s.	4s.
12 pp. "....	1s. 6d.	10s.	6s.

The whole series, well bound, in 4 volumes, for 10s., or free by post 11s.

In cases where the Tracts will have to be sent by post, a penny in the shilling must be added for postage.

Mr. Herford will be glad to forward, on application, a complete list of the "Home Page" Tracts and Covers.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.
S. WHITEFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS
OF BEDDING AND WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.
VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

WHITEFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS AND
SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS, CASH AND DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.
WHITEFIELD & SONS,
VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

A. BEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED
AND OTHER NEEDLES.

TEVERSHAM'S Boarding House, Commercial and Private, 23, Ironmonger Lane, Cheap-side, London.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,
FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS,
23 SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.
Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8,
Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.
S. T. ANN'S CAFE,
3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER.
(Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse).
J. BALLS, Proprietor.

NEW GOODS FOR THE SUMMER SEASON.
WILLIAM MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also Bannockburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits.
FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

LONDON.
SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE
HOTEL,
37, Queen's Square, Bloomsbury.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL.
Beds from 1s. 6d. per Night.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL.
Plain Breakfast or Tea, 1s. 3d.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL.
For Home Comfort.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL
not only speaks for itself, but hundreds of Visitors from all parts of Her Majesty's dominions have left most favourable Testimonials in the Visitors' Book, which is constantly on the coffee-room table.

SHIRLEY'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL.
The motto of which is, "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."
LONDON: 37, QUEEN SQUARE, BLOOMSBURY.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at

11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED.
We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, clean-flavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,
WINE MERCHANTS,
26, MARKET-STREET,
And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool. MANCHESTER

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 37, Waterloo Road, Chesham Hill, at his printing offices, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, July 17, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 378.

FRIDAY, JULY 24, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing	236
What is Saying on Church Matters	236
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XIII.	238
Reviews: "The Theological Review"	238
"The Edinburgh Review"	238
Free Christian Union	239
American Notes	239
The Next General Council	240
Fire-side Readings: Echoes	241
Water! Water!	241
Flowers from Persian Gardens.—VIII.	241
Church Curiosities.—XI.	241
Early Child Names	241
Intelligence: Ministerial Appointment, Belfast, Birmingham, Chowbent, Cirencester, London, Swinton, Synod of Munster	242
Correspondence	242
The Coming Week	242

MILES PLATTING.—On Sunday, July 26th, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached; in the afternoon by the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS, and in the evening by the Rev. G. H. WELLS, M.A. Afternoon service at three o'clock; evening, at 6.30. Collections after each service in aid of the School Funds.

KENT GENERAL BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.—The ANNUAL MEETING of this Association will be held at the General Baptist Chapel, Cranbrook, on Tuesday, July 28th, 1868. The Business of the Association will commence at ten o'clock a.m., when the Letters from the Churches will be read, and the general affairs of the Association transacted. Divine Service will commence at eleven o'clock, when a SERMON will be preached by the Rev. T. B. W. BRIGGS, of Dover. In the evening, at five o'clock, there will be a PUBLIC TEA MEETING at the Chapel, after which the meeting will be addressed by several ministers and other friends. The subject will be, "The Established Church in Ireland, the cause of the slow progress of Protestantism in that Country."

SOUTHPORT, July, 1868.—The Committee of the Portland-street Unitarian Church appeal to the general Unitarian public to assist in paying off the debt contracted in the erection of their Church, which still amounts to about £700. They beg to remind their friends that the Church has been erected to supply a want which is participated in by visitors from the neighbouring towns, as well as by the inhabitants of Southport. While gratefully acknowledging the liberal help they have already received they again appeal with confidence to the generosity of those who sympathize with them in the support of a liberal and enlightened Christianity. Subscriptions will be received by the Secretary, EDWARD JOHNSON, 6, New Promenade, Southport; the Treasurer, HOLBROOK GASKELL, Birkenhead, Southport; Rev. THOS. HOLLAND, B.A., Belmont-street, Southport.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH AND SCHOOLS, STEPNEY, LONDON. By a Sub-committee of the London District Unitarian Society assembled in Conference with the Committee of the Rev. J. Phillips's Congregation, on Tuesday, 12th May, 1868, at Stamford-street Chapel, it was resolved that assistance should be rendered to that congregation in obtaining a Permanent Place of Worship at Stepney Green. In pursuance of such resolution, and through the kind instrumentality of members of the Sub-committee, a suitable site has been obtained on which to erect a Church, School, &c., at Stepney Green. It has been determined at present to erect a neat and substantial School-room, capable of accommodating about 250 persons, and that religious worship shall be conducted therein till the funds are raised for the Church. The Congregation, consisting for the most part of working men, appeal most earnestly to the Unitarian public to supplement their efforts to open the School free of debt. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by Mr. GEORGE RITCHIE, 34, Bread-street, London, E.C.; Mr. F. M. WALLER, 100, Turner's Road, Burdett Road, London, E.; and The East London Bank, Cornhill, E.C.

CLEKENWELL.—THE TEACHERS OFFER THEIR BEST THANKS for the following DONATIONS: Mr. Walpole, 2s. 6d.; Miss Bridget, 2s. 6d.; A. P., 1s.; Mrs. Harrod, 5s.; Two Friends, 2s.; Herbert Chamberlain, 10s.; E. B., 2s. 6d.; W. S. B., 2s. 6d.; F. Nettlefold, 10s.; Miss Ralph, 8s.; P. Holland, 10s.; From the West, 1s.; Mrs. Cooper, 8s.; Mr. Wade, 5s.; Annie Preston, 2s. 6d.

IN THE MATTER OF THE CHARITY CALLED "THE GENERAL BAPTIST EDUCATION FUND." Notice is hereby given, that an Order has been made by the Board of Charity Commissioners for England and Wales appointing Trustees for the management of the above-mentioned Charity. A Copy of the Order may be inspected, free of cost, daily, except on Sundays, during the space of one calendar month, to be computed from the date of publication of this notice, at the office of the said Commissioners, at No. 8, York-street, St. James's Square, London, between the hours of ten a.m. and four p.m. Dated this 14th day of July, 1868. HENRY M. VANE, Secretary.

METROPOLITAN DRINKING FOUNTAIN AND CATTLE TROUGH ASSOCIATION. 116 Fountains and 98 Troughs for Animals have been erected, and are kept in repair, and supplied with water, by this Society. The Committee are urgently in need of Funds to enable them to sustain and extend the work, and they earnestly appeal for help to all who are anxious to promote habits of temperance or to alleviate the sufferings which are experienced by horses, dogs, sheep, and oxen in the streets of London from thirst. JOHN LEE, Secretary. Bankers: Messrs. Ransom, Rouverie, and Co., 1, Pall Mall East, S.W.; and Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, Taitton, & Wills, and Co., 54, Lombard-street, E.C.

BEERHOUSE LICENSING SYSTEM

AMENDMENT, For Remedying the fearful Evils arising from the present indiscriminate and unrestricted granting of Beerhouse Licences by the Excise. VICE-PRESIDENT.—ED. AKROYD, Esq., M.P., Halifax. PROVISIONAL COMMITTEE. JOSEPH WHITWELL PEASE, M.P., South Durham. Archbishop MANNING. TITUS SALT, J.P., Bradford. Col. SHAKESPEARE, J.P., Witham, Essex. J. ROBINSON, Esq., Mayor, Rochdale. Alderman SIOTT, Rochdale. E. B. W. BALME, J.P., Mirfield. Sir ELKANAH ARMITAGE, J.P. NATHAN WORTHING ON, J.P., Oldham. CHARLES PEASE, Darlington. J. RILEY, J.P., Oldham. TAYLOR, Manchester. WM. TOUCHSTONE, Manchester. G. BANCROFT, Manchester. E. HANSON, Manchester, &c., &c. BANKERS.—Messrs. CUNLIFFE, BROOKS, & Co., Manchester. SECRETARY.—Rev. WILLIAM SPANNEY, M.A., formerly Curate of St. James's, Halifax. AGENTS.—Messrs. MATTINSON, MARSH, and PRESCOTT. Offices, 116, CHEETHAM HILL, MANCHESTER.

DONATIONS ALREADY ANNOUNCED.	July 14, 1868.	£	s.	d.
Edward Akroyd, M.P.	100	0	0
Titus Salt, J.P.	100	0	0
E. B. W. Balme, J.P., Mirfield	25	0	0
S. Kershaw, Manchester	1	0	0
Councillor H. Riley, Oldham	2	0	0
Hocken, Bird, Cole, & Co., Manchester	5	0	0
D. Dale, J.P., Darlington	2	2	0
Rochdale Auxiliary	15	3	0
J. Riley, J.P.	2	0	0
W. Schofield, J.P.	1	0	0
Alderman Stewart	1	0	0
Asa Lees, J.P.	1	0	0
Thomas Emmott, J.P.	1	0	0
Councillor Dearden, Rochdale	1	0	0
Josh. Fletcher, J.P.	1	0	0
The Mayor of Chester	1	0	0
W. Slater	1	0	0
Oldham Auxiliary	11	0	0
Ashton Auxiliary	9	10	0

Further sums thankfully received. The following noblemen and gentlemen, among many others, have sign'd their approval of the movement:—The Lord Bishop of Oxford. W. E. Sutcliffe, Deputy-Lieutenant. Canon H. Cadogan, Esq., Islington Priory, county of Durham. The Very Reverend Dr. Howson, Dean of Chester. Rev. John Hand, Rector of Handsworth. Lieut.-Col. White, Chief Constable of the county of Durham. The Rev. T. Eaton, Canon of Chester. Sir John Swinburne, Bart. Sir Stephen Glynn, Lord-Lieutenant, Flintshire. The Lord Mayor of London. The Mayor of Chester. The Mayor of Rochdale. The Mayor of Ashton. The Mayor of Oldham. The Mayor of Bolton. The Mayor of Southport, &c., &c.

The Association purposes obtaining 150 influential petitions from as many corporate towns, in each case, if possible, headed by the Mayor, and to hold 25 large public meetings. INSTANCES OF THE EVIL WORKING OF THE PRESENT CONFLICTING SYSTEM.

1. At the Oldham Police Court, — On 23rd August, 1866, was fined 2s. and had his licence taken away by the magistrates. In open defiance of the justices he now carries on a beerhouse, having subsequently demanded a licence from the Excise. The conviction was for notoriously disgraceful proceedings. N.B.—The amendment now proposed would hinder such a case as this.
2. In South Durham, after the magistrates had, on the almost unanimous petition of the inhabitants refused to license a public-house, a number of beerhouse licences were demanded from the Excise. Instances a plurimum. Ask the Police their opinion of the beerhouses. Send for papers to the Secretary.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—SATURDAY TO MONDAY AT MATLOCK.—Every Saturday until the end of October, 1868, RETURN TICKETS, at the following low fares, will be issued from the under-mentioned Stations to MATLOCK BATH, by the Midland Company's New Route, by any of the ordinary trains on Saturday, available for return by any train on the following Sunday or Monday.

Stations.	First Class.	Second Class.
Manchester	9s. 6d.	7s. 6d.
Guide Bridge	9s. 6d.	7s. 6d.
Stockport (Leviat Dale Station).	8s. 6d.	6s. 6d.

In Manchester, Tickets will be issued at Cook's Excursion Office, 42, Piccadilly, and at the Midland Booking Office, London Road Station. JAMES ALLPORT, General Manager. Derby, May, 1868.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—NINE HOURS AT THE SEASIDE.—This Company is now prepared to ARRANGE EXCURSIONS, at nominal fares, with Mill Hands, Mechanics' Institutions, Provident and other Societies, Sunday and Day Schools, to SOUTHPORT, the Montpelier; or BLACKPOOL, the Brighton of the North; or to those other delightful Watering-places, LYTHAM, FLEETWOOD, and WARTLEIGH. Also to LEEDS for the National Exhibition of Works of Art. The conditions may be obtained on application to the undersigned. H. BLACKMORE, Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, Manchester, June 22, 1868.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—CHEAP SUMMER EXCURSIONS DAILY TO LITTLEBOROUGH for HOLLINGWORTH from Manchester, Stalybridge, Ashton, Bolton, Bury, Middleton, &c.

Fares for the Double Journey: First class, 2s. 6d.; Second class, 1s. 9d.; Third class, 1s. 3d. A SPECIAL TRAIN also leaves the Victoria Station, Manchester, on Saturday Afternoons, at 2.45 p.m. for LITTLEBOROUGH. To WHALLEY, CLITHEROE, and CHATBURN, Every Saturday, from Manchester, at 1.30 p.m. Fares for the Double Journey: First Class, 4s. Third Class, 2s. 6d. For further particulars, see handbills. By order. Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, Manchester, July 16, 1868.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—ART TREASURES EXHIBITION AT DARWEN.—NATIONAL EXHIBITION OF WORKS OF ART AT LEEDS.

For the accommodation of parties wishing to visit the above, the public are respectfully informed that 1st, 2nd, and 3rd class tickets will be issued to Leeds, from all stations on this Company's line, at ONE FARE FOR THE DOUBLE JOURNEY, to parties of not less than six 1st class, or ten 2nd or 3rd class passengers. The tickets will be available for Return the SAME DAY ONLY, and parties can only proceed and return by that class of carriage for which they have taken tickets. Where the distance exceeds 50 miles, the tickets are available for return the following day. To obtain these tickets, application must be made by letter not later than three days before the excursion, addressed to the Superintendent of the district, stating the following particulars, viz.:—For which class of carriage; the date of the proposed excursion; and the probable number of the party. Manchester, July 6, 1868. By order.

SOUTHPORT.—Mrs. HEISE'S SCHOOL will RE-OPEN August 3rd. Mrs. H. is most helpfully assisted in her duties by the Rev. THOS. HOLLAND, B.A., to whom references are kindly permitted. Queen's Arms, 4, Hawkehead-street, Southport.

EDUCATION.—14, GREAT STANHOPE STREET, BATH.—Mrs. JEFFERY receives a small number of Young Ladies, whom she educates as members of a family. Bath is considered a healthy locality, and offers great facilities for securing the services of efficient masters. Terms on application to Mrs. Jeffery. References: Rev. W. Odgers, Bath; Rev. T. E. Poynting, Monton, Manchester; Rev. W. Cochrane, Cradley, Worcestershire; J. Murch, Esq., Bath; E. Cobb, Esq., Bath; W. A. Case, Esq., M.A., late Vice-master of University College School, London; J. Shute, Esq., Clifton Down, Bristol.

KNOTSFORD.—Mrs. LAW FORD'S SCHOOL for Little Boys will be RE-OPENED on Saturday, August 8th.

OLD HOUSE SCHOOL.—Mr. HUTTON will RE-OPEN his School on Tuesday, August 18th. He has two or three Vacancies.

MUSIC.—Mr. THOMAS RAWSON will RESUME his Instructions on Pianoforte, Organ, and in Singing, on Monday, the 27th inst. Cecil House, Broughton Lane, Manchester.

MISS O'DWYER'S SCHOOL will be RE-OPENED Tuesday, August 4. Northgate, Wakefield.

SOUTHPORT: ALBERT ROAD.—Mr. MILLSON will RE-OPEN his SCHOOL on Monday, August 3rd. He has three Vacancies.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.—The NEXT QUARTER BEGINS on Tuesday, August 4th.—During the erection of new premises, address 13, Regent-street. EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Principal.

THE CONIGRE, TROWBRIDGE, WILTS. The PUPILS of the Misses MARTIN will RE-ASSEMBLE after the Midsummer vacation, on Thursday, July 30th.

LANCASTER.—The Rev. D. DAVIS, B.A., will RE-OPEN SCHOOL on Friday, August 7.—No vacancy.

MISS PILCHER'S SCHOOL, 3, Caven-dish Place, near All Saints', Manchester, will RE-OPEN on Tuesday, July 28th. Results of examinations, terms, &c., on application.

9, WELL CLOSE SQUARE, WHITBY. The Rev. JOHN and Mrs. OWEN wish to receive two or three Ladies or Gentlemen as BOARDERS during the season.

HIGH SCHOOL, 126, MUCH PARK STREET, COVENTRY.—The Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., having taken extensive premises, is prepared to RECEIVE BOARDERS. Terms: 30 to 40 Guineas per annum. Full prospectus on application.

STAND GRAMMAR SCHOOL, NEAR MANCHESTER.—Head Master, Rev. JOHN DAVIES, M.A.—House large and commodious, locality healthy, playground attached, and number of pupils limited. Terms per annum: For Boarders under 14 years of age, £25; for Boarders above 14 years of age, £40. Day Scholars admitted at 12 guineas a year each. Full particulars on application. N.B.—A Preparatory school for Little Boys and Girls, by Mrs. DAVIES. Terms: For Boarders, £25; for Day Scholars, four guineas a year. The NEXT QUARTER will COMMENCE on Tuesday, August 4, 1868.

LENDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

It appears that, after all, the Bishop of Cape-town is about to carry off Mr. Macrorie, incumbent of Accrington, and have him consecrated at Cape-town by the South African Bishops; so we may expect lively intelligence from Natal before long.

A brisk controversy is at present going on in Berlin, arising out of an address made some time ago by Dr. Lisco, when presiding at a Synodal Conference of the Evangelical Church, in which he maintained that modern ideas regarding the nature and structure of the universe contradict those of the old orthodoxy, and that this, formed by a credulous study of the Bible alone, finds itself now pitted against the might of philosophy and science. On this Pastor Knak, representing the High Lutheran party, rose and declared that if that orthodoxy were "antiquated and worm-eaten," he at least would never desert it, nor be ashamed to profess his attachment to the ancient symbols. In reply, Dr. Lisco presumed that Mr. Knak believed, contrary to the words of Scripture, that the earth moved round the sun. Nothing of the kind, said Mr. Knak; you may say what you will about Copernicus, but "I recognise no other world-picture save that which I find in my Bible." This led to a hot paper war, in which the old question came up of the sun standing still at Joshua's bidding. Some of Pastor Knak's brethren endeavoured to save the text by alleging that Scripture always accommodates itself to popular modes of speech, as we now speak of the sun "rising" and "setting." The orthodox pastor, however, is not to be satisfied with any such explanation, but in a letter to his brethren he boldly says: "The Bible speaks distinctly of 'God causing his sun to rise over the just,' &c., and therefore the earth must stand still and the sun moves. For the laughter I cause," he continues, "I care little. I am as happy as a child. And what is more, I do not stand alone; I have some of the highest scientific authorities on my side." Unfortunately, he does not mention who these are. The controversy is still going on, and assuming larger dimensions every day.

On the 16th of last month Pius IX. commenced the twenty-third year of his Pontifical reign. Since St. Peter, to whom tradition assigns twenty-five years, there have been but three Popes out of 258 who have lived to commence or to finish their twenty-third year of government. They are Adrian I., the Pope of Charlemagne; Pius VI., the Pope of the Directory; and Pius VII., the Pope of Napoleon I. Pius IX. will be the fourth. If he lives until June 16, 1869, he will stand alone with Pius VI.; if he lives till June 16, 1870, he will be matched only by St. Peter. But if he survives June 16, 1871, he will have outdone not only all preceding Popes, but St. Peter himself.

While the King of Prussia has been inaugurating the Luther monument at Worms, and a festival has been held at Constance, to commemorate the Reforming services of Huss, the Italian Government has been honouring the memory of the great Florentine reformer, Savonarola. The convent of St. Mark at Florence has been converted into a national museum, in which, in addition to the great artistic treasures, the works of Fra Angelico, which it previously contained, will be preserved whatever relics, antiquarian, artistic, or literary, can be found in any way connected with Savonarola's history. The municipality of Florence has also decreed that one of the great squares in the new quarter of the city shall be named Piazza Savonarola.

The Presbyterian (Scotch) congregations in England seem more liberal to their ministers than some we could name. In the same paper we observe that the one in Regent Square, London, have agreed to give a stipend of £800, and that Dr. Munro's, in Manchester, while providing him with a colleague, to whom they give £400 a year, allow him also the same sum.

A singular case of superstition is reported from Cornwall. A "white witch" of Liskeard was consulted by the son of a farmer, supposed to be "ill-wished" by the wife of a labouring man residing on the estate. On the recommendation of the witch the latter was discharged. The "ill-wished" man fell sick, and during the night was visited by the village blacksmith. The latter, on going to the sick man's house one night, saw something like a goat; the next night it assumed the form of the devil. The witch on being consulted ordered that a gun should be kept loaded, charged with four-penny-pieces broken into small bits. The blacksmith kept a strict watch the succeeding night and fired to the great alarm of the villagers. This is a case which ought to come under "What the Churches are not doing," rather than "What they are doing."

On the retirement of the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel from the active duties of the ministry, his congregation last week, when he completed his seventieth year, presented him with a thousand pounds, as an expression of their profound respect for his character and for his ministerial efforts during nearly twenty years. At the same time a handsome silver service was presented to Mrs. Noel.

A society formed within the pale of the Establishment, entitled "The Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ," has printed a manual for the use of its members, which, under the heading "An Act of Adoration," for the "Eucharistic Sacrifice," has the following:

"I adore thee, O Lord my God, veiled under these poor earthly elements, and prostrate before thy Divine Majesty, I desire to honour thee with all the devotion of which I am capable, and that I may the better honour thee, I unite myself with all thy saints and angels in their more perfect adoration."

"Hail! Living Bread, that comest down from heaven to give light to the world. Hail, most holy flesh of Christ! Hail, heavenly drink of Jesu's blood, to me above all things the sum and fulness of delight."

This, too, is part of a Litany contained in the manual:

"Soul of Christ, sanctify me!
Body of Christ, save me!
Blood of Christ, inebriate me!
Water from the side of Christ, wash me!
Passion of Christ, strengthen me!
O good Jesu, hear me.
Within thy wounds, hide me."

And in "An Act of intercession" the Romish phrase is used without disguise—"O Almighty Father, I offer to Thee this propitiatory sacrifice."

Notwithstanding the ignominious treatment to which some of the Evangelicals conceived themselves exposed at the last Church Congress, it seems that Dr. McNeile, Mr. Ryle, and several other leading men of the party are about to attend the coming meeting in Dublin.

The Town Council of Edinburgh have elected the Rev. Dr. Glog, of Blantyre, to the church and parish of Old Greyfriars, by 18 to 15, against the Rev. Robert Wallace, of Trinity College Church, Edinburgh. The congregation had petitioned in favour of Mr. Wallace, but he was rejected chiefly on the ground that his sentiments in regard to "innovation" harmonise to a considerable extent with those of the late Dr. Lee.

The Rev. W. W. Malet, vicar of Ardeley, has just published a book, giving an account of a pilgrimage he made last year to Rome, Jerusalem, and Constantinople, "for the reunion of the faithful." He assured the Pope that he (the vicar) represented "thousands in England" who sympathised with him in his mission; urged upon Pio, among other reasons for the restoration of intercommunion that "England has her holy orders and ordinances of worship from Rome," and "recognises His Holiness as the Chief Bishop of all." This is an admission which we fancy will be somewhat startling to many of Mr. Malet's brother Churchmen, but he tells us that, before his interview with the Pope, he "had laid before the Holy Father's Chamberlain and Secretary his letter of 'holy orders,' signed and sealed by the Lord Bishop of Rochester," and "his letter commendatory of the Primate of England." The latter, however, was nothing more than a simple commendation of Mr. Malet to the care of all Christians as one deserving of it; but when the Chamberlain found it associated with an introduction from Dr. Manning, and from Mr. Malet's "commission for re-union of Christendom by the President and the Secretary of the Society for promoting that union," he might not unnaturally suppose that the pilgrim had come to Rome with a sort of quasi authority from his Metropolitan for the same purpose. But though the Pope received him courteously, listened to him, and gave him his benediction, which Mr. Malet hails "as an earnest of recognition," it is clear from his own narrative that both Pope and Chamberlain regarded his representations more in a spirit of contempt than as likely to lead to any serious result.

As we were afraid would have to be the case, Mr. Coleridge's Universities Bill was withdrawn on Wednesday.

Supposing that the purpose of the Church Association, in prosecuting Mr. Bennett, is to dispute the right of those who hold the High Church view of the Eucharist to remain in the Establishment, and conceiving that this purpose will not be attained by proceeding against the Vicar of Frome for "inadvertently using inaccurate and untheological language," Dr. Pusey writes to the Secretary of the Association to "renew the same invitation which he has given at different times to others who have impugned his good faith at public meetings, or have otherwise uttered calumnies against him:

"You accuse me of teaching doctrine contrary to that held by the English Church. Substantiate your charge, if you can, in any court. If you do, I will resign the office which I hold by virtue of my subscription. I will oppose no legal hindrances, but will meet you on the merits of the case."

The Doctor adds:

"I will not conceal from you that I think that you run a risk in acceding to the invitation. I cannot think that any court could condemn me; and, if I were acquitted, your party could no longer use the language which it does against us. This is your concern, not mine. You must have looked at this in the face; for you could not as honest men, make charges which you do not suppose that you could substantiate; but then I think that as honest men, you are equally bound not to try to take advantage of an accidental slip of language (if you can; for a Judge, I suppose, would allow Mr. Bennett to correct his language), but if you dispute our right to teach as we do, dispute it directly. . . . It is not for me, of course, to dictate the course which your association should take; but I may say this for your information, that a mere attack on the language of Mr. Bennett will not attain your end, and that I do not think that Englishmen will think it a straightforward proceeding to fix on those incidental and disowned expressions, instead of calling in question our belief itself."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Christian World thus expresses its feelings on a movement which we mentioned a little time ago:

"The small but increasing section of Unitarian Friends who appear to take Dr. Colenso as their great authority, are continuing to issue pamphlets containing enunciations of their views in derogation of Scriptural authority and of the deity of Christ. At the last annual meeting of the society, held in London in May, much discussion took place relative to the progress of these unsound doctrines. We are sorry to learn from several sources that during the past two months the difficulties attendant on this movement have increased instead of decreased. Much anxiety is felt by the Friends in the neighbourhood of Manchester in particular."

The Daily News remarks that one of the most formidable missiles used in war is the grenade, which, from the foul matter with which it is filled, and the unbearable odour which it diffuses, is known by the uncomplimentary English name of a stink-pot. In Mr. Murphy, the party who are endeavouring, for political purposes, to raise the "No Popery" cry, have possessed themselves of such an instrument. Mr. Murphy is Mr. Disraeli's stink-pot. He is both a nuisance and a danger. His obscenities are as disgusting as his violence is outrageous; and both are the more odious for the religious pretences under which he hides them.

The Church Times, the organ of the Ritualists, in remarking on Dean Alford's presence at Cheshunt College, not only admits but exults in all that he said regarding the "thread of foreign scarlet" in the garment of English Protestantism, and says:

"It is just the 'thin scarlet line' which is the only formidable one in the battle of the Faith against unbelief; and if the Church of England is to have a new suit of clothes, we mean that it shall be neither black nor grey, and we shall say of her as of the wise woman of the Proverbs, 'She is not afraid of the snow for her household, for all her household are clothed with scarlet.'"

In the same article we have this choice little morsel:

"It would be too much to expect Dr. Alford to remember his Bible, now that he is casting in his lot day by day more distinctly with the Colenso school, upholding Unitarians, disputing the Resurrection, and playing fast and loose with Holy Writ, in pursuance of his old habit of raving and then taking up with any party that seemed fashionable and popular."

The same contemporary takes the Queen to task, which seems hardly becoming, considering that she is the Head of the Church which it professes to uphold, in this rude fashion:

"Although the Queen cannot find time or inclination to discharge her duties as the chief officer of the State, it seems that she is able and willing to make herself prominent in matters which lie completely out of the sphere of her obligations. In a very uncalled-for telegram to the King of Prussia, on the occasion of his unveiling the Luther monument at Worms, she attempted to pledge the nation over which she rules to sympathy with the apostate and profligate, albeit able and courageous, Augustinian. In so doing she needlessly insulted all her loyal Anglican subjects, who are pledged to resist Lutheranism to the uttermost, all her Roman Catholic subjects, and finally, all her Scottish Calvinist lieges, the maintainers of a creed which Luther stoutly anathematized. And considering that she holds the title of 'Defender of the Faith' on no other ground than that an ancestor and predecessor of hers controverted Luther, she ought either to have checked her pen or abdicated the distinctive appellation."

It is encouraging to see the way in which some of the clergy are bringing themselves to contemplate the possibility of a separation of Church and State. The Bishop of Ely, for instance, at a Church Conference the other day, said:

"We must strive to keep what blessings have been given to us; but if it should happen that in the course of the next few years they should be taken away, we may still strive to maintain the Anglican Church; we should still be of the Catholic Church in this country; and, if organised, we might still be able to prevent our Church on the one hand from being absorbed into Rome, on the other from dwindling down into a sect. If our Church is not to pale before Rome on the one side or Rationalism on the other, it must be the result of greater life and fuller organisation."

It is not for us to pass judgment on Broad Churchmen who remain in the Establishment when they have ceased to hold its doctrines, but we are often led to wonder how they reconcile it to their consciences to go on solemnly declaring before God that those who disbelieve the contradictory statements of the Athanasian Creed "without doubt shall perish everlastingly," and yet speak of it thus, as Dean Stanley does in Macmillan's Magazine:

"According to the obvious intention of that famous creed, according to the view with which it was first received into the Western Church, and the meaning which it must bear for all who accept its words without such a qualification as is tantamount to a virtual repudiation, the gentle and devout Philaret 'cannot be saved,' and 'shall, without doubt, perish everlastingly.' So, doubtless, would have believed the author of the creed, and the larger part of the Western Church from the eighth to the fifteenth century. But so believe now probably only a few even in the Roman Church. So, in spite of the continued recitation of that creed in many of our services, not one amongst the prelates and clergy of the Church of England."

The Daily Telegraph says:

"We have now before us a tradesman's card on which it is really difficult to comment, and we should not notice it if we had not recently observed several of the kind. It runs thus:—'Jesus only' — oil and Italian warehouseman, No. —, — road, Notting-hill. Sauces, jams, pickles, &c., &c.' The words 'Jesus only' are printed in neat small letters on the left-hand upper corner of the card. We are aware that some religious societies hope to do good by the display of startling Scripture texts in unexpected places; but it is much to be feared that, instead of introducing religion into common life, they vulgarise and profane words and ideas usually associated with the most serious and respectful thoughts. And whatever may be said of religious placards posted by religious enthusiasts at railway stations and hotels, no one can fail to see the atrocious profanity of dragging in the most sacred name as a help to puff off jams and sauces."

With regard to the decision of the Lords on the Irish Suspensory Bill, the Methodist Times remarks:

"It is very natural that the Irish Bishops should say to the English Church and the English aristocracy, 'You are all in the same boat with us, and if we go to the bottom you will go with us;' but it is the extremest folly for either Church or aristocracy to admit the plea. It is quite true that we are all in the same boat, and that the weather is changeable and seas are high, but so far from going to the bottom together, we throw Jonah overboard to save the ship. The Irish Church is to be sacrificed to save the rest. A monstrous and indefensible injustice, neither the Church, nor the aristocracy, nor even the empire itself is strong enough to protect it, and the Liberal party call upon the nation to sever its fate from that of all our other institutions, lest they should be involved in a common ruin. But the spectacle which the House of Lords has presented in this debate has not been reassuring to the country. It is like a part of the crew taking up Jonah's cause, and protesting that they will either save him from destruction or go overboard with him. Of course, not even the Bishop of Oxford, nor Lord Redesdale, means this. There is a good deal of what the Americans call 'buncombe' in this talk."

The Irish Evangelist, the organ of the Wesleyan body in Ireland, says that the great mass of the ministers of that denomination have "lost all faith in establishments and endowments as being auxiliary to true Protestantism; regard the general disendowment of all the charities in Ireland as essential to the safety and efficiency of Irish Protestantism; and will hail the hour of general disendowment with peculiar joy."

Mr. Disraeli's methods of helping the Church seem to excite distrust even among many Conservatives. One of them, "Presbyter E.," in a letter to the Guardian, after remarking that there has been "a good deal of cock-crowing" on the rejection of the Suspensory Bill by the House of Lords, writes thus:

"Ought I not to ask what the Government propose to do in the matter of the Irish Church before I give my three or four votes in their favour? It is all very well to run down Gladstone's disestablishment scheme, but I tell you I dread something far worse from the present Government, and it would be a great relief to my mind to know what they intend to do. A very sensible speech was made recently at Bath, I believe, by the rector of Walcot, about 'killing the Church by inches;' and if it is intended to reduce the number of Bishops to six (and they might in their presumption just as well reduce the number to 0, and declare their omnipotence in things sacred and religious at once), and otherwise lower the Irish Church by weakening her sinews, while all the old State trammels are to be left in full swing, or even tightened—for as the power of the Church is weakened in the same proportion will that of the State be increased over her—then I think Gladstone's scheme more honest, more religious, and far more favourable to the Church's mutual wellbeing, and I think we ought to support him in that case."

The Rev. J. Monsell, vicar of Egham, while he loves and respects the two dignitaries of the Church, who were at the Cheshunt College anniversary, "as the lions of the day," cannot see how they could be present and take part in the proceedings "consistently with their duty to the Catholic Church." As he says, in the Guardian:

"Two remarkable protests were publicly made against Catholic truth. One against the power of the keys as entrusted by Christ to his church, and the other against one article of the Apostles' Creed, founded as it is on the dying words of our Lord, and accepted as it has been through all ages of its existence by the church universal. Are these great truths upon which so much depends to be dealt with so lightly, that, for the sake of one day's kindly compliment and speech-making, they are not only to be omitted from the day's service—that were a comparatively small offence—but they are to be openly and distinctly denied? For surely it is nothing short of denial of such truths, that men who have not episcopal orders should wear the Church's dress and read the Church's service; that by their marked omissions from her ritual they may make plain their protest against those doctrines which she teaches, but in which they do not believe."

One clerical correspondent of the same paper can only characterise the epithets which Dr. Littledale employed, when he called the Reformers a set of "unredeemed villains," as most unwarrantable and unchristian; but another thinks it ludicrous that it should be considered "high treason to breathe a word of condemnation against Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, while nothing is thought too bad or too hard to say against Archbishop Laud and Charles the Martyr," and it seems to him, while the present acts of the Legislature in Church and State remain, "somewhat more indecent in an English Bishop or Priest to attack the Act of Uniformity in the reign of Charles II., than it is for Dr. Littledale to insult the actors in the sixth year of Edward VI." From the way in which they treat it, with a view to "bolster up Bishop Colenso," the "authority of the law is as much a nose of wax in the hands of the Broad Church party, as the Holy Scriptures are in those of the Low Church."

The Rev. Wm. Anderson, rector of Raymunderdoney, in a reply to Dr. Macdonnell, Dean of Cashel, which appears in the Guardian, asks,

"How long is it to be endured that Cashel, with some 6,000 Church-people, should have over £13,000, while the parish of Belfast, with some 40,000 Church-people, should have far less than £1,000 a year?" And concludes his letter thus:

"We have been unable to understand why Protestantism should have become so effete and so crippled that if it were disestablished it would cease to exist in many parts of Ireland. We do not see why Irish Protestants should be so much weaker than their kinsmen in Canada, or than the Free Church of Scotland. Of one thing we are sure, that the evil does not arise from any inherent defect in Protestantism itself. We have learned that Protestantism is strength and freedom. We have been taught that the great champion of Protestantism in the sixteenth century declared that notwithstanding the inhuman atrocities and systematic perfidy of Philip II. and his infamous lieutenants, 'there were no Papists left in Holland, except a few ecclesiastics;' and we believe that the system which would completely reverse this picture over a wide part of Ireland, if the Establishment were withdrawn, so that there would be no Protestants left except a few ecclesiastics, must require a complete revolution, whether the Suspensory Bill pass or not. There are many of the Irish clergy who think it no discredit to be supported by the 'doles' of their flocks, and who, if they had not cherished the hope of some revolution in the distribution both of revenue and of labour, would long since have repaired to Canada, or to any other part of the world in which their efforts for the good of the Church would have met from those in high places, if not a readier sympathy, at least a less contemptuous refusal."

With reference to the Œcumenical Council, our High Church contemporary has the following just observations on the action of the Romish Church:

"She must fight in her own way, and that way is laid down for her in a groove which centuries have cut. She is like some huge ponderous machine which deals heavy blows right and left, but wastes nine-tenths of its strength in false directions. Terrific sweeps, that ought to demolish Babylon itself, hit nothing, and terminate idly in the air. The blundering engine acts in obedience to an impeding law of motion, which is part of itself now, whether part of its original construction or not. And the blundering Church misapplies its forces for the same reason, because she is obliged to act in harmony with what has been, and to consult and follow up the past. She is what ages have made her. The act of the present moment represents herself under the hidden necessities which a thousand years prior of action have imposed. There is nothing so inexorable as the past, it continues as a binding power long after the express acts are over, and dictates the policy of ages after. It creates the mind and disposition of the body, dictates its policy, and inspires its points of view. Rome is Rome, and to expect her to act otherwise than as her history inspires her, is to expect a death and a resurrection in this world. Even now, with common enemies on all sides of us suggesting common defences, we hear of her contemplating in this very council of which announcement is now made, an addition to Roman dogma, in the shape of a dogmatic imposition of the extreme form of the doctrine of the Papal Infallibility. She is bent on stiffening in her sectarianism, while everything around calls for common grounds."

In a pamphlet just published by Dr. McCosh, of Belfast, there are some remarks on what are likely to be the results of the present crisis of the Irish Church. He has hopes of much incidental good to arise out of it. He believes that it will call forth a spirit of zeal and liberality in the Irish Episcopal churches, and the Irish Presbyterian Churches, such as they have never exhibited before. He has an expectation, too, that the barriers which at present separate them being broken down, the Churches of Christ in the sister isle will be brought to a better understanding, and Protestantism exhibit before the Roman Catholic population a visible unity such as she has not been able hitherto to display. He indulges the hope that in a very few years Episcopalians and Presbyterians, at present standing at a distance from each other, will be seen meeting for prayer and for conference, and for the spread of the free Gospel of Jesus Christ, north and east, and south and west, throughout Ireland.

The Italia, of Florence, after remarking on the omission of sovereign Princes or States from the invitation to the proposed Œcumenical Council, observes that this indicates a great change which has taken place since the Council of Trent. "Instinctively modern society has brought about a real separation between Church and State." Rome assumes the air of not accepting this current of ideas, and protests against it. And yet by the form of her present Bull she does accept it; and the principle of the separation of Church and State will be the result of this Council, either because the State takes no part in it, or because its canons will be so intolerable that the mixed system of relation between the two powers at present practised will appear wholly incongruous and incompatible. "Trent was powerless to prevent Protestantism. Rome will not prevent the separation above spoken of."

ACCRINGTON.—On Sunday last, the Rev. J. W. Kay, of Higher Bentham, late of Nottingham, preached two sermons to good congregations, morning and evening. Collections were made on behalf of the Sunday school.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—XIII.

SUBJECT: God's loving providence upon the earth is beautifully described in the Hebrew writers.

Read Psalm lxxv., where the writer joyfully addresses God, "Thou gladdenest the outgoings of the morning and the evening. Thou visitest the earth and waterest it; Thou abundantly enrichest it." The fertility of the earth is said to be the goodness of God dropping on it from above, and the springing up of its verdure is compared to shouts of joy.

Read also Deut. xi. 2—17. The favour of Jehovah to his people is said to be shown in the fruitfulness that He gives to their country. It is "a land which Jehovah thy God careth for always." "The eyes of Jehovah thy God are upon it, from the beginning of the year even to the end of the year."

Again, read Psalm cxlvii., where, together with the works of God in nature, the writer mingles the doings of the Almighty among men. It is He "who covereth the heavens with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow upon the mountains," and who "giveth to the cattle their food, and to the young ravens when they cry." But His work is more especially among the joys and the sorrows of His children: "Jehovah buildeth up Jerusalem, He gathereth together the dispersed of Israel, He healeth the broken in heart and bindeth up their wounds."

REVIEWS.

The Theological Review. No. xxii., July, 1868. Williams and Norgate, London.

THE contents of the Theological Review are more varied than usual, embracing articles on philanthropic subjects as well as pure theology. We can recommend this number to our readers, as in one or other of the papers they will find matter instructive and interesting to them, however varied their tastes. A brief, somewhat too brief an article by Mr. J. F. Smith, describes the claims of Lessing as a theologian, which are only too little known in England, and points out the influence he has exerted upon the development of a sound and reverent criticism of the Scriptures. Mr. Russel Martineau brings his studies, on the account of the Creation given in Genesis, to a conclusion, in an article which will, perhaps, be read with more interest than his previous ones, as he enters in it upon the exposition of a theory of the origin of the Israelites based upon the description of the Garden of Eden, which will be novel to most of his readers, giving, as it does, a suggestion of a common origin of the Semitic and Aryan races, which few have hitherto been able to trace. Mr. Rathbone's article on "The Progress of the Working Classes," is full of suggestive thoughts, which we should have liked to have seen more thoroughly and fully worked out. Mr. Tayler's review of Dr. Davidson's Introduction to the New Testament is generously appreciative of the great service that gentleman has rendered to the study of the Scriptures by his thorough and scholarly work. Perhaps the natural love of controversy which men possess will make the concluding pages of his article especially interesting, as they contain a severe and just rebuke of the dogmatizing tone which Mr. Higginson adopted in criticising Mr. Tayler's work on the Fourth Gospel. The number contains an article by Sir J. Bowring on "Remunerative Labour in Prisons," and a brief notice of the biography of the late Chevalier Bunsen, by the Rev. C. Kegan Paul, characterised with the fairness and animation which mark all this gentleman's contributions to the Review. Of one article we cannot, however, speak with praise; not that we have to find fault with the literary ability it displays, but from a deep sense of what we cannot help calling its immoral tendency. "Presbyter Anglicanus" defends in it the position which those of the clergy and laity hold in the Established Church, who, having abandoned full belief in the creeds and articles, and disapproving of the sacramental teaching of the Liturgy, still use its services and avail themselves of the social and other advantages it affords. To us it has always been a difficult task to comprehend how men whose honour we were unable to question could conscientiously hold offices which, in the common apprehension of all men, imply belief in what is commonly called orthodoxy, while they teach opinions of so broad and liberal character as to render them appropriate to the freest Unitarian pulpit. The doctrine defended in the well-known "Essays and Reviews," that the legal is the measure of the moral obligation, always seems to us simply dishonest. No high-principled tradesman would apply it to his business; and we can certainly see no reason to regard it with greater favour when it is applied to the more sacred questions of theological opinion; and yet "Presbyter Anglicanus" does not hesitate to restate it in defence of his position. He calmly claims the right to use the solemn language of prayer, without holding the doctrines implied by the words he employs. He states that no layman, and he implies that no clergyman, can be considered bound to believe in the propositions of the various creeds which both repeat, without one qualifying word to hint that they are not held to be literally true. He distinctly declares "that every one of the most solemn formulæ of the Church of England are used with certain reservations and evasions by large parties within her pale, and used with the full sanction of the Parliament and the people." That sanction is, however, only given because no legal process has yet been discovered by which uniformity can be enforced. There are many dishonourable actions in trade which are not punishable by law, but a merchant who avails himself of the statute of frauds to cover a breach of contract does not hold a very enviable position on the Exchange. It seems to us as if these gentlemen who hold and defend the views of "Presbyter Anglicanus" are involving society in the danger of bringing upon us a condition of things akin to that which prevailed in the sinking days of heathenism, when educated and enlightened priests and philosophers had come to utter unbelief in pagan teaching, but conformed to the rites which the faith and self-interest of the uneducated people still upheld, contenting themselves with an esoteric doctrine of pure theism. We all know something of the unmeasured immorality, the licentious cruelty, the awful superstition, combined with the rare sublimity of here and there a scanty philosophic school, which was the result.

When men can play fast and loose with religious teaching, it is not surprising that they should be corrupt in every matter of less importance. Are not the upholders of a free but esoteric faith in the Church, perhaps the men upon whom the responsibility rests, that we are now so lax in matters of ordinary duty? We hear complaints on every hand of tradesmen being guilty of using false weights and measures, adulterating almost every article in which they deal. We lately saw the leading commercial men of Liverpool publicly protesting against the lax views of honour which are current upon the Exchange. We know that appearances and not realities are only too frequently valued in social life. Can we be surprised at this when the leaders of the moral and religious life of the nation—the men of the highest learning and the noblest philosophy—justify reservations and evasions with regard to religious opinions upon which all true life should be based, and when it can be declared unblushingly by a dignitary of the Church, and quoted by a clergyman with approval, that "if all such reservations and evasions are to be regarded as inadmissible, there is not a single clergyman who could, with a good conscience, retain his office, from the Archbishop of Canterbury to the meanest curate in the wilds of Cumberland?"

In the teaching of the so-called Broad Church there is much that we admire, much with which we have deep sympathy; and even when, as at present, we are compelled to find fault with the spirit of the leaders of the party as wanting in straightforward simplicity, we are convinced that it is the influence of an education in an establishment based upon compromise and concession, instead of principle, which silences the voice of conscience in honourable men, and hides from them the straight path of duty. We are more grieved than angered; but from a party which is so unable to distinguish the clear path of honesty, we have but little hope to see arise the reformation of religious life in the Church of England.

The Edinburgh Review. July, 1868.

An article on "Salem Witchcraft," after describing the village of Salem with the interest of one who has visited the place, and rehearsing part of the oft-told story with details from Mr. Charles Upham's work on the subject, draws a striking parallel between the delusions of the day which believed in satanic influence, and the one which believes in spirit-rapping. It enlarges upon the mysterious phenomena of sleep-walking, mesmerism, and the like, as showing the intimate and yet unexplained relation between soul and body, and considers that many of the delusions of possession in the middle ages and of spiritualism now would probably be cleared up, if the manner in which the mind suffers from a morbid state of the body could be thoroughly understood. But some think these phenomena can be referred only to possession or inspiration by spirits; some consider a physiological explanation of the subject to be materialism; while others shrink from novelty, fear for religion, and will not listen to evidence opposed to their prejudices; and so the riddle comes slowly to solution. The late Prince Consort wisely said that he could not understand the conduct of the English medical profession in leaving the phenomena of mesmerism to the observation of unqualified persons, instead of undertaking an inquiry which was certainly their proper business, in proportion as they professed to pursue science. And Mr. Hallam, in 1844, considered that the phenomena of mesmerism and other similar ones were "fragments of some general law of nature, which we are not yet able to deduce from them, merely because they are destitute of visible connection." Progress is making in this direction. Sir Henry Holland tells "How certain treatment of this or that department of the nervous system will generate this or that state of belief and experience as well as sensation." Dr. Carpenter discloses facts of brain-action without consciousness, and Dr. Maudsley shows in the horrors of the lunatic asylum the very phenomena which our forefathers ignorance referred to the power of Satan.

An article on the "Apocryphal Gospels" gives the critical history of the recovery and publication of their various texts, which had disappeared when their strange accounts had laid foundations for the beliefs, the practice, and the art of mediæval Christianity. Though coming from an early date, and not chargeable with wilful fraud, they are yet very useless for increasing our knowledge of early Christian history. What information they give is not as to direct facts, but indirectly of the habits and customs, and the growing tendencies of belief in the age when they were produced; showing, e. g., the early inclination to belief in the dogma of the Virgin's Immaculate Conception, recently promulgated by the Pope. They disappoint us by not giving any residuary traditions of the public life of Jesus, which might have floated in an unfixed form in the memory of the early church after the Gospels had taken their definite shape. Instead, they give us strange and fanciful, and sometimes disagreeable tales about the origin of Jesus, and his own youthful conduct. Their principal use is in the confirmation of the canonical gospels, insensibly afforded by the contrast between their wild fictions and unchristian thought and the soberer records and sublime teachings of the canonical gospels. The reviewer mentions, with considerable praise, a contribution to the literature of this subject in the lectures of M. Douhaire, in the "Université Catholique," and in the "Dictionnaire des Apocryphes," included in M. Migne's "Encyclopédie Théologique," the text book of the French clergy. It may be well to quote the caution given by the reviewer, that the valuable translation of the Apocryphal Gospels, published last year by Mr. B. Harris Cowper, is defaced by frequent inaccuracies in the translations from the Greek, and even from the Latin. The most flagrant instance is a direct contradiction of the original "Evangelium Nicæ: P.I.A. c. xv. οὐκ ἀγνοεῖτε (ye are not ignorant) ye know not." p. 81 note.

The concluding article, generally supposed to be by Dean Stanley, treats the question of the "National Church," in a very liberal way for one who argues in favour of Establishment. It considers the Church under the control of the law and the nation, which have no right to dictate in matters of faith. Thus the Church includes various schools of thought. Their separation from the State would result in the formation of more extreme sects, while, if the Church hold together, it may by gradually continuing its present course of relaxing its bonds, attract the better part of the Dissenters. The reviewer refers to previous articles on Church Extension, Revision of the Prayerbook, and Amendment of the Rubrics, as illustrating the large advantage which would spring from simple changes. Without suggesting anything very novel in its point of view, this article is yet interesting as showing in what influential quarters liberal views are held, and with what sober thought the details of progress and improvement require to be considered.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, JULY 24, 1868.

FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

THOSE who are trying to do away with sectarianism, and bring the divided members of the body of CHRIST closer together, are doing a noble, if a difficult, work, and deserve the cordial sympathy of all free men. So the promoters of the Free Christian Union, which for a year past has been struggling to win a foothold among ecclesiastical associations, if they cannot as yet be congratulated on their success, and even if some of their measures seem to outsiders a little erratic and incoherent, ought to meet with earnest and thoughtful appreciation; and if we take upon ourselves to criticise them, it is certainly in no unkindly spirit.

The feebleness and inefficiency of their efforts seem to us to result from a certain indecision as to what it was they were really attempting. They appear to have been vacillating between two different things—the one an effective working union of free churches, the other a personal association of men and women, whether belonging to free churches or not, upon a basis which should simply disregard all existing lines of church organisation and affinity. They began with the attempt to carry out the first idea. The movement originated with the needs of our free churches. It was distinctly put forward as a project for giving these free churches what it was contended, quite logically, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association could not supply—a church union that should foster and extend free churches; and one large part of the argument by which the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was induced to relinquish the principle of congregational representation was, that that special branch in our co-operation might be taken up more competently by the projected Unsectarian Association. We should have been perfectly content to have foregone even more important elements of the old Association of our own group of churches, if there could have thus been gathered into one brotherly organisation all the scattered congregations—for there are many besides those in open alliance with ourselves—based upon the principle of Free Christianity. This, however, has not been done, and we think that there is fair ground of complaint against the leaders of the movement that it has not even been fairly attempted. We are afraid, in fact, that the leaders of this movement have been acting not very differently from the promoters of the English Church Union in their efforts to draw the Greek Church into a quasi-fraternisation. Our High Church friends have professed the deepest anxiety for union between different churches, but all they have done has been to make frantic efforts to get on to speaking terms with some churches in the far East, while they have shown not the slightest desire for any union with that large portion of Christendom—the Nonconformist bodies—at their own doors. So we confess it seems to us that those who have assumed the leadership of the Free Christian Union have been making very great efforts to win the Broad Church clergy into their new alliance—these being able in any case only to come in as individuals—but have been at no pains whatever to ascertain what Dissenting congregations there might be, and influence them to join—and we know there are scores throughout England—that are as unsectarian as our own, and many of which, we believe, would be glad to be able to enter into Christian association with other similarly constituted churches. Hence has arisen, as we believe, the miserable disproportion between the programme of the Free Christian Union and its actual results. Our own congregations, feeling their existing District Associations to be as free as is practically possible already, do not feel the want of this new candidate for their guineas; the scattered free churches unconnected with ours hardly know anything about it, and the Broad Churchmen, with a very few exceptions, refuse to come. Thus it has become, practically, a mere friendly association for promoting individual Christian union. In that character its meetings of a few weeks ago are by no means without their interest. The mere fact that the evening meeting was presided over by GOLDWIN SMITH, that GEORGE DAWSON, STOPFORD BROOKE (the biographer of F. W. ROBERTSON), and several other clergymen, with a few men from among ourselves like R. D. DARBISHIRE, JAMES MARTINEAU, and Dr. BELLOW, all successively addressed the meeting, is significant of a hopeful state of things, and cannot but lead to some drawing nearer of the scattered elements of Christian life. But, then, what does all this come to? If we are not much mistaken, simply to something in which no organised union is necessary—something which lies close at hand for every one who really cares for such wider Christian fellowship. The Rev. STOPFORD BROOKE hit the mark when he insisted, as we are informed, that the great thing for those who believed in wider religious fellowship, is, to take it, to hold open religious association with one another, ignoring the lines of sect, by exchange of religious services and other ways usual between churches that are in Christian fellowship. This, however, needs no association in order to make it practicable. The way is open. Those who feel thus disposed have only to declare it, and it becomes an accomplished fact, without any association, or rules, or preamble, or guinea, or even half-crown. The thing was actually done a week or two since by Dean ALFORD and several other clergymen at Cheshunt College, and that without any timid susceptibility on the subject of reporters. While our Free Christian Unionists were talking about it with closed doors, these men were doing it before the world. A few such instances are better than all talk in the world.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The scheme for raising an American battalion of 1,000 men for the service of the Pope, has been put a stop to by the Archbishops of Baltimore, Cincinnati, New York, and St. Louis disowning it. They think that if it were carried out, it would prove detrimental, instead of beneficial, to the Holy Father. "Pecuniary aid is more needed just now than military aid," and they urge the faithful to contribute the former, and the Pope "will employ their offerings in such way as may seem to him best."

Dr. Bushnell thus concludes an article defining the relations which should subsist between Science and Religion

"We are to say, go on gentlemen, for there is a much larger field to be possessed. As yet you have but snatched the world's surfaces, in what you call your sciences. Go deep; for the deeper you go, and the more unsparring your search, the better it will be for us. Wrench every subtlest and most secret thing from nature's bosom, and let us have it. We shall appropriate every true thing you bring us, and thank God for it. Only bring us no conceit, as if nature were the all, and science the all expounder. What you call nature is but a very small affair, compared with God's high spirit empire, and the vast immortal quantities, and powers, and passions, and truths, that build the eternal system it composes. Do not imagine that you are in a commission large enough to include and give you jurisdiction of things supernatural, when your only jurisdiction is of shell. Be not in haste to put your sentence on the faiths of religion."

The question of Presbyterian union seems to be making more rapid progress in the United States than here. The two principal bodies, the Old School and the New, at the annual meetings of their General Assemblies, have agreed on a joint basis of union, in doctrine and polity. The basis of doctrine may be thus summarily defined:

"The Scriptures of the Old and New Testament; the Westminster Confession of Faith, it being received in the Reformed or Calvinistic sense; and liberty being given for philosophical views and explanatory statements in the united Church which do not impair the integrity of the Calvinistic system."

In noticing a sketch of the official life of Governor Andrew, the Nation (N. Y.) gives some interesting reminiscences in illustration of the character of this truly noble man, from which we take the following:

"As Governor of Massachusetts it was his duty to look after those who may be regarded as the wards of the State—the children in the public schools, the paupers, the prisoners, the deaf and dumb, the insane, the blind. No Governor before ever gave such attention to these in times of peace as Governor Andrew did in the midst of the awful war. Once, when he was visiting the reform school for boys at Westboro', having spent the morning in examining classes, dinner-hour came, and the company of visitors moved toward the dining-room. Governor Andrew was following, when he heard some shrill little voice calling his name. He looked around and saw no one; but still the little voice piped out "Governor Andrew! Governor Andrew!" At last it was found to come from a room high up above the hall, in which a little boy was confined for some offence. He had the boy brought down, heard his appeal and his petition to be allowed to join his companions, called back the officers, inquired into the case, requested the authorities to forgive the child and remit the rest of the sentence, and then, calling together again the rest of the boys, told the story of their companion to them, showing them how they might help such a boy to do right or make him go wrong. The Governor lost his dinner; but that evening, as he related the story in full, it was easy to see that his generous heart had entered fully into the case of this poor lad and made it his own.

"Toward the close of his term there was a great outcry made against him because he refused to sign the warrant to execute Green, the Malden murderer. The crime was a brutal one, and the community cried for the man's blood. The Governor would neither sign the warrant nor publish his reasons for not doing so. A storm of reproach and complaint arose; but nothing shook his solid mind. One day, at this time, walking in the country, we were overtaken by the Governor in his carriage, who stopped and took us in. Being alone with him, we took the opportunity to ask his reasons for this course. 'Well,' said he, 'people say I do not hang him because I am opposed to capital punishments. But since I have been Governor I have signed two death-warrants, so that I need not sign another in order to show that I can hang a man.' He then proceeded to explain, at length, that Green had not been tried, but had pleaded guilty, and had been sentenced on that plea; but that by the law of Massachusetts there were two degrees of murder, the first of which was punished by death, and the second by imprisonment for life. Now, in pleading guilty to murder, Green had not (in the opinion of the Governor) been properly made to understand the difference between these two, and the Governor did not believe that he meant to plead guilty to murder in the first degree. That question, he thought, ought to be tried, especially as, by the concurrent testimony of those who had known Green from childhood, the ministers of the town, the Mayor, and the detective who had worked the case, he was a person of very imperfect intellect. Explaining all this at great length, and with all the reasons and facts fully given, the statement was so impressive that we said: 'Governor, if this were published, it would produce an entire change of opinion through the State in twenty-four hours in regard to your course.' He answered: 'Very likely. But I shall make no such statement. I could not do it without seeming to blame the courts, and I do not think it right to set the executive and judicial departments of the Government even at apparent variance now. No; my back is broad enough to bear all the reproach, and I would rather have it fall on me than on the judges.' His course on this occasion and in regard to the liquor law were the two bravest acts of his life, for on these occasions he alienated his own party and his friends. But he never seemed to mind it. He was no more afraid of his friends than of his enemies—the rarest courage in a public man."

A short time ago we mentioned that a correspondent of the English Independent, who was convinced that many of the more thoughtful members of the Congregationalist churches were disbelievers in the doctrine of eternal punishment, wished to know how they were to be treated; and that the editor declined to have the subject discussed in his columns, merely saying that he thought such persons could not be very comfortable in Congregationalist churches. Adverting to this matter, the Liberal Christian observes:

"There are a great many Universalists in Methodist, Congregationalist, and Episcopal churches in this country, and they are so 'comfortable' there that they do not care to leave them to help to form or sustain a church of their own. The reason of this probably is, that so many 'Evangelical' ministers have 'reasonable doubts' whether everlasting is used in the Scriptures in a philosophical sense, and whether it comports with the character of God, as revealed by Christ, to shut any soul up in hell for ever for the sins and shortcomings of this finite life. They use the Scripture language in its obviously popular sense and indefiniteness, refusing to dogmatise upon uncertainties, and not pretending to be wise above what is written. Let the doctrine of endless punishment, as laid down in the creeds, be preached from the 'Evangelical' pulpits by men who really believe it and feel the real danger of it, and there would be such a secession from the 'Evangelical' churches as they have never witnessed; or, what is more likely, the preachers would be dismissed in the most summary manner. If our 'Evangelical' friends do not believe this, let them try the experiment."

A correspondent of the Pall Mall, writing on the Roman Catholics of the States, remarks that as, of the two nations which contribute the bulk of emigrants that land there, the Irish send scarcely any but Romanists, and the German more of these than of Protestants, one would expect New York to be almost a Catholic city; and yet in the last directory, out of 327 churches of all denominations 39 only are returned as of the old faith. All allowances made, the preponderance of Protestants must be very great—greater than can be accounted for, except on the theory that the free air of America is unfavourable to the durability of an exclusive and narrow persuasion. The priest, even according to the testimony of Catholic observers, gradually loses his influence over the new comers, and more rapidly among the Irish than the Germans. To keep them at all, he must humour them to an extent of which his principles will not strictly allow; and from this kind of loose adherence to positive defection the step is short, in a country where everything conspires to nurse independence of thought. This is especially the case in New England. The "Methodist episcopal" body—which, speaking generally, appears to be the most growing in the States—is held to be more powerfully organised, both for conquering and preserving its conquests, than either the Catholic or the Anglican; the latter, though fashionable and prosperous, seeming to gather within its fold chiefly those who like to see the lieutenant saved before the ancient. The Methodist church spoken of has at once the compactness which episcopal government gives—that government which, by a singular turn of events, Wesley permitted to his American disciples while he refused it to his English—and, in addition, the peculiar democratic force of Wesleyanism. Through the machinery of its "classes," it calls the community itself in aid to watch over and answer for every member, and its offsets are not planted, but spread themselves naturally as suckers from a tree.

THE NEXT GENERAL COUNCIL. (Pall Mall Gazette.)

A GENERAL COUNCIL professes to be, and by the largest and most widely spread of all Christian bodies is believed to be, an infallible sovereign legislature—at all events when the Pope agrees with it—having the power to make laws binding the consciences of all Christians upon all subjects connected with faith and morals. Upon the theory held by those who convoke or believe in it, it can declare with infallible authority the truth as to all matters in controversy; make rules as to ecclesiastical discipline, which rules are binding alike on all persons, clerical or lay; superintend literature, education, marriage—in one word, do all that appertains to the moral and spiritual government of the human race; and this as the organ of God Almighty invisibly present at, presiding over, and directing its deliberations. These are the pretensions set up for general councils by those who believe in them. Let us see what is to be done by the particular General Council which is to meet at Rome at the close of next year.

It is summoned by letters apostolic which in their style and manner are as turgid and diffuse as they might be expected to be, but, rejecting superfluities, they are as follows:—The only begotten Son of the Eternal Father chose Peter to be and do a great many things, of which one was to "rule the Universal Church;" wherefore "the supreme power and jurisdiction of Peter over the whole Church continue unaltered in the Roman Pontiffs." Hence the Roman Pontiffs have done their best at all times "to preserve the deposit of the faith, the clergy's discipline, and their holy and learned education as well as the sanctity and dignity of marriage; and also to promote every day more and more the education of the youth of both sexes, to favour religion, piety, and morality among nations, to defend justice, to further the peace, order, prosperity, and wants of civil society." When they have found themselves in difficulties they have from time to time called councils. They find themselves now in a very great difficulty. "All know with what a fearful tempest the Church is assailed, and what many and mighty evils afflict civil society. By the acts of the enemies of God and man the Catholic Church, its salutary doctrine and venerable name, and the supreme authority of this apostolic see, are attacked and trampled on; everything sacred is despised, ecclesiastical property is usurped, Bishops and venerable men devoted to the divine service, and persons conspicuous for their Catholic sentiments, are harassed, religious communities are suppressed, impious books of all sorts, pestiferous journals, multifarious and pernicious sects are everywhere diffused, the instruction of youth is almost everywhere taken from the clergy, and, what is worse, entrusted in many places to masters of error and iniquity. Hence . . . impiety, immorality, unbridled licence, the contagion of bad opinions, of vice and wickedness, and the disregard of all human and divine laws have acquired such proportions that not only our holy religion, but human society itself is fearfully convulsed and afflicted." Wishing to remedy this, "the Bishops of the whole Catholic world" are to be convened to an Ecumenical Council, which is to decree rules relating to a variety of matters, amongst which are mentioned "the improvement of morals, the education of Christian youth, and the general peace and concord of all," whereby "all evils may be removed from the Church and from society." For this purpose, "as well as the Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops, as our beloved sons the Abbots, and all others to whom by right or privilege it belongs to attend General Councils and deliver their judgments in them," are solemnly named to attend at Rome on the 8th of December, 1869. Upon this M. Veuillot, writing in the Univers, makes a characteristic observation in the following words: "The Bull convening the Ecumenical Council does not invite sovereigns to sit in that legislative council. The omission has been remarked, and it is indeed remarkable. It implies that there are no longer Catholic crowns, that is to say, that the order in which society has lived for the last thousand years no longer exists. What has been called the 'middle ages' has come to an end. The 29th of June, 1868—the date of the promulgation of the Bull 'Æterni Patris'—is the date of its death, of its last sigh. Another era begins. The Church and State are separated in fact, and both recognise it. Thus we can understand why the Pope has departed from the precedent of the Council of Trent, and has not summoned the representatives of the temporal authority. What place could they hold, and what part could they play, in a programme of the government of mind and morals? What could they venture to do for the object of the council, for the greater glory of God, for the integrity of faith, for the Christian education of youth; in a word, for the eternal salvation of men?"

We are much disposed to agree with M. Veuillot. The fact is as he states it, and it is one which those who are able to appreciate its significance must regard with the most absorbing interest. Let us try to state a little more at large what the fact in question is. It is that there are, speaking boldly and generally, two ways of viewing the world in which we live. There is the lay and there is the clerical point of view. After centuries of more or less confused struggle it is gradually becoming obvious to every one who can look upon the world fairly that these two views are conflicting and cannot be reconciled. It would not be impossible to show how they are connected with other controversies in politics, in ethics, and in metaphysics, but that there is a broad and striking contrast between them, and that the clerical view in its most concentrated, unmixed, and absolute form is represented by Pius IX. and his clergy, appear to us to be propositions as plain as any propositions of so much generality can possibly be. To find any one representative of the other view is obviously impossible, for this plain reason: its one essential feature is that it is imperfect, and changes from time to time according to the growth of our knowledge and experience. All those, however, who believe that much is still to be learnt upon religious and moral subjects by using the common means by which facts are investigated more or less represent it, though, if they were to assert that at any given moment they had arrived at any other sort of certainty respecting such subjects than that which can be obtained on other branches of knowledge they would be inconsistent with their own principles. Thus the contrast between the lay and the clerical view of life relates not so much to the subject matter—the doctrines which are believed—as to the manner in which those doctrines are ascertained, and the foundation on which they rest when they are ascertained. It would be altogether inconsistent with a cordial and genuine acceptance of the lay view of life to refuse to hear evidence in favour of every doctrine which Pius IX. has to teach, so long as those who taught those doctrines admitted the validity of the common rules of evidence, and called for no other or further belief in their teaching than such as might be warranted by those rules. The question is not, for instance, whether the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception is true or false, but whether it can be established by the same sort of evidence by which you prove, for instance, any theory in political economy, and whether, when it has been established, people are to be required to have in it more confidence than the state of the evidence at any given moment would naturally produce. This is the real, the vital difference between the two views of the world; and what Pius IX. and his clergy have got to make good is the proposition that their solemn assertion as to the truth of any doctrine, theological or moral, is conclusive proof of its truth, and imposes upon the whole human race a conscientious obligation to believe it now and for ever, and in spite of any evidence which may be at any time offered to the contrary.

To us there is something almost affecting in the manner in which the whole body of the Roman Catholic clergy are preparing themselves to protest with passionate energy against the determination of the lay world, expressed in all sorts of forms, to take its own course and to see with its own eyes. They are not unlike the traditional crew of the Vengeur assembling, according to Barrere's famous canard, to sing the "Marseillaise" as their ship went down. We have only to look at one or two broad facts to be convinced of this. So long as they confine themselves to making theological assertions, which it is as impossible for any one who cares to use words with a meaning to deny as to affirm, they are on perfectly safe ground; but, if their theological assertions were really believed, their orders as to morals would be obeyed. If the States of Europe and America, or those who govern them, really attached any considerable importance to the clerical view of things, they would acknowledge the right of the clergy to regulate marriage, education, and the press at least. Either the clerical claims are altogether false, or else they know what is the divine will upon these matters; and, assuming that the divine will upon these matters is known, can there be a question that it is the duty of legislatures to bow to it and enforce it by appropriate legal sanctions? We cannot understand how any one accustomed to use language with a meaning can doubt it. It is clear, however, that in almost every part of the world the State—that is, the effective majority of grown-up men—steadily refuses to accept the clerical view of life to this extent, and resolutely insists upon acting on other views more or less opposed to it. What is the result of this? Clearly, that grown-up men all over the world have ceased to render to the clergy an unquivering belief, and will act no longer upon the assumption that in any matter of importance they know better than other people what is true and what is not. This is equivalent to saying that henceforth the Church and the State are to be regarded not merely as separate, but to a great extent as hostile bodies.

Agreeing, as we do, with M. Veuillot as to the fact that Church and State are divorced, it does not follow that we are obliged to agree with him as to the moral impotence of the State—its utter unfitness to govern mind and morals. Notwithstanding the odium which we seem to have incurred by saying so, we are of opinion that a father ought to govern his family in case of need, and this is eminently a case of the government of mind and morals. Why, then, should not the fathers of the State, collectively, the permanent majority of adult men, be able to govern both themselves and the weaker members of the State, by devising or maintaining institutions calculated to guide their passions into proper channels, to restrain them where restraint is good, to leave them at liberty where restraint is bad? Have they not done so, in fact, in every part of the world? and is it not a gross untruth and exaggeration to say that the result has been utterly bad, that "immorality, unbridled licence, the contagion of bad opinions, of vice and wickedness, and the disregard of all human and divine laws," have prevailed wherever lay legislation, and lay principles of legislation, have prevailed? There is a fine figure in one of Mr. Goldwin Smith's pamphlets of which we are constantly reminded by the attitude of the clergy and their doleful outcries in these days. A man at night fell over a cliff and caught hold of the edge with his hands. He clung, and screamed, and struggled, and suffered the bitterness of death, till at last his convulsive grasp slowly gave way and he fell just six inches. So now the clergy, with the Pope at their head, cry aloud in tones of the most passionate and agonised entreaty to the lay world to be governed by them, under pain of unutterable consequences; the lay world steadily goes its own way, and when it has at last carried the clergy with it, the clergy will find themselves much the better for their defeat.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

ECHOES.

J. H. MILLAR.

Words! 'tis said, when once they're spoken,
Like a stone thrown in the sea,
Wake a ripple on the ocean
Of the great eternity.

Idle thoughts, though whispered softly,
Fall not, but for ever rise;
Still progressing, still expanding,
Till they thunder in the skies!

Guard them, then, for soon as uttered
Quick they vibrate on the air,
Travelling through the whole creation,
Scattering influence everywhere

Think when wandering hereafter
In that land beyond the tomb,
Hearing those undying spirits
Shrieking wildly through the gloom!—

Words you dreamt were long forgotten,
Echoed louder than before;
Silent ripples of the ocean,
Dashing wildly on the shore.

O that every thought when spoken
Were but told in truth and love,
What a holy strain of music
Would reverberate above!

What a universal anthem,
If each silent world around,
In one glorious constellation
Would unite to swell the sound!

WATER! WATER!

THOUGH there are complaints from many parts of the country of the serious scarcity of water, we may trust that none of our countrymen will have to undergo the sufferings which are occasioned by thirst. M. Vambéry gives a lively idea of what these must be, in his "Travels in Central Asia." We abridge one of his descriptions.

On the road to Bokhara from Tünükli, after examining our skins we calculated we should have to apprehend a deficiency of water only during a day and a half; but the very first day of the six, I remarked that the Oxus water did not bear out our calculations, and that, either from the heat of the sun or its own evaporation, it diminished every moment. This made me watch my stores with double carefulness; in this I was imitated by others, and, in spite of our anxiety, it was even comical to see how the slumberers slept, firmly embracing their water vessels. Notwithstanding the scorching heat, we were obliged to make marches of from five to six hours during the day. Some of the poor camels fell ill through the torments of the sand and the heat, and at one station two of them died. We ourselves were left without strength, and two of our poorer companions, forced to tramp on foot by the side of their feeble beasts, having exhausted all their water, fell so sick that we were forced to bind them at full length on the camels, as they were perfectly incapable of riding or sitting. We covered them, and as long as they were able to articulate they kept exclaiming "Water! Water!"—the only words that escaped their lips. Alas! even their best friends denied them the life-dispensing draught; and when, on the fourth day, we reached Medem Bulag, one of them was freed by death from the dreadful torments of thirst. I was present when he drew his last breath. His tongue was quite black, the roof of his mouth of a greyish white; his lips were shrivelled, the teeth exposed, and the mouth open. I doubt whether, in these extreme sufferings, water would have been of service; but who was there to give it to him? It is a horrible sight to see the father hide his store of water from the son, and brother from brother; each drop is life, and when men feel the torture of thirst, there is not, as in the other dangers of life, any spirit of self-sacrifice or any feeling of generosity.

On the fourth day, I had still left about six glasses of water in my leathern bottle. These I drank drop by drop, suffering terribly, of course, from thirst. Greatly alarmed to find that my tongue began to turn a little black in the centre, I immediately drank off at a draught half of my remaining store, thinking so to save my life; but, oh! the burning sensation, followed by headache, became more violent towards the morning of the fifth day; and when, about mid-day, we could just distinguish the Khalata mountains from the clouds that surrounded them, I felt my strength gradually abandon me. As we were searching eagerly to discover a drove of cattle or shepherd's hut on the side of the mountains, the leader of the party drew our attention to a cloud of dust that was approaching, and told us to lose no time in dismounting from our camels. These poor brutes knew well enough that it was the Tebbad (fever-wind) that was hurrying on; uttering a loud cry, they fell on their knees, stretched their long necks along the ground, and strove to bury their heads in the sand. We entrenched ourselves behind them, lying there as under a wall, and scarcely had we done so, before the wind rushed over us with a dull, clattering sound, leaving us covered with a crust of sand two inches thick. The first particles that touched me seemed to burn like a rain of flakes of fire. Had we encountered it when we were six miles deeper in the desert, we should all have perished.

Towards evening we reached fountains that had not yet been visited this year by the shepherds; the water, undrinkable by man, refreshed our beasts. We were ourselves all very ill, like men half dead, without animation but that which proceeded from the now well-grounded hope that we should be saved. I was no longer able to dismount without assistance; they laid me upon the ground; a fearful fire seemed to burn my entrails; my headache reduced me almost to a state of stupefaction. My pen is too feeble to furnish even a slight sketch of the martyrdom that thirist occasions; I think that no death can be more painful. Although I have been able to nerve myself to face all other perils, here I felt quite broken. I thought, indeed, that I had reached the end of my life. Towards midnight we started, I fell asleep, and on waking in the morning found myself in a mud hut, surrounded by people with long beards. In these I immediately recognised children of Iran. They first gave me something warm to drink, and a little after some sour milk, mixed with water and salt. This gave me strength and set me up again.

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—VIII.

THERE was a handsome and virtuous youth who was betrothed to a beautiful girl. I have read that as they were sailing on the great sea, they fell together into a whirlpool. When a sailor came to seize his hand, and save him from perishing in that extremity, he called out from the midst of the threatening waves, "Leave hold of me, and take the hand of my beloved." Every one admired him for that speech; and when he was expiring, he was heard to say, "Learn not the tale of love from that light-minded person who forgets his beloved in the hour of danger."

It was good, the answer which the aged woman made to her son, when she beheld him, strong as an elephant, able to cope with a tiger: "Didst thou call to remembrance the time of thine infancy, when thou lay helpless in my embrace, thou wouldst not to-day afflict me with violence, thou in the fulness of thy manhood, and I a weak old woman."

He who has never learned good habits in his childhood will in his manhood never recover his superiority. You may twist the green wood in any way you please; the dry you can make straight only by fire.

A king, who was sending his son to school, placed on his breast a silver tablet, on which was written, in letters of gold, "The severity of the schoolmaster is better than the indulgence of the father."

I heard a learned instructor saying to one of his scholars, "Did a man fix his heart as much upon Him who affords him subsistence as upon the subsistence itself, he would raise himself into the sphere of angels. He did not forget thee when thou wert as yet unborn and hidden in the womb. He gave thee a soul, and reason, and form, and intellect, and beauty, and speech, and thought, and judgment, and understanding. He arranged on thine hand thy ten fingers, and adapted thy two arms to thy shoulders, and thinkest thou now, who art at thy best a mere nothing, that He will forget to give thee the means of subsistence?"

I saw an Arab, who was saying to his son: "O, my child, on the day of the resurrection, they will ask you, What have you done? not Whose son are you? The veil which they kiss in the holy place is not famous, because it came from the silkworm. It was associated some time with a venerable personage. That is the reason why it is so precious."

A silly fellow, having a pain in his eyes, went to a farrier, and asked him for a remedy. The farrier applied to his eyes something which he would have given to an animal, and it blinded him, upon which they made an appeal to the magistrate. The magistrate said: "This is no case for damages; it is plain that this fellow is an ass, or he would not have gone to a farrier. No man of enlightened understanding will commit weighty matters to one of mean abilities. A weaver of mats, though he be a weaver, will not be employed in the weaving of silk."

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XI.

WISHING TO BE MARRIED.

APPROPOS to the recent innovation in the Scotch Kirk of celebrating marriages at the church, instead of at the residence of the parties, the Londonerry Standard relates the following incident:

The afternoon services had ended, and the congregation were arranging themselves for the benediction, when, to the manifest interest of the worshippers, the good parson descended from the pulpit to the desk below, and said in a calm, clear voice:

"Those wishing to be united in the holy bonds of matrimony will now please come forward."

A deep stillness instantly fell over the congregation, broken only by the rustling of silk, as some pretty girly or excited matron changed her position to get the first view of the couple to be married. No one, however, arose, or seemed the least inclined to rise. Whereupon the worthy clergyman, deeming the first notice unheard or misunderstood, repeated:

"Let those wishing to be united in the holy bonds of matrimony now come forward."

Still no one stirred. The silence became almost audible, and a painful sense of awkwardness among those present was felt, when a young gentleman who occupied a vacant seat in the broad aisle during the service, slowly arose, and deliberately walked to the foot of the altar. He was good looking and well dressed, but no female accompanied his travels. When he arrived within a respectable distance of the clergyman, he paused, with a reverent bow, stepped to one side of the aisle, but neither said anything nor seemed at all disconcerted at the idea of being married alone.

The clergyman looked anxiously around for the bride, who, he supposed, was yet to arrive, and at length remarked to the young gentleman, in an undertone:

"The lady, sir, is dilatory."

"Yes, sir."

"Had you not better defer the ceremony?"

"I think not."

"Do you suppose she will be here soon?"

"Me, sir?" said the young gentleman, "how should I know of the lady's movements?"

A few moments were suffered to elapse in this unpleasant state of expectancy, when the clergyman renewed his interrogatories.

"Did the lady promise to attend at the present hour sir?"

"What lady?"

"Why, the lady, to be sure, that you are waiting here for."

"I did not hear you say anything about it," was the unsatisfactory response.

"Then, sir, may I ask you why you are here, and for what purpose you thus trifle in the sanctuary of the Most High?" said the somewhat enraged clerical.

"I came, sir, simply because you invited all those wishing to be united in the holy bonds of matrimony to step forward; and I happened to entertain such a wish. I am very sorry to have misunderstood you sir, and wish you a very good day."

The benediction was uttered with a solemnity of tone very little in accordance with the twitching of the facial nerves, and when, after the church was closed, the story got among the congregation, more than one girl regretted that the young gentleman who really wished to be united in the holy bonds of matrimony had been obliged to depart without a wife.

A CLERICAL HIRELING.

In his "Saints and Sinners," Dr. Doran, writing of the clerical hirelings that abounded in the last century, tells the following anecdote of one of them. Mounted on a cob, he was trotting briskly on a Sunday morning to the country church where he had engaged to preach. He overtook Howell Davies, Whitfield's coadjutor, who was walking with similar purpose in view. As Howell looked clerical, the equestrian clergyman entered into conversation with him. He spoke of their calling as unprofitable; "I can never get more than half a guinea for preaching," Howell mildly remarked that he was glad to preach for a crown. The cob-exalted priest did not refrain from expressing his contempt for a fellow who so disgraced his cloth. "You'll perhaps despise me more," said Davies, "when I tell you that I am going 18 miles in and out to preach, and that I have only 7d. in my pocket for all expenses." "Why," cried the other, "you said you were glad to preach for a crown." "So I am," replied Howell, "for a crown of glory." Whereat Presbyter put his one spur to the flank of his cob, and rode away with a "psha!"

EARLY CHILD NAMES.

THE choosing a name by sound belongs to civilisation. It was not so with nations in their infancy. They went by sense. They fixed on a name that described the child, that referred to its personal characteristics, that was an outlet for their piety and thanksgiving, that was owned already by something that they were grateful for and loved. The Jewish mother—as long ago as the days chronicled in the Bible—rocked her baby on her breast, and as she sat among the flocks, and birds, and flowers, called it Susanna, lily; or Hadassah, myrtle; or Zophar, her little bird; or Deborah, the bee, that buzzed so closely it made her little one open its eyes and smile. Or, joyous and poetic in her luxuriant land, the timid sheep were bleating by, and she called her babe Rachel, in their memory; or the rich fruit of the pomegranate overhung her, and gave her food, and she called her baby Tabrimon; or the palm-tree rose straight and tall, and so her child should, and be named Tamar; or the sparrows twittered in her ear, and her child was Zipper; or the dove cooed softly, and she called it Jonah; or the crow showed its sable plumage, and its name was Caleb; or the light seed-down was wafted by her, and her babe was Julia, the tender, delicate, nestling little thing. Carmi, my vineyard, the Israelites' child became, when they were grateful for that source of their happiness and wealth; or Eshcol, the full cluster of ripe, purple grapes; or Lot, sweet-scented myrrh; or Peninnah and Pinon, pearl; or Thabash, the tender tint of hyacinth, fragrant and pale; or Ulla, a young child; or Sapp, the moss growing so plentiful at their feet on the bright sea-shore. And then Hebrew parents mourned over a sickly child, and called it Abel, because they saw it was like breath or vapour, and would soon pass away; or they named it Delilah, weak; or Hagar, timorous stranger; or Jabez, sorrow; or Job, a weeper; or Leah, weary; or Necho, lame. And the robust child, the sturdy, strong, young fellow was rejoiced in, and called Elah, the tall, spreading oak; or Amos, weighty; or Asher, bliss; or Ruth, contentment; or Rebekah, fat; or, more poetically still, Abigail, the father's joy; Eve, the gladder; Isaac, laughter; Nahum, comforter; and David—sweet and tender utterance—beloved.—Chambers's Journal.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—The Rev. William Oates, of Derby, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Birkenhead Unitarian congregation to become their minister.

BELFAST: SUNDAY-SCHOOL RE-UNION.—On Saturday last, Dr. and Mrs. Ritchie entertained at The Grove three schools connected with the Northern Sunday-school Association, namely, the Mountpottinger, York-street, and Stanhope-street schools. At half-past three o'clock about 200 children, accompanied by the superintendents of the several schools—Mr. Robert McCalmont, Rev. J. Jellie, and T. Bowring, and thirty teachers—arrived, and found that most extensive preparations had been made for their entertainment. Tables were laid on the lawn for the children, who were supplied with an abundant tea, and other refreshments. In a handsome marquise Dr. and Mrs. Ritchie entertained the teachers and visitors. Before the company returned from the marquise to join the young people, the Rev. D. Maginnis, of Stourbridge, who had been deputed to do so, tendered the most cordial thanks of the three schools to Dr. and Mrs. Ritchie for their generous hospitalities, to which Dr. Ritchie replied, and expressed his hope that their re-union would become an annual one.

BIRMINGHAM.—On Monday, the fifth annual excursion of the Lawrence-street Mission was made to Dudley. Upwards of 300 persons, with the sax horn and drum and fife bands from the schools, visited the town, the Wren's Nest—a huge hill, parallel with the castle grounds; the limestone caverns beneath, and the castle and beautiful grounds. After rambling about for some time the party took tea together in Bayliss's School. The party was under the direction of the Rev. John Wilson. Mr. Ridgway rendered valuable help.

CRENSHAW.—On the 12th inst. the second annual Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. H. Austin. Both the attendance and collections were encouraging. On Thursday, the 16th inst., about 120 children and friends went to Alfred's Hall, by the kind permission of Earl Bathurst, and found ample amusement. The friends, as on a former occasion, kindly subscribed and provided the children with their tea free of expense. A month ago, the Rev. H. Austin recommended his open-air village addresses at Kemble. Large numbers of villagers assembled at these meetings, and, indeed, nearly the whole population has espoused the cause of liberal Christianity. On Tuesday last, the psalmody of these services was very much improved by a young man bringing out his harmonium, and under the large elm trees gathering a choir, which put new animation into the meeting.

CHOWBENT.—On Sunday last, the annual school sermons were preached by the Rev. S. A. Steinhilf, of Platt. The attendance was large, the sermons good, and the collection excellent, being about £40.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.—We understand that this society has taken the chapel in St. John's-square, Clerkenwell, better known as the "Free-thinking Christian Chapel," for the purpose of holding Sunday evening services. This will in no way interfere with the Clerkenwell Mission, as it is intended to continue that as a school and mission station, while the new place will be used for religious services only. As there are two restrictions under which the society holds it, viz., that the services shall not be conducted by a salaried minister, and that Trinitarianism shall not be preached, the Lay Preachers' Union will no doubt render great service. The chapel is capable of holding about 200 people, and having recently been painted and cleaned, it will be one of the most attractive of the stations of this society.

SWINTON.—The annual sermons in aid of the Sunday school were preached on Sunday last, by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, of Bolton. The chapel was filled both afternoon and evening. The collections amounted to £20.

UNITED PRESBYTERY OF SYNOD OF MUNSTER.—At the annual meeting of this religious body, held in Cork on the 14th inst., the following motion on a subject which has excited and is occupying so much of the public attention at the present moment, was brought forward by the Rev. James Orr, of Clonmel, and seconded by the lay representative of the said congregation, James Crawford Ledlie, Esq.:—"That while deeply grateful to the British Government for its support hitherto, by giving to us, with other Irish Presbyterian Dissenters, the grant usually termed Regium Donum, without any interference on its part with our religious liberties, we are, nevertheless, rejoiced at the determination of the British House of Commons to place all religious denominations in this country on an equality, and believe that while this will for a time be prejudicial to some weak congregations, yet that it will on the whole be highly favourable to the progress, peace, and prosperity of a country too long distracted by sectarian differences." As this motion leaves the question of endowment of all, or disendowment, entirely to the wisdom of the British Parliament, and simply affirms the principle of religious equality, no objection to it was anticipated. But it was met by a counter resolution to this effect—that it was "inopportune" to give any expression to our sentiments, and this resolution was affirmed by the majority. If the Synod of Munster, in its wisdom, be right in this respect, surely all other religious bodies that have given expression to their sentiments on this subject must have been ill-advised to moot the question.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. S. P.—Your letters being unpaid, cost us 2d. F. M. W.—Declined.

THE GREEK OF THE NEW TESTAMENT MADE EASY.

To the Editors.—In announcing my willingness to open a class for the systematic study of the Greek of the New Testament, I used the term "persons." A warm friend to the effort asks me whether the word includes or excludes "ladies." Includes, certainly. If, however, a sufficient number of ladies prefer a class for themselves, I am ready to form one. I may add that, as I shall studiously avoid debated points of doctrine, the instruction given will be open and unobjectionable to persons of all denominations. JOHN R. BEARD.

The Meadows, Altrincham, July 20, 1868.

AN EXPLANATION.

To the Editors.—It is to-day I had the first sight of your issue of the 10th inst. In the brief report of our quarterly meeting held at Cwmbach, I am represented as having urged the doctrine of the final destruction of the wicked. It is not correct to say that I urged the doctrine. It is only true that I alluded to it in my address to the congregation. When afterwards questioned by some of my brother ministers as to my views on the subject, I said I did not see how several passages in the Gospels could be explained, except on the supposition that the wicked were to be finally annihilated.—Yours faithfully, D. L. EVANS. Carmarthen, 21st July, 1868.

MILE END AND STEPNEY, LONDON.

To the Editors.—Permit me to refer to an advertisement in your columns from the Unitarian Christian Church at Stepney. I have requested the secretary, Mr. Waller, to correct the first paragraphs, but he declines, therefore, I am desired by the members of the sub-committee referred to in the advertisement, to say that no resolution was agreed to, and that the London Unitarian District Society is not pledged to render any help. The society may or may not assist. Allow me also to say that about twelve months ago the District Society opened rooms at 245, Mile End Road. In the course of nine months about fifty members joined the church. A difference arose about the continuation of the minister. I attended one of these meetings, and found that thirty agreed upon a change of minister and twenty determined to hold by their present minister, the Rev. James Phillips. Mr. Phillips and his friends have now opened a room at Stepney Green, and the friends who made the first effort at Mile End Road, and have been very active, remain in the meeting-house by the wish of the District Committee. It was not the committee of the Mile End church, but the friends of Mr. Phillips, who met the sub-committee of the District Society at Stamford-street Chapel. I need not say we greatly deplore this division, and the London District Committee have not decided upon the course they may take.—Faithfully yours, ROBERT SPEARS.

THE COMING WEEK.

CRANBROOK: KENT GENERAL BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.—On Tuesday, the annual meeting. Business at 10 a.m., service at 11. Preacher, Rev. T. B. W. Briggs. At five p.m. tea, followed by a public meeting.

MANCHESTER: MILES PLATING.—On Sunday, school sermons. Preachers: Afternoon, the Rev. J. Page Hopps; evening, the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A.

PENMAENMAWR: PENDRYFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. R. B. Aspinwall, M.A.

Marriages.

BOTH—FIRTH.—On the 23rd inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, Heywood, by the Rev. J. Fox, Mr. Edward Booth to Betty Hannah, eldest daughter of Mr. Sutcliffe Firth, all of Heywood.

HASTINGS—BEAVERS.—On the 19th inst., at the Old Meeting, Yarmouth, by the Rev. R. Shelley, Mr. George Andrew Hastings to Miss Mary Ann Beavers, both of Yarmouth.

JONE—WILLIAMS.—On the 21st inst., at Gorton Chapel, by the Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A., Joseph Jones to Esther Williams, both of Gorton.

SHAW—WHITEHEAD.—On the 22nd inst., at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., Mr. Joe Shaw to Miss Henrietta Whitehead, both of Falsworth.

Deaths.

JACKSON.—On the 18th inst., at her residence, Byrom-street, St. John's, in her 63rd year, Frances, relict of the late Mr. John Jackson, of Manchester.

WANTED, by a Young Man (25), a Situation in an Office, Warehouse, or Mill, where he can be actively employed.—Reference, Rev. Brooke Herford, Higher Broughton, Manchester.—address L. M., Herford office.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME

of the late
GEORGE BROWN,
Barrister-at-Law.

Containing 17 sermons preached by him
in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle.
Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A.,
with

Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 3s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to
Mr. JOSEPH LEE,
Barnard Castle.

In three vols. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES. Translated by SAMUEL SHARPE. Being a Revision of the Authorized English Old Testament. "Superior to any preceding revision of our English translation."—Athenaeum.
E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

Nearly ready.

"THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK," price 4s. 6d.
TUNES TO ALL MARTINEAU'S HYMNS.
London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W.

PRESENT Condition of Unitarianism and Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 3d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

THE following WORK may be procured from JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester, for cash:—

DR. BEARD'S BIBLICAL DICTIONARY (containing above 1,000 engravings, together with maps and plates), a new edition, elegantly got up, large 8vo., 1,200 pages, containing matter equal to eight ordinary 8vo. vols.

Prices:

Neatly half-bound morocco, gilt edges, 18s.

Full-bound morocco, ditto 22s.

Full-bound morocco, richly gilt 25s.

THE "HOME PAGES" TRACT SERIES.

The whole series of 235 Tracts (with the exception of one or two of the earliest) are kept in stock.

All orders must now be sent direct to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,

Higher Broughton,
MANCHESTER.

Prices.

Single Tracts. Per dozen. Per 100.

4 pp. Tracts... 4d. 4d. 2s.

8 pp. " " 8d. 8d. 4s.

12 pp. " " 1s. 1s. 6s.

The whole series, well bound, in 4 volumes, for 10s., or free by post.

In cases where the Tracts will have to be sent by post, a penny in the shilling must be added for postage.

Mr. Herford will be glad to forward, on application, a complete list of the "Home Pages" Tracts and Covers.

TORQUAY.—Furnished Apartments, 11,

Scarboro' Terrace, Torre Abbey Park.—Address as above.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITEFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS

of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET,

EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE,

BIRMINGHAM.

WHITEFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and

SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS,

CASH and DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c.,

&c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITEFIELD & SONS,

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET,

EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE,

BIRMINGHAM.

A BEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED

AND OTHER NEEDLES.

TEVERSHAM'S Boarding House, Commercial and Private, 22, Ironmonger Lane, Cheap-side, London.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of

Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant,

STOCKPORT.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,

FURNISHING IRON WONGERS and CUTLERS,

23 SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8,

Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck

was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvener-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Leard.

NEW GOODS FOR THE SUMMER SEASON.

WILLIAM MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also

Bannockburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits.

FIRST CHAMBERS, 42, MARKET-STREET.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use

WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE

USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at

11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED.

We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, cleanflavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical

Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,

WINE MERCHANTS,

26, MARKET-STREET,

And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool. MANCHESTER

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsey

Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing offices, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said

Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster

Bow.—Friday, July 24, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 379.

FRIDAY, JULY 31, 1868.

PRICE 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing	244
What is Saying on Church Matters	246
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XIV.	246
Review: The New Catholic Church	246
Wilberforce and Spurgeon	246
Thoughts for Present Use	246
Can there be a Catholic Church?	247
Regium Doum	247
Ecumenical Councils	248
Siemond	248
Religious Buzzing	248
The late Mr. William Clephane	249
Fire-side Readings: Communion	249
Lapland Superstitions	249
Undesirable Acquaintances	249
A Scotch Obit	250
Westminster Abbey	250
Robert Hall's Portrait	250
A Singular Cure	250
Intelligence: A Correction, Bury District Sunday-School Union, Great Hucklow, Swindon	250
Correspondence	250

REV. DR. BELLOW, OF NEW YORK.
On Sunday next, August the 2nd, the Rev. H. W. BELLOW, D.D., of New York, late President of the United States Sanitary Commission, will PREACH in Hope-street Church in the Morning (service at eleven a.m.), and in Renshaw-street Chapel in the Evening (service at half-past six).

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, ST. PAUL'S ROAD, CAMDEN SQUARE.—The Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS will preach in this Church next Sunday, August 2nd, both morning and evening.

BUXTON: PRESBYTERIAN CHAPEL.
BAIL BANK. On Sunday next, Aug. 2nd, a SERVICE by Sir JOHN BOWRING, LL.D., F.R.S., &c.; and on the 9th, SERVICES by Rev. D. GORDON, of the Presbytery of Antrim. A Collection after each service in aid of the Chapel Funds.

ROCHDALE: CLOVER-ST. CHAPEL.
CONGREGATIONAL JUBILEE AND OLD TEACHERS' and SCHOLARS' TEA MEETING.—On Saturday, Aug. the 8th, it is intended to celebrate the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Opening of the above Chapel, by a Jubilee and Tea Meeting. Old friends, teachers, and scholars are kindly invited. Several ministers and gentlemen of the district are expected to be present and address the meeting. Tea on the table at half-past four. Tickets, 6d. each.

DOB LANE, FAILSWORTH.—SUNDAY-SCHOOL SERMONS on Sunday, Aug. 9, 1868. Afternoon at 3, by the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. Evening at 5.30, by the Rev. JOSEPH FREESTON. Collections at the close of each service.

SOUTHPORT, July, 1868.—The Committee of the Portland-street Unitarian Church appeal to the general Unitarian public to assist in paying off the debt contracted in the erection of their Church, which still amounts to about £700. They beg to remind their friends that the Church has been erected to supply a want which is participated in by visitors from the neighbouring towns, as well as by the inhabitants of Southport. While gratefully acknowledging the liberal help they have already received they again appeal with confidence to the generosity of those who sympathize with them in the support of a liberal and enlightened Christianity.

Subscriptions will be received by the Secretary, EDWARD JOHNSON, 6, New Promenade, Southport; the Treasurer, HOLBROOK GASKELL, Birkdale, Southport; Rev. THOS. HOLLAND, B.A., Belmont-street, Southport.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH AND SCHOOLS, STEPNEY, LONDON.

By a Sub-committee of the London District Unitarian Society assembled in Conference with the Committee of the Rev. J. Phillips's Congregation, on Tuesday, 12th May, 1868, at Stamford-street Chapel, it was resolved that assistance should be rendered to that congregation in obtaining a Permanent Place of Worship at Stepney Green.

In pursuance of such resolution, and through the kind instrumentality of members of the Sub-committee, a suitable site has been obtained on which to erect a Church, School, &c., at Stepney Green.

It has been determined at present to erect a neat and substantial School-room, capable of accommodating about 250 persons, and that religious worship shall be conducted therein till the funds are raised for the Church.

The Congregation, consisting for the most part of working men, appeal most earnestly to the Unitarian public to supplement their efforts to open the School free of debt.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by Mr. GEORGE RITCHIE, 34, Bread-street, London, E.C.; Mr. F. M. WALLER, 100, Turner's Road, Burdett Road, London, E.; and The East London Bank, Cornhill, E.C.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.—Full information as to the Subjects in which Candidates for Admission to the above Institution will be examined may be obtained on application to the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A., George-street, Chesham Hill, Manchester.

Applications from Candidates must be sent in, as above, before 1st September next.

IN THE MATTER OF THE CHARITY CALLED

"THE GENERAL BAPTIST EDUCATION FUND." Notice is hereby given, that an order has been made by the Board of Charity Commissioners for England and Wales appointing Trustees for the management of the above-mentioned Charity.

A Copy of the Order may be inspected, free of cost, daily, except on Sundays, during the space of one calendar month, to be computed from the first publication of this notice, at the office of the said Commissioners, at No. 8, York-street, St. James's Square, London, between the hours of ten a.m. and four p.m.

Dated this 14th day of July, 1868.
HENRY M. VANE, Secretary.

TO UNITARIAN MINISTERS.—THREE
MISSIONARY MINISTERS, or Qualified Preachers, are WANTED.—Apply to Rev. E. SPEARS, 27, Grosvenor Park, Camberwell, London.

REQUIRED, by a Lady of experience, a Re-engagement, to take the CHARGE of a HOUSEHOLD, or to assist in Superintending the duties of a Family, and to give instruction in English, Music, and French. References.—Address E. M., 26, Falkner Square, Liverpool.

WANTED, for a Young Lady, aged 21, a Situation, as RESIDENT NURSEY GOVERNESS. Letters to be addressed to E. M., Mr. MATTHEWS, 39, Congreve Road, Birmingham.

WANTED, by a Young Man (25), a Situation in an Office, Warehouse, or Mill, where he can be actively employed.—Reference, Rev. Brooke Herford, Higher Broughton, Manchester.—Address L. M., Herford office.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—NINE HOURS AT THE SEASIDE.—This Company is now prepared to ARRANGE EXCURSIONS, at nominal fares, with Mill Hands, Mechanics' Institutions, Provident and other Societies, Sunday and Day Schools, to SOUTHPORT, the Montpelier; or BLACKPOOL, the Brighton of the North; or to those other delightful watering-places, LYTHAM, FLEETWOOD, and WATERLOO. Also to LEEDS, for the National Exhibition of Works of Art. Fares and conditions may be obtained on application to the undersigned.
H. BLACKMORE,
Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, Manchester, June 22, 1868.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—CHEAP SUMMER EXCURSIONS DAILY TO LITTLEBOROUGH FOR HOLLINGWORTH from Manchester, Stalybridge, Ashton, Bolton, Bury, Middleton, &c.
Fares for the Double Journey:
First class, 2s. 6d.; Second class, 1s. 9d.; Third class, 1s. 3d.
A SPECIAL TRAIN also leaves the Victoria Station, Manchester, on Saturday Afternoons, at 2.45 p.m. for LITTLEBOROUGH.
To WHALLEY, CLITHEROE, and CHATBURN, Every Saturday, from Manchester, at 1.30 p.m.
Fares for the Double Journey:
First class, 4s.; Second class, 2s. 6d.; Third class, 2s. 6d.
For further particulars, see handbills. By order.
Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, Manchester, July 16, 1868.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—ALTERATION OF TRAINS FOR AUGUST, 1868.
A new Train will leave Blackpool at 3.10 p.m., and Lytham 8.25 p.m., for Preston, Blackburn, and Accrington.
The 1.15 p.m. Train, Manchester to Preston, will run forward to Lytham and Blackpool, leaving Preston at 9.15 p.m.
A new Express Train will leave Blackpool for Manchester at 2.45 p.m., stopping at Lostock, Bolton, and Salford.
The Train leaving Liverpool for Accrington and Colne at 3.30 p.m. will leave at 3.40 p.m., and cease stopping at Ormskirk; it will also run to Sowerby Bridge, arriving there at 5.40 p.m., forming a connection with Trains for Halifax, Bradford, and Leeds.
A new Train will leave Sowerby Bridge at 6.15 p.m., after the arrival of Trains from Leeds, &c., for Burnley and Accrington.
The Train leaving Preston for Accrington at 9.20 p.m. will leave at 9.10 p.m.
The Train leaving Accrington for Preston at 9.55 a.m. will cease stopping at Bamber Bridge.
The 9.20 a.m. Train, Preston to Liverpool, will be discontinued.
The 8 a.m. Train, Preston to Liverpool, will leave at 9.8 a.m. and stop at Ormskirk at 9.35.
The 7.55 p.m. Train, Liverpool to Preston, will stop at Bootle Lane.

SUNDAYS.
The Train leaving Accrington at 1.15 p.m. will run through to Blackpool, arriving there at 2.58 p.m.
A new Train will leave Preston for Blackpool at 2.10 p.m.
A new Train will leave Blackpool at 8 p.m. for Preston, Blackburn, Accrington, Burnley, and Colne.
For various other alterations see the Company's time bills and books. By order.
Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, Manchester, July 29th, 1868.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—SATURDAY TO MONDAY AT MATTLOCK.—Every Saturday until the end of October, 1868, RETURN TICKETS, at the following low fares, will be issued from the under-mentioned Stations to MATTLOCK BATH, by the Midland Company's New Route, by any of the ordinary trains on Saturday, available for return by any train on the following Sunday or Monday.

Stations.	First Class.	Second Class.
Manchester	9s. 6d.	7s. 6d.
Guido Bridge	9s. 6d.	7s. 6d.
Stockport (Periot Dale Station)	8s. 6d.	6s. 6d.

In Manchester, Tickets will be issued at Cook's Excursion Office, 42, Piccadilly, and at the Midland Booking Office, London Road Station.
JAMES ALLPORT, General Manager.
Derby, May, 1868.

METROPOLITAN DRINKING FOUNTAIN AND CATTLE TROUGH ASSOCIATION.

116 Fountains and 93 Troughs for Animals have been erected, and are kept in repair, and supplied with water, by this Society. The Committee are urgently in need of Funds to enable them to sustain and extend the work, and they earnestly appeal for help to all who are anxious to promote habits of temperance or to alleviate the sufferings which are experienced by horses, dogs, sheep, and oxen in the streets of London from thirst.
JOHN LEE, Secretary.
Office, 1, Shorters Court, Throgmorton-street, E.C.
Bankers—Messrs. Ransom, Houeverly, & Co., 1, Pall Mall East, S.W.; and Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, Tritton, Twiss, and Co., 54, Lombard-street, E.C.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

MRS. GLOYN'S PUPILS will RE-ASSEMBLE at three o'clock on Tuesday, Aug. 11th. Acomb House, Greenheys.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G., 31, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

SOUTHPORT.—Mrs. HEISE'S SCHOOL will RE-OPEN August 3rd. Mrs. H. is most ably assisted in her duties by the Rev. THOS. HOLLAND, B.A., to whom references are kindly permitted.
Queen's Elms, 4, Hawkhead-street, Southport.

KNUTSFORD.—Mrs. LAWFORD'S SCHOOL for Little Boys will be RE-OPENED on Saturday, August 8th.

OLD HOVE HOUSE SCHOOL.—Mr. HUTTON will RE-OPEN his School on Tuesday, August 18th. He has two or three Vacancies.

MISS O'DWYER'S SCHOOL will be RE-OPENED Tuesday, August 4. Northgate, Wakefield.

SOUTHPORT: ALBERT ROAD.—Mr. MILLSON will RE-OPEN his SCHOOL on Monday, August 3rd. He has three Vacancies.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.—The NEXT QUARTER BEGINS on Tuesday, August 4th.—During the erection of new premises, address 18, Regent-street.
EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Principal.

LANCASTER.—The Rev. D. DAVIS, B.A., will RE-OPEN SCHOOL on Friday, August 7.—No vacancy.

9, WELL CLOSE SQUARE, WHITBY.
The Rev. JOHN and Mrs. OWEN wish to receive two or three Ladies or Gentlemen as BOARDERS during the season.

HIGH SCHOOL, 126, MUCH PARK-STREET, COVENTRY.—The Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., having taken extensive premises, is prepared to RECEIVE BOARDERS. Terms: 30 to 40 Guineas per annum. Full prospectus on application.

STAND GRAMMAR SCHOOL, NEAR MANCHESTER.—Head Master, Rev. JOHN DAVIES, M.A.—House large and commodious, locality healthy, playground attached, and number of pupils limited. Terms per annum: For Boarders under 14 years of age, £25; for Boarders above 14 years of age, £40. Day Scholars admitted at 12 guineas a year each. Full particulars on application.
N.B.—A Preparatory School for Little Boys and Girls, by Mrs. DAVIES. Terms: For Boarders, £25; for Day Scholars, four guineas a year.
The NEXT QUARTER will COMMENCE on Tuesday, August 4, 1868.

NEW EDITION OF DR. EPHRAIM PEABODY'S "CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS." Just published, neatly printed, and bound in bevelled boards, with red edges, price 3s. 6d., a new edition of "CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS." By EPHRAIM PEABODY, D.D.
London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

DR. BEARD'S MANUAL OF CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE. No. VII. The GOD OF REVELATION and the GOD OF IDEALISTIC MATERIALISM. Orders may be sent to Mr. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

Nearly ready.
"THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK," price 4s. 6d. TUNES TO ALL MARTINEAU'S HYMNS.
London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL PENNY MAGAZINE for AUGUST, contains:—Aunt Ruth's Almanac.—The Boys' Adventures. Chapter VI.—The Ex-torted Promise. Part IV.—The Tomtit: A Fable. Published by the Manchester District Sunday-School Association. London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson, 59, Market-street. General Agent: Mr. T. P. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME of the late GEORGE BROWN, Barrister-at-Law. Containing 17 sermons preached by him in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle. Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A., with Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 8s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.
Subscribers' names to be sent to Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Barnard Castle.

PRESENT Condition of Unitarian and Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 3d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Russian papers give a long account of the progress of Innocent, the new Metropolitan of Moscow, from his former diocese, and of his entry into that city. Among other things, it is mentioned that at Kazan he kissed the relics of St. Cyprian, and visited the nunnery where "the wonder-working image of the Mother of God is preserved;" on his arrival at Moscow, Bishop Leonidas welcomed him, and presented him with "a consecrated picture of the Divine Mother of Iberia"; the Mayor and councilmen offered bread and salt; and the heads of the monasteries and nunneries presented him with consecrated pictures. On the Sunday, after service and kissing of relics, an address was read to him, in which a curious parallel was drawn between the journeys of "His Eminence" and the Apostle Paul. In his reply, the Metropolitan said he was only "a modest workman in a small field of Christ," and not worthy to be compared with his predecessor. The Independent notices as singular the omission in his address of all reference to the Holy Ghost.

The Municipal Council of Florence have been debating the question—which is sure before long to rise up in every Catholic country—Who shall control the schools, the State or the clergy? On one hand, it is feared that if the common schools are taken entirely out of the hands of the priests, they will use their influence to keep the children away from them; and on the other hand, the "Liberi Pensatori," who seem to answer pretty much to our "Secularists," and are the usual product of revolt against Catholicism, are strongly opposed to allowing the clergy any influence in the schools, and go in strongly for educational freedom.

Letters from Rome state that the rupture of diplomatic relations between the Vatican and the Austrian Government may now be considered as complete. M. de Meysenberg has left, after placing in Cardinal Antonelli's hands the protest of Baron von Beust against the Papal allocution of the 22nd of June.

The commissioners appointed by the Bishop of London for the preliminary inquiry into the charges of heresy brought against the Rev. W. J. E. Bennet, Vicar of Frome, are Sir Travers Twiss, Archdeacons Hale and Sinclair, and the Revs. J. E. Kempe and F. G. Blomfield.

According to the Leeds Mercury, Mr. Councillor Clapham has been fined by the magistrates twice, the second time £15, for allowing music on Sundays in his park; and the magistrates seem resolved to enforce the penalty so long as Mr. Clapham continues to repeat the offence.

From a correspondence between Mr. Hubbard and the Bishop of London, it appears as if they were both of them powerless against Mr. Mackonochie, of St. Alban's in Holborn notoriety, who, in spite of their objections, pleadings, and supplications, persists in the "introduction of strange and obsolete services." Mr. Hubbard, who has spent five or six thousand pounds upon the church, says that when he presented Mr. Mackonochie to it, he gave him a promise, which he has not kept, to "act as a true and faithful priest of the Church of England, with prudence and discretion;" and dishonourably introduced the gorgeous vestments, knowing that Mr. Hubbard's fellow-churchwarden had written to him on the subject, before his answer could be given, "to preclude any intervention on his part." Mr. Hubbard has repeatedly invited Mr. Mackonochie to submit his objectionable practices to the Bishop, but he will do nothing of the sort, and his unfortunate patron asks the Bishop if he can give him no help. His lordship, in reply, assures him of his sympathy under his "disappointment," but as Mr. Mackonochie has refused all reference and arbitration, and his case is before the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, the Bishop wishes to know their decision before doing anything, but confesses he sees no hope of final peace till the Bishops have more powers of interference given them than they at present possess.

The Bishop of Capetown has published a circular in which he says that Convocation having declared that "the Church as a spiritual body may rightly accept the validity of the sentence pronounced against Dr. Colenso; and the Government having, after an undue interference with our liberties, admitted our perfect right to consecrate an orthodox Bishop for the faithful clergy and laity of Natal," there is no further legitimate hindrance to the consecration of Mr. Macrorie. The consecration, therefore, will be proceeded with at the earliest possible period; and Dr. Gray, "sure that it will be felt that it is neither reasonable nor right that one Bishop in Africa should remain responsible for the income of another," has made himself answerable, so long as needed, for £600 a year.

A striking illustration has just been given of the kind of religious liberty which is granted in Russia. A clever journalist in Warsaw ventured, though a Pole, to contract marriage with a Russian lady, and in order to escape official displeasure, registered her as a Roman Catholic. But in Russia, children inherit the religion of their parents, and she therefore belonged to the Greek Church. The Government, becoming cognisant of the offence thus committed, banished the husband to Siberia, and sentenced the wife to five years' confinement in a convent. Having a presentiment, however, of what was awaiting them, the young couple escaped into a freer country, and when sentence was ready to be executed, were not to be found.

Emboldened by their successes in Wales, the Mormons have endeavoured to break ground in Liverpool. Few persons out of the Principality are aware of the encouragement which the emissaries of Brigham Young always find in the Welsh counties, especially in the southern parts. The miners, allured by the promises held out to them of getting "land for the asking," high wages, and a comfortable home, gladly abandon a life of toil for the fair prospect which is pictured to them. The Mormon elders, however, seek chiefly for girls, and many a household in Wales loses its best female servants once or twice a year, owing to the persuasions of Mormon preachers. These young women are generally told that polygamy forms no part of the Mormon religion or practice, and that its alleged existence is a mere wicked calumny of the "Gentiles." In Monmouthshire the progress of the sect during the last few years has been very great, but it is impossible to estimate it properly by statistics or returns, because the "converts" are taken out of the country as fast as they are won. In Liverpool the Mormon pioneers did not find a promising field the other day. Two of them began to preach in Sheil Park, but they were mobbed and driven from the spot. It is not usual for Mormons to resort to this method of proselytising; they prefer to work unnoticed, and "lead captive silly women." The elders are not men to be discouraged by the displeasure of a single crowd in Liverpool.

A correspondent of the Pall Mall, who was present at the opening of an iron church at Clapton, by the Bishop of London, says:

"Only two of the many clergy present were even the least eccentric, or childish, in their dress; one wearing a short black petticoat beneath his surplice, and the other not only a petticoat, but a small black tippet, with bow and strings behind. The last clergyman referred to came late, and seemed to amuse the congregation, especially the younger members of it, as he glided up the church. It is a curious fact that nearly all the clergy who aim at eccentricity in dress are not members of our Universities, but very generally persons who have gained access to the Church through St. Bees, or otherwise."

It is stated that, in consequence of the complications of various kinds which have for some time existed in the college of St. Aidan's, Birkenhead, the Council have under consideration the question of closing it at Christmas.

The Weekly Review regrets that the practice of placarding the walls with announcements of forthcoming sensational sermons on topics of the day is on the increase in South London. One struggling cause last week sought to attract a congregation by copying Madame Rachel's advertisement, "Beautiful for ever!"

Punch gives the following as a few of the alarming and disastrous calamities which a large proportion of the peerage, the clergy, and the county families, and an excited section of the ladies residing in market towns and rural districts are confident will be the certain result of the disestablishment of the Irish Church:—Scarcity of foxes, stoppage of banks, an inferior description of sherry (bad enough already), decay of county balls, increased consumption of tobacco, demoralisation of curates, alarming spread of poaching, indifference to the office of rural dean, decline of croquet, general neglect of gloves, disease amongst grouse, servants more and more indigent, no railway dividend, black beetles, the fires at Smithfield, disuse of powder by male sportsmen, no champagne, short sermons, the elevation of Mr. Bright to the peerage, and the setting of England's sun for ever.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

M. Veuillot, in the Univers, seems to confirm what M. Ollivier called "the pretensions of the Roman Church to bind the State, but not to be bound by it." He says that it is not "alliances" but "conquests" that the Church now has in view. If Concordats are doomed to be destroyed, as he thinks is the case, by the "fury of revolutions" and the "thoughtlessness of princes," such destruction will only bring about a closer description of unity, and by no means abolish that union of Church and State which the "Church will never renounce," but, on the contrary, maintain more firmly than ever, "with a view to the future."

In an article on the Rev. Baptist Noel's retirement, the Freeman remarks:

"Alas, that when he entered the pulpits of Dissent the pulpits of the Church were closed against such a man! Will they ever be opened to Dissenters? Never, we fear, until that—on the one hand much dreaded, and on the other much desired—event has happened, which at the present moment is so ominously projecting its shadow into the future. The hierarchy will never undraw the iron bolts; never cast away the brazen bars; never surrender the fortress to invaders. But we know enough, alike from the course of Providence and the Word of God, to be assured that nothing shall be permitted permanently to obstruct the accomplishment of the Divine purposes. He has often broken an opposing power which would not bend to His will. He can take away all the supposed buttresses and safeguards, and leave His Church uninjured; more than this, he can make its disestablishment in England and all the countries of Europe the greatest of blessings to all churches and to the world. And whenever that disestablishment takes place, we have not the belief simply, but the firmest conviction, that this will be the result. And still more, we are bold to affirm, whether we obtain credit for it or not with our Church friends, that of all the motives by which Dissenters are actuated in this great controversy, this is the most powerful. Our principles may place us in antagonism with the Church of England as it is at present constituted, they can never place us in antagonism with the Church of Christ; and just in proportion as the true elements of the latter exist in the former, will her real dignity be advanced and her usefulness be extended by her disenthralment from the bondage of the State."

Several of the Church papers are labouring hard to bring discredit upon the principle of voluntaryism, chiefly by quotations from Nonconformist letters and statements of a fault-finding character. The great object of the writers is to prove that the Irish clergy would starve were it not for State support; and in some parishes where "dearly beloved Roger" is the only person to profit by their services, this might be the case. But, as the Freeman observes, the failures of voluntaryism no more prove the scripturalness of State aid than the failures of a State Church prove the scripturalness of voluntaryism. The failures of small farmers do not prove the necessity for large landowners; nor does the successful competition of other countries in manufactures to the depreciation of some of our own show the absurdity and injustice of free trade. It should be borne in mind that where Dissent is weakest there social persecution of Dissenters by Churchmen has been most rife; that Dissenters have to contend against the old notion of the lack of respectability which attaches to voluntary communities; that, in other words, the unjust system of setting up one denomination above the rest has crippled all but the favoured sect. Nonconformists of the present day have inherited the burdens of their fathers; in many cases enduring the obloquy which attached to them, and hindered in their work by incumbrances which were bequeathed them. Considering the difficulties they have had to contend against, and the indignities they have had to submit to, the wonder is, not that they have done so ill, but that they should have succeeded so well. The era of suppression of Dissent is now gone; Dissenters are making their influence felt not only where they have been successful, but also in those quiet nooks and corners where a few years ago clergymen looked contemptuously upon their existence, and threatened them with speedy extinction.

Dr. Norman Macleod gives the following illustration of the lengths to which sectarianism may be carried:

"I one day met one of ten missionaries from America, and I asked him why he didn't belong to the great body of the American portion of the churches labouring in India. He replied that there were such differences between them that they could not have union. 'Pray,' I said, 'what are these differences?" "Well," he said, "there is one tremendous thing—they sing hymns." That is as worthy a man as lives—a most excellent man. I then asked if he would not, in consequence of those differences, worship Jesus Christ with them. "Yes," he replied, "under protest." I could not help saying that was the worst Brahminism I had ever seen in India."

Both the Rev. John Oakley and Archdeacon Sandford reply, in the Guardian, to the rebukes of the Vicar of Egham for their attendance at the Cheshunt anniversary, which we gave last week. They remark, with truth, that the passage in the Apostles' Creed, omitted by Mr. Newman Hall, of "the descent into hell," is not found in the earliest forms of the creed, and is "bracketed" in the American Prayer-book. Mr. Oakley says:

"The view that Mr. Newman Hall's reading of our morning prayer, and wearing of a surplice and a chaplain's scarf, was an act of sacrilege, and a virtual 'denial of truths,' at which I ought to have recoiled in horror, represents a pitch of Anglican enthusiasm of which I freely confess myself incapable."

We, poor heretics, have had countless sins laid to our charge, but, as appears from a sermon in the Methodist Times, on "Who was Melchisedec?" the Rev. T. B. Balch finds us guilty of one which we never heard of before, and the exact nature of which, we must confess, we hardly understand. It seems that we are Aaronites, whereas we ought to be Melchisedecites. Mr. Balch thus concludes us, together with the Ritualists, under sin:

"That remarkable priest [Melchisedec] was a Canaanite. He was never included within the fences of Judaism, and never offered a Jewish lamb, or sent upward from his censer a grain of Jewish incense. And yet we, who are Gentiles and not Jews, are under a priesthood, modelled not after that of Aaron, but after that of the Jebusite, who acted under the Divine oath. Unitarians, then, who deny the priesthood of our Saviour, are boldly confronting that oath, and Ritualists are everywhere guilty of the same daring sin. Aaronites, both in England and New York, are flocking over to Papistry. We regret to announce this fact, but they who sow the wind often reap the whirlwind."

In a first notice of "Dr. Davidson's Introduction to the Study of the New Testament," the English Independent, admitting that he is "a superior scholar and a courageous critic," makes much of the change which his views have undergone since his former works appeared, and contends that this places him in an unfortunate position, and greatly lessens his authority. It says:

"Dr. Davidson may possibly be nearest the truth in his latest opinions, and, of course, having formed them, he was bound in all honesty to correct what now seem to him to be his earlier errors. Still, it cannot be denied that so extreme a divergence of opinion as that between his present book and his former introduction to the New Testament, and still more between it and his treatise on Sacred Hermeneutics, does take away from the influence of a writer. It is an awkward thing to have three separate works all treating the same theological problems, and each giving them a different answer. The misfortune is all the greater when we find these opposing views expressed with the same unhesitating dogmatism in every case, and often unsupported by any argument beyond the bare dictum of the writer."

After pointing out some of these "opposing views," and intimating that "considering how much he has conceded and how rapidly he progresses, the Doctor may yet reach the same conclusion" as Strauss and Renan have arrived at respecting the Gospel narratives, the reviewer concludes with this harsh sentence:

"We are bound to say that even the fulness of the information his book contains, the complete view it gives of the work of German critics, and the extreme minuteness of his own observations afford no compensation for the dangerous principles which it inculcates."

After describing the controversy which there has been respecting Professor Morley's discovery in the British Museum of what he takes to be an Epitaph by our great Puritan poet, the Christian World puts the question:

"If English-speaking critics, the countrymen of Milton, sitting in judgment two hundred years after his death, cannot decide whether a certain poem is his or not, what likelihood is there that English or German critics, judging Greek writings composed eighteen centuries ago, are able to determine whether an Apostle might or might not have used an expression which we now find in a Gospel or Epistle?"

A conference was held at Ipswich the other day, one great object of which seemed to be the glorification of the Evangelical party. This, however, does not seem to be in a very hopeful condition. One of the leaders said:

"If the desultory and isolating policy of the past was to be continued, and individual men were to act each for themselves, what would become of the Evangelical party; if they failed, what would become of the truth they represented; and if that were darkened, what of the Church of England, when her salt had lost its savour, and her light was darkened in the midst of her?"

Another speaker, however, the Rev. S. Garratt, found reason for hope in the very weakness of his party:

"He was of opinion that it was probable the second coming of our Lord was approaching. He believed the Evangelical party was never weaker than now; and if so, it was not a ground of discouragement, because God loved to help the weak—He came to the help of Gideon when his army had been reduced."

We mentioned last week that the Catholic Archbishops of America had put a stop to the proposal to raise a battalion for the Pope in that country, and had stated that what he most needs is not men but money. On which the Nation asks:

"If this be true, why not disband the army, and use the funds which now go to feed and pay the lazy scamps who compose it in missionary labours? Here are heathen, as any one of the Archbishops will tell us, going to destruction in enormous numbers every day, for want of instruction, and the money that would send out missionaries to them is put into 'Zouaves,' who are certainly neither a credit to the Church nor the world."

In a letter to the Independent, called forth by Dr. Raleigh's address, to which we have more than once referred, the Rev. Gilbert Wardlaw says: He conceives that the way to enforce the claims of Scripture on opponents is not "to descend upon them with texts, denounce them as enemies of truth, and threaten them with Divine condemnation"; this only excites disgust in intelligent minds. But he thinks reference may be made to Scripture doctrine and authority that is perfectly compatible both with the mental position of unbelievers towards revelation, and with their right of independent judgment in relation to ourselves:

"We, on our part, may approach them in an attitude, not of dictation, but of frank acknowledgment that we can speak only our own conviction, and that however dangerous and even fatal their errors may be, it belongs to them, as far as we are concerned, to judge for themselves. But it is allowed us at the same time to remind them that they are responsible to God. We may be able to show them that this responsibility is not a light matter. We may be able to give them reasons for self-suspicion as to their own impartiality and perfect moral sincerity in their treatment of such a system as Christianity is. We may give them reasons for apprehending that if a revelation coming with much evidence, and charged with the most important moral requirements, is rejected, God cannot hold the rejecters guiltless. We may also show clear cause why those who profess the benevolence of Christianity, and who believe it to be a message of life and death to guilty human beings, should not suppress their convictions, but earnestly utter them when called to speak of the moral bearings of the greatest theme of human discourse. Doing thus, we may doubtless be still reproached for the narrowness and harshness of our creed; but no unbeliever of common candour will charge us with assumptions of an infallibility that does not belong to us, or such a usurpation of a right to dictate truth as he may turn from with contempt."

In another set of "Essays on Questions of the Day," edited by the Rev. Orby Shipley, Dr. Little-dale thus writes of the Broad-Church party:

"The real use of the Broad-Church party is, that it acts as a useful check on over-clericalism, whenever that danger is imminent, and brings the priesthood back to primary social truths and duties sometimes forgotten in the strife of tongues. It represents, when at its best, the mere human side of Christianity with great faithfulness, and therefore it cannot be spared, though many of its members might depart without arousing any special pangs in those they left behind. Another useful function which the Broad-Church party discharges is to act as a safety valve during the first revulsion of minds which have been trained in the belief that Calvinism and Christianity are the same thing, and have suddenly awoke to the horrors of the Supralapsarian creed. In a large proportion of cases they would hurry at once into infidelity (as Switzerland, Holland, and New England know only too well), were it not that they find a refuge in Broad-Churchism, which, though lying perilously near the frontier of the desert, is yet within the Christian pale, and affords ready access to safer and more fertile regions. Principal Tulloch and Dr. Norman Macleod are doing this work for Scottish Presbyterianism now, and if the picture of the state of religious belief amongst the thoughtful peasantry, drawn by Mr. George MacDonald, be at all correct, not before it was needed."

In the midst of some sharp abuse of the Rev. Charles Voysey, "the clerical Tom Paine," as he is styled, the editor of the Methodist Times puts a question, which only shows his own ignorance. He asks, "Who ever argued that miracles proved the superhuman or Divine nature of Christ?" We could point him to not a few that have been esteemed champions of orthodoxy in their day who have so argued; but perhaps his question may be taken as a sign that some of the old arguments are no longer relied on.

The Times is ashamed to see that the remnants of religious bigotry are still so considerable as to drag our legislators through so much folly and trumpery in regard to the new Poor Relief Bill. There is one clause in it which is necessary simply because at present a minister cannot enter a work-house at all without permission of the authorities, and it is necessary to ensure him free access. On this an amendment has been tacked, prohibiting the minister's visits wherever an inmate "being above the age of fourteen years, and after having been visited at least once by such minister, shall object to be instructed by him." This is practically saying that a minister shall not be allowed to make more than a single attempt to gain a hearing. One would like to know what would be the effect of a chaplain's or clergyman's ministrations if he were never allowed to appeal more than once to an erring member of his flock. Again, it is difficult to listen with gravity to a serious discussion whether it be at the age of twelve or fourteen that a child becomes competent to "select his religion." Mr. McLaren declares that he knows children of twelve who could puzzle members of Parliament on religious subjects. A similar feat was performed by Robinson Crusoe's man Friday, and in later times by a South African savage on a Bishop. It is absurd that if a little vagabond of twelve gets "bored" with the service or the Sunday school to which the priest or minister takes him, a State department must be called upon to inquire into the tenderness of his conscience and the precocity of his wits.

The Advertiser is afraid that many Dissenters have lost or outgrown their Protestantism. Only last week, Mr. Edward Baines, an eminent Dissenter—the Advertiser is sorry it cannot use the old phrase "Protestant Dissenter"—gave both his vote and his speech in favour of forcing a Romish chaplain, with altar and other Romish paraphernalia, on the workhouses of Marylebone and St. Pancras, at the expense of the ratepayers! Yet the Romanists distinctly avow their expectation of reconquering this realm of England; and maintain in all their recent publications the fitness and propriety of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Our contemporary may somewhat calm its fears by remembering what a Defender of the faith Protestantism has in Mr. Disraeli. As the song assures us,

"With him to guide,
The Church will outlive
The threatening storm!"

Dean Stanley has brought upon himself the ire of several clerical wasps by venturing, the other day, to say a word or two, in the Guardian, on behalf of the Bishop of Natal's hymn-book. First, the mild-spoken Dr. Little-dale declares that the Dean, "in speaking to the brief he holds for Dr. Colenso, has for the most part confined himself to fervid rhetoric and veiled sophism"; says, "he has had the inconceivable indiscretion (not to use a far harsher and seemingly more appropriate word) to cite the book of 1853, which was never called in question, as though it were that of 1866, which has been justly inculcated"; and charitably adds, "it is quite impossible that Dr. Stanley could have mistaken one book for the other." Then comes the Rev. M. F. Sadler, who, on the Dean's statement that Dr. Colenso has published two editions of his hymn-book, in which are certain orthodox hymns, begs to ask the Dean "whether Dr. Colenso is publishing a second edition of his 'Sermons,' and, if so, whether, in this edition, he is omitting the horrible insinuations contained in the first, &c." And the Rev. H. Douglas thinks the Dean's letter "in defence of the heresiarch of the day is quite consistent with the course he has taken throughout, and only adds to the pain experienced by many that one so high in office in the Church, and possessed of so many gifts, should chiefly use the influence which these afford in the support of one who has done more than any other living man to destroy the faith as given to the Church once for all to keep whole and undefiled."

In regard to Lord Redesdale's opinion of the Coronation Oath, the Guardian well observes:

"If his opinion of it were just, it ought on any consistent view of the British Constitution to be abolished immediately. What could be more unconstitutional or more mischievous than that the Sovereign (who is one member of the supreme Legislature of the realm) should be required by law to bind himself on ascending the throne not to assent to alterations of the law which might be approved by the other members of the same supreme Legislature? And what can be more improper than for a peer to suggest to Her Majesty that her moral or religious duties conflict with advice which may hereafter be constitutionally tendered to her by her Ministers? Such difficulties may always arise in a Sovereign's mind; but it is indecent in the extreme to anticipate them in this fashion."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XIV.

SUBJECT: Pictures of God in bodily shape as met with in the more ancient of the Bible writings.

Read Genesis xxxii. 22—32, where Jacob wrestles with a man in the night and holds him fast until he obtains a blessing from him. Jacob afterwards discovers that it is God with whom he has been struggling, and he calls the name of the place Peniel [or the Face of God], "for," says he, "I have seen God face to face and my life is preserved." This ancient story of God in bodily shape and substance that could be touched and felt, is one of the most forcible in the Bible. There are others of the same sort, but from their having been altered it is no longer always clear what the writer meant us to believe in them.

Read with care Judges xiii., where the angel of Jehovah appears to the father and mother of Samson, and they try to persuade him to eat with them. Manoa's fear at the end of the story, "We shall surely die because we have seen God," shows that it was Jehovah himself who had talked with them, and not as the words, "Angel of Jehovah," would lead us to suppose, merely an angelic being.

For another example by the side of these may be set a few verses of the ancient account of God's appearing upon Mount Sinai, Exodus xxiv. 9—11. Here Moses, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel go up the mount, and they see the God of Israel. The writer expresses surprise, as in the narratives above, that after having thus seen God they yet lived and eat and drank. We may point to the words of Deut. iv. 12, "And Jehovah spoke to you out of the midst of the fire. Ye heard the voice of the words but saw no similitude," to show that later writers took pains to contradict the early account, after long centuries of struggle against idolatry had shown them the danger of low and corporeal notions of God.

REVIEW.

The New Catholic Church. Third Edition, revised. London: Trübner and Co., Paternoster-row. 1868. This pamphlet, which bears the nom de plume of "Amicus"—a name which, as I am in a position to state, represents its various autho(r)s—recognises the fact that all ecclesiastical organisations are falling to pieces, being unsuited to the deep intuition, the rational conceptions, and the practical common sense and circumstances of the present day.

"The Church of England is not what its name imports—the religious home of the people. Great public movements advance without much reference to the teachings of the pulpit. A considerable portion of the intelligent working people in large towns attend no place of worship; and many of our most profound thinkers and best philosophical writers—our Carpenters, Darwins, Faradays, Huxleys, Lyells, Mills, Owens, Spencers, Tyndalls, &c.—are connected with none of the popular churches. The Dissenting bodies have no greater reason to boast than the Establishment. Confessions and bewailments of inefficiency are rife among all sects. They no longer hold the common mind as in days of yore. In sober truth, common sense is in the ascendant, and clerical influence is losing its sway over the young and the old of both sexes."

After drawing a truthful and effective picture of the undeniable decay of all ecclesiastical systems, the authors of this pamphlet inquire:

"Without attempting to forestall the future or fix the progressive, we ask ourselves whether the principles of a national religious organisation may not be indicated with sufficient breadth and clearness to form a basis of union for all earnest and devout minds?"

The answer which they return is this:

"The acceptance of two simple, practical, but most comprehensive principles would seem to be enough. All who accept with loving heart the worship of God and the service of man, may be members of one church. They are of one church, even if they own it not—know it not."

Here is surely a contradiction between the statements that men holding the principles just named may be members of the Church (as if they were not so already), and yet that they are of one church, even though they know it not. Had the authors held fast by the idea that love to the Lord and love to mankind make all who cherish and live according to these loves to be of one church, they might have easily and safely floated onwards to the solid truth, that the church is the human mind which has such love for the Divine Will as results in the service of God in every needful service to mankind. But instead of seeing that the church, or temple of the living God, is the faithful soul—the soul that is faithful to what is seen to be right, doing daily nothing but what is understood to be right, or the Divine Will—the authors are still entangled in the notion—it is really akin to the old Popish notion—that the church, even if stripped of all traditional darkness, and cleansed from all accumulated defilements, would still be an ecclesiasticism, a clerical or ministerial corporation, an external institution with national dimensions. Accordingly they speak of "admission into the church," their new Catholic Church, by (of course) those who might be invested with power to admit; they speak also of "the lay element," and of "linking all noble institutions with it" (their ideal church), as if a noble institution could be separate from God's church, the mediate source of all that is externally noble; thus showing that they still keep up in their minds the old artificial distinctions of lay and clerical, secular and religious, the religious being restricted to the ecclesiastical. "The New Catholic Church," thus conceived as an ecclesiastical mechanism, is an impracticable dream, though the benevolent gentlemen who have dreamt it are seeking for a better and brighter age for the world. Their New Catholic Church would be only a new sect, which, with its power of the keys—of admission and exclusion, and with its ideas of religion and secularity—could hardly fail to grow, and grow rapidly, into a new and tremendous tyranny. No; this "New Catholic Church" will not do; the present age, and the ages of growing intelligence that are to follow, will not have it. The well-intentioned authors of this pamphlet, who are feeling after the truth, and who, from one or two expressions they have dropped, are evidently not far from the truth, may see that the distinction which they would maintain between the secular and the religious, the lay and clerical—a distinction inseparable from their present idea of the church—has of necessity an immoral tendency, strengthening and propagating the delusion that secular deeds are non-religious (whence follows, too, and naturally, their transaction in a non-religious, i.e., a selfish and worldly spirit), whilst religious works are confined to ecclesiastical regulations, and the ministry of religion to a distinct order of men. As I have before said, that which needs to be seen in reference to this subject, is the simple truth that the church is the human soul, considered both individually and universally, when it has faith in the right, which is the Divine Will as individually perceived, and when all that is done upon earth is done from the right spirit, or because it is conscientiously believed to be in obedience to the commandment of God. Then every true work would be seen to be a religious work, and every faithful worker a minister of religion and of God. The Church, which would disperse all sacerdotalism and sectarianism, would regenerate the State, ennoble our professions, purify our trades, and diffuse light and blessedness all around. It would hallow everything—every home, every workshop. We should then have really religious societies, and united worship, and enlightened addresses. Those who have been taught themselves, and had a capacity for teaching, would, voluntarily and gratuitously, at least for some years to come, be teachers of others. But such teachings and worship would not be regarded as more religious than the duties faithfully performed by the farmer, the mason, the shopkeeper, &c.; neither would the teachers of the most exalted truths or the leaders of social worship be esteemed as more sacred or more deserving of honour than any other class of men who did their duties sincerely and thoroughly, all good workers being ministers of God, and all good works being services to God. If these ideas of the Church were embodied in the next edition of "The New Catholic Church," which in that case would have to be wholly remodelled, it would, as I am thoroughly convinced, meet one of the greatest necessities of the age.

WM. HUMPHREY,

A clergyman of the Church of England.
Middleton, Manchester.

WILBERFORCE AND SPURGEON.

A contemporary thus contrasts, not altogether unfairly, these two well-known men:

"It would be difficult to find two people more completely the antitypes of each other than the Bishop of Oxford and Mr. Spurgeon. The genius of the one is eminently sickly and soft. A courtly, polished man of the world; a graceful ecclesiastic, well versed in the ways of winning hearts; a supple pleasing intellect, which has been trained and coaxed up to its highest point of culture, are all found in Dr. Wilberforce. He can rebuke so gently as to make his sweet censure seem like the chastening of one who loves; and he can denunciate, and sneer, and ridicule with a vigour and force which makes upper-class Christians and High Church penitents look up to him as to a champion indeed. Who so gallant or chivalrous as this episcopal defender of that forlorn hope, the Irish Church—who so full of common sense and real charity as this compassionate protector of Sunday-school children—who so playful yet so dignified as this urbane utterer of placid witticisms—who never seems to forget his position in the Order of the Garter, and that deferential devotion to the fair is a paramount duty of every true knight, be he clerical or lay? Mr. Spurgeon is the reverse of all this. Balfour of Burley is the sort of knight he resembles most. His genius is natural and bluff; his humour of the rough Saxon sort, and his pathos of the broad and hearty kind which appeals to the people of every-day life, the people who buy and sell, who bear their share of common every-day burdens, who have neither time nor inclination to sentimentalise or to 'dress up' their thoughts, or feelings, or sorrows, but who grieve when they grieve, and rejoice when they rejoice, with a heartiness and simplicity which makes plain-speaking essential to their comfort."

THOUGHTS FOR PRESENT USE.

PROFESSOR VINET has the following remarks on Church and State in relation to Protestantism and Catholicism, which call for application at present.

If Protestantism have devised or regulated a State Church, it is not by virtue of its principle. On the contrary, in this it has shown itself unfaithful to its principle, and its State Church is but a worthless relic of former ages. The church of free investigation would only be a society of consciences. She must either abjure her principle or yield to liberty. Her head is at Rome or in Heaven. If she will not receive the Holy Spirit as a head, she must be content with a Pope, and this Pope ought to be in communication with the Holy Spirit, and should be able to prove it, or at least should make the attempt. But in the Reformed churches, neither the clergy nor the State have attempted this proof. They have thus acknowledged the Protestant principle, while at the same time they have denied it indirectly in their institutions. The principle lives, although concealed, always ready to reveal itself, always demanding satisfaction, and certain of obtaining it, in spite of established custom, inveterate prejudices, and inextricable logomachies, and the interested resistance of men wilfully inconsistent.—Protestants to deny everything, and Catholics to bind everything.

If the question were here to place the interest of one sect in opposition to another, we should say that Protestantism cannot defend itself against Catholicism with the Catholics, but with the Protestant principle. Protestantism, as such, cannot be strong but on condition of maintaining its Protestant character, and in proportion as it does so. And after all, what does it wish? It wishes, at least, to exist. For Protestantism, apparently, to exist, is to be Protestant; but if this reasoning be too abstract to convince many persons, we can approach them in another manner. Whatever their Protestantism may be, or whatever it may be worth, they do not wish to be Catholics. They do not wish the flood of Catholicism again to invade the shores which it formerly covered. But Catholicism will be weak against a strong principle, and strong against a weak principle. Catholicism is a theocracy, frank and imperious; territorial Protestantism is a theocracy, but equivocal and hesitating. Every vague principle aims at precision; every uncertain principle would become rigorous. Protestantism, as it is, has two principles, both vague, both uncertain; one is the principle of individuality, the other is the theocratical principle, both of which it accepts by halves. But it is with the Church as with the man: a divided heart is inconstant in all its ways, and it is weak when it is inconstant. The Church is a kingdom, and it is true of every kingdom, that when divided against itself, it cannot stand. But Catholicism, in this respect, at least, is not divided against itself. It is compact—Protestantism is not. It is true that Protestantism pretends to be so, by means of this territorial Catholicism, or of this nationality, whose principle we oppose; but that which it esteems a cement is but a solvent, since its union with the State detaches it from its principle. It is united with a strange body, but it is separated from itself.

Protestantism must not deceive itself by its duration for three centuries. It still lives by the first and vigorous impulse it received in the sixteenth century. It lives by its antecedent politics. It lives by the element of nationality. But this impulse will be exhausted. The beams of the framework are disjointed. The edifice shakes in every part. The accessory and auxiliary supports are withdrawn. Protestantism remains alone and disorganised. No institution can be maintained in a disorganised condition; no institution can long endure an organisation foreign to its principle. There are still Protestants, but no Protestantism. And from this moment the assailant, we mean Catholicism, has only to contend with individuals, and would nowhere meet with a body, had not the alarm, of late years, given to Protestantism an unforeseen organisation, but opposed to its ancient organisation, and incompatible with the system we combat. Protestantism is only saved by forming societies without the pale of Establishments.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, JULY 31, 1868.

CAN THERE BE A CATHOLIC CHURCH?

WE think there can be. Indeed such a church already exists, only it is not organised into a visible unity. The different sects of Christians, however they diverge from one another in a considerable portion of their religion and theology, have still a common section in which they are all one. The lines of Christian thought and feeling may be compared to lines of railway which run from a common terminus, and, for a space, all form only one track, and then diverge and run ever farther and farther apart. This common section of the faith of Christendom is that which makes a catholic church at present, and it is by our throwing ourselves upon it, and bringing it out into greater prominence in the Christian consciousness, that we shall prepare the way for the visible catholic church of the future.

Let us consider in how much Christian minds are one, whether Evangelical or Ritual, Trinitarian or Unitarian. They are one, first of all, in loving and seeking the same good life for themselves and others—a life of justice, truthfulness, kindness, purity, temperance, tenderness, and reverence. Whatever divergent theories they hold as to the means by which this good life is to be attained, and whatever place it occupies in their scheme of faith, they all profess to love, desire it, and strive after it.

They are one, again, in loving and worshipping the same God. No doubt if you regard the whole of the features, loving and wrathful, beautiful and repulsive, which each sect professes by its creed to see in its God, the God of one sect does sometimes seem a different God from that of another sect. But if you will pay little attention to the creeds of Christians, and look more at their prayers and religious poetry, you will find that there is one aspect in which all sects see God in a very considerable portion of their thought and worship. It is as the Father, the pure, good, loving Being, in whom is found the perfection of the goodness which we seek on earth. As a matter of fact, discovered by frequent experience, all Christians can join in a large part of the worship usually offered in churches where Unitarians meet. They recognise that the God there presented to them is their own God, as far as the representation goes, though they will often complain that there is something wanting—that is, the other and sterner side of the Divine nature.

Then, thirdly, all Christians go a certain way with one another in their thought of CHRIST and their feeling towards him, however their lines of doctrine diverge as to his essential nature. They all reverently see in him the embodiment of the good life on earth, and the image in humanity of the Father in heaven. And so, though they explain in different ways the methods by which his death benefits us, they all agree that there is one way at least in which it does so, by acting on us, and drawing us by love and gratitude into sympathy with him.

Fourthly. All sects of Christians agree in some portion of their belief with regard to the future life. They may hold widely different theories as to the nature and duration of future punishment, but still they are one in believing that the really good life in this world—in justice to some of them we emphasise really—will be followed by a state of blessedness in the world to come, and that a life of unrepented sin will be followed by a state of suffering there.

Now, we believe that if the different sects of Christians could but be brought to notice this unity of thought and feeling amid all their differences, they would be gradually drawn together. They would feel their common brotherhood and see that, widely as they differ, there is yet a common ground on which they can meet and interchange sympathies, and even enter into common worship. We would ask no sect for admissions as to what are the essentials and what the non-essentials of Christianity. We would only ask all to recognise that there is a portion of the Christian life which, whether the essential or non-essential, is common to all.

Our assertion that the different sects of Christians could actually join in common worship may appear too bold. It might be thought the faith in which we all agree is too bald and scanty to furnish materials for worship that would satisfy any party. But we point to the Liturgy of the Church of England, in which a large number of the prayers are formed from these common materials, and have therefore the most catholic character. Take, for example, the Confession, Absolution, Lord's Prayer, the Prayer for all Conditions of Men, the General Thanksgiving, and a very considerable number of the Collects. It only needs to drop out from the Liturgy everything that has not this catholic character, and we have the conditions of a truly catholic worship.

We would have the teaching from the pulpit—connected with this catholic worship—of the same catholic nature. The preacher should confine himself there within the limits of the theology common to all, and maintain the practical aim of inspiring the soul with a greater love for the beautiful life, and hatred for the sinful one; of helping it to realise more and more the moral image of Christ, and lifting it in love and aspiration towards the Heavenly Father. Here is scope for loftiest, most strenuous efforts.

But do not let us be misunderstood. We do not ask anything so absurd as that Christians shall cease to differ, or cease to attach importance to the doctrines in which they differ. Let there be times and places for the meeting and interchange of sympathy of the sectional branches of the church. Let them there pursue their own peculiar doctrines, and even have, if they wish, their peculiar worship, but let them keep the common catholic worship and teaching sacredly broad. Christendom might then be like a body of worshippers assembling in some grand cathedral, meeting in sects and parties in the smaller chapels round the edifice, but at times coming all together into the choir to forget their sectarian divisions, feel that they are all brethren, and join in common worship to the same Father.

REGIUM DONUM.

A WRITER in the Freeman furnishes us with the following account of the origin of the royal bounty, the "miserable pittance," as Mr. Disraeli termed it, which so many of the Irish Presbyterians are anxious, not merely to retain, but to have increased.

When James I. ascended the throne, the Roman Catholics expected to receive much consideration from that monarch. And it must be admitted that at the first his general policy tended towards conciliation; but the Gunpowder plot frightened him, and he refused to tolerate the public performance of Roman Catholic worship. The fruits of this conduct were secret plotting against the Government among the Irish chieftains, and applications for assistance to France and Spain to help them to put down English rule in Ireland. But the conspiracy was crushed in the bud, and the lands held by the conspirators were confiscated. The king found that he had about half a million of acres at his disposal, which he divided among three classes—British undertakers (English and Scotch), servitors of the Crown, and native Irish. This was the origin of the "Ulster Plantation." A large number of Scotchmen came over and took possession of the forfeited lands; and these being chiefly Presbyterians, their ministers were induced to settle in the country. This was the beginning of the Presbyterian Church in Ulster. But the ministers came as Nonconformists, who had no legal status in the Irish Church. The Bishops of that day, however, were not very exacting. The terms of conformity were made comparatively easy, and these having been accepted by the Presbyterians, they preached in the parish churches, and received tithes of all the people possessed. But their tranquillity was of short duration. The genius of Archbishop Laud was in the ascendant, and although the Irish Church had before declared its independence, that arch persecutor found ready tools to carry out his high-handed policy in Ireland, and to set aside all that the gentle Usher had established. Dr. Reid says, that, "by the tyranny of Strafford, the Presbyterian ministers were deprived, their meetings suppressed, and themselves obliged to flee." From the same authority we learn that they suffered much during the wars of the Commonwealth. From 1649 to 1654 they had no settled maintenance; and although the Presbyterians espoused the cause of Charles II., yet, when that monarch came to the throne, he did not reward their loyalty as they expected. They met in Synod at Ballymena in the memorable year 1660, full of spirits. Mr. Adair distributed warrants for the collection of parochial tithes, and two ministers were deputed to go and present a congratulatory address to His Majesty. The historian says that Charles "looked with an awful majestical countenance on them, and promised royal protection for the time to come." During the next twelve years there was little improvement in their condition, but at the end of this period Sir Arthur Forbes, who was in high favour with the king, persuaded him to make a grant to certain Presbyterian ministers out of the secret service money. Sir Arthur had induced four ministers to go to Dublin, and during a conference with His Majesty the latter inquired concerning the Presbyterian ministers in Ireland, how they lived. Sir Arthur replied that they lived in no great plenty, whereupon "the king, of his own mere notion, told Sir Arthur that there was £1,200 a year in the settlement of the revenue of Ireland not yet disposed of but designed for charitable use, and he knew not how to dispose of it better than by giving it to those ministers." But the £1,200 was found to be only half that sum, so a warrant was made out to "S. A. Forbes, our marshal in Ireland, for secret services without account, £600." Thus, the Regium Donum began with Charles II. The warrants continued in force during the next ten years—till 1682, but the money does not appear to have been regularly paid, as "the warrants provided that deficiencies in the revenue, which were always very great, should fall on the pension list." The keeper of records in Dublin "could find only one entry of the payment;" but in a work known as "Presbyterian Loyalty" the bounty is said to have been paid without interruption, except during the reign of James II. and a very few years of the latter end of the reign of Charles II.

The presence of William III. in Ireland revived the hopes of the Presbyterians, who never lost an opportunity of pleading their sufferings and urging their claims. Accordingly, they laid a petition at the royal feet, setting forth "the insupportable straits" to which they were reduced, and asking that they might, "for their present necessary support, have a proportionate share in the public charitable collections." The appeal was successful. On the 19th of June, 1690, when the court was at Hillsborough, the king issued his famous order to Christopher Carleton, collector of the customs at Belfast, "authorising the payment of £1,200 yearly to the Presbyterian clergy of Ulster." Owing to some legal difficulties which presented themselves to the Belfast collector of taxes, a warrant was issued, placing the royal bounty on the civil list for Ireland. During twelve years three patents were issued, the last by Queen Anne. Twenty-eight years after the original grant was made, an augmentation of £800 a year was given, to be divided between the Synod of Ulster and the ministers in Dublin and the South of Ireland. The amount has gradually crept up till it has reached nearly £50,000 a year, which is paid not out of the civil list, but as a parliamentary grant, so that in reality it is no longer a royal bounty.

ECUMENICAL COUNCILS.

(English Independent.)

AN Ecumenical Council having been called for next year by the Pope, it may not be out of place to glance at the history of this kind of ecclesiastical assemblies. During the first two centuries we meet with hardly anything of the sort. In the third century there were meetings of Bishops and Presbyters convened to arrange disputes concerning points of faith or of practice; but the greatest of these did not rise above the line of provincial gatherings, called Synods by the Greeks and Councils by the Latin Christians. The Emperor Constantine was the first, in the year 325, to convene a church meeting of a larger description, consisting, in part, of representatives of the whole Christian Church. To councils, of which this set the precedent, the epithet ecumenical was given, because they extended to the whole Roman empire, then commonly considered as co-extensive with the habitable earth; ecumenical, as scholars need not be told, being the Greek equivalent for home-abiding, and the noun signifying earth being understood when it is used. There never was, however, an ecumenical council in the complete sense of the word, and it is evident that, so far as Pope Pius is concerned, there will not be next year. In calling such councils, nevertheless, their universality is assumed, and the rules or canons which they lay down are by those who take part in them held to be of universal obligation. Of the nineteen councils on record under this high-sounding title, only the first seven have any plausible claim to be so considered. These are the First Council of Nice, in 325, called to settle the Arian controversy; first of Constantinople, 381, on the Trinity; of Ephesus, 431, to condemn the Nestorian heresy; of Chalcedon, 451, against Eutyches; second of Constantinople, 553, on the resurrection of the body, and the pre-existence of the soul; third of Constantinople, 680, against the Monothelites; and second of Nice, 787, to approve the worship of images. In consequence of the schism between the Greek and the Latin Churches, the representatives of the former, who had never been numerous, ceased to attend the general councils, which, from this point downwards, must be regarded as comprising only the adherents of the Church of Rome. The whole of the twelve need not be recapitulated; it will suffice to name the first Lateran, which, in 1123, decreed the celibacy of the clergy; the third Lateran, which (1179) condemned the Waldenses; the fourth, which (1215) defined Transubstantiation; that of Constance, which, sitting from 1414 to 1418, deposed two Popes and sentenced Huss and Jerome of Prague to the flames; and that of Trent (from 1545 to 1563), which fondly hoped to crush the Reformation. It may be safely predicted that the council of 1869 will not complete that unfinished work; nor, meanwhile, can it escape notice that, in place of a second Council of Constance, a large representative assembly is at this moment taking place at that city, for the purpose of doing honour to the memory of the Bohemian martyr.

SISMONDI.

If we were obliged to believe all that some people say—which, fortunately, we are not—we should suppose liberal Christianity, such as we understand and hold it, to be a thing barely of yesterday. These gentry—some of whom bear, as if in mockery, the title of "the learned professor"—fancy that for us to remain in the Protestant Church whilst rejecting the creed which was never St. Athanasius's, is a monstrous intrusion that would have horrified our fathers. Our fathers, however, knew as many things as they do, and understood them much better. We will take a single instance; it shall be Sismondi.

We have all heard of him—an erudite historian, an acute political economist, a rigid republican, a man of the utmost probity and humanity.* His opinions must have great weight with thinking men. He was a Genevese, a Protestant, and the son of a pastor. Religion held a prominent place in his life. It is worth while to see how he understood and valued her.

In 1819 he married a sincere and enlightened Protestant, orthodox in her opinions, the sister-in-law of Sir James Mackintosh. They often talked on religious matters. He writes on Feb. 26, 1825:

"We were talking this evening on the worth of prayer. My wife is convinced that it is impossible to be in the habit of praying daily without becoming better. In opposition to this view, I appealed to facts, and the hard-heartedness of devotees in other religions than her own. But she does as all women and many men do. She begins by putting into her religion all that is best in a pure soul like hers, then she fancies this to be the character of religion in general, and that all religions participate in it. She forgets that if we take the whole human race, those who make beneficent truths a part of their religion are not one in a hundred.

As age comes on, Sismondi shows more marked signs of piety; he searches his heart, and writes one morning in his journal thus:

"Dec. 31, 1835.—I feel strong traces of age; I know that I am an old man;† I know that I have not much longer to live, and this knowledge does not trouble me. My confidence in the perfect goodness of God, as in his justice, grows stronger daily. I become more religious, but it is a religion of my own, a religion which accepts Christianity as men have perfected and still are perfecting it, not as the priestly spirit has handed it down."

He was wrong here. Men have not perfected Christianity; they have only restored it to its original divineness. Great progress indeed has been made; great progress indeed will yet be made; but as Réville well says: "Never will man discover anything greater than duty, perfection, God, and the obligation to seek them; or therefore anything greater than the Gospel. Systems, dogmas, and churches shall pass away, but Christianity shall not pass away, for it is not a system, it is better than a dogma, it is greater than a church. It is one with the tendency of human nature to truth, holiness, and charity; and the Gospel can disappear from the world only by mankind becoming extinct. This is one of the great excellences of the religion of Jesus that, being chained to no system, it can and must link itself with the development of the human race. Every truth, known or unknown at present, is Christian."

For some time previously to this said year of 1835, Sismondi had been in correspondence with Channing. The latter thought that France was ripe for a religious revolution, and that this revolution would not be long in coming. Sismondi, who did not altogether concur in this view, tells Channing (in a letter dated 6th September, 1831) that he judged too leniently of [the religious position of France. He says:

"Religious feelings have progressed in France during the nineteenth century; but I am not sure that the imprudent efforts of those who seek to revive them are not on the other hand causing a recoil at present. Like you, I am convinced that entirely new teachings will be necessary to satisfy pious souls; like you, I nowhere see these teachings beginning; nay, on the contrary, I see religion reproduced in its abuses, in its hateful side."

He goes on to sketch the mental condition of France. Firstly, there are men who have inherited the anti-Christian fanaticism of the last century. To a certain extent they are excusable. Catholicism was then intolerant and oppressive; and her overthrow was necessary. It was a battle that must be fought. Things were carried too far, it is true; but all revolutions are carried by their motive-power beyond their true aim. However, these anti-fanatical fanatics were daily becoming fewer. Sismondi says:—

"After the overthrow of the Church by the critics and the revolutionists, when a little calm had succeeded to the tempest, the need of affection, the need of faith and hope, admiration of the Creator's work, a feeling of the spirituality of our nature, the thirst for immortality, made themselves felt in the mind. Political life was still too stirring for men of superior mind to turn their attention to spiritual things. It was chiefly amongst women that religious feeling re-awoke; but their influence made itself felt over society in general. Nearly all thinking men whose opinions were formed before the Revolution belong still to the school of Voltaire; but they are now seventy years old, and they stand alone. None of their posterity adopt either their turn of mind or their opinions; no man under sixty years of age who writes, who exercises the least influence, possesses a mocking scepticism; there may be doubts, but there is a desire for loftier opinions; there is a need of religion, and a respect for beliefs which, however, few men fully adopt."

* His chief works are the "History of the Italian Republics," "History of the Fall of the Roman Empire," and the elaborate "History of the French," in 31 vols. Born 1773, died 1842.

† He was sixty-two.

How can this general sympathy of which Sismondi speaks be changed into a full adhesion? He and Channing have answered the question—entirely new teachings are necessary to satisfy pious souls. Whilst awaiting them, Sismondi attends without scruple and with profit the religious worship of Geneva, though taking with him his reservations and his secret dissidences. He finds himself side by side with some Calvinist who clings to predestination, or with some Rationalist who sees in Christianity only "the successive labour of the most virtuous and enlightened men of all ages to formulate all that our race has learned of its connections with the God who made it, and of its duties to itself." Does he find this promiscuous mixture detestable? Nay, he says:—

"Both say they are Christians, and I believe them. I receive them as brothers, and I find pleasure in joining with them in a public homage of gratitude and love to the Being who gave us existence, and has enriched it with so many blessings."

Sismondi has been charged with logical errors, with confounding at times sentiment and science. But when he wrote the lines we have just quoted, he rose to a more pure and touching conception of Christianity—a conception loftier, truer, more Christian, and more Protestant than that of the men who style themselves orthodox, who make division amongst brethren and call it unity.

CYRIL.

RELIGIOUS BUZZING.

THE Rev. Henry Ward Beecher recently preached a sermon before the Young Men's Christian Association at Brooklyn, in which he drew a contrast between true and misguided religious zeal, in the following caustic language:

It seems to me that this is a very fit exhortation to the Young Men's Christian Association of our land: "Go tarry until the Holy Ghost descends and brings you power from on high." There is a rash and wasteful expenditure of activity; there is such a thing as coming into the service of the Lord, or into the service of man, in such an unprepared state as that we squander rather than accumulate success. I desire to impress this thought upon you, that your power in all outward endeavour, in practical labour, will be in the ratio of your hidden life. That is, your power to plan, to achieve, to think, to feel, to influence the minds of men depends upon the internal, the spiritual condition of our souls.

It is one of the characteristics of novels to represent busybodies in other men's matters, and it is also one of the strongest living criticisms to point at men that are eternally fluttering, not as bees, in the Lord's garden, gathering honey, but as flies in the Lord's house, annoying everybody, and to style them busybodies. Theirs is an activity that seems scarcely less than impertinent. Ever full of buzzing, ever full of alacrity, these men settle down upon your ear, and are brushed away, only to settle upon your face, bringing you nothing and carrying away nothing. They wake you if you slumber, they pester you if you read, they perpetually torment you, and not the less because they are so insignificant.

In the heat of summer what is more nimble than a fly? When every other thing seems to drop under the heat, and to become leaden and lethargic, then they triumph in the swirl of an amazing nimbleness and activity. I have seen men that had nearly the same sort of activity, who were great in little things; who were continually running hither and thither; who were full of new plans; full of new thoughts and projects; who run about hither and thither continually; and in the end are nothing but busybodies and blusterers. What do they do? A thousand of them would not make a man. Straw thrice threshed are they, but they have never had any wheat in them.

There is always something that they have to do, and by doing that universal something they might hit the right something. There is with them no deep communion with God; no realm of invisible truth; no hill over which they have ranged, and from which they came clothed with fresh power; no real religious sympathy; no depth of feeling. Their well is empty, and they have nothing to draw from it with, if it had any water in it. Restless are they and lovers of excitement. A kind of dry inspiration they sometimes have, a kind of financial conscience. Too often to this is joined a secret inspiration of pride, of vanity, of love of place, of love of name and influence. They shrink from real life, from Christian self-denial; from unseen work, from wise adaptation of means to the ends to be gained.

Against all such activity as this (which is as misshapen as it is foolish and worthless) I warn you. You are not called upon to be active merely for the sake of being active. Mere activity is not usefulness.

The peculiar tendency of our day is to external action. Such action has in it much of blessing, if to this be added a wise preparation. If the soul be truly spiritualised, then is this a most auspicious age in which we live.

The Late Mr. William Clephan.

LAST week we recorded the death of Mr. William Clephan, of Stockton-upon-Tees, as one widely respected for his integrity, and as a generous supporter of the Unitarian Church. The respect which he had inspired in his native place was shown at his burial, when his remains were followed to the grave by "a long train of sorrowing townsmen, who," says the Stockton Herald, "desired to pay their last respects to their departed friend." The Chief Magistrate and other members of the Town Council were present, and all classes of the inhabitants joined in the demonstration. The same paper says, "He was well known throughout the district as an eminent architect, several of the principal buildings in the town and neighbourhood having been designed and erected by him. He was a good and thorough workman—one of those who love work, and love to see it rightly done—who finish their task for its own sake." As the master-mason of whom Hugh Miller learnt his craft "put his conscience into every stone that he laid," so the conscience of the deceased went with every line that he drew and every nail that he drove. As Mr. Elliott said, in his funeral sermon, "no one could come in contact with him, without knowing that he was a man of high honour and sterling integrity." As he was just and true, so was he also kind and generous, winning, with the confidence of those around him, their warm affection. The poor and needy have lost in him a tender friend, and society a valuable member. Of an active and energetic spirit, and of sound judgment, his frame was less robust than it seemed; and within the last few months his health gave way; but the faith which had animated his life sustained him in death. Of our own branch of the Christian church he was an attached and exemplary member; and it sustains, in common with his family and friends, a severe loss by his lamented death.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

COMMUNION.

WITH heart ennobled by the worthy aim,
Christ! Saviour! see, I seek to follow thee;
I am a bondsman until thou make me free,
A slave unknown by any holy name.
Baptise me, Lord, with inward-searching flame,
The purifier from iniquity,
So that my soul, enbarbouring sanctity,
May wear the whiteness of an angel's fame.
I needs must have thy countenance anear,
Thy life, thy love, must in my bosom burn,
Else I am vanquished by the shapes of fear
That gloom me, shadow-like, where'er I turn.
Give me a servanthip, Redeemer, dear,
And strength from Heaven earth's earthliness to spurn.
Glasgow. JAMES M'CONNOCHE.

LAPLAND SUPERSTITIONS.

A WORK recently published, entitled "Tellstrom and Lapland," gives some curious particulars respecting the people, from which we take the following:

The Laplanders are shy, suspicious, and superstitious—the natural result of oppression and moral darkness. They worship stones, presenting to their idols offerings of deer's horns. It is said that they never dance, and their very singing is melancholy. The first Christian churches were erected there in the sixteenth century, subsequent to the Reformation in Sweden; and the earliest Christian book in the language is dated 1619. There are thirteen parishes in Swedish Lapland; but in some the incumbent is ignorant of the language, and therefore can do little to instruct his parishioners. Charms and omens are much regarded; and a leading superstition—the use of the divining-drum—continues in full force to this day. The writer has a specimen before him, supplied by his friend Tellstrom; and, as a proof that the superstition is not obsolete, the man who sold this drum became exceedingly unhappy, and could not rest until he had procured another. The divining-drum is an oval or egg-shaped wooden hoop, sixteen and a half inches long, by ten wide at the broadest and five at the narrowest part. It is three inches deep, with a cross-bar inside, of great firmness, and to hold the drum by in the one hand.

A covering of prepared reindeer skin, the smooth side outwards, is spread tightly over the hoop, and is marked with a variety of figures with reddish dye. From the broad end hang fifty cords, about a foot long, made of leather covered with wire, and each having a brass ring or other distinguishing mark fastened at the end. Thirty-six similar cords, six inches long, are suspended from the narrow end. Whether these appendages are merely ornamental, or as Tellstrom was informed, form, the longer ones a chronicle of remarkable events, and the shorter a necrology of distinguished persons, the writer cannot decide, though he inclines to trust the accuracy of Tellstrom's information. A pointer, made of deer's horn and ornamented with coloured beads, is laid loosely on the cover of the drum; and, taking a small hammer of the same material in his right hand, the diviner, by striking the drum, causes the pointer to move about on the surface; and when it has reached a certain mark, he professes to discover, and proceeds to disclose to the applicant, the matter concerning which his aid has been sought. The possessor of a divining-drum occupies an important position amongst the people, and when he travels a separate sledge is provided for it. The drum is carefully concealed from females, and they are not allowed to touch it. This superstition is sometimes turned against themselves. A constable was applied to by a Laplander who had been robbed. The man strongly suspected a neighbour of being guilty of the robbery, but had not sufficient evidence to convict him. The constable promised to use means for discovering the criminal; and, getting several men to surround a table, he placed on its centre a pocket-compass, necessary to him in travelling, declaring that this was a divining-drum. Placing the pole opposite the suspected man, he caused the needle to revolve rapidly, saying that the point would stop opposite the guilty one. All eyes were fixed; and when the needle rested, the man declared it was all nonsense, and changed his place for a second trial. A corresponding change was easily made in the position of the compass; and, lo! the needle stopped again opposite the same man. He now requested to try it himself, and the constable allowed him to do so; when, on being pointed at a third time, he openly confessed his fault, and restored the property to its rightful owner. He then sought a private interview with the constable, and offered to purchase at any cost this divining-drum, as it was the best he had ever seen. Of course the constable, for sufficient reasons, declined compliance.

UNDESIRABLE ACQUAINTANCES.

M. VAMBERY, in his "Central Asia," gives an account of two creatures he met with that may certainly come under this heading.

On one occasion, he says, I dwelt in the court of a deserted mosque, and in the evenings the Turkomans usually brought with them one of their collections of songs or ballads, from which I had to read to them aloud, and it gave me especial pleasure to witness the undivided attention with which they listened to some popular hero, while the silence of the night air around us was only broken by the hollow murmur of the rolling waters of the Oxus. One evening our reading lasted till near midnight. I felt rather tired, and, unmindful of the advice I had often received, not to sleep in the immediate proximity of ruined buildings, I stretched myself out beside a wall, and soon fell sound asleep. After about an hour I was suddenly awakened by an indescribably violent pain in my foot, and jumping up and screaming aloud, I felt as if hundreds of poisoned needles were shooting through my leg, and concentrating in one small point near the big toe of my right foot. My screams awakened the eldest of the Turkomans, who slept near me, and without questioning me, he exclaimed, "Poor Hadji, a scorpion has bitten thee, and that during the unlucky period of the Sarafan (the dog days)! May God help thee!" By careful treatment, however, of course he recovered.

Another creature which he had to dread in Bokhara, and the apprehension of which doubled his sufferings from the intense heat, was the Rshite (Maria Medinensis), by which, during the season, one person in every ten is attacked. One feels, at first, on the foot or some other part of the body, a tickling sensation, then a spot becomes visible, whence issues a worm like a thread. This is often an ell long, and it ought some days after to be carefully wound off on a reel. This is the common treatment, and occasions no extraordinary pain; but if the worm is broken off, an inflammation ensues, and instead of one, from six to ten make their appearance, which forces the patient to keep his bed a week, subjecting him to intense suffering. The more courageous have the Rshite cut out at the very beginning. The barbers are tolerably expert in this operation. The part where the tickling sensation is felt is in an instant removed, the worm extracted, and the wound soon heals. One curious thing is that sometimes the malady recurs in the following summer, and that too even when the patient is in a different climate. It happened so with Dr. Wolff, the well-known traveller, who dragged with him all the way from Bokhara one of these long memorials of his journey. It did not show itself till he came to England, when it was extracted, in Eastern fashion, by the late Sir Benjamin Brodie.

A SCOTCH CRITIC.

A VOLUME of Essays by the late Alexander Smith has been recently published, with a memoir prefixed, in which the writer tells some amusing anecdotes of Hugh Macdonald, a close friend of the poet and a most unique critic. Macdonald, with the warmest affection for Smith as a man, combined a resolute contempt for him as a poet, to which he never hesitated to give the very broadest Doric expression.

"I like ye weel, Sandy," he would say, "an' that ye weel ken; but as for yer poetry, as ye caa' 't, sae help me, I mak' but little o't. It may be poetry; I'm no sayin' it is na; but the creetics say it's poetry; an' nae doot they suld ken; but it's no my kind o' poetry. Jist a blather o' braw words, to my mind, an' bit whirly-whas they caa' eamages. I canna' mak' either head or tail o't."

Macdonald was so fanatically devoted to Burns, that save in a grudging way, he would concede no merit to any other poet. The following is a racy bit of his criticism:

"Shakespeare?" he would say dubitatively. "Well-a-weel! Shakespeare! nae doot a vera great poet! I wadna just ventur to say our Rabbie" (Burns, of course) "culd hae written Hamlet; but there's aye twa ways of puttin' a thing. Honestly, div ye really think, noo" (with a twinkle in the keen grey eye of ironical humour, presumably, more probably of intense conviction), "Shakespeare culd hae written Tam o' Shanter?" Shakespeare's superior claims were thus to be considered neutralised, if not entirely disposed of. Lesser and later men were much more peremptorily set aside. "Keats was a puir bit penny whistle o' an English cratur! Endeemion, say ye? There's nothing in 't to get a grip o'. I canna get a hand o' 't, Sandy, ony mair than o' ye, wi' yer whirly-whas. Hech, but it's thin, thin—a bit coloured wab, the like o' whilk amaist ony speeder mitch spin, gif ye gie'd it vermealion i' the guts o' 't. Nae clath there to clead puir men's backs wi'! Shelley was whiles bonnie, bonnie; but just clean daft, puir fellow! a' the air, like his ain laverock" (skylark). Or again: "O' him ye ca' Wudsworth I hae jist nae opinion ava. He drank naething a' his life but lake watter, they say, and troth, I weel believe 't, for little else eer cam' out o' him." For Tennyson his expression of contempt was extreme, and once—the book being at hand—I remember he effectively illustrated his position by a reading of "Ary. Fairy Lilian." Working his Scotch with vigour and carefully emphasising any little points of weakness—for which he had the keenest eye—he produced, with much ease, a detestable caricature, which nearly made us all expire with laughter. Then of course he triumphed. "Laugh awa' lads? Deed ye may weel laugh at him. O, but, but its wersh, wersh, that kin o' thing to put beside o' Rabbie; I tell 't ye he was nae poet."

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

OBSERVE how magnificently the strange conjunction of tombs in what has been truly called this Temple of Silence and Reconciliation exemplifies the wide toleration of Death—may we not add, the comprehensiveness of the true religion of the Church of England? Not only does Elizabeth lie in the same vault with Mary, her persecutor, and in the same chapel with Mary, her victim; not only does Pitt lie side by side with Fox, and Macpherson with Johnson, and Outram with Clyde; but those other deeper differences, which are often thought to part more widely asunder than any political, or literary, or military jealousy, here have sunk into abeyance. Goldsmith, in his visit to the Abbey, puts into the mouth of his Chinese philosopher an exclamation of wonder that the guardianship of a national temple should be confided to a "college of priests." It is not necessary to claim for the Deans of Westminster any exemption from the ordinary infirmities of their profession; but the variety of the monuments in country and in creed, as well as in taste and in politics, is a proof that the successive chiefs who have held the keys of St. Peter's Abbey have, on the whole, risen to the greatness of their situation, and have endeavoured to embrace, within the wide sympathy of their consecrated precincts, those whom a narrow and sectarian spirit might have excluded; but whom the precepts of their common Master, no less than the instincts of their common humanity, should have bid them welcome. The exclusiveness of Englishmen has given way before the claims of the French Casaubon, the Swiss Spanheim, the Corsican Paoli. The exclusiveness of Churchmen has allowed the entrance of the Nonconformist Watts, of the Roman Catholic Dryden. Courayer, the French latitudinarian; Ephraim Chambers, the sceptic of the humbler, and of Sheffield, the sceptic of the higher ranks, were buried with all respect and honour by the "college of priests" at Westminster, who thus acknowledged that the bruised reed was not to be broken, nor the smoking flax quenched. . . . The god-like gift of genius was recognised, the baser earthly part was left to the merciful judgment of its Creator. So long as Westminster Abbey maintains its hold on the affections and respect of the English church and nation, so long will it remain a standing proof that there is in the truest feelings of human nature, and in the noblest aspirations of religion, something deeper and broader than the partial judgments of the day and the technical distinctions of sects,—even than the just, though it may for the moment be misplaced, indignation against the errors and sins of our brethren. —Dean Stanley's Memorials of Westminster Abbey.

ROBERT HALL'S PORTRAIT.

AFTER some remarks on the likeness of Sir Henry Havelock, among the portraits at South Kensington, a writer in the Freeman gives the following anecdote of another distinguished Baptist whose likeness appears in the same collection:—"About the year 1823, the writer accompanied an elderly lady to an artist's room at Leicester. After the object of the visit had been accomplished, the artist, with great glee, said, 'Madam, would you like to see my portrait of Mr. Hall?' The reply was, 'Why I have been told that Mr. Hall never would sit for his portrait.' 'No, but I have made sketches unseen by him whilst he was preaching.' He opened a case lying on the floor and disclosed a full-sized portrait. 'Has Mr. Hall seen it?' 'Yes, Ma'am, he was brought here this week, and looked at it with surprise, as he was not aware that it had been done. I said to him, Well, sir, what do you think of it? He replied, If it were not another man's property I would put my foot through it, sir! and turned away in displeasure.' His great dislike to having any representation of himself made public is well known."

A SINGULAR CURE.

At a recent meeting of a charity, called the "Jewish Blind," a remarkable case was brought under the notice of the president, Sir Benjamin Phillips. A woman (stone blind) has been in receipt of a pension for about eight years. During a heavy storm that prevailed some weeks since, she became suddenly aware, as she expressed it, of "a glimmer of light," and from that time to the present her vision has improved daily; perfect eyesight is now restored to her.

INTELLIGENCE.

A CORRECTION.—In the brief report which we gave last week of the proceedings of the Synod of Munster, we stated that the resolution affirmed by the majority of the synod was that it was "inopportune" to take the question of the withdrawal of the Regium Donum; the word should have been "premature." The majority, we are informed, fully agreed with Mr. Orr, but thought it better to wait till the intentions of the Legislature were fully known before passing any resolution on the subject.

BURY DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.—On Sunday, July 26th, about 90 members of this union partook of tea at Bury, after which about 130 attended the meeting in the upper schoolroom, the Rev. John Wright, B.A., in the chair. The Rev. J. T. Whitehead, of Ainsworth, read a paper on "The relations between superintendents and teachers." The following took part in the discussion, viz.:—Messrs. Wm. Freeston (Heap Bridge), Rev. W. C. Squier, and Messrs. Darbyshire and Tonge (Stand), Richd. Kay, John Reynolds, Thos. Holt (Bury), and the chairman.

GREAT HUCKLOW.—On Sunday week, two impressive sermons were delivered to large congregations in the Old Chapel, by the Rev. R. L. Lloyd, at the close of which collections amounting to £13. 5s. 11d. were made in aid of the Sunday and week evening schools.

SWINDON.—The Rev. F. R. Young, who has returned from a visit to America much improved in health, preached two interesting sermons, last Sunday, on completing the seventh year of his ministry here. After adverting to the experiences of the past, and mentioning the inducements that had been held out to him to settle in some of the cities of the Far West, he said that he did not feel warranted in forsaking his present sphere of labour, and would only leave it if another offered to him a greater prospect of doing good. At the same time, he exhorted his hearers that if any minister could help them as he could not, or any other principles appeared to them purer than those which he taught, then they should leave him, and seek some other church better adapted to their spiritual wants.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ANONYMOUS.—Our memory, we admit, is fallible, but in the case referred to we feel pretty sure that it is yours, not ours, that is in fault.

THE FREE CHRISTIAN UNION.

To the Editors.—In your leader of last week you have so far broken through the restraint imposed by the Free Christian Union upon itself and its friends with regard to the proceedings of its late evening conference, as to state that certain gentlemen successively addressed the meeting, and you intimated that the facts of the presidency of Mr. Smith, and the delivery of those addresses were significant of a hopeful state of things, and could not but lead to some drawing nearer of the scattered elements of Christian life.

Perhaps the prohibition of publication is not binding upon a certain class of good-natured friends, and it may be lawful for such to repeat hearsay for the purpose of "not unkindly" criticism. With that I have nothing to do. You, however, named me as present at, and as addressing that meeting. It was only fair, if you attempted any enumeration, to count the unclean as well as the clean beasts who entered that ark; the simple badger as well as the philosophic elephant and the megatherium of western might.

It is true that such a conference and the free exchange of speech between earnest men of the most various schools of training was remarkable, and in all probability must promote such a better understanding as may enable them to unite more freely than they were likely to do without that opportunity of mutual acquaintance and appreciation. Nevertheless, as to the supposed fact of my particular presence there, I am seriously unwilling that, even under the meanest mark, I should be named as either a member or a friend of the Free Christian Union. If I was present on that occasion, it could only be as a curious and mistrusting inquirer. If I spoke there, it could only be to prevent any misapprehension as to the meaning of such attendance. At such a meeting I think it must have been impossible for me not to have protested against the practice of the Union, and against the theory of its organisation.

To insist, as the majority of the founders are understood to do, on the acceptance of their view, that all possible noble development of character and life is implied in the word "Christian," and to exclude from co-operation in such objects as some of those are which the union sets before it, alike such as believe that persuasion, however fond, however amiable, to be irrational and deceptive, and all who are purely pious and good outside of the Christian pale, is to inaugurate not freedom, not love, I venture to say, from Christianity, but only a new denominationalism—an act intrinsically inconsistent with the professions of the union preambles, and its terms of fellowship.

To use the word "Christian," and, while so accepting it only in the most comprehensive sense, also to consent to its being used, confessedly, on the ground that thereby the co-operation may be secured of those to whom the word is known to imply a definite dogmatic position of some sort, seems to me identically the very same abuse of words for the sake of conformity, which you, and other leaders of heterodox free thought in Church matters, so systematically and so righteously denounce, when criticising broad Churchmen and their non-natural constructions of traditional theology—a most strange commencement for a body pledged to urge the avoidance of controversial names.

It is a question which either students of the nature and history of humanity and of the profoundest laws of its action and development, or those inspired teachers whose several faculties, in decent order ranged, teach them what is in man without the labour of philosophic research, can alone answer with certainty, and which less learned and less prophetic men may gravely doubt about—whether self-conscious drill can ever organise anything more than sectarian mechanism, more or less powerful and enduring according to the width and stability of its platform. Men who lose themselves in the earnestness of pious affection, or in the zeal of devotion to every next duty naturally unite when and as the opportunity for cohesion occurs, and, without conscious effort, simply and generously blend, and form a church or a league—members of one body.

For those who can wait, the end is certain: the Church and the Brotherhood of the Sons of God. So far as I can see my way in the midst of a problem so great, so complicated—which, however, is one that is laid upon each one of us to solve, and must therefore be within the grasp of every modest and single-minded servant of the Lord—it seems that it is not for us to organise that millennial union. What is within our reach is unaffected piety, and unflinching exertion in every field of duty which our circumstances open to us; a simplicity of character which knows nothing of its purity, its strength, its holiness, its effort, its self-sacrifice, its success, its consequence, which is content to do the bidding of God, and lose itself in love and duty where he has placed it, and to leave to Him the government of the greater world, the organisation of the universal.

If we have learned anything, it is the coldness and the false shame of our piety, the conceit and self-will of our activity. Let us root out these evils, and the uncleanness that impedes a living union will be removed. If we have gained any insight, it is the knowledge that every sectarian bond is a delusion—a painted standard, and not the cross. Let us practise the principle we profess, and neither raise nor recognise the lines of a politicism of which the end is surely at hand, and every day shall see the leaven work till the whole is leavened.

It may very well be that I have not eyes to see, that I do not hear the call which the Free Christian unionists have heard and are obeying; but till now the union seems to me but a carved image of a saint, and not the inspiring presence of the Lord—a hindrance and not a help in the way of the kingdom of one God. R. D. DARBISHIRE.

29th July 1868.

THE COMING WEEK.

Buxton.—On Sunday, a service by Sir John Bowring, LL.D.
Hyde Chapel, GEE CROSS.—On Sunday morning, the Rev. R. Brook Aspland, M.A., will preach.
London: STOKES NEWINGTON.—On Sunday morning, the Rev. J. K. Applebee will deliver a discourse on "Inspiration."
London: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, ST. PAUL'S ROAD, CAMDEN SQUARE.—On Sunday, morning and evening, the Rev. J. Page Hopps will preach.
Liverpool.—On Sunday morning, the Rev. Dr. Bellows will preach in Hope-street Church; in the evening in Renshaw-street Chapel.
Penmaenmawr: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, B.A.

Births.

BROMHEAD.—On the 23rd inst., at Alpine Villa, Bristol, the wife of Mr. Sidney Bromhead of a son.
THORNE.—On the 23rd inst., at Lower Bedford Place, Bristol, the wife of Mr. J. W. Thorne, of a daughter.

Marriages.

FOX—CUNLIFFE.—On the 25th inst., at Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, by the Rev. Jeffery Worthington, assisted by the Rev. John Wright, B.A., the Rev. John Fox, of Heywood, to Mary, only daughter of the late Richard Cunliffe, of the Folds, Bolton.
SMETHURST—CRITCHLEY.—On the 23rd inst., at Hope-street Chapel, Liverpool, by the Rev. A. Gordon, M.A., Joseph Smethurst, Esq., J.P., Audenshaw, to Elizabeth, daughter of the late Henry Critchley, Esq., of Liverpool.—No cards.

Deaths.

ALCOCK.—On the 25th inst., at her residence, Nelson-street, Manchester, aged 88, Miss Sarah Alcock.
EVANS.—On the 27th inst., Mr. Thomas Evans, Lower Bolton, near Altrincham, aged 70 years.

In three vols. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES. Translated by SAMUEL SHARPE. Being a Revision of the Authorised English Old Testament. "Superior to any preceding revision of our English translation."—Athenaeum. E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

THE "HOME PAGES" TRACT SERIES. The whole series of 288 Tracts (with the exception of one or two of the earliest) are kept in Stock. All orders must now be sent direct to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, Higher Broughton, MANCHESTER.

PRICES.
	Single Tracts.	Per dozen.	Per 100.
4 pp. Tracts....	4d.	4s.	2s.
8 pp. ".....	1s.	8s.	4s.
12 pp. ".....	1s. 6d.	10s.	6s.

The whole series, well bound, in 4 volumes, for 12s., or free by post 11s. In cases where the Tracts will have to be sent by post, a penny in the shilling must be added for postage. Mr. Herford will be glad to forward, on application, a complete list of the "Home Page" Tracts and Covers.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at 11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED.

We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, clean-flavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY, WINE MERCHANTS, 26, MARKET-STREET, MANCHESTER.

And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool.

WILLIAM MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also Bannockburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits. FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8, Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester. Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 71, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS, FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS, 25 SNOW HILL, LIVERPOOL. Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED AND OTHER NEEDLES.

WHITFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS AND SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS, CASH AND DEED BOXES, SIREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM. COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE, 3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANNY'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER. (Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse). J. BALL, Proprietor.

SCARLET FEVEIL, &c. S. WHITFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application. VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Birmingham 114, at his printing offices, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, July 31, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY

REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 381.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 14, 1868.

PRICE 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing	280
What is Saying on Church Matters	280
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XVI.	281
How to treat Catholicism	282
Calvin and Servetus	282
How not to do it	282
The "No Popery" Dodge	283
Fire-side Readings: Immortal Harmony	284
Chinese in Melbourne	284
Standing Fire	284
Out of the Storm	284
Farewell Banquet to Dr. Bellows	284
Intelligence: Barnard Castle, London, Seaton Burn, and Tainton	286
Correspondence	287
The Coming Week	288

CHARGE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ten lines and under	6d. a line.
After the first ten lines	5d. a line.
For 6 consecutive insertions, a reduction of 25 per cent.
13	50 per cent.
Half column	£1. 6s. 0d.
A whole column	£2. 10s. 0d.
A whole page	£5. 5s. 0d.

Post-office Orders to be made payable to Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester, to whom all orders and business communications should be addressed.

STAND.—On Sunday next, the SUNDAY-SCHOOL SERMONS will be preached by the Rev. JAS. DRUMMOND, B.A. Service in the morning at 10.30; in the evening at six.

LONDON: 245, MILE END ROAD.—Dr. S. C. DAVISON will PREACH on Sunday, August 16th, at the Unitarian Christian Church, and on the following Sunday, August 23rd, the Rev. T. CROW will PREACH, morning and evening.

Services are conducted every Sunday by Ministers and Members of the Lay Preaching Union.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—The Regulations relating to the EXAMINATION OF WOMEN for Certificates of General and of Special Proficiency, under the provisions of the Supplemental Charter, having been framed by the Senate, and approved by Her Majesty's Government, may now be obtained on application to the Registrar of the University.

WILLIAM B. CARPENTER, M.D., Registrar.
Temporary Offices of the University, 17, Savile Row, W.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.—Full Information as to the Subjects in which Candidates for Admission to the above Institution will be examined may be obtained on application to the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A., George-street, Cheetham Hill, Manchester.

Applications from Candidates must be sent in, as above, before 1st September next.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH AND SCHOOLS, STEPNEY, LONDON.

By a Sub-committee of the London District Unitarian Society assembled in Conference with the Committee of the Rev. J. Phillips's Congregation, on Tuesday, 12th May, 1868, at Stamford-street Chapel, it was resolved that assistance should be rendered to that congregation in obtaining a Permanent Place of Worship at Stepney Green.

In pursuance of such resolution, and through the kind intermediality of members of the Sub-committee, a suitable site has been obtained on which to erect a Church, School, &c., at Stepney Green.

It has been determined at present to erect a neat and substantial Schoolroom, capable of accommodating about 250 persons, and that religious worship shall be conducted therein till the funds are raised for the Church.

The Congregation, consisting for the most part of working men, appeal most earnestly to the Unitarian public to supplement their efforts to open the School free of debt.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by

Mr. GEORGE RITCHIE,

24, Bread-street, London, E.C.;

Mr. F. M. WALLER,

100, Turner's Road, Burdett Road, London, E.;

And

The East London Bank, Cornhill, E.C.

LANCASHIRE & YORKSHIRE RAILWAY.—CHEAP SUMMER EXCURSIONS DAILY TO LITTLEBOROUGH FOR HOLLINGWORTH, from Manchester, Stalybridge, Ashton, Bolton, Bury, Middleton, &c.

Fares for the Double Journey

First class, 2s. 6d.; Second class, 1s. 9d.; Third class, 1s. 3d.

A SPECIAL TRAIN also leaves the Victoria Station, Manchester, on Saturday Afternoons, at 2.45 p.m. for LITTLEBOROUGH.

To WHALEY, CLITHEROE, and CHATBURN, Every Saturday, from Manchester, at 1.30 p.m.

Fares for the Double Journey

First Class, 4s. Second Class, 2s. 6d.

For further particulars, see handbills. By order.

Superintendent's Office, Victoria Station, Manchester,

July 16, 1868.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—SATURDAY

TO MONDAY AT MATLOCK.—Every Saturday until the end of October, 1868, RETURN TICKETS, at the following low fares, will be issued from the under-mentioned

Stations to MATLOCK BATH, by the Midland Company's

New Route, by any of the ordinary trains on Saturday, available for return by any train on the following Sunday or Monday.

Stations. First Class. Second Class.

Manchester. 9s. 6d. 7s. 0d.

Guide Bridge. 9s. 0d. 6s. 6d.

Stockport (Trevi Dale Station). 8s. 6d. 6s. 0d.

In Manchester, Tickets will be issued at Cook's Excursion

Office, 43, Piccadilly, and at the Midland Booking Office, London Road Station.

JAMES ALLPORT, General Manager.

Derby, May, 1868.

OWENS COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD receives into his house, as members of his family, Young Men studying at Owens College. Two vacancies for next session. Mr. Herford will be glad to procure any information that may be desired respecting the terms, classes, &c., of the College.

1, Kersal Terrace, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

ABOLITION OF COMPULSORY CHURCH RATES.

At a Meeting of the Executive Committee of the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control, held August 7th, 1868, it was resolved:

"That this Committee records with more than ordinary gratification the passing, on the 31st of July last, of the Bill for the Abolition of Compulsory Church Rates, regarding it, not only as a satisfactory termination of a severe and protracted struggle, but as an important step towards the realisation of one of the fundamental objects of the Society, viz., 'the discontinuance of compulsory exactions for religious purposes.'"

"It recognises with pleasure the frankness and courtesy displayed by the authors of the Bill in endeavouring to render it as acceptable as well as an effective measure, and the readiness with which their efforts have been seconded in both House of the Legislature."

"On behalf of the opponents of Church Rates, it desires to express a deep sense of obligation to J. A. Hardcastle, Esq., M.P., for his valuable assistance in promoting a settlement of the question, and also recalls with gratitude the services rendered by Sir William Clay, Bart., Sir John Trelawny, Bart., and others, who, in past sessions of Parliament, ably and perseveringly laboured in the pursuit of that object."

"While acknowledging the value, and rejoicing at the success of the parliamentary proceedings which have resulted in the abolition of compulsory Church Rates, the Committee feels bound to express the belief that the success is primarily due to the patient and self-sacrificing exertions of those who, during the last thirty-five years, by resolute resistance in the parish vestries, and by subjecting themselves to disrepute, to prosecution, and to imprisonment, have practically abolished Church Rates, or the compulsory collection of rates, in numerous parishes, and have at length aided the Legislature to put an end to the unrighteous system of compulsion throughout the kingdom."

"In directing that steps be taken for giving wide publicity to the provisions of the Compulsory Church-rate Abolition Bill, with a view to the full realisation of the intentions of the Legislature, the Committee expresses the hope that the spirit of conciliation which has marked its passage through Parliament will be also manifested in connection with the practical working of the measure, and that, as the result, the members of the Church of England will acquire such increased experience of the power and sufficiency of Christian willingness, as a means of sustaining Christian agencies, as will encourage them to rely upon it unreservedly for the future maintenance and extension of their Church."

WILLIAM EDWARDS, Chairman.

J. CARVELL WILLIAMS, Secretary.

2, Serjeant's Inn, Fleet-street.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.

Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.

Principal: C. du G. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthily-situated establishment Boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemen's education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few

Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G., 68, Guilford-street, Russell Square, London; or to Mr. A. G., 31, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

OLD HOVE HOUSE SCHOOL.—Mr.

HUTTON will RE-OPEN his School on Tuesday,

August 18th. He has two or three Vacancies.

9, WELL CLOSE SQUARE, WHITEY.

THE Rev. JOHN and Mrs. OWEN wish to receive two or three Ladies or Gentlemen as BOARDERS during the season.

HIGH SCHOOL, 126, MUCH PARK-

STREET, COVENTRY.—The Rev. G. HEAVISIDE,

B.A., having taken extensive premises, is prepared to RECEIVE BOARDERS. Terms: 80 to 40 Guineas per annum.

Full prospectus on application.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL,

NOTTINGHAM.—SCHOOL RE-OPENED on Tuesday, August 4th.—During the erection of new premises, address 18, Regent-street.

EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Principal.

NOTE.—At the recent B.A. Examination of the University of London, one of Mr. Smith's pupils has successfully passed.

This marks the fourth of his private pupils who have been prepared by him specially for the B.A. degree, and in each instance with success.

TO UNITARIAN MINISTERS.—THREE

MISSIONARY MINISTERS, or Qualified Preachers, are WANTED.—Apply to Rev. R. SPEARS, 27, Grosvenor

Park, Cambridge, London.

A WELL EDUCATED Young Lady desires a Re-engagement as DAILY or AFTERNOON

GOVERNESS. Excellent references.—Address Q. V., Postoffice, Liverpool.

NEW EDITION OF DR. EPHRAIM PEARBODY'S

"CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS."

Just published, neatly printed, and bound in bevelled boards, with red edges, price 3s. 6d., a new edition of

CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS.

By EPHRAIM PEARBODY, D.D.

London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

PRESENT Condition of Unitarian and

Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 6d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.

THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, Containing

Tunes to ALL Martin's Hymns.

London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester:

Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6,

Commercial-street; and of all music and book sellers.

In three vols. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES. Translated by SAMUEL SHARPE. Being a Revision of the Authorised English Old Testament. "Superior to any preceding revision of our English translation."—Athenæum.

E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp.,

well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME

of the late

GEORGE BROWN,

Barriester-at-Law,

Containing 17 sermons preached by him

in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle.

Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A.,

with

Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and

8s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to

Mr. JOSEPH LEE,

Barnard Castle.

THE "HOME PAGES" TRACT SERIES.

The whole series of 238 Tracts (with the exception of one or two of the earliest) are kept in Stock.

All orders must now be sent direct to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,

Higher Broughton,

MANCHESTER.

PRICES.

Single Tracts. Per dozen. Per 100.

4 pp. Tracts. 4d. 4s. 2s.

8 pp. " 6d. 6s. 3s.

12 pp. " 1s. 12s. 6s.

The whole series, well bound, in 4 volumes, for 10s., or free by post 11s.

In cases where the Tracts will have to be sent by post, a penny in the shilling must be added for postage.

Mr. Herford will be glad to forward, on application, a complete list of the "Home Pages" Tracts and Covers.

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED

AND OTHER NEEDLES.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of

Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant,

STOCKPORT.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE,

8, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER.

(Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse.)

J. BALLS, Proprietor.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,

FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS,

23 SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

NEW GOODS FOR THE SUMMER SEASON.

WILLIAM MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also Bamocoburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits.

FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8,

Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck

was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower

Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Heard.

WHITFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and

SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS,

CASH and DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c.,

&c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITFIELD & SONS,

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET,

EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE,

BIRMINGHAM.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS

of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital.

Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET,

EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE

BIRMINGHAM.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use

WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE

USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at

11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED.

We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, cleanflavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical

Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,

WINE MERCHANTS,

26, MARKET-STREET,

MANCHESTER;

And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

According to the Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall, the Eternal City is still under a regime of proscription. A few days ago some of the pupils of a hospice near the Baths of Diocletian complained that they were badly treated by the rector, a Belgian prelate who had been appointed to the office during the administration of Monsignor De Mérode. The Pope, without inquiry into the facts, instantly sentenced the rector to banishment. The poor man procured evidence to prove that he discharged his duties in an exemplary manner, and drew up a statement of the case, supplicating the Holy Father to rescind his sentence; but he could find no courtier to support his petition. At last this office was undertaken by a Roman prelate, Monsignor Macchi, who, having obtained an audience, induced the Holy Father to go into the case, and satisfy himself that the rector was blameless. The Pope expressed himself to this effect, writing some words on the margin of the petition with his own hand, and then returning it to Monsignor Macchi, who hurried with it to the porch of the Vatican, where the rector was waiting. Monsignor Macchi, elated with success, put the petition in his hand with a smile, and told him what had passed. They then proceeded to read the Pope's minute, when, to their dismay, they found it to consist of these words:—"The rector must leave Rome within twenty-four hours."

We are glad to say that Dr. Littledale has had the candour to "express publicly (in the Guardian), as he had already done privately, his apology to Dean Stanley for having suggested that he had cited Dr. Colenso's Hymnal of 1853, as though it were that of 1866."

The parishioners of St. John's, Hanley, know so little of the Church to which they belong, that they have actually been asking their vicar to resign, because his conduct does not please them. It seems that Hanley does not agree with him, and that for five years he has spent but one Sunday in the place, providing them with curates instead of ministering to them himself. Not satisfied with this, they went to the Bishop, and the Bishop wrote to the Vicar, but he, in substance, told the Bishop to mind his own business. Whereupon the parishioners held an indignation meeting, and in a very dissenting fashion resolved that it was "very unjust and blameable on the part of Mr. Whidborne, to continue to hold the incumbency of Hanley for the mere sake of the emoluments, when he well knows that he is unable to perform the duties attached thereto." These poor Hanley people have evidently a good deal still to learn, or they would know, as Sidney Smith once said to a friend of ours, "in our Church we never give up anything."

The material changes recommended in the Irish Church Commissioners' report are said to be these: A reduction in the number of dioceses from twelve to eight, by distributing Cashel, Kilmore, Meath, and Killaloe amongst the adjoining sees; the lowering of the incomes of the Bishops to £3,000 each, with £500 extra from those who have to attend in the House of Lords; the reduction of the income of the Primate to £6,000, and of the holder of the see of Dublin to £5,000 should he remain an Archbishop, and to £4,500 should he be turned into a Bishop; the abolition of all cathedral establishments, except those attached to the eight surviving sees; a reduction in the salaries of the Deans and number of Archdeacons; the giving of encouragement to tenants under church leases to purchase the perpetuity; and the relieving of incumbents from the management of glebe lands. Sundry recommendations affecting the distribution of incomes are included in the report.

The late great Dublin brewer, Sir B. L. Guinness, who has left upwards of a million, wills that if certain estate bequests fail from want of issue, the property is to go to Trinity College, and the interest expended in the maintenance of Protestant students of all denominations, Arians and Socinians excepted. Well, let us hope that his views have become a little broader where he is gone.

The Rock gives an account of a grand exhibition of Ritualism which took place on the "feast of St. Martha," at the opening of a "school chapel," at Charnley, in Sussex. About five o'clock in the afternoon, a procession wended its way through the village, headed by a boy, decked out in scarlet and white, bearing a banner with a portrait of the Saint of the day. Then came some thirty charity children from St. Margaret's "Convent;" then the village choir, and a youth with another banner, and some of the choir of Christ Church, St. Leonard's, in scarlet cassocks and surplices; then some "monks" in cowl, hood, &c. These were followed by the "Sisters" of St. Margaret's Convent, in the usual "coal-scuttle" bonnets; and the procession was wound up by the "priests," among whom were Dr. Littledale and Mr. Nugee, in surplices and gaudy "stoles" of red and gold. A verse of one of the hymns sung was this:

"Mary, God's dear Mother,
Israel's lily, hail!
Pattern for Christ's children
In this sinful vale;
Mid life's surging ocean
Whither can we flee,
Save to our sweet Saviour
Who was born of thee."

A verse of another hymn in the "Order of Dedication" was as follows:

"Mary, mother star of Ocean
Mystic rose, God's minor bright,
Who within Thy bosom's chamber
Did'st contain the Infinite;
We implore Thee, we beseech Thee
Show the Saviour to our sight."

On arriving at the ground, the procession halted before a large wooden cross, when "Brother Dunstan," one of "Father Ignatius'" monks, mounted the steps, and delivered a rambling address, in which he said the jaws of hell were opening wide to swallow up Protestants, as they did Nathan, Korah, and Abiram, those "wicked schismatics" in Moses' time, and "the next thing Protestantism has to do is to lie down and give up the ghost."

All beneficed clergy of the Church of England are now either rectors or vicars. The style of "perpetual curates," which has attached to the incumbencies of district churches and of the greater part of the appropriate and inappropriate rectories, has been extinguished by the District Church Titles Amendment Act, which has just become law, and the nominal inferiority implied by the use of that title has thus been removed.

A superb edition has been issued of the "Directorium Anglicanum." Some of the instructions for the celebration of the communion rival the most ridiculous precepts of the Talmud. For instance the priest is told that before "mass" he must not wash his teeth, but only his lips, for fear of mingling water with his saliva; and that "after mass he should beware of expectorations until he shall have eaten and drunken," lest by any chance he should spit out any atom of "the body" which "shall have remained between his teeth!" The priest is also minutely directed what to do if a fly or a spider has fallen into the "blood," and what penance he shall do if any of the "blood" has dropped upon the table, or on the linen cloth; how the blood is to be sucked up, and the wood scraped, and the shavings burned, or the linen washed three times over the chalice, and the ashes or the ablution preserved with the relics.

Last session the friends of religious equality congratulated themselves on the passing of three bills, which, to a greater or less extent, recognised their principles. This year they have put just the same number on the statute-book; but the measures are of greater importance. The result, says the Liberator, that whereas the last Parliament did nothing to further our cause, that which is about to be dissolved has helped it by passing seven measures during the short period it has existed. These measures are the—1866. 1. Qualification for Offices Act; 1867. 2. Dublin Professorships Act; 3. Transubstantiation Declaration Act; 4. Offices and Oaths Act; 1868. 5. Compulsory Church-rates Abolition Act; 6. Irish Burials Act; 7. West Indies Ecclesiastical Grants Act; and, taking them in connection with other measures, which have advanced towards, though they have not reached, the legislative goal, the expiring Parliament is entitled to our thanks.

The Council of the Church Association sends the following reply to Dr. Pusey's challenge:

"You are under a misapprehension in supposing that the object of Mr. Sheppard's proceedings against Mr. Bennett is to obtain a judgment founded on two verbal expressions, which as you state 'he has since cancelled.' Those expressions form only a small part of the allegations of false doctrine published by him, and the proceedings are undertaken with a view to obtain a decision condemning his teaching, as inconsistent with the doctrine of the Church of England. In this teaching you admit that you and your party in general substantially agree. It is true that such teaching has already been authoritatively condemned in your case by the University of Oxford, when you were silenced from preaching before the University for two years. In the case of Archdeacon Denison the teaching was also condemned by the court held at Bath, presided over by the late Archbishop of Canterbury, with learned assessors, who determined that the doctrine was 'directly contrary and repugnant to the Twenty-eighth and Twenty-ninth Articles of Religion,' and adjudged the Archdeacon to be deprived of all his Church preferment. And this judgment on its merits the Archdeacon never ventured to challenge. The Council cannot entertain the idea of advising Mr. Sheppard to discontinue the action against Mr. Bennett; but if, in the progress of that case, it should appear necessary to take further proceedings, in order to vindicate the Church of England from the false dogmas of the Church of Rome, they will hold you to the offer made in your letter."

The Dean of Westminster, writing to the Times, urges strongly, on archeological and artistic grounds, the maintaining of the Church of St. Margaret's by the side of the Abbey. He also suggests an addition. The Abbey is not yet filled. There are places, and will be for at least another generation, for the famous Englishmen who can be commemorated on no other spot so fitly as beneath its roof. But still we must look forward, and for the future the provision is at once easy in itself, and in full accordance with the other improvements proposed in the neighbourhood of Westminster:—"It is the erection of a cloister which should be connected with the Abbey by Poet's Corner, and continued on the space behind Abingdon-street, facing the Palace of Westminster on one side and the College garden of the precincts of Westminster Abbey on the other."

Two parties have been warmly contending, not for the dead, but the living body of the Rev. Donald Fraser, a Free Church minister of Inverness—his own congregation, and one in Marylebone, London. The latter offered a stipend of £800 a year for him; but against this his own people laid a memorial on the table of the Presbytery, signed by 1,333 persons, deprecating in the strongest terms his removal to the South. In the end, after long discussion, the decision was left with Mr. Fraser himself, who, though he had long cherished the idea of being a minister in London, felt it his duty to remain in his present sphere, where he has made himself so popular.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Paris correspondent of the Guardian points to an apparent reaction against Protestantism in some of the more elevated minds there, and says:

"A 'strong' Church is, it appears, as much in favour now as a strong Government; and because religious principles have been rudely shaken, people are invited to rush into Ultramontanism for safety from infidelity, just as they did before into absolutism from anarchy."

As many of our readers no doubt are aware, Dr. Bellows's letters to the Liberal Christian, from which we have so often given extracts, have, part of them, been collected into a volume. The American correspondent of the English Independent speaks thus appreciatingly of them:

"A genial sympathy with nature and humanity, and a spirit of philosophic criticism upon peoples and institutions, are well combined in 'The Old World in its New Face,' by Dr. H. W. Bellows, of New York, whose name as a popular Unitarian divine, and as the president of that original and most efficient auxiliary to our army, the Sanitary Commission, is doubtless well known to readers of the English Independent. Dr. Bellows has the faculty of seeing things understandingly, and of saying things well. He is a charming talker, fresh, racy, well-informed, of broad views and generous sympathies; and he has succeeded in making his book talk much as he himself talks. Of course, like all travellers who give their passing impressions, he is liable at all times to mistake the causes of social phenomena, and to form judgments which a better knowledge of the interior of society would lead him to revise, if not to revoke. But Dr. Bellows had unusually good facilities of access to the best sources of information, and his personal judgments are aided by the matured convictions of philosophical students in France and Germany. His sketches of places and men are sometimes quite piquant."

The newest and most delicious thing in songs is thus advertised: "Our Dear Old Church of England, New National Song. Dedicated, by express permission, to the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli. May be had," &c. According to the Independent, it is expressly arranged for a falsetto, and the words, which are an adaptation from several of the Premier's recent speeches, are highly sentimental. It will be sung by him in character, during the recess, in Buckinghamshire and elsewhere.

The English Independent has searched through Dr. McNeile's lengthy letter against the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and, like ourselves, has been unable to find in it a solitary new fact or argument, or even any freshness in the statement of old ones. There are the innuendoes about Mr. Gladstone's motives which Tory speakers and journals are for ever repeating—the stock arguments about the danger to the rights of property and to English liberty involved in his proposals, the familiar denunciations of Popery in which the writer has always been so fond of indulging, and to which a special solemnity is imparted by the assumption of a knowledge of its character and working which others do not possess. This is literally all. Dr. McNeile does not condescend to show how the disestablishment of the Irish Church involves the concession of a power to Popery which it does not at present possess, and still less does he undertake to point out any actual service which the Establishment has rendered to the cause of Protestantism. All that has to be proved is taken for granted, and such an attempt at reasoning is valueless, because it is either irrelevant, or rests upon assumptions which themselves require first to be established.

The Church Times, referring to the Bishop of London's Fund, which is not getting on so well as it did at first, says of it and him, more plainly than courteously, "The bubble is beginning to burst. The Bishop is a bad Bishop; he has no adequate idea of his work or his responsibility. Cold, inaccessible, shifty, his rule is unjust, his administration disastrous. The condition of the people committed to his charge is becoming worse and worse; the clergy are discontented, the people are dissatisfied, and if the present system of bustling negligence and silly cunning continue, it must result in the catastrophe which all prescient men see imminent."

Mr. Spurgeon, the other day, was scolding certain of his followers who declined to interfere in politics on the ground that they were "not of this world." This, he argued, was mere metaphor: "You might as well," he said, "being sheep of the Lord, decline to eat a mutton chop, on the plea that it would be cannibalism."

Dean Alford, who has hitherto taken no part in the "Cheshunt correspondence," thinking the best thing he could do was to let it work the good which he had no doubt it was working, writes to the Guardian now because there seems to be a misapprehension respecting his "platform" of action, which, if suffered to continue, might hinder the object he has in view. He says:

"That object is the frank recognition of the Christian bodies around us as churches of Christ, without any compromise of doctrine, and with no ulterior views. As to the former, compromise of doctrine, I claim to be, as to every Church doctrine, unchanged by 'fraternisation' with those who differ from us. And they on their part stand on the same ground. On the firm maintenance of this principle, all true recognition and union depend. Whether they omit in their worship an article of the Creed, is no matter of mine. They love and serve the Lord Jesus Christ; they are my brethren; I believe the time is come when I am bound to show that I regard them as such. And as to the latter point, abandonment of ulterior views respecting them, I have no hesitation in saying that, as I do not expect, so neither do I wish for, any reabsorption of Nonconformists into the Church of England. I believe it would be the worst thing possible, both for ourselves and for them. We are to be 'not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is.' And to my mind, His will has been unmistakably manifested in the free expansion of the Christian conscience as now found among us. It is our duty not to fight against His providence: not to attempt to work our way back to an uniformity which has utterly gone by; but to surrender our miserable jealousies; to accept, bravely and frankly, the state of things in which God has placed us; to walk, in the kingdom of God, and to the house of God, and in society before the world, hand in hand with our Nonconformist brethren. Thus only shall we of the Church of England be making safe and wise preparation for the day which must soon come upon her. We may, if we please, lower ourselves, by exclusiveness and uncharitableness, so as to become in that day a mere sect among sects; but we may also, and I hope we shall, so lift in our esteem our Christian brethren around us, as to find ourselves, when deprived of the aid of the State, a Church among churches."

The Guardian has an article headed "The Jew Premier," which, as Artemus Ward would have said, is "rit sarkastikal." The writer (professes to be of George Eliot's opinion in "The Spanish Gipsy," that extraordinary deeds are the result of "race," and the extraordinary spectacle of a Premier holding on for a whole session against large adverse parliamentary majorities, is only to be accounted for by the fact that Mr. Disraeli is a Jew. "An almost superhuman grasp of what they had was taught the Jews at first by the circumstances of their situation, and subsequently became an hereditary mark. The Jew of the middle age grasped his treasure so long as his fingers remained to perform that function. We may readily see what a strength such a faculty would, by a vast genealogical accumulation obtain; what a power of tenacity would enter into the blood, and form part of the character of the nation. It is this power of tenacity which Mr. Disraeli has shown in the campaign of this session, and in which, we think, he stands distinguished from—we use the expression for the sake of convenience, and mean no offence—an English Premier. In the one point of grasping—keeping fast hold of what he has got—the Englishman is no match for the Jew."

The English Independent says:

"The rage of the clergy on account of the proposed disestablishment of the Irish Church towards Nonconformists, especially Nonconformist ministers, would be amusing were it not that it is so unchristian. All Dissenters now are represented 'as the antagonists of the Church, and as joining with traditionalists and philosophers in an unholy crusade against pure Christianity.' We pity the men professing to be Christians who can so far forget themselves and set aside truth as to pen such language; not less do we compassionate all those who, on such untenable ground, can separate themselves from their fellow-Christians and abuse them. 'Union with traditionalists and philosophers against pure Christianity! Well do intelligent Churchmen know, however much they may be led astray by prejudice, that if they could convince Nonconformists that 'Establishments' and 'pure Christianity' were synonymous, they would soon cease to be Dissenters. Well do they know that if they could show that the removal of 'Establishments' would be ruinous to 'pure Christianity,' Dissenters would cease to seek their removal. But we are ashamed to think of Christian men even affecting to believe that pure Christianity needs for its existence an 'arm of flesh,' the status and support of worldly power. Still more are we ashamed of Protestant Christians who maintain that no sooner will the Protestant Church of Ireland cease to be established and endowed, than that Protestantism will cease to exist, and that Romanism will arise and at once become predominant and supreme."

In noticing Mr. C. Bentinck's civil remark in the House of Commons, that "Dissenters generally belong to the lowest class of society," the Christian Monthly News observes:

"This was a bold assertion, especially when we look at our respective gaol deliveries, which show that for every one Dissenter 'in durance vile,' there are more than forty-six Churchmen, and even nearly four Churchmen for every Romanist."

The Oswestry Advertiser has the following:

"Some time ago we stated that a Shropshire clergyman 'improved the occasion' of Gladstone's first Irish Church victory, by comparing him to Barabbas. Another rural parson in the county beat this on Sunday, by attributing the continued hot weather to the wickedness of the nation in supporting Gladstone throughout in his measure. In the latter case it is pleasant to know that there is room for repentance, for the parson hinted that if the people supported good staunch Churchmen—like one they had amongst them (indicating a Tory squire and M.P. present)—at the next election, they would redeem themselves from the disgrace under which they had fallen."

The Tomahawk presents us with this, "from the St. Alban's Primer"

"Poor Mr. Hubbard,
He went to his cupboard,
To build a good priest a church,
Who was no sooner there
But he left (hardly fair)
His most excellent friend in the lurch
"However," said he,
'I have found you a home';
'Thank you much,' said the priest,
'But there's no place like Rome.'
"Then he went to the tailor's,
To buy him a cope;
But when he came back—
He was playing at Pope!
"Said he then to the priest,
'Come, get out, make your bow';
Who replied, as the dog did,
With 'Get out? Bow-wow!'"

The Church News, in an article on the distinction between clergy and laity, thus uncompromisingly upholds the high claims of the former:

"The aunt that buys her nephews' commission in the army has as much right to interfere at the Horse Guards as Mr. Hubbard has to interfere at St. Alban's, and the rich squire has as little control over the services of his parish church as the keeper of the village general shop. The priest takes his orders and executes his office with a mission from the kingdom where education and birth meet with as little regard as money or anything that money can buy. It is part of the priest's mission to present the services of the Church to his people, as far as possible, in the form in which they will be most benefited by them, having regard to the future as well as the present; but this is a matter for his decision, not theirs. If a man builds a church and wants to have services conducted after his own devices, he is quite at liberty to engage as his minister any gentleman who will agree with him, but if he selects a priest of the Church Catholic, he must understand that he is choosing one whose allegiance is already pledged, and to whom, as the representative of the Church, he must himself submit."

The Pall Mall thinks Sir George Bowyer should at once communicate with "Captain C," who in an advertisement in the Tablet, offers for a trifling loan to become a Catholic and to supply the Pope with an invention far surpassing the Chassepot, which, as General Dumont bragged, did such wonders at Mentana. The advertisement is as follows:

"Rome.—'Secret invention.'—Guaranteed to repulse any existing army, equipped as they now are, that may attempt to force the gates of the Holy City. The inventor (seven years in the English army) seeks the loan of £1,500 to enable him to proceed to Rome, there first to embrace the Catholic faith, and then place himself and invention at the service of the Pope. Freehold property and effects given to the value of the loan required. Address, Captain C., under cover to the Editor of the Tablet."

The Telegraph, noticing Bishop Hind's pamphlet on the "Free Discussion of Religious Topics," joins issue with the Bishop when he virtually contends that even if a clergyman believes doctrines which he knows to conflict with those of the Church, he is still entitled to use his position and his power as a clergyman to spread those doctrines before he leaves the Church. Such a man commits a fraud. He received certain privileges on the distinct condition that he should not teach certain doctrines in defiance of that agreement, he does teach those doctrines before he gives up his position; and hence he is as clearly guilty of a breach of faith as the man who, receiving money beforehand for the performance of work, keeps the money, but leaves the work undone. If the Articles of the Church of England are too stringent, let them be altered; but let us have no playing fast and loose with what the law has declared to be their meaning. After all, clergymen, as well as laymen, must obey the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal;" but they do steal—they steal power, they steal prestige, nay, steal money—when they use an Anglican pulpit, or the office of an Anglican clergyman, to teach doctrines which the accredited authorities of the Anglican Church have bound them not to teach. With Dr. Hind's main object—the promotion of free discussion among the clergy as well as the laity—the Telegraph has the warmest sympathy.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XVI.

SUBJECT: Eastern manners in the Bible.

Read Genesis xxiii. 3–20. The account of Abraham's buying the cave of Machpelah. The men of Heth are sitting at the gate of their city when Abraham goes to sit down among them and explains his errand. They answer him with compliments, and offer him the best of their sepulchres. Abraham rises up, bows himself before them, and modestly asks to be allowed to buy the cave of Machpelah at its full price from the owner. Then Ephron the Hittite speaks in the hearing of the rest. "The field I give thee and the cave that is therein, in the presence of the sons of my people give I it thee." Abraham understands good manners better than to take this speech for more than it is worth. He bows again, and again he offers to give money for the field. So Ephron names a good round sum as the price of the land, adding that the money is but a trifle between two such men as they are. The silver is then weighed out in the scales, and the bargain made sure in the presence of the rest.

Read also 2 Samuel xxiv. 18–25. When David buys the rock that Arounah had used as a threshing floor, for an altar for Jehovah, compliments are passed between them in the same way, and then David pays down the fifty shekels. The like scenes may be witnessed to-day in the bazaars and markets of the East.

Read 1 Kings xx. 1—21. Benhadad, king of Syria, encamps his army before the city of Samaria and lays siege to it. He sends an insulting message to the king. "Thy silver and thy gold is mine, thy wives also and thy children, even the goodliest are mine." In the abject language of eastern deference, the besieged makes an answer, "My Lord, O King, according to Thy saying I am Thine, and all that I have." But Benhadad is not to be put off with words, and he proclaims his intention of sending to fetch his treasures. At this the King of Israel calls a council. "Mark, I pray you, and see how this man seeketh mischief," my compliments and my promises were not enough for him; he means to enforce their performance. And the Samaritans prepare for battle.

HOW TO TREAT CATHOLICISM.

IN a letter to the Times, Dr. McNeile tries to show that his "boggy" is not a make-believe but a dreadful reality. Consistent Roman Catholics, he maintains, must wish to persecute; the canon law enjoins persecution; and there are sufficient grounds for seriously apprehending that the "Papal authorities in England may so far delude themselves as to think that their time has come to try it on;" whence, he concludes, we ought not to go on "removing our defences one after another." The Pall Mall, which does not think it worth while to waste time on a man who cannot see the difference between a code of laws enforced in invitato, and a set of rules adopted by a people of their own free will, has the following good remarks on the points we have mentioned:

How any one can seriously believe that any sane Roman Catholic thinks that the Pope can ever dream of exercising any sort of legal power in this country is to us altogether unintelligible, particularly when we think of the position to which the course of recent events has reduced him in France, Austria, and Italy. To connect such a design with the famous aggression of 1850 is about as absurd as it would be to say, that if a debating club which had previously been managed by its secretary determined to adopt the standing orders of the House of Commons for the regulation of its debates, this was evidence of an intention to subvert the Constitution. It is impossible to argue with these fantastic terrors, yet there is something more in the matter than the difficulty of arguing with Dr. McNeile. The real annoyance is to see how he and other excellent people strengthen the system which they dread by making these absurd attacks upon it, whilst they have close before them, and actually employ, though without apprehending its scope, an argument against the whole system which is altogether unanswerable, and which derives great part of its force from the very circumstance which throws them all into such terror.

Dr. McNeile says consistent Roman Catholics ought to persecute. Their creed binds them to it. Their canon law sanctions and even commands it. Their whole theory of this world and the next implies persecution. This we think is true in the main, though we would not warrant Dr. McNeile's exposition of the canon law; but surely the obvious inference from it is that the Roman Catholic creed is silently, but not the less emphatically, denied by the whole of the modern world. Religious persecution is beyond all question a thing of the past. It is practised nowhere, and any attempt to revive it would meet with universal execration and contemptible failure. If, then, the Roman Catholic theory demands it, the Roman Catholic theory has lost pro tanto its hold upon mankind.

This consequence is unquestionably the true one, and if Dr. McNeile and others who think with him were capable of taking a calm view of the subjects on which they write so eagerly, they would see that, notwithstanding the eternal brag about the logical character and perfect consistency of Popery of which we hear so much, its contact with the world, its recognition as one form of religious opinion amongst many, its practical reduction, in a word, to the position of a religious sect enjoying just as much influence as it can get by practising the common acts of religious sects—all these things are continually placing it more and more in a radically false and untenable position. Nothing can be more really hostile to the spirit and to the creed which is the essence of Popery, than the sort of treatment which it receives from modern society in general, and especially from modern society in England and the United States. Bow down before it, and it will govern, and perhaps tyrannise, as it did in the middle ages. Recognise it as a hostile power, to be confronted and baffled by the law of the land, and you provoke a vehement and acrimonious contest in which you will very likely come off worst. Treat it with courtesy and justice as one amongst many contending religious sects, all of which are equal before the law of the land, and all of which must recognise the law of the land as their common superior whenever the state of circumstances requires a trial of strength, and you put it at once on its true level. It may brag and bluster, and make pretensions as high in words as ever, but in their hearts the lay members of the body know that they are treated justly, and as they themselves wish to be treated. The great mass of Roman Catholics, like the great mass of Protestants, care for a variety of other things much more than they care for their priests or their dogmas. They want to buy and sell, and marry, and educate their children, and succeed in their professions, and amuse themselves just like other people, and they would dislike the realisation of the theories of their priests just as much as Protestants. They like their clergy to be allowed to say their say and make their claims, and go through their observances without being interfered with or humiliated by the law, but that is all. There is no more fear that any great body of modern Roman Catholics will try to carry the High Catholic theory in practice, than there is that the lay members of the Church of England will ever come to treat Unitarians as they most certainly would treat them, if they really believed certain parts of the Athanasian Creed. By practically putting all creeds on a footing of equality, by refusing to recognise the tenets or rules of any one sect in any other character than as the terms of a voluntary contract, and impartially recognising all of them in that character, the world at large tacitly, but nevertheless really, gives judgment in favour of the great heresy of all heresies—that after all is said and done religion is matter of opinion, upon which people must agree to differ. This general conclusion is in fact helped on by Roman Catholics, however much they may condemn it in words, when they demand and accept religious equality, and insist that they have as much right to call their ecclesiastical dignitaries Bishops of Westminster, or Beverley, or Birmingham, as the Wesleyans have to divide the country into circuits and appoint preachers to them with the title of minister of such a district in such a circuit, and that they have as much right to adopt the provisions of the canon law as rules for the management of their own ecclesiastical affairs amongst themselves, as the Wesleyans have to exact from their ministers obedience to the regulations made by Conference. The substance of a thing is apt to be stronger than the form within which people may try to compress it. The Roman Catholic clergy and laity may turn and twist the matter as they will, but they will never make anything else of their church than a sect tolerated like other sects, arguing with them upon equal terms, subject to precisely the same law, and indulging in the same sort of hopes, with, to say the very least, no greater amount of justice. By helping them good-naturedly, and with perfect justice and bona fides, into that position, fundamentally inconsistent as it is with every one of their opinions, you will do as much to injure their system as you would do to help it by recognising the Pope as a rival to the Queen, and the canon law as law in some sense other than that in which the rules of the Jockey Club are law.

CALVIN AND SERVETUS.

A WRITER (E. L.) in Notes and Queries, has been trying to whitewash Calvin as far as his complicity in the burning of Servetus goes. Another correspondent (W. D.), who regards E. L.'s letter as "evidently the production of a lawyer practising himself in the art of special pleading," and thinks that a much better defence had been already made by Calvin's biographer, Bungener, says:

"The only real question that any one cares about is not touched on by him—that is, what were the respective acts of Servetus and Calvin, and what is the moral judgment we are authorised to pass on them? . . . I will only mention the two most important facts, and which the reader will most care to know. First, if Servetus did not deserve his fate morally, he did so in another common sense of the word, inasmuch as he brought it entirely on himself by his inconceivable fatuity—not only in openly declaring himself a heretic, and that on so purely abstract and therefore wholly impracticable a question as the Trinity (while yet one considered essential to all idea of religion by both Romanists and Protestants), but by repeatedly putting himself into positions of danger again after narrow escapes, and even at the last going to Calvin's church at Geneva, and so getting recognised, as he might have expected. Secondly, Calvin does not seem ever to have intended to have Servetus burned, or even to have expected it. He simply wished him to be put to death by being beheaded, and voted against his being burned. At the same time it seems evident that he made no effort to prevent it, as it can scarcely be doubted that he had influence enough to have obtained the more merciful sentence, if he had urged it with earnestness. Still it was better that he should have given this lukewarm and barren support to the more humane course, than that he should have instigated the other."

Another correspondent (Jaytee) remarks:

"Seeing that E. L. admits 'it was true he (Calvin) was in earnest in having him (Servetus) punished, which is the worst that can be said against him,' I do not think, considering the power held by Calvin in Geneva over the minds of the people, that E. L. can escape the conclusion of Calvin's complicity in the burning of Servetus. In the days when that event took place, Calvin would only be thought 'in earnest' if he did pass sentence of death upon Servetus. Some men are only thought to be 'in earnest' now when they consign a heretic to eternal perdition. Why be nice, then, about Calvin burning Servetus? The belief in Calvin's doctrines recognises the certain perdition of the majority of the human race; why be so fastidious in respect to the censure of a single heretic who was troublesome? Calvin could scarcely with any consistency, holding Servetus to be an arch-unbeliever, feel a qualm in passing sentence of death on him. The greater, of course, includes the less in this as in other respects."

The truth seems to be that Calvin did wish the burning to be dispensed with, as, in a letter to Farel (Aug. 20, 1553), he said, "I hope Servetus will be condemned to death, but I wish the severity of his punishment may be softened;" and again (on Oct. 26) he wrote, "He will be executed to-morrow. We have endeavoured to change the mode of death, but in vain." There seems good reason, however, for believing that the stern Reformer was not particularly distressed at the way in which the arch-heretic had been removed, with his "diabolical imaginations."

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 14, 1868.

HOW NOT TO DO IT.

THE spectacle presented by the Unitarian body of late years is of so strange a character that it would be ridiculous were it not so sad, and disgraceful were it not so simple. Possessed of men of intellect and energy equal to any of the present day, and engaged in the promulgation of those very theological truths to which the age is most manifestly tending, we have so frittered away our great powers and opportunities, that it is questionable whether our numbers and influence are increasing or decreasing. Is not this sad?

During the last half century, men educated in Unitarian principles have, in no small numbers, proved themselves capable of gaining distinction in every walk of life. Under the fostering influence of our grand theology, they have, with small beginnings, heroically fought their way to the front ranks of our English world. We need cite no instances, but those who know the inner history of the leading men of the day know how large a share the influence of Unitarianism has had in moulding their character. Are these earnest Unitarians? Do their children grow up to be a support to our body? Notoriously the contrary. They have been educated in such an excessively liberal manner that they think everybody's creed a little better than their own, and therefore naturally take the first opportunity of making an exchange. Does not this betray the most infantile simplicity on the part of a body professing to think that it represents the essence of the Christian church? Viewed in any other light than this, we certainly are making ourselves a laughing stock to gods and men. We flatter ourselves with the delusive hope that we are imperceptibly influencing the National Church, and silently changing the current of theological opinion. Very imperceptibly and very silently, indeed. The units of truth which we throw into the sea of error float confusedly about the surface for a few years; they disappear in death, and their children coalesce with the greater mass. They are lost to us and to our cause. The wealth, the influence, and the intellectual habits fostered and matured by Unitarianism, in the second or third generation are turned against us. The bitterest arrows shot at us are feathered from our own wings, and we meantime are contented in our apathy, because a few large-hearted Trinitarians give us a friendly meeting, and talk dreamily about the future of a Free Church. We forget they will die, and their large heartedness with them, and the world will be as far off a pure monotheism as ever. Instead of consolidating our forces, we are dissipating them; instead of making sincere Unitarians, we are content with sympathising with liberal Trinitarians. Instead of concentrating what educational power we have in one centre of strong light, we dissipate it over rival institutions, and then send our young men of the laity to be educated under Trinitarian influences. Quem Deus vult perdere! And is it really so? Is there nothing better left for the descendants of PRIESTLEY and BELSHAM and CHANNING than a happy despatch at their own hands, consummated in the presence of an admiring Trinitarian audience?

Our error lies not in defect, but excess of faith; we are so certain that the truth will triumph, under God's good providence, that we forget that we are the keepers of the Ark. We are contented spectators of a great drama, in which we were appointed to be leading actors. Great is the truth, we cry, and sit with folded arms on the front benches of the theatre awaiting her appearance. No wonder that she does not come; for those who are to play that part have slipped in among the audience, and are too busy criticising the performances of others to take their proper place in the drama. Oh, most excellent Bishop! we say, surely he is coming near the truth. Oh, most admirable Dean! in him we see the prologue to the great drama; the pure statue will be unveiled by him, and our souls shall be satisfied with the sight of the long-expected Goddess. But we wait even as our forefathers waited, and she comes not.

We are the inheritors of the glorious faith that drew Israel out from among the heathen, and made of her a great nation, heirs of the true faith in ONE GOD, the FATHER ALMIGHTY, and yet we cower before a predominant but bastard Christianity, and apologise for the grandest faith the world has ever had—whether Jewish, Christian, or Mohammedan; and consider ourselves happy when the followers of heathen tradition will admit us within the pale of the Church—in theory;—in practice we know that it cannot be in our time—no, nor ever. Why are we so long in seeing that the Unitarian and Trinitarian can have no spiritual affinities? Our whole religious conceptions are wide as the poles asunder. We, in our conception of God and His providence, follow the leadership of ABRAHAM and MOSES, and the grand school of the Prophets. The Trinitarians of the present day are the spiritual descendants of the sun worshippers of the ancient world, and they ignorantly echo the ritual and philosophy of a school of thought to which they can attach no meaning, but which they have made palatable to the multitude by a grossness of imagery almost without a parallel in the world's history. Is it not so, when in every parish church in England they preach about the death of an eternal God, and the very essence of their creed is a direct contradiction of the divinely implanted human reason. No wonder that we do not flourish as we ought. We have had the true precious stone given to us, and we go about coveting the glass gems of others, because they have more tawdry settings. Instead of scattering our forces, let us try to concentrate them. Let us have faith in the truth that is in us, and bring up our children to feel that to be born into a Unitarian church is a blessing and not a curse; and, little as we are in the world's estimation, we shall have the consciousness of being true to the light that is given to us; and when the time is come we shall be the nucleus around which shall gather the grandest Christian church which the world has seen since the days of the Apostles. But if this is to be our future, we must not be half-hearted now. Charitable and tolerant as ever to all forms of religious thought, we must still dare to be true to our own. Both at home and in the world we must show that we are proud of our simple faith, and are prepared to make any sacrifice rather than betray our trust. Let us only do this, and our children will not go over to the strangers; nor will they treat us with a pity that closely borders on contempt.

THE "NO POPERY" DODGE.

THE papers in Mr. Disraeli's interest, obeying his lead, are working the "No Popery" pretence with great zeal, and making a special effort to excite the fears of Protestant Dissenters. The Standard, for instance, bids them note that, though the Established Church in Ireland may be swept away, an Establishment will still remain, for, adopting Dr. Waldegrave's words, "as the supremacy of the Queen recedes that of the Pope advances." After dwelling on the aggressive force which is wielded by the Papacy, the Standard declares that the English Church is the only effectual barrier against its machinations (forgetting that that Church has given to Rome Dr. Manning, Dr. Newman, and many besides), and asks, whether the Protestant Dissenters of England are willing, either from apathy or from unworthy jealousy of the State Church, to hold aloof from a contest in which the Protestant cause is threatened by an array of adversaries as united as it is heterogeneous in its elements and composition? Agreeing as we do entirely with the Pall Mall Gazette in the importance of the great question on which the approaching election will turn, it is most desirable that there should be a clear understanding of it, so that none should be led to give their votes from fear, instead of from reason. With this view, we subjoin some of the remarks of our contemporary on the candidature of Sir John Acton for Bridgnorth, who has laid aside literary labours in which he was engaged, in the desire to vindicate one English town at least "from the most odious of all imputations, the imputation of an ignorant and craven bigotry." Whether Bridgnorth does or does not enable him to accomplish his purpose, the speech which he made the other day is a valuable answer to that "No Popery" cry, by the revival of which the Government is discrediting itself and its supporters. It was to be expected that this odious watchword would be raised with unusual vigour in a borough where the Liberal candidate is a Roman Catholic, and this anticipation, it seems, has been amply justified. It may be worth while to illustrate, by one or two quotations, the tone in which an enlightened Roman Catholic speaks of the question of disestablishment. Those whom it concerns can then compare it with that assumed by men who have chosen to style themselves, for the nonce, the defenders of "civil and religious freedom" against Popish tyranny.

Sir John Acton is evidently not afraid to take the bull by the horns. In order to put in the clearest possible light the controversy about the Irish Church, he selects as an appropriate analogy the controversy about the temporal power of the Pope. "Suppose," he says, "I were to say, in the case of Rome, that I would not consider the principles on which the Government is conducted, and the charges which are brought against it; that I would not judge it by the same standard as other States, because I thought that its destruction might be injurious to the Church to which I belong—what would you then think of me? You would say that I was a man without principle; that I was willing to do evil that good might come; that I acted as if the end justified the means. . . . And you would be perfectly right." The characteristic fault of the line taken by the Conservatives on this question is just what is here stated. At the best they subordinate moral considerations to theological; at the worst they "disguise a sordid interest in the stolen garb of religion." In other words, they adopt, in all its cynical defiance of principle, the Ultramontane defence of the temporal power. Substitute "Irish" for "Roman," and "the Church of England" for "the Catholic Church," and the arguments of the Univers or the Dublin Review might be transferred without further alteration into the columns of the Conservative organs. Speak to a Ministerial candidate of conceding the just demand of four-fifths of the people of Ireland, and he answers by an elaborate demonstration that such a concession would be fatal to the theory of an Established Church. This it is that must be maintained at all hazards. It does not trouble him that this or that particular establishment cannot be supported without a sacrifice of principle. So much the worse for principle—or rather, he has no belief in principle, as distinct from the supposed interests of religion. This is the best thing that can be said for the defenders of the Irish Church. They are anxious to benefit the cause of Protestantism; and where the end is so good they cannot believe that the means can be bad. A sound theology purifies everything it touches. In matters of religion the motto of the Conservative party seems to be, Non olet.

But when the Tories refuse to "consider the conditions which justify or condemn the existence of a State Church," they are really doing more harm to the Church of England than they can possibly do good to the Church of Ireland.

"The tactics of the Tories are not only a crime, but a mistake. They are binding the two Establishments together by a bond which may prove too strong to be sundered when the weak one sinks. They, not we, have embarked the Church of England in this crazy boat; they, not we, are answerable for the result. They cannot save the Irish Establishment; its weakness exceeds their strength. I would warn them not to plunge the two institutions into one common ruin. . . . It is yet time for the English Establishment to free herself from her sinful sister and to escape the effects of a ruinous complicity. If she will bring back the untaught heathen of our great towns to the forgotten name of Christ, and work out that apostolate of charity towards the neglected poor, which England among all the nations needs the most, then she need not fear for her endowments, for Catholic and Nonconformist will alike acknowledge that the labourer is worthy of his hire."

At the close of his address, Sir John Acton referred to the use which the Bishop of London made of his name in his speech on the Suspensory Bill:—

"You may be told that I occupy an exceptional position, apart from the common and familiar line of opinion among the English Catholics. You may be reminded that, in the late debates, a right reverend prelate pointed to me as one who had special reason to look with sympathy on the existence of the Establishment. And it may be said that a man cannot be taken as a representative of the Catholic body who is at variance with a large portion of it on important points. Whether I represent the body or not, I claim to understand and represent the spirit. If I differ from many of my friends, I differ from them in nothing more than this—that so far from my believing the principles of my religion to be hostile to political enlightenment, to the progress of religious or secular knowledge, to liberty which is a test of truth, or to charity which is a test of faith—that religion has taught me to cherish the high qualities, the love of fair dealing and of open speech, the love of even justice and of freedom, which are the glory of the English name."

These are the opinions and the policy which are being denounced all over the country as subversive of civil and religious freedom. The "No Popery" cry is not directed against an effort of the Church of Rome to obtain a new position or exceptional privileges. It is raised with no other excuse than the merely accidental one, that the most conspicuous sufferers by the wrong it is proposed to remove happen to be Roman Catholics. The qualities which make the name of Popery a bugbear are to be found to-day on the side of the Irish Church. The most significant support accorded to Mr. Disraeli's policy on this question has been given, as Sir John Acton reminds us, by "an official organ of the Roman Government, a new paper which is published under the authority and the shadow of the Vatican." We do not believe that this device of the Government will exercise any appreciable influence on the result of the contest. Mr. Disraeli will have the satisfaction of knowing that he has done his best to fan into unnatural life the embers of a slowly-dying bigotry; but his self-congratulations will, to all appearance, have to end here. But that this spurious intolerance may not snatch a momentary victory, it is well that those to whom it falls to give an answer to the Ministerial challenge should not relax their exertions till the result has become a certainty.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

IMMORTAL HARMONY.

ALL sainted souls, Lord, are the chords
From which Thy fingers draw
Immortal music to the tones
Of Thy most holy law.
The melodies, which Thy high heavens
Thro' all the ages fill,
Are wills responding, and at one
With Thine, the Master-Will.
The angel's harp is but a heart
That knows no law but Thine;
The angel's song, a creature's love
At one with Love Divine;
And music breathes from all Thy worlds
Because they never stray
From the blue spaces where of old
Thy hand has traced their way.

J. S. BURNS.

CHINESE IN MELBOURNE.

THE Melbourne Argus furnishes us with the following account of two of the favourite resorts of the Chinese in that place:

We commenced our tour of inspection by a visit to a gambling-house. On a word from a Chinese detective we were instantly admitted. At the side of the door was a boarded partition, where an almond-eyed Celestial of the better class was retailing lottery tickets. These tickets are pieces of coarse, grey paper, containing eighty squares, a letter being marked in each square. They are sold at various prices, the purchasers being entitled to blot out so many of the signs according to the price he pays. For 6d. four or five squares are allowed, the number varying at the different shops. When the eventful period of "drawing" takes place, the proprietor, sitting before a table on which a number of papers stamped with signs are deposited, takes one at random and sticks it upon the wall. Each sign corresponds with one of those on the purchased ticket, and when eighty have been drawn, the lottery is over. The blotting out of one, or even three, right numbers on a ticket does not entitle the owner to a prize. Four is the usual average; but should any one succeed in taking all, or even half, his gains will be very great, the interest paid increasing with the declaration of every new square. Some of the Chinamen spend all their earnings in this amusement, and, although nearly starving, will reserve a sixpence to buy a ticket of four numbers with. The profits made by the owners are sometimes large, as nights frequently pass without any one gaining a high prize. The temptation is great, however; £400 can be gained for 6s., and £80 for 2s. 6d., if the purchaser "have luck," the chances of his not having it being largely in favour of the bank. Passing through a large and lofty hall (the house had been a two-storied store in days gone by) we were apprised by the rattling of coins that the gambling-tables were near. The doorway of the room was choked up with Chinese, some in wadded-silk coats, some in fustians and moleskins—all, however, wore white felt wide-awakes; and the array of dented grey crowns clustered round the table reminded one of a troop of Confederate sharpshooters. There were two tables in the room, one only being occupied, the rules being that after twelve "throws" the company adjourn to the other. The game was the celebrated fan-tan. It is wonderful that no spirited European has ever yet introduced this game into polite society. It is as simple as blind hockey, as exciting as roulette, and the stakes are unlimited—three advantages which recommend it to the sporting public. Fan-tan is played with counters—pieces of tin divided into four squares each numbered. Each player bets on a number, and the game having been "made," the banker flings a handful of counters upon the table, and proceeds to withdraw four at a time by means of a forked ivory rod. The number that remains on the table when the last series of four has been removed wins, the rest lose. Nothing can be more simple. A solemn personage, very yellow about the teeth, very red about the eyes, and very bristly about the head, sat behind the banker, and sold counters to represent various sums, but did not in any way take part in the game. Several incomprehensible blotches on red and yellow paper decorated the walls, and our conductor informed us that these were invocations to gods presumably favourable to players, and consolatory maxims from Confucius, for the benefit of the losers. A gilded and illuminated sheet placed over the banker's head contained the rules of the game. The noise was deafening. The incessant jabber while staking, the shrieks of delight at winning, and the screams of disgust at losing, were terrific; while the fumes of bad tobacco almost hid the players from view. The twelve throws were over about ten minutes after we entered, and the crowd rushed frantically to the other table, in order to secure good and "lucky" places. We stayed for some time longer, but nothing out of the common was to be seen; there was no very high play going on, and the losers bore their losses with equanimity.

Declining all offers to "take a hand," we left the place, and crossing the road, entered an opium shop. There were some twelve or fifteen persons in the place when we entered, and the peculiar acrid smell of the burning opium was almost unendurable for the first few moments. The interior of a Chinese opium house has been frequently described, and the languid eyes, withered faces, and hopeless aspect of the confirmed smokers desecrated upon ad nauseam. The scene in the house we visited was of the usual kind. Couches, or rather benches, covered with straw matting, are placed in little alcoves. On each bench reclines a brown and withered figure, whose unstrung muscles, leaden eyes, and corpse-like visage, proclaim him a slave to the influence of the drug. It is a common mistake to suppose that opium-smoking induces visions of extraordinary beauty. This is not the case, save in some rare instances. The influence of hatchis, or opium, when eaten, not smoked, will have this effect. The drug is chiefly used in the first instance to alleviate pain, or to produce a temporary excitement of the nerves, similar to that effected by the moderate use of alcohol. One pipe leads to another, and so seductive is the power of the poison, that a fortnight is long enough to rivet the chains of this terrible vice around the victim. Should he attempt to break off the habit he has formed, the terrible pains that follow drive him nearly to madness. All the men we saw in the establishment were old and hardened smokers, and they were lying in full enjoyment of their brief respite from pain. The eager-looking faces of the new comers became calm and composed after a few whiffs at the pipe; and one unfortunate, who had been hanging about the door with a horrible expression of longing and pain on his haggard features, upon receiving a few shillings, rushed in, and having applied his lips to the huge bamboo stem with impatient greed, puffed volumes of the acrid smoke through his nostrils, and sank back upon the matting, with a smile and inarticulate moan of delight that was absolutely painful to witness. He had been debarred from the use of his stimulant for two days, and after praying in vain for relief, had been twice ejected from the house with blows. The drug is sold in little boxes at 1s. each. Each box contains sufficient opium for three pipes. The opium is prepared in the form of a paste, which has a sweet and peculiar smell, and looks much like treacle. The smoker takes it up with an iron pin, and lights it in the flame of a lamp. The burning drug is then placed in a small hole in the huge clay bowl of the pipe, and the smoke inhaled through the bamboo attached.

We followed our guide into several rotten wooden sheds immediately behind the Theatre Royal. Most of the places were used as lodging-houses and as resorts for thieves. At the first rap at the door, a general stampede took place, and in less than three minutes the place was cleared. Rushing rapidly through the house, we caught a glimpse of a departing pigtail, as its owner dived through some broken palings close to the stage door of the theatre, and, as the courtyard was thickly paved with broken bottles, and ankle deep in mud, we did not follow. The house had originally contained about three rooms, but by judicious insertion of lath and plaster these had been converted into ten or twelve. Each little apartment was about six feet by three, and the furniture consisted only of a bench, on which the occupant lay. Lines were stretched across the bed—which consisted of a few dirty rags—and from these lines various garments dangled. To give an adequate description of the filth, the disorder, and the smell of these dens would be impossible. Only a few of them had windows, and in all the entrance was so low that we had to crawl through. Most of the "lodgers" had bolted, and in one room a "party" had been assembled, for we found three opium pipes, a pack of Chinese cards, and a few shillings lying on the bed, the owners having abandoned them at the dreaded sound of "police." In a cheerful (!) looking spot, some five feet by two, lay an old man, in the last stage of atrophy. He was unable to move, and grinned ferociously when we invaded his privacy, clutching with his long fingers a small roll of blanket, in which, probably, his money was deposited. We succeeded in assuring him of our good intentions, and he informed us, through the medium of F— S—, that he was a rag-picker. He had been a digger, "no good!"—shepherd, "no good!" and was now dying. He was able until the last week to earn money by picking up rags, bottles, and rubbish in the street, and selling the same. His rent was 3s. a week, and he had to find his own board. His savings would soon be done, and then he said complacently, "Me die 'long a street." The stench was unbearable. He had not been moved for five or six days, and had lived chiefly on opium during that time. We entered several houses, all of which were equal to, and some worse, in point of filth and overcrowding, than the one we had just left. The number of Chinese in Melbourne averages about 500, and as a rule they are quiet and orderly. Whatever vices they have they keep them to themselves, and are seldom in an English court of justice. There is a joss-house in the "quarter," and behind it is a room used as a courthouse, in which disputes between relatives are settled, some well-known and wealthy Chinamen acting as arbitrator. These disputes, however, are few and far between; and considering that the Melbourne Chinese are usually the scourgings of the seaport towns of their native country, we may congratulate ourselves upon their usual good conduct.

STANDING FIRE.

MORAL courage, when it is really true, rarely, if ever, fails to secure respect. The following instance is a proof of this:—A young soldier, going to his barrack-room to sleep for the first time, quietly knelt down to pray in presence of his comrades. This act was the signal for a storm. Hisses, shouts, and whistling filled the room with hideous noise. Belts were thrown at the kneeling soldier, one man leaped upon the bed and shouted in his ear. But he was unmoved to the end of the prayer, when he arose and silently went to his rest. The next night his comrades eagerly watched to see if he would dare to pray a second time. To their surprise he again dropped upon his knees, and they saluted him with the same noises as on the previous evening. He did not flinch, however. The third evening he knelt down and prayed, regardless of their continued knocking and noise. On the fourth evening the noise was less. On the fifth it was still less, and on the sixth one of the soldiers exclaimed: "He stands fire, he stands fire. He's genuine." After that no one disturbed him. He had overcome opposition—he had won respect.

OUT OF THE STORM.

AN angel in the Book of Life
Wrote down an infant's birth,
Then added, ere he closed his book—
"Too beautiful for earth."
And when the reaper, Death, passed by
He read the words, and smiled;
Then gently folded in his arms
The lovely little child.
The mother wept, but angels sang,
With soft and glad accord;
They welcomed the transplanted flower
In the garden of the Lord.
The mother wept; she will not weep
When all her days have run,
And at the gates of Paradise
She meets her little son.

FAREWELL BANQUET TO DR. BELLOWES.

OF the various interesting speeches delivered on this occasion, at Liverpool, last week, we regret that we can only find room for that of Dr. Bellows. He said:—Mr. Gair and gentlemen, any personal pride which I might naturally feel both in receiving the honour of this banquet, in the presence of this distinguished company, and in the kind and genial way in which you have been pleased to receive my name is suitably chastened, I hope, by a proper consideration that in your eyes, and in the eyes of my friend, Mr. Gair, I have the good fortune to represent, unworthily it is true, but yet to represent not only the Unitarian body in America, but America itself. (Cheers.) And that the great kindness, and what I am ready to say is the uncalled-for kindness, of such an occasion as this, is only justified by that consideration. As to my friend, Mr. Gair, he has utterly forbidden me to say a word about himself, and as I know his modesty is of that genuine sort that what he says he absolutely means, I intend therefore to pay him the respect of silence upon that point. I may, however, remind him of what I know he has not forgotten, that I had the pleasure of speaking into his ear for some ten years; and I hope that, mingling with that fond and devoted interest in the country where he has long lived, which he is so generally known to feel, there are some slight strands woven in of affectionate partiality for his old minister. I congratulate my fellow-Unitarians and fellow-Christians, upon an occasion which brings before us the recognition of the fact, that we have part here and part on the other side of the flood of that small but goodly company of fellow-men and fellow-Christians who, in the providence of God, have been permitted to attain to views of religion and of Christianity so precious and so dear to our hearts, those who are esteemed by the honoured and, I trust, ever to be honoured name of Unitarians. (Cheers.) I rejoice to be able to say that in passing from one country to the other, and in examining, with a little of the taste of the amateur, or, perhaps, of the connoisseur, the character of the article, I rejoice to be able to say that it would be extremely difficult for me to tell the difference in the cloth, or texture and finish, on either side of the roll, though the wide ocean divides them. I find, and I rejoice to find, that the article is precisely the same article here and there; that the cloth is ruffled a little here precisely as it is ruffled a little there; but the warp and the texture are precisely the same things. The looms of Manchester, the forges of Birmingham, the commerce of Liverpool, all turn out essentially and precisely that which we are accustomed to weave, or to forge, in the name of Unitarianism, on the other side of the water—(cheers);—and I declare to you, although I have been here only a few short weeks, that I am so utterly unable to feel myself to be a stranger—(cheers)—or to realise that the broad ocean divides me from my own land and my own Unitarian friends, that I almost feel as if I were going away from home rather than towards it. These are great and joyful days, brethren, for our cause. I do not know that we hold a prouder or nobler place than those who have gone before us, and who had the burthen and heat of the day to bear; but I have always found that sacrifices and crosses in behalf of noble things and noble sentiments brought in their train a touch of glorious knighthood, which made them in no small degree compensations for everything that prosperity could confer; and therefore, when I look back to our noble Nonconformist fathers in this country from whence you sprang, and those other noble men in America, who first took their lives and their reputations into their hands, and went out from the strongholds of prosperous creeds to maintain the integrity of their own creeds—it is almost with envy that I consider what they bore and what they sacrificed for the honour of God and truth. But we cannot all be heroes and martyrs. Let us therefore rejoice that we are victors, and let us bear whatever a gracious Providence may place upon us, with gratitude to the good God who has given to our cause at least something like the aspect of prosperity, and to our hearts something like the cheer of success. But this glorious success is not brought about by our labours or our purses, or by the victory of our right hands, but has come to us owing to the great fact that the principles and ideas we have contended for are so natural, so deeply grafted into humanity, and into the very necessity of things, that whilst the stars in their course fought against Sisera, the constellations, science, art, human progress, are all fighting, by the necessity of God's most holy law, for the very cause for which we have been contending from the first. Never had any cause so humble in its origin such mighty alliances. I have only to refer you to the eloquent discourse of Mr. Wicksteed before the Unitarian Association in 1866, which I read with great gratification, for a full exposition of the relation of the fundamental idea of the unity of God, to the contributions which science, political economy, the agencies and experiences of nature and of humanity, are all bringing to bear upon that fundamental principle not only of the universe but of humanity itself. Well, I believe the days of our small things are gone by. The days of our struggling in both countries necessarily had the effect of putting on our faith a certain hardness, a resisting and antagonistic quality, a necessity of denial, and a certain chill and coldness, which undoubtedly gave it some aspect of unprofitableness—at any rate want of attraction to men of fervid temperament and active thought. That cruel, crushing period, when we had to put on this aspect, has happily gone by. Doubtless whilst it lasted it had a most trying, in some senses a most dispiriting, a most chilling, and in every respect a very disagreeable influence, both over the form of our faith and the acceptance of it in the hearts of our disciples. But, thank God, our great hammers of science, political, metaphysical, aye, and physical, too, are now grinding to powder that great system made up half of chains and half of mill-stones. (Cheers.) Those old ideas, I can never speak of them without a profound respect, for, grim as they were they had some majestic elements of truth—the same solemn necessities in the providence of God, the rude rough vessels in which alone the precious water of life could be held during periods when it was exposed to various kinds of assaults, now happily passed away—these ordinances and ceremonies have now been marked for ruin and destruction. No glacier descending those Swiss mountains, which your wives and daughters are now visiting, ever came down with more fatal and crushing weight on the rocks that obstructed its progress, than these powerful scientific and progressive ideas are now pressing down fatally and irresistibly upon the errors and convictions which so long passed for the true creed of Christianity. (Cheers.) You might as well try to tie up one of those glaciers with a ribbon snatched from the neck of a Swiss peasant, as to stop the inevitable pressure of those ideas. Therefore the preparation for that positive form of Liberal Christianity for which we are now waiting is taken out of our hands, and is being done for us by the might and good providence of God. (Cheers.) Our faith—and I thank God that I have lived to see such a glorious era—has taken in my own country, and I think I can see clearly that it is taking in your country, a positive form; and, oh! what glory, what victory, what precious results await the hour when we can affirm a Unitarian Christ-ianity without doubt, fear, or misgiving; when it shall be seen to grow, not amidst storms and glaciers, but in the pleasant sunshine of human confidence and human devotion. Oh! what will it not be when men failing to look at it any longer with the eye of suspicion, and doubt, and fear, come to see in it all the gentleness, sympathy with humanity, tenderness to human weakness; all the mighty confidence in the love of God; all the mighty aspiration after holiness and beauty that dwell in the life and sanctify the death of Jesus Christ? What will not this positive religion do, when, taken out of the old chill, it is permitted to blossom and to bear fruit in the sunshine of human eyes, and in the dew of human hearts. Oh! with what joy, with what hope, with what confidence, do I look forward to the day when the general reception of these ideas shall permit the world to see how long they were crucifying the master himself, in the despite and contempt which they poured upon the simplicity of the Gospel, reproduced in Unitarianism. Well, I must tear myself away from so inviting a consideration as that which opens before me—a theme so full of hope and delightful sympathy, for I desire to express to you the extreme delight and joy, nay, I must say, even surprise, with which I have passed through those of your churches and societies with which I have acquainted myself. I have met your ministers and laity in England within the last ten weeks, and have noted the degree of strength and hopefulness, preparation for noble victories, and the degree of social influence and dignity and importance that belong to the Unitarian cause in England. I am prepared to say that instead of being less than I feared, it is far greater than I hoped. I was here twenty years ago, and I recollect that in the short visit I paid them I was struck with the shabbiness of your church edifices, and the dirty and cob-web air that prevailed; the smallness of the congregations I met, and the apprehension that the good old times had gone by—that the thing would last as long as they lasted, and “after us the deluge.” (Laughter.) That seemed to be rather the feeling that prevailed amongst the Unitarians at that time. Such was the state of things I encountered twenty years ago. After twenty years' absence I find elegant and costly structures where I found before old, dilapidated, dispiriting chapels. I find excellent congregations wherever I have been. Out of twenty occasions when I have had to address Unitarian congregations in England, I have not looked upon anything that could not be considered full and devout audiences. I find, amongst the ministers here, men in all respects equal in learning, equal in spiritual zeal, in elevation of tone, and in mutual sympathy and co-operative spirit, to our brethren at home. I find among you men of whom I should not venture to say that they are a whit inferior to those we are able to present in my own country, and that, for an American, is saying a good deal. (Cheers and laughter.) Let me also add that I have been very much delighted—and I am old enough, I think, to be permitted the privilege of expressing an opinion upon that subject—I have been truly delighted with the character and promise of the younger portion of the ministers who have fallen under my own eye, and come within my own knowledge. I confess that when I came here, I was sufficiently under the prejudice of my own particular notions to be a little disturbed that a certain licence of thinking and speaking, as it seemed to me, was common amongst them; but the longer I have been here, and the more intercourse I have had with the younger ministers of the Unitarians, the more disposed I am to think and say that they have been subjected to a kind of training, a thoroughness of discipline, which entitles them to hold their own opinions. I hope I never shall be one of those men who, having got very tired himself, pronounces that there is no road beyond the point which he has reached, or who is disposed to lay his dead body across the track to prevent anybody else going any further. I have my own opinions, and they do not agree with the opinions of a great number of our young people in my own country and here; but I have too much reverence for the providence of God to wish to tie up the rising generation with my own girdle, or to strangle them with my own spiritual girders; and I purpose therefore, in full confidence that God has new light to bring into the world, to trust my son, and those with him, in the care of the same Being who has so prosperously and so mercifully ruled my own thoughts and fortunes. There are the same political and ecclesiastical squabbles amongst the Unitarian body with us, but there is a disposition to shake hands over them, or at least a disposition to consider that they are not fatal to our communion, but rather establish mutual respect and joint sympathy and compassion; and that, dear brethren, is all we can expect or hope for. I trust there will never be that sort of stupid and sleepy unity in the Unitarian body here or in America, which, from the absence of any two elements of policy in it, is reduced to that motionless point which must belong to a thing which finds nothing on earth to differ with it. I find that motion is a certain disturbance of equilibrium, and if you are to have that healthy swing so favourable to health and spirits, you must at least have some honest differences of opinion and some antagonism even within your own body. We have come to understand in America that the very thing we originally most heartily disliked and quarrelled with, and rather tried to trample out, has, in the providence of God, turned to our good. I wish to state a plain truth on the subject, and I declare to you that, if the kind of fenced and restricted Unitarianism which ruled in America forty years ago had been permitted to continue, we should have been almost without anything but a tombstone and a record at this hour. Dr. Channing, who, without knowing it, was one of the greatest transcendental radicals that Almighty God ever raised up, reanimated the Unitarian body in Boston and throughout America by inspiring us with the sense of an immanent God in connection with the human soul. It was that spiritual thought that revived and saved Unitarianism. And when Theodore Parker afterwards, in a rough, blacksmith fashion, tried to forge it into a more definite and semi-philosophical shape, I in my heart thought that if I had had a foot quick enough I should—not to put too fine a point upon it—have kicked him out of the theological world. Yet I lived long enough to see how, in the mighty shapings of the good providence of that great and glorious God, who is so much greater and more comprehensive than the utmost sweep of the human intellect and the utmost breadth of human charity, he was made to us an instrument of tremendous usefulness. We have loved and honoured and respected him without necessarily adopting his conclusions; for I wish distinctly to say here, in this presence, that while I yield to no man in liberty, or in allowance to human thought, and while I yield to no man in—I do not like to use such a word as “toleration,” it is an insult to the human race—but in absolute rejoicing in the liberty of every human soul, let its conclusions be what they will, I am not, and never expect to be, a doubter as to the supernatural, or the miraculous authority of the religion of Jesus Christ; and I believe with all my heart and soul that all you young ministers, and all you old ministers, and young and old laymen who wander from that point, just as far as you go from that direction will you have to replot, under many difficulties, your way, until you find yourself in the presence of, and bowing low before, him whom God has made His Son in the one sense, in which no other person is His son, the leader and head of the human race and of the Christian church. (Cheers.) With regard to the condition of things in America, we have to rejoice that over there they are a little more encouraging than that which is nevertheless very encouraging in your condition here. We have more elements of success and prosperity amongst us, more particularly within the last ten years. Ten years ago our condition was not more prosperous than yours is to-day, but I can assure you that we have plucked up courage, and adopted principles of organisation which we find compatible with absolute religious liberty. Our churches have enough liberty, and enough confidence in their liberty, to bear to creep into communion without fear that they will be quashed or destroyed by coming into union with other churches. And since congregational independence has become so safe, the people have consented to union, and our organisation has become a strong weapon for ecclesiastical purposes—(cheers)—I do not think that is a triumph which has been very successfully attained amongst the English Unitarians. During the last five years we have succeeded in organising ourselves in such a way that we have become a formidable progressive Christian denomination, ready to take the field against any odds, and to bear ourselves in such a manner as to claim the attention of the public. We do not intend to be modest any longer, but to be courageous in the cause of Christianity, of truth, and of enlightenment. (Cheers.) Therefore, we have taken on a noble confidence, and we expect to succeed, and mean to succeed. We are not willing to succeed in that very doubtful way which consists in supplanting the prejudices of people, and undermining their minds and hearts by some secret underground current, while they continue professing members of Calvinistic and orthodox Churches; but we mean to succeed in the amalgamation of our churches, the intercourse of our ministers, and the extension of our own proper body. (Cheers.) I do not approve of an exalted superiority to all external circumstances, and to all bodily and visible shapes. I am afraid I do not share that high spirituality of thought which is contented by knowing that our ideas are secretly held by those who profess sentiments of a contrary character. (Cheers.) I want to acknowledge and honour religious conviction. I confess that I have taken, myself, a most ardent and zealous interest in the attempt to persuade our people at home to organise themselves for the ordinary ecclesiastical victories, to achieve success externally; not, I trust, for the sake of external success, but for the sake of that internal administration by which that success is to be achieved. We must have done with all visionary notions—we must aim at positive and definite results. That is what we are aiming at in America, and just in proportion to our clearness of aim and distinctness of purpose has our success been. For five years past our success has exceeded anything that could be shown for fifty years before. Put five years against fifty, and you will not over estimate the success which is attending our organisation. We consider our laymen to be kings and priests; we require them to work with us, and to go before us if necessary; and most cordially do I say that the Unitarian laity of America have really saved the Unitarian clergy. (Cheers.) Our laity now are actuated by a new and strange fire, not that unholy "strange fire" we read of in the Scriptures, but strange because new. They are doing the work of Christians; they even lead at our prayer meetings, and they animate themselves with a noble enthusiasm in our cause. Is nothing but the fear of hell, or the hope of a sensuous heaven going to stir up enthusiasm on behalf of the human soul? Are we so low and degraded as not to consider the wants of human beings as human beings? There is little to be said for our latent capacity of being followers of Jesus Christ, if there be not in our system a stirring energy, and an enthusiasm in our disciples. If there be not a capacity for enthusiasm in Liberal Christianity as great as ever moved any system of Christianity that was ever known, then it is not the grace and truth of God which is in it. Brethren, I conclude this not wandering speech, for it has been woven on my heart-strings; I conclude my wandering—if they be wandering—thoughts, with expressing to you the heart-felt gratitude which He who knows my soul knows is eternally recorded there, for the hospitality and over-kind welcome, and genial sympathy and confidence I have received from one to the other end of England, and especially from our Unitarian churches. I beg to assure you that I return home anxious to be made, in the providence of God, a humble link which binds these twins of grace together. I hope I may prove a bond strong and flexible enough to be stretched across the broad Atlantic, to bind something very near your hearts to something very near their hearts; and then this body of Christian people may not unfitly represent that unity of feeling which I trust will not only exist between the severed parts of that Christian church, but between all the children of the common English mother, who has taught us the English tongue, and inspired us with the sympathy which beats in our hearts as in yours—the one heart of Saxon humanity. (Great applause.)

INTELLIGENCE.

BARNARD CASTLE.—On Sunday week, the services in the Broadgate Chapel were conducted by the Rev. W. Elliot, of Stockton-on-Tees. There was a large congregation in the evening. On Monday the ladies gave a treat to the choir within the ruins of Balio's Tower. Later in the evening the friends connected with the church met for the purpose of taking farewell of Dr. John Chalmers, who has closely identified himself with the cause in Barnard Castle during his residence there. Mr. Stephen Kirtley, in the name of the ladies, presented him with a neat pocket Bible, and an address. Mr. Chalmers, in his reply, was much affected; and he carries with him in leaving the well wishes of the congregation, and the inhabitants generally of Barnard Castle.

LONDON: CARTER-LANE MISSION.—The friends of this institution will be glad to learn that the various entertainments for which their bounty has been solicited have, during the last three or four weeks, come off with great satisfaction. The first was an excursion to Windsor Castle, by twenty-four poor women of the "Mothers' Meeting." This annual treat is the only occasion many of them have of getting into the country. After viewing the Castle, St. George's Chapel, &c., a large van was provided, and the whole party was driven to the Virginia Water. On returning to Windsor, all sat down to tea, and after a few words from Mr. Taylor they returned to London. The children next had their treat. Some ninety of these, too young to go to the school excursion, were entertained in the schoolroom on Friday, the 31st ult. On Sunday the 2nd instant, the half-yearly distribution of prizes took place. On this occasion the upper room was decorated with flowers, ferns, hops, and wheat. It was crowded in every part. After an address, Mr. Taylor distributed 45 prizes and two extra prizes to children who had not lost a mark during the whole year. At the conclusion of the service, the flowers were given, some to those children who had just missed the extra prize, and some sent to sick children at home or in the hospital. On Monday last, the annual excursion of the Sunday day and evening schools took place to Petersham. Upwards of 300 children and teachers were taken by boat, and all enjoyed the day.

SEATON BURN, NORTHUMBERLAND.—On Saturday evening last, the Rev. J. C. Street, in response to a request from friends, went out to Seaton Burn to preach. No Unitarian service had before been held in that place. The colliery schoolroom was granted for the occasion. Very short notice had been given, but the schoolroom was nearly filled by a most attentive audience. The subject of the sermon was "The first principles of Christianity." At the close many persons assembled together, and a general desire was expressed that further services should be held. A number of tracts was distributed.

TAUNTON.—On Wednesday, Aug. 5th, the scholars of the Mary-street Chapel had their annual treat in a field in Holway Lane, kindly lent by Mr. Godfrey. On arriving at the field several games were entered into, and continued till eight o'clock, when, after a fire-balloon had been sent up, all re-assembled and walked back to the schoolroom, where they were dismissed after a few kind words addressed to them by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, minister of the chapel. Refreshments were of course provided for the day.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A LIVERPOOL UNITARIAN.—Our rule is not to publish letters unless the writers sign their names.

ANDREW DAVIDSON.—Next week.

W. S.—We have forwarded your inquiry to the writer of the articles. Thanks for the interest you take in our efforts.

S. S.—Received.

CHURCH RATES AND THE IRISH CHURCH.

To the Editors.—Will you allow me to call the attention of your readers to the minute of the Executive Committee of the "Liberation Society," adopted at their first meeting after the Compulsory Church-rates Abolition Bill had received the royal assent, and which appears in your advertising columns?

That minute not merely recognises the value of the services rendered by the parliamentary friends of church-rate abolition, but does honour to those without whose aid the long struggle which has just ended in victory could never have been maintained. I refer to those who have conducted the agitation in the parishes. They have for many years formed the most numerous portion of my correspondents, and I have, therefore, had ample opportunities for becoming acquainted with their difficulties and their exertions. For devotedness and energy; for aptitude in learning the legal lessons which were needed to foil those whose war-cry was—"It's the law," and for patience in bearing the obloquy which was, sometimes, the least part of the price they had to pay for this championship of the right, they have been supporters of whom any organisation might well be proud, and to whom the Liberation Society owes a deep debt of gratitude. I suspect, too, that the gratitude exists in other and less partial circles; for I believe that in many a parish Episcopalians are now thankful to those who years ago abolished church rates, and made it necessary for them to resort to other, and better, modes of raising funds for the purposes of Divine worship.

It is a curious and suggestive fact that, just at the time when the society's remaining stock of church-rate publications may be destroyed, as having done their work, all the available space in its depository is required for pamphlets, tracts, leaflets, handbills, and placards, on the much greater question of the Irish Church. These have been carefully prepared for circulation among electors, prior to the general election, and, already, strong testimony has been borne to their adaptation to the circumstances of the hour, and to their utility as means of dispelling ignorance or fear among Liberal electors, and securing their votes in support of Mr. Gladstone's Irish Church policy. Every post brings information which shows the necessity for the wide distribution of such facts and arguments as these publications contain, and, although great pains are being taken, by advertising and otherwise, to make the fact of their existence known, your readers may feel assured that they can render valuable assistance by their personal efforts in the same direction. This is especially desirable in the counties, where the effect of the extended franchise will probably be more important than in the boroughs, and where, from the sparseness of the population, meetings and lectures can scarcely be arranged for.

There is, however, abundant room for an extension of this last-named agency, and the Executive Committee hope to have at their disposal a sufficient amount of lecturing power to enable them and their friends to turn to the best account the golden opportunity which will be afforded to them by the electoral excitement which will prevail in September and October next. But, for that purpose, they must be well backed by the activity of individuals throughout the kingdom, and, although both lecturers and audiences may be excused facing each other during this the great holiday month of the year, it is not too early to send up requests for lecturers from all places where their services will be valuable for electoral purposes.—Yours, very truly,

J. CARVELL WILLIAMS.

2, Serjeant's-inn, Fleet-street, E.C., August 10.

MILE END AND STEPNEY.

To the Editors.—I have delayed, perhaps too long, taking any official notice of the discussion between Mr. Spears and Mr. Waller, in reference to the circumstances connected with the division in the congregation at Mile End, in the hope that Mr. Waller might accept Mr. Spears's corrections, and that the matter might thus be quietly settled. It appears, however, from Mr. Waller's letter in your impression of Friday last, that this is not to be the case, and I feel that it is desirable that the real state of the question should be set before your readers.

The fact that a difference of opinion on some important points existed in the congregation was formally notified to the committee of the London District Society at one of their meetings, in April or May last. It appeared to the committee that a separation was desirable in the interests of both sections of the congregation, and a sub-committee was appointed to confer, not with a committee of Mr. Phillips's congregation, but with a committee representing one section of that congregation, the views of the other section having been already represented to the committee by one of the members then present. This conference took place at Stamford-street Chapel on the 12th of May. The sub-committee did not resolve that assistance should be rendered in securing a site, for the very sufficient reason that they had no power to pass any resolution, their duty being simply to report to the committee of the District Society the result of the conference, which they did at the next meeting, and the committee took action on their report. What was done afterwards by a member of the committee in respect to securing a site was not done in pursuance of such a resolution, nor in his capacity of a member of the committee, but simply in his private and individual capacity.

This statement of facts seems to me to dispose of some portions of Mr. Waller's letter in your paper of Friday. In reference to other points it may be remarked that the facts connected with the schism are disputed by the members of the other section of the congregation; that Mr. Wells has fully explained the misunderstanding which on one occasion caused the harmonium to be closed and the hymn-books to be out of the way when wanted; and that we have been informed of members who, instead of staying away from the services without ceasing to subscribe, attended at the meetings and spoke and voted, avowedly with the intention of complicating matters and obstructing the views of the other section, without having paid any subscription at all, or at any rate for some time previously. It is hardly possible again that the congregation at Mile End could ever have recognised the appeal as their own, when your intelligence and advertising columns make known the fact that service is still being held at 245, Mile End Road.

The only desire on the part of the committee of the London District Society has been that the separation, if inevitable, should be so carried out as to be productive of the least possible ill feeling; and while they have no intention, as they have seen no reason for it, of withdrawing from the congregation still meeting at 245, Mile End Road, any sympathy and assistance which they have up to this time afforded them, they will sincerely rejoice if the circumstances of the congregation at Stepney Green and the position they take up shall be such as may justify them in extending to them also such assistance as they may be able to give.—I am, dear sir, yours very truly,

SAM'L. DAVIDSON.

London, 11th August, 1868.

[We have received other letters upon this subject, but the above, we think, must end this correspondence.—Eds. U. H.]

THE COMING WEEK.

London: 245, MILE END ROAD.—On Sunday, morning and evening, Dr. S. C. Davidson will preach.

PENMAENMAWR: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Mr. C. T. Poynting.

Stand.—On Sunday, school sermons by the Rev. James Drummond, B.A., morning and evening.

Births.

ALLEN.—On the 11th inst., Mrs. P. Allen, of Sedgley Park, Prestwich, of a son.

AUSTIN.—On the 12th inst., at 1, Pembroke Terrace, Cirencester, the wife of the Rev. H. Austin of a daughter.

ROWLAND.—On the 10th inst., at 153, Warde-street, Hulme, Manchester, the wife of Mr. W. J. Rowland of a son.

Marriages.

CLARK-BELL.—On the 9th inst., at the Church of the Divine Unity, by the Rev. J. C. Street, Mr. Thomas Clark to Matilda Bell, of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

PEPPERILL-WENSELEY.—On the 10th inst., at Southport, by the Rev. Thos. Holland, B.A., Robert Pepperill, of Bridgewater, to Emma Wensley, of Southport.

SPACKMAN-HARRISON.—On the 5th inst., at St. Paul's Church, Northwich, by the Rev. D. Waller, Alfred W. C., youngest son of Mr. William Spackman, Belfast, to Jane, youngest daughter of the late Mr. John Harrison, of Northwich, Cheshire.

TALBOT-HARDING.—On the 11th inst., at the Old Meeting House, Birmingham, by the Rev. C. Clarke, F.L.S., John Arthur, second son of William Talbot, Esq., of Whitwell, near Kidderminster, to Flora, youngest daughter of William Sextus Harding, Esq., of Harborne Heath, near Birmingham.

Deaths.

ALLEN.—On the 11th inst., aged 41, Sophia Russell, wife of P. Allen, Esq., Sedgley Park, Prestwich, and eldest daughter of the late John Edward Taylor, Esq., of this city.

AYRTON.—On the 6th inst., at 123, Chatham-street, Liverpool, in his 76th year, Mr. Francis Ayrtton, sen.

CROSKEY.—On the 8th inst., at Liverpool, Sydney, the youngest son of John and Caroline Croskey, of Beddington, near Lough, Sussex.

EATON.—On the 6th inst., in her 63rd year, at her residence, Claremont, Shrewsbury, Emily, last surviving daughter of the late John Eaton, Esq., banker.

NASH.—On the 10th inst., at Royston, Herts, Martha, youngest daughter of the late William Nash, Esq., in her 87th year.

HOME PAGES.—A complete List of the Series, and also of the Tract Covers, with prices, &c., will be forwarded on application.—All orders must now be addressed to Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, Manchester.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing offices, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, August 14, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY

REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 382.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 21, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing.....	268
What is Saying on Church Matters.....	268
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XVII.....	269
Considerations suggested by the Census of the Report of the Ministers' Salaries Committee.....	269
Dr. Pusey and Conference.....	270
Lord Falkland.....	270
How to do it.....	271
A Pharise's Prayer.....	271
Sermons.....	272
Romanism in the Establishment.....	272
American Notes.....	272
Fire-side Readings: My Creed.....	273
Queen and Post-Laureate.....	273
The Jews' Use.....	273
Intelligence: Glasgow, Melbourne, Stourbridge.....	274
Correspondence.....	274
The Coming Week.....	274

CHARGE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ten lines and under.....	6d. a line.
After the first ten lines.....	5d. a line.
For 6 consecutive insertions, a reduction of 25 per cent.
" 13.....	50 per cent.
Half column.....	£1. 8s. 6d.
A whole column.....	£2. 10s. 6d.
A whole page.....	£3. 5s. 6d.

Post-office Orders to be made payable to Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester, to whom all orders and business communications should be addressed.

In sending Stamps for orders for short advertisements, parties must reckon the words for the first line, and eight words for each succeeding line. In cases where the amount sent is insufficient, we leave out unnecessary words to reduce the advertisement.

UNITARIAN NEW CHURCH,
ST. JOSEPH-STREET, HUNSLLET ROAD, LEEDS.
The OPENING SERVICES will be conducted on Wednesday Evening, August the 26th, at seven o'clock, by the Rev. C. WICKSTEED, B.A., of Liverpool.

And on Sunday, August the 30th, in the morning at eleven o'clock, by the Rev. T. R. ELLIOTT, minister of the place; and in the evening at 6.30, by the Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, of Manchester.

On Wednesday, August 26th, previous to the service, a PUBLIC TEA MEETING will be held in the New School-room, Tea at five o'clock. Tickets, 1s. each, to be had of Mr. J. Child, 20, Hunslet Road; Mrs. Tordoff, Hunslet Road; Mr. Lawson, Hunslet Road; and of the Chapel-keepers at Mill Hill and Holbeck.

N.B.—The above place of Worship will be conducted on the Free Pew System, and the Offertory will be taken at the close of each service.

HEAP BRIDGE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL.—On Sunday, the 30th August, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached in the above School by the Rev. H. E. DOWSON, B.A., of Gos Cross, when Collections will be made in aid of the School Funds.

Service to commence in the afternoon at three o'clock, and in the evening at half-past six.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.
DONATIONS.
Miss Yates, Liverpool, 2nd donation, 1868.....	£100 0 0
T. C. Clarke, London.....	1 1 0
C. F. Taggart.....	1 0 0
Mrs. T. Janson.....	2 0 0
Rev. T. S. Hunter.....	0 10 0
E. Smallfield, London.....	1 1 0

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH AND SCHOOLS, STEPNEY, LONDON.

By a Sub-committee of the London District Unitarian Society assembled in Conference with the Committee of the Rev. J. Phillips's Congregation, on Tuesday, 12th May, 1868, at Stamford-street Chapel, it was resolved that assistance should be rendered to that congregation in obtaining a Permanent Place of Worship at Stepney Green.

In pursuance of such resolution, and through the kind instrumentality of members of the Sub-committee, a suitable site has been obtained on which to erect a Church, School, &c., at Stepney Green.

It has been determined at present to erect a neat and substantial Schoolroom, capable of accommodating about 250 persons, and that religious worship shall be conducted therein till the funds are raised for the Church.

The Congregation, consisting for the most part of working men, appeal most earnestly to the Unitarian public to supplement their efforts to open the School free of debt.

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by Mr. GEORGE RITCHIE, 34, Bread-street, London, E.C.; Mr. F. M. WALLACE, 109, Turner's Road, Burdett Road, London, E.; and The East London Bank, Cornhill, E.C.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—SATURDAY TO MONDAY AT MATLOCK.—Every Saturday until the end of October, 1868, RETURN TICKETS, at the following low fares, will be issued from the under-mentioned Stations to MATLOCK BATH, by the Midland Company's New Locomotive, by any of the ordinary trains on Saturday, available for return by any train on the following Sunday or Monday.

Stations.	First Class.	Second Class.
Manchester.....	7s. 6d.	7s. 6d.
Guide Bridge.....	9s. 6d.	6s. 6d.
Stockport (Teviot Dale Station).....	8s. 6d.	6s. 6d.

In Manchester, Tickets will be issued at Cook's Excursion Office, 43, Piccadilly, and at the Midland Booking Office, London Road Station.

Derby, May, 1868. JAMES ALLPORT, General Manager.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

Full Information as to the Subjects in which Candidates for Admission to the above Institution will be examined may be obtained on application to the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A., George-street, Chestham Hill, Manchester.

Applications from Candidates must be sent in, as above, before 1st September next.

OWENS COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD receives into his house, as members of his family, Young Men studying at Owens College. Two vacancies for next session. Mr. Herford will be glad to procure any information that may be desired respecting the terms, classes, &c., of the College.

I, Kersal Terrace, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

WANTED, a Situation in a Unitarian firm, as CLERK, PORTER, or WAREHOUSEMAN. The Advertiser would take a small salary to begin with.—Address A., Herald office.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

WANTED, by a Young Lady, a Re-engagement as DAILY or RESIDENT GOVERNESS in a family. Acquirements: English, French, Music, with Rudiments of German and Drawing.—Address Y., 140, Southgate Road, London.

THE Friends of a Young Lady (aged 19) wish to procure for her a Situation as RESIDENT NURSERY GOVERNESS, or to Assist a Lady in Household Duties. She is very fond of children, and willing to make herself useful.—Address C., care of Mr. Thew, 1, Castle-street, Liverpool.

REQUIRED, by a Young Lady, aged 19, accustomed to tuition, a Situation as NURSERY GOVERNESS to two or three children. English, Music, Rudiments of French and Latin.—Address H. S., "The Briers," Tunbridge Road, Maidstone, Kent.

A YOUNG LADY, accustomed to tuition, desires an Engagement as RESIDENT GOVERNESS in school or family. She is capable of teaching good English, Music, Drawing, French, and German. Good references.—Address L. K., 30, Clarke-street, Ipswich.

WANTED, a Situation, as PREPARATORY GOVERNESS, English Teacher in a private School, or as an Assistant in a British School. Good references. Address L. PATTEN, Somerset Place, Bridport.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.—Principal: G. du G. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthy-situated establishment Boarders can receive first-class Instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemen's education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G., 63, G. Hilford-street, Russ 1-Square, London; or to Mr. A. G., 31, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

9, WELL CLOSE SQUARE, WHITTY.
THE Rev. JOHN and Mrs. OWEN wish to receive two or three Ladies or Gentlemen as BOARDERS during the season.

HIGH SCHOOL, 126, MUCH PARK-STREET, COVENTRY.—The Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., having taken extensive premises, is prepared to RECEIVE BOARDERS. Terms: 30 to 40 Guineas per annum. Full prospectus on application.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.—SCHOOL RE-OPENED on Tuesday, August 4th.—During the erection of new premises, address 13, Regent-street.

EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Principal.
NOTE.—At the recent B.A. Examination of the University of London, one of Mr. Smith's pupils has successfully passed. This makes the fourth of his private pupils who have been prepared by him especially for the B.A. degree, and in each instance with success.

THE Misses SMALLFIELD'S SCHOOL RE-OPENS on Monday, September 15th, 1868. 33, Kensington Gardens Square, Bayswater, London, W.

Just published, second edition, price 3d.

SUBSTANCE OF A LECTURE ON COMPULSORY EDUCATION. By THOS. AINSWORTH. Read at Cleator, February 14, 1868. London: Whitfield. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson.

PRESENT Condition of Unitarian and Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 3d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.
THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, Containing Tunes to ALL Martin's Hymns. London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6, Commercial-street; and of all music and book sellers.

Price Sixpence.
THE SOVEREIGNTY AND FATHERHOOD OF GOD: A Discourse preached during his visit to England, by the Rev. HENRY W. BELLOW, D.D., Minister of the First Congregational (Unitarian) Church, New York, and late President of the United States Sanitary Commission. Printed by request. London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

In three vols. cloth, price 7s. 6d.
THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES. Translated by SAMUEL SHARPE. Being a Revision of the Authorized English Old Testament. "Superior to any preceding revision of our English translation."—Athenaeum. E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME of the late GEORGE BROWN, Barrister-at-Law, Containing 17 sermons preached by him in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle. Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A., with Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 8s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Barnard Castle.

A SELECTION OF TRACTS from HOME PAGES, illustrative of Unitarian Christianity. Price 8d., made up into packets containing one each of the following Tracts:—

A Common-sense View of the Bible.
Are not we Christians also?
Trying to believe in God.
Servetus the Martyr.
Love to Christ—the true saving faith.
Two Schemes of Salvation.
Common-sense view about Man's Nature.
Saved, yet so as by fire; or the object of future punishment.
Christianity as Christ preached it.
Do Men Mean what they Say?
Christ our Saviour, not our Substitute.
What Christ has done for us.
Think for Yourself.
The Work of the Spirit in Man's Heart.
Not what Men believe, but what they are.
Repentance the true Atonement.
For 3s. a packet containing six of each of the above Tracts.

All orders must now be made direct to Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

NEW AMERICAN UNITARIAN

BOOKS.—The following New American Books, published by the American Unitarian Association, may be had for Cash from Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester:

Altar at Home, 2nd series.....	4 0
Peabody's Sunday-school Teacher.....	3 0
Clarke's Doctrines of Prayer.....	4 0
Ware's Formation of Character.....	2 6
New Discussion of the Trinity, by various authors.....	3 6
Clarke's Orthodoxy; its Truths and Errors.....	7 6
Selections from the Works of Channing.....	3 0
Hale's Service of Sorrow.....	8 6
Ware's Silent Pastor.....	3 6
Noyes' New Translation of the Hebrew Prophets.....	14 6
Ditto ditto of the Book of Psalms.....	7 0
Ditto ditto of the Book of Job.....	7 0
Ditto ditto of Ecclesiastes and the Canticles.....	7 0
Noyes' Theological Essays, by Stanley, Jowett, &c.....	7 6
Bartol's Word of the Spirit to the Church.....	2 6
Hedge's Reason in Religion.....	9 0
Furness's Domestic Worship.....	2 6
Ware's Home Life.....	6 6
Channing's complete Works, in 3 vols.....	15 0
Smith's Christian Lessons.....	6 0
Norton's Genuineness of the Gospels.....	7 6

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED AND OTHER NEEDLES.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE, 3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER. (Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse).

J. BALL, Proprietor.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS, FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS, 23 SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8, Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

WHITFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS, CASH AND DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITFIELD & SONS, VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS OF BEIDING and WEAVING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application. VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Some churches seem to have strange notions regarding the nature of Christian conversion. The Pall Mall tells us, that the other day a singular procession was seen passing through St. Petersburg. Twenty Jews with a white cross chalked on their backs were carried along under strong military escort. These wretched beings had been condemned to deportation to Siberia, but had prayed to be converted to the Orthodox Church, in order that the usual pardon might be granted them. Instead of being obliged to work in the mines, they are allowed to "settle" in Siberia as a reward for embracing the faith.

The Pope has hit on a grand device for sobering down his ever unruly subjects. In the year of the Council he intends to celebrate also the "Year of the Jubilees" (Anno Santo), which on account of his "absence" in 1850 did not come to pass. This would be no joke. All "worldly amusements," such as theatres, concerts, balls, &c., would be entirely at an end during that whole year. Whether this is likely to pacify the Romans, seems to us rather doubtful.

The invitations which Churchmen have recently given to Wesleyans to "come over and help them," do not seem likely to be responded to at present. At the Conference just held, a letter was read from the Rev. Thomas Jackson, a Methodist patriarch, eighty years of age, who has been twice President, and twenty years Divinity Professor in one of the Wesleyan Colleges, in which he said that forty years ago he published, by request, a pamphlet in which friendly relations were acknowledged towards the Establishment. But the principles then laid down are not applicable now. "The Church of England is not what Wesley understood it to be. Many of the clergy declare their abhorrence of the very name of Protestant, affect Popish forms, and preach Popish doctrines." And he concludes by declaring the amalgamation of Methodism and the Church of England to be "legally, morally, and religiously impossible."

The Essex Herald gives us this:

"The wife of a respectable innkeeper had driven over from Chelmsford with the laudable intention of 'standing godmother' to the infant child of an acquaintance, and fearing she was rather late, she at once hastened to the church, and found the clergyman and others waiting, but the child not yet arrived. As it would have been rather a novel precedent, to say the least, to christen a child in its absence, and the clergyman had been already kept considerably beyond his time, the godmother elect, whose acquaintance with her protégé seems to have been of the slightest, hastily undertook to fetch it, and running to the parents' house, caught up a baby which a female neighbour held in her arms near the door, and returned with it in triumph to the church. Everything being now in readiness, the ceremony was about to proceed, when the clergyman, looking earnestly at the baby, asked, 'Whose child is this?' 'Mr. So-and-So's,' replied the godmother elect. But what was the dismay of the party, and the congregation generally, when the shrill voice of a little nurse girl in the background was heard to exclaim, 'No, that I know it aint; you've got the wrong 'un.' As may be supposed, notwithstanding the solemn character of the occasion, a titter went round the church, and could scarcely be said to grow 'small by degrees and beautifully less' when the godmother having stated, in reply to the minister, that the child was a boy, the persistent nursemaid shouted out, 'No it aint; it's a girl.' Explanations now ensued; it was clearly shown that the godmother, whose intentions were doubtless of the very best, had in the hurry of the moment brought the wrong child; and the 'real Dromio' having been duly substituted, the ceremony was gone through without further mishap, and the party went on their way rejoicing."

Miss Brennen, described as "a talented young lady belonging to Gateshead," has been preaching at Jarrow for the last month to crowded congregations.

The expected gathering of the Provincial Synod of Dublin next month is to be merely formal after all. Lord Mayo has taken the advice of the law officers of the Crown as to its meeting without the Queen's Writ, and they have given their opinion that legal objections exist.

We have now practically done with Church Rates, as no suit in any court can be instituted to compel the payment of them.

From returns to the late Conference it appears that the total number of members of the Wesleyan body in Britain is 342,380, being an increase of 5,310 during the year, and there are 24,926 on trial for church-membership. Within the year 5,471 members have died. A long conversation at one of the meetings took place on the presence of the registrar at Wesleyan marriages. The subject was not finally decided upon, but a very strong feeling came out against all invidious distinctions between Episcopalians and Wesleyans. They lay claim, with increasing earnestness, to religious equality with the Church of England in baptisms, marriages, and the burial of their dead.

It is stated, on what seems good authority, though the Times can hardly believe it, that the Archbishop of Canterbury has made formal application that a Royal Mandate may be granted for the consecration of a new Bishop for Natal, and that the Duke of Buckingham has given his consent to the issue of such a mandate. On what grounds this can be justified it is hard to say. If Dr. Gray is what he claims to be—the Bishop of a Free Church, he can have no power to depose the Bishop of a State Church; and the Queen, acting through her ecclesiastical courts, has refused to acknowledge in him any such power. For Dr. Gray and his following to speak, as they do, of Dr. Colenso having been deposed by a "canonical trial," is mere trifling so long as there is no legal deposition; and the wonder is that the Primate and the Colonial Secretary can help seeing this.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In a letter to the Times, the Rev. Lord S. G. Osborne traces the declining influence of the pulpit to the cowardice of preachers, who, "to avoid what they know they ought to say but dare not say, wander away in their discourses from plainly speaking plain truths to everything and anything their ingenuity can extract from Scripture which may chance to attract, but is not likely to offend." In his opinion, "the great use of preaching is to uphold right, to denounce wrong; to offer hope, or warn against its loss, without respect of persons." But before people find fault with the clergy, he asks for a just consideration of their case. "Say that a London West-end preacher determines to be honest, or even that a Bishop in his pulpit does so, would the congregation bear to be told in plain words Bible truth as to adultery, gambling, utter devotion to money-making, the giving up mind and body to mere pleasure-hunting in any fields, however polluted by open sin?" He believes not; it would be set down as bad taste, and would not be endured. "There is many a pure heart which feels itself choked in utterance because, forsooth, the higher orders are not to be offended." Take a country parish, "you are expected to work at those poor poor; to preach down drunkenness, poaching, stealing of all kinds; and in the afternoons to speak plainly about the marriage vow and its frequent breach. You know full well that these poor poor have been starved on low wages, that they are dependent on the poor-rate for every interruption to their normal famishing state; you know they are so housed that all ordinary rule for the protection of modesty is a farce; that drunkenness to them is a dearly-bought forgetfulness, for a time, of the wretched monotony of a struggling life, and becoming a habit is their ruin. You know that their condition can truly be traced to the door of some of the other classes to whom you have to preach; that they, owners and occupiers, do reap the benefit of keeping these poor as they are. Now, dare one clergyman in a hundred—could he get a Bishop to do it for him?—preach Bible-truth as plainly about the duty of employer and landowner to their poor, as they expect him to preach to the poor the virtues which Heaven demands from them, and which will make them better earthly servants? If your great man or any of the lesser great ones should live a profligate life, should he be a known drunkard, would it be justifiable, even in your Bishop's eye, if you preached at his vices as he expects you to attack those of the poor?" S. G. O. concludes with adding his conviction "that if a Church which has failed of its purpose should be disestablished, his own is in danger," and with saying he "would like to see one year's honest campaign against high-class vice. He should then be less ashamed of the order to which he belongs, the profession he has not yet altogether quitted."

In the same letter, the Rev. Lord gives the following experience:

"When I was a young man I was doing duty in a parish which my sexton thought highly privileged.

'There was a deal of carriage company.' I had one morning preached on the proper religious training of children, the duty of keeping them out of the way of early vanity and temptation to early ungodliness. I had hardly got home to luncheon when a groom came with a hurried note from one of my flock, a lady of high rank and what was called great worldly influence—as kindhearted a creature of that sort as any I have ever known. She expressed her astonishment that, being on the friendly terms I was at — with all the family, I 'should have so pointedly preached at them.' I sent her the sermon, case and all, begged her to observe it had been preached a few Sundays before at D—t for the National School Society. She apologised the next day with all that good-humoured grace which so well became her, only adding—'But you know, I think—you ought to have seen, that what would not give offence at D—t would surely do so to us.'"

On S. G. O.'s letter, the English Independent asks: "Can it be the Established Church of England that is thus talked of by one of its own ministers? Why, this is one of the stock arguments against the voluntary principle, that it makes cowards of its ministers—that being dependent on their congregations they dare not tell them the truth—that the Dissenting pastor is always afraid of the deacon who hands him his salary quarterly, or of the rich giver in the big pew who subscribes largely—and that at least he spares his faults. Week by week the Broad Church papers of the Spectator school proclaim that connection with the State is the only method of maintaining the independence of the clergy, and Erastian Evangelicals everlastingly harp the same tune in a slightly different key. It has formed the staple of a series of papers contributed by the Vicar of Lowestoft this very month to one of the most Evangelical of Evangelical newspapers. But here we have an acknowledgment at the hands of an irrefragable witness that this fear of the people, this time-serving in the pulpit, is the common failing of a State-supported, State-patronised clergy, and that this is the reason of their dull and stupid sermons. Bishops with £5,000 a year, and richly-endowed clergymen who cannot be turned out of their livings, are the men 'who preach to please,' and not the humble Nonconformist minister who has nothing but his £20 a quarter to depend upon."

For those who cannot make up their minds to endure the present quality of preaching patiently, nor to depart when prayers are over, nor to stay away from church altogether, the Pall Mall says there remains but one alternative:

Their only resource is to agitate for the introduction into the ranks of the clergy of another class of men whose sole duty it shall be to preach, not merely good sermons, and short sermons, but long sermons, especially adapted to the wants of well-educated men and women. The present system of sermon-manufacturing is radically a blunder. It sacrifices the influential few to the unimportant many. All the letters of all the correspondents who write to the Times and all the other London papers, and all the instruction in theology, in rhetoric, and in speaking, which could be given to embryo clerics in all the colleges and seminaries of the country, could never confer upon the large majority of the clergy those gifts which nature has altogether denied them. It is as absurd to expect every clergyman to preach so as to satisfy the demands of the quick-witted man of the world of to-day, as it would be to expect every singer in the Sacred Harmonic Society to sing like Mario, or every fiddler in an operatic orchestra to play like Joachim. What an educated listener wants is not a string of platitudes, whether ten minutes, or half an hour, or three-quarters of an hour long. He wants a bond fide discussion of some subject or other, which may, at least, interest his understanding, even if it fails to convince his judgment or to affect his conduct. He wants to be brought into contact, so to say, with another man's mind, and to hear what is to be said, whether on general religious topics or on separate passages in the Bible, by a well-educated person, who gives a good deal of his time to theological and critical studies, with the special intention of handling them in public before audiences capable of understanding what he has to say to them. This is the only kind of preaching which will be permanently endurable to cultivated and sincere minds."

Sir George Bowyer has been called to account by Dr. Cumming for having said, "Dr. McNeile will find a declaration prefixed to the Catechism of the Scotch Church, that it is the duty of all civil governors to suppress by fire and sword all doctrines contrary to those of John Knox, and especially all Popery and Prelacy." Sir George is obliged to admit that in making the charge he had trusted to his memory, and that what he had taken for a declaration of the Catechism was in reality an Act of the Scotch Parliament. On which the Doctor says, "Sir George may denounce as want of courtesy every exposure of unfounded charges of this sort. But, as I never attribute to his Church what I cannot prove, I must entreat him not to charge the Protestant Church with doctrines she repudiates, and when, as in this instance, his allegation is shown to be unfounded, to do the gentlemanly act of expressing his regret and withdrawing a charge he owns he cannot substantiate."

In Sir Roundell Palmer's address, asking for reelection at Richmond, the Guardian understands him to intimate that he could not vote for Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions and Suspensory Bill, without knowing more definitely the provisions in regard to the endowments allowed to remain. This is the difficulty no doubt felt by many in regard to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. They are prepared for that step, but are still anxious that the Church should not be totally crippled in the new start she has to make.

Mr. J. J. Murphy, an Irish layman, writes to the same paper:

"I think there is every reason to believe that a measure based on Mr. Gladstone's Resolutions will soon become law. I shall rejoice at the separation of our Church from the State, for I believe its political position here in Ireland, though not in England, is purely mischievous; though I see no reason for depriving us of any great portion of our present endowments. Whether we are to be disendowed or not, however (and there is every reason to fear that we shall be), it is evident that our whole position must be changed and reorganised; and in all probability there will be large pecuniary demands on the members of our Church in order to enable her to continue her present career of usefulness."

Mr. Murphy considers that a central endowment fund will be needed, and if such a fund is properly set going, pledges himself to give a thousand pounds to it.

Dr. Monsell, still harping on the Cheshunt anniversary, like a good Churchman, says:

"I believe that to be in full communion with the Church of Christ (of which the Church of England is one of the purest and most perfect sections) would increase the holiness of the holiest Dissenter that ever lived or died. And therefore for Christ's sake, for their sake, and for our own (the whole Body and Head would feel the blessing), I desire most earnestly the return of our Nonconformist brethren to all the privileges of the Christian Church."

The Rev. H. R. Reynolds, President of Cheshunt College, with reference to the same occasion, writes:

"Unquestionably Dean Alford has struck the true note in his recent letter, when even granting a divergence of creed which as a fact does not exist, he maintains the right of the Christian conscience, and the wisdom of the course which he and others have pursued. There can be no sympathy, charity, nor brotherhood, unless these are based on the mutual recognition of conscience; they cease to exist if they become merely smothered attempts at proselytism; they cannot be bought at the expense or compromise of principle. Nothing but eventual disaster could result from a hollow truce. It is not imagined at Cheshunt College that any Anglican clergyman has consented for an hour to undervalue one distinctive principle of his Church by the course he has recently adopted, nor have we as Nonconformists repudiated one ecclesiastical principle by the heartfelt welcome we gave to those who differ from us."

To the Secretary of the Church Association Dr. Pusey writes:

"I do not express any opinion on the Council of the Church Association's declining to accept my challenge to institute proceedings against me, either simultaneously with, or as a substitute for, the proceedings against Mr. Bennett, until I shall see whether and in what way it shall re-form its charges against Mr. Bennett. If it shall now withdraw the charges founded upon language which Mr. Bennett has corrected, and shall set itself to dispute in a straightforward way our belief in the Real Objective Presence, the Eucharistic Sacrifice, and the adoration of our Lord truly present under the Eucharistic symbols, as not being tenable by clergymen of the Church of England, well. If not, notwithstanding its disclaimers, I cannot but think (and I believe that the majority of fair-minded Englishmen will think with me) that it hopes for some advantage from attacking one who wrote unguardedly, rather than one who has, in a long series of years, defended at length 'the way which you call heresy,' as being the teaching of the whole Catholic Church from the time of the Apostles, to which our own directed us. I deeply regret to see you wasting against us, who in all which you hold of faith (i.e., as many of you as are not Lutherans or Calvinists) are at one with you (for denials of faith are not faith), energies which had better have been directed to gain those who deny the Saviour, whom we both adore. But since you will have it so, I shall not need to be 'held to the offer' which I have made, but should at any time gladly defend against you primitive and Catholic truths, which, if the Church of England denied, she would forfeit her claim to be a portion of the Church of Christ.

But I shall not hold myself bound to any obiter dicta of judges, or to any censure of inaccurate statements which do not express my belief, or of ambiguous terms which may be condemned in any unsound sense which no one holds, or to any condemnation of anything which does not, in clear unmistakable terms, condemn my belief, but I should challenge you anew to assault it, not something else which you represent to be it."

In his pamphlet on "Free Discussion of Religious Topics," which we referred to a fortnight ago, Bishop Hinds thus truly describes the painful position in which not a few of the clergy of the Establishment are placed:

"The position of a clergyman becomes thus very embarrassing when he finds himself compelled, from conviction, to question and dissent from any doctrine of his Church. On the one hand, if he avows his convictions, the consequence may be that he and those dependent on him will be brought to destitution, and the very calling by which he earns his livelihood interdicted to him. On the other hand, if he suppresses his convictions, and goes on preaching and teaching what he doubts or disbelieves, or conforming to that which he holds to be wrong, with what a troubled conscience must he do so! Am I wrong in supposing that, of the two hard alternatives, some will choose the latter? And if he who does this cannot be acquitted of the charge of dishonesty, those who condemn him may well temper their sentence of condemnation with sympathy, when they reflect on the trying circumstances in which he is placed; and may well ask themselves, before they cast a stone at him, what they would do under the like circumstances? Even when a clergyman, by speaking out, has no pecuniary sacrifice to fear, or to whom the sacrifice is of minor moment, to face the taunts of the many, and the ban of the class to which he especially belongs, supposes more than ordinary courage, and he who braves this social martyrdom has given a pledge of being sincere, whether he is right or wrong in his convictions."

In an article on the Irish Church, the Daily News observes:

"The theory of Church Establishments is not now in question, except so far as some of the clergy seem bent upon showing that the tendency is not so much to consecrate authority by religion as to make religion the handmaid of faction, and to convert those who should be its teachers into eager political partisans and electioneering agents. Let these clergymen reflect that in so far as they succeed in connecting the Church with a particular party and policy, they associate its future with the fate of that party and policy. The Church of England has survived the uprise and the growth of Nonconformity. It has even been purified and strengthened by the healthful rivalry of the Free Churches; and its numerical losses have thus in one respect been its moral gain. But it will not survive an alliance, offensive and defensive, with Toryism, and a partnership with the professional politicians of the day. The evil spirit of privilege and ascendancy, hunted out of its retreat in rotten boroughs, must not be suffered to find a refuge in the sanctuary. Happily, there are clergymen in the Church of England, and many of them, who understand that the only politics which have any proper place in the pulpit are those which enforce the highest morality of nations, who feel that justice is the first duty of a Christian State, and that the best service that can be rendered to Protestantism in Ireland, is to withdraw it from a position which is in conflict with the elementary principles of social and neighbourly duty."

Referring to Mr. Maclorie's consecration, the Record says:

"In the proposal for obtaining a royal mandamus for the consecration of a rival to an undeposed Bishop, we only hear the knell of departing Church Establishments. If, in consequence of a legal condemnation of Dr. Colenso's pestilent heresies, the Duke of Buckingham were to recommend Her Majesty to revoke that unworthy Prelate's patent, we should rejoice. But as long as Dr. Colenso is legally Bishop of Natal, the consecration of a rival Bishop is an act of violence to law, and an affront to the Church of England as by law established."

Appropos of Dr. Monsell's charge that a clause was omitted from the Apostles' Creed in the service at Cheshunt, about which so much has been written, a correspondent writes:—

"Though the 'Apostles' Creed,' as it has been erroneously called, contains nothing inconsistent with Unitarianism—as in the Scriptural expression 'Holy Ghost,' the idea of personality is not necessarily involved, and the miraculous conception has nothing to do with the matter—it has not only been greatly interpolated, but in the earliest form known to us it has in one particular departed from the teaching of the Apostles. According to Mr. Justice Bailey, no fewer than eleven changes have been made since the year 600; and among these the introduction of the word 'Catholic.' The error referred to is the substitution of the word 'flesh' or 'body' for the word 'dead.' The Apostle Paul speaks of 'the resurrection of the dead,' not of the 'body' or the 'flesh.' On the contrary, he says, 'thou sowest not that body that shall be,' and 'flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God.' Besides, he speaks of a 'spiritual body' as distinguished from a 'natural body.' He also says 'we shall not all sleep; but we shall all be changed.' According to Dr. Campbell ἀναστροφῆς τῶν νεκρῶν denotes nothing more than 'the renewal of life. After speaking so plainly, is it not strange that he should have been so generally misunderstood, as he has been, both in ancient and modern times?"

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XVII.

SUBJECT: The proclamation of the only true God.

Read Deut. xxxii. 1—43. The song that Moses spake to the assembly of the Israelites. "My doctrine shall drop as the rain, and my speech shall distil as the dew, because I publish the name of Jehovah." The purpose of the poem is to ascribe greatness to God. Surrounded by false worshipers and idolatries more than we can have any notion of, and speaking to a people only half freed from superstition, the writer takes some pains to prove that the power of Jehovah is greater than that of all other gods. Jehovah it was who did the great things for the nation. "Jehovah alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him." They have angered God, he says, by sacrificing to gods whom they knew not, to new gods who came newly up, whom their fathers feared not. The gods of the heathen, he argues, cannot be compared with the Hebrew God, "for their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges." Where are these their gods? Let them rise up and help you, and be your protection. Then in words very similar to some, we find (Isaiah xlv.) Jehovah declares, "I, even I, am He, and there is no God beside Me. I kill, and I make alive. I wound, and I heal." In this poem, we meet with the primitive thought that God could feel jealousy against the gods of men. "When Jehovah saw it, He was angry, . . . and He said, . . . they make Me jealous with what is not God. They make Me angry with their vanities [or idols], and I will make them jealous with what is not a people. I will make them angry with a foolish nation."

Read also Isaiah xl. In a grand strain of poetry, the writer declares that the glory of Jehovah shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together. Messengers are to carry the word to the cities of Judah, "Behold your God." Take notice of the distinctly Unitarian spirit of this chapter. Who but Jehovah has done the mighty works of creation? "With whom took He counsel, or who instructed Him?" No burnt-offerings or sacrifices are great enough for Him; no likeness or image can be made of Him. It was He that stretched out the heavens as a curtain. He also is the God of men. He bringeth the princes to nought; He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might He increaseth strength.

CONSIDERATIONS SUGGESTED BY THE PERUSAL OF THE REPORT OF THE MINISTERS' SALARIES COMMITTEE.

[COMMUNICATED.]

THE retirement of the Provincial Assembly's Committee on ministers' salaries, and the publication of their last report in your columns, suggest a reflection on the prospects of the movement which they have so successfully initiated. By their withdrawal, the agitation of the matter, in the form of general argument, may be considered as brought to a close; and it must be confessed that little remained to be said on a question, the merits of which were so indisputable that nothing could with decency be urged on the opposite side. There are people, to be sure, who, if they do not openly argue, are ready enough to insinuate against any movement in favour of ministers' money. For their benefit, may I refer to an article by Dr. Caird, in the March number of Good Words, and extract the following pungent sentences:

"We have never been able to see why enforced poverty should guarantee clerical purity of motive. It is true that a clergyman should be disinterested and self-denied; but the disinterestedness and self-denial would be evidenced better in making a good and unselfish use of money, than in not having it at all. A lawyer or physician is as much bound to be self-denied as a clergyman, but does either of them for that reason ever refuse a fee? Or would either quietly listen to a rich tradesman who offered him beggarly payment for his skill and toil, on the plea that self-sacrifice is a fine thing, and that a Christian man should be above the love of money? There would be self-denial in spending my hard-earned emoluments, not on myself, but on works of charity and love; but there is no self-denial in letting a rich man keep the reward of my toil and thought in his own pocket. Why should the clerical be the only profession of which wealthy tradesmen and others get the benefit dog-cheap, buying the results of a costly, long-protracted education at a rate of emolument they would scorn to compound for in their own cases, nay, sometimes which they would blush to offer to a clerk? It is certainly a new kind of self-denial to swell out a millionaire's bank balance, or to enable him to buy more pictures for his walls, and more dresses for his wife and daughters."

In quoting these remarks it is difficult to suppress a feeling of vexation, that such misconceptions as those here noticed should ever stand in the way of a direct and practical treatment of the subject. Surely the bare fact stated, not for the first time, in the committee's report, that the average stipend of our own ministers does not exceed £120 a year, is argument enough. The Daily Telegraph has recently discussed the question as to the minimum upon which it is wise for a city clerk to undertake the expenses of married life, and concludes by fixing on the sum of £300 per annum. How must it fare with a clergyman salaried at less than £120? In point of fact, the minister who finds no way to improve upon such an engagement enters upon a life, the unhappy incidents of which it is well he should seldom foresee. What a godsend to him and his family an occasional little gift of a wealthy patron may some day be; how he and they shall rely on favours of the kind, for tiding over difficulties that constantly threaten; how large a place among his cares the mere escaping from insolvency shall come to occupy; all this, if known beforehand, might have an effect in reducing too much the number of aspirants to the clerical office. As it is, there can be no doubt at all but that much of the reluctance to enter the profession, which is exhibited by young men of good culture and generous feeling, arises from the almost servile under-character naturally induced by a life so circumstanced. The heart of the true minister will turn from the desire of luxury, but it is anything else than a deliverance from the cares of money to have the want of it forced upon him every day of his life. If it were desired that pecuniary considerations should have a constantly-felt weight on the mind of any class, no plan could be more effective than to raise them to a position of respectability, to supply them with means altogether inadequate to their wants, and then, by the courtesies of their office, to shut their mouths against all complaint.

There is something irritating in the repetition of such considerations. The necessity for augmenting the stipends of our ministers is thus evident, while no agency presents itself that may be relied on for effecting this object. The stipend is what it is, because it has all along been nobody's business. By general understanding it is not the minister's own business. The sentiment, even of a congregation like Ward Beecher's, while it permits the letting of seats by auction, and is gratified with the minister's presence and encouragement at the bidding, does not as yet allow him personally to transact the bargain. One of the principal parties being thus removed, his interests are virtually left to others. Now it is not too much to say that in practice this has been very often ignored; that no one has undertaken the trust expressly on the minister's behalf. This duty, I apprehend, should fall upon the vestry, or managing committee of the congregation. It is for them to appeal for whatever funds may be required; to inform the congregation of the state of affairs, as to which congregations are often entirely ignorant; to represent, in short, the demands upon the finances, as well as to economise the expenditure. This business is, and always has been, theirs, and they cannot well escape a share, and a large share, of whatever blame attaches to the neglect of the minister's interest in the temporalities.

But if, in the past, the vestry has done its part, as a representative body, in representing the stagnation of the church, let us hope it will not be found wanting in giving effect to the newly-awakened interest which the community everywhere takes in all that pertains to religion. The movement for increasing ministers' salaries is now general among the denominations. Its true significance lies in its being the undertaking of the laity themselves; and it only remains for the representatives of the laic body to carry out the common desire that this matter should no longer impede the progress of our churches. The benefit of such a movement will then appear, when the clergy learn to interpret it as a demand for a more efficient performance of their functions. It may be recommended on the score of justice to a profession, whose emoluments have not been raised in proportion to the general advance of incomes and prices. But the act of tardy justice is prompted by a motive of interest of which no one need be ashamed—the people's interest now at last beginning to be felt in the business of their pulpits.

Reverting to the labours which the committee have so long continued under the able and zealous direction of their convener, Mr. Shipman, and which have just been brought to a close, it remains to ask whether their retirement may not in the meantime leave the matter to silence and forgetfulness. In other denominations something more has been done than our committee could venture upon. This year one of the Methodist connexions has determined to raise the allowance to its preachers by a considerable amount; this year, too, the Congregational body has taken another step in the same direction; and this year the Free Church of Scotland has at length attained the minimum stipend, originally proposed, of £150. Among ourselves the matter now lies in the hands of the vestries and managing committees.

The case of congregations that are unable with their best exertions to raise a proper amount, is too frequent with us to be taken as a mere exception, and deserves more consideration than it has yet received at our hands. The chairman of the Salaries Committee, in his remarks on presenting the report, threw out the suggestion that an effort should be made for supplementing the funds of such congregations by a general subscription. So timely a hint, and from such a quarter, should not go for nothing. The successful issue of the agitation, however, depends not so much on any particular scheme, as on the determination of the people that something shall be done. The only danger is lest, after all, the matter should again be left to be nobody's business.

DR. PUSEY AND CONFERENCE.

In the Wesleyan Conference last week, a letter from Dr. Pusey was read which was remarkable enough to deserve a separate notice. One of the speakers regarded it as "a sign of the times," and complimentary to Methodism; to us it looks simply like a sign of distress. The object of the High Churchman's communication was to induce the Wesleyans to co-operate with the Oxford Tories in their attempt to defeat Mr. Coleridge's scheme for throwing open the honours and emoluments of the Universities to men of all creeds and denominations. The bill, he said, had been advocated as being "in the interest of the different Dissenting bodies," but, he added:

"I am convinced that it can be in the interest of no religious Dissenting body, of no Dissenting body at all, except the Socinians, and not even of them permanently; for Socinianism, being one of the most inconsistent of all religionisms, can maintain no long hold upon the human mind. It must go downwards towards Deism, even while it continues to call itself Christian, or to acknowledge some unreal Christ of its own invention."

By "Socinians," as there is no such body in England, of course the doctor means "Unitarians," and it is hardly courteous or gentlemanly in him, instead of using the appellation by which we are ordinarily known, to designate us by what, he must be well aware, is only an offensive nickname. We can afford, however, to smile at such pettiness as this; and as for his dictum about ours being "the most inconsistent of all religionisms," great as the Doctor may be thought by some, we cannot help feeling that he is scarcely so great as Newton, or Milton, or Locke, or many others who have found rest in that "religionism."

He is persuaded that the effect of Mr. Coleridge's Bill would be to legitimise a conflict between the old creeds of the Church and some form of irreligion:

"The body whose interests it would advance would be those whose indistinct belief is ever being precipitated downwards, who hardly know what they themselves believe, and who, under the name of progress, are ever retrograding to the hopeless scepticism before our Lord came. It is true that this (although a diminishing party among our young men) does exist among us; some have gone far further than this, to the denial of Christianity itself, of their own free agency, and of God."

"Supposing the present state of things to be changed," which it is sure to be, he suggests, "two alternative expedients." One is that subscription to the Nicene Creed (which would exclude "all who have lapsed into Socinianism") should be substituted for subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles; the other that new colleges should be founded out of the revenues of the old ones for "the different bodies who hold the faith in our Lord Jesus Christ." "Better," he says, "even to decide that Socinianism should be endowed than to allow that all colleges should become Socinian, sceptical, Deistic, Atheistic." On which the only remark we have to make is, that the Doctor does not seem to have much confidence in the prevalence of his own views.

The discussion which followed the reading of his letter was not of a kind to afford encouragement to his party, as will be seen by the remarks of one or two of the leaders in Conference. The Rev. W. Arthur could not wonder that Dr. Pusey was afraid to see the side which he took brought into unsupported conflict with Socinianism and Atheism. A remark made to him (Mr. A.) by a leading member of the Oxford party, had led him to believe that he saw exclusiveness to be a fine thing so long as it lasted, but that it could not last always.—Dr. Rigg felt that the letter was a proof that Methodism was recognised as a power in the State beyond what it had previously been, and likewise that the party of exclusiveness was in extremis. Dr. Pusey would not have come before Conference if he had not felt that the course taken by the Methodists was of much consequence to his party. He had not changed from what he was thirty years ago, but he had felt that the hour had struck when the Universities must be nationalised. The question was—How? Dr. Pusey had suggested two methods. One was that all should subscribe to the Nicene Creed; the other, that new colleges should be created for the denominations. He (Dr. R.) hoped they would be no party, directly or indirectly, to either scheme. He would not like to debar from University privileges even one who declined to subscribe to the Nicene Creed; neither would he care to endow colleges for all sects. He thought the Conference could not make a greater mistake than to commit itself either way. He would avoid all harsh words; he would recognise the Christianity of Dr. Pusey and his party notwithstanding its heresy, as they also recognised the Christianity of the Methodists notwithstanding what was thought to be their heresy; but they must abstain from all alliance with Dr. Pusey.—The general feeling of Conference seemed to be, that it was misfortune only which could have driven the High Church party to seek an alliance with the Wesleyans, and it was politely decided to abstain from dealing with the subject "at present."

LORD FALKLAND.

This celebrated man—one of those rare heroes whose good fortune it has been to be appreciated by all parties—is said by Aubrey to have been the first English Socinian. Dean Cressy, of Leighlin, and of Merton College, first brought Socinus's books into England, and from him Falkland borrowed them. A perusal of Falkland's forgotten works against Romanism—the Discourse of Infallibility, and the Reply to a Catholic Answer to that book, has confirmed my belief in his heterodoxy. He advances, indeed, no heterodox propositions; but one can hardly fail to see the conclusions to which he must have perceived that his position logically led, or to discern the cause of his occasional reserved modes of expression. And though he guards himself against being construed to be arguing in defence of Arianism, there can be little doubt what was passing in his mind when he wrote such sentences as the following:—

"Mark what Cardinal Perron (Contra Regem Jacobum, p. 633) confesseth, that an Arian will be desirous to have his cause tried by those authors we now have, which lived before the question arose; for there, saith he, will be found, 'The Son is the instrument of his Father,' 'The Father commanded the Son when things were to be made,' 'The Father and the Son are aliud et aliud,' which who should at this day dare say would—now the language of the Church is better examined—be accounted an Arian. . . . If you please to reconsider these authors seriously . . . you will confess it." (Reply.)

"All which reasons move me to think that the generality of Christians had not always been taught the contrary to Arius's doctrine; but some one way, some another, most neither." (Reply.)

His immediate purpose in these passages is to show that tradition is not so complete and accurate a guide as his adversary alleges. Falkland, we learn from Clarendon, "had read all the Greek and Latin Fathers, all the most allowed and authentic ecclesiastical writers, and all the councils, with wonderful care and observation." Both his books display great logical power and clearness of mind, as well as calm temper and a vein of pleasant humour.

He declares his unbiassed love of truth:

"This I must profess for myself, that since I considered anything in religion, and knew that there were several of them in the world, I never avoided to hear (at least) any man that was willing to persuade me by reason that any of them was the true . . . nay, rather have I laid wait to meet with such of all sorts as were most likely to say most on their side." (Reply.)

He says that he paid special attention to the arguments on the Romish side of the controversy lest his educational prejudices should bias him:

"I was never more ready to part with my clothes when they were torn, than with my opinions when they were confuted and appeared to me to be so." (Reply.)

"If the Church be divided, I have no way to know the true Church but by searching which agrees with Scripture and antiquity, and so judging accordingly." (Discourse.)

He vindicates free inquiry from the supposition of its being displeasing to God:

"It will not stand with the goodness of God to damn men for not following His will, if He hath assigned no infallible way to find it. . . . To them that follow their reason in the interpretation of the Scriptures, God will either give His grace or assistance to find the truth, or His pardon if they miss it." (Discourse.)

"Grant the Church to be infallible, yet he that denies it, and employs his reason to seek if it be true, should be in as good case as he that believeth it, and searcheth not at all the truth of the proposition he receives, . . . unless the Church be like a conjuror's circle that will keep a man from the devil though he came into it by chance." (Discourse.)

"Next to this certain and undoubted damning of all that are out of the Church of Rome—which averteth me from it—comes their putting all to death that are so, where they have power. . . . That averteth me yet more, for I do not believe all to be damned that they damn, but I conceive all to be killed that they kill." (Discourse.)

He writes with great calmness and fairness, and praises his answerer for doing likewise, remarking:

"I have ever thought that there should be as little bitterness in a treatise of controversy as in a love letter." (Reply.)

On the argument from majorities, he says:

"I am told that many more Christians disagree from your Church in this main question of her being a guide than she herself consists of; the Turks are more than both; and the Pagans more than all three; so that if they relate the state of the world aright, multitude must rather seem an argument against truth than for it."

Of Constantine:

"I believe his after-wits to have been his worse wits, in punishing, though not in condemning of Arius. . . . To have laboured in stopping of disputes on both parts, and tying them to Scripture phrases, and to speak of God only in the word of God, had been, at least in respect of unity, not a worse way than to have given an example of what after followed, I mean the frequent explication (with Anathema to boot) of inexplicable mysteries. Neither, then, would so many questions have so long troubled the Church, which, for their slightness, were unworthy even to exercise the schools."

CYRIL.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 21, 1868.

HOW TO DO IT.

IN our last week's number we could not help calling attention to the weakness and inefficiency of our Unitarian body. But we should feel that it would be very useless to call attention to our disease unless we had some remedy to propose for healing it. But having such remedy to propose, we think it right to make the patient desire to apply it, by making him first conscious of his disease. Yet we would even do more than make the patient feel that he is sick; we would lead him to discover why he is sick. We would not detain him in merely marking and bewailing the symptoms. We would take him down to the very root of the disease, that he may thoroughly understand what it is he needs to make him better.

It appears to us that the Unitarian church languishes very much from simple atrophy—defect of nourishment—for the soul. We have so long considered it our work to point out to the religious world at large that their methods are only "how not to do it;" to point out that the straw and the chaff of mediæval dogma which is held out to men as bread is not bread, and will not nourish the soul—that we have little time or energy—perhaps have lost the inclination—to fall back on the real grain that we profess to have winnowed from the refuse, feed upon it ourselves, and give it to others. We neglect the "how to do it." We do not saturate and inspire our souls enough with what we tell ourselves are our great positive ideas. We do not seem to realise the fact that no soul can live and grow strong upon mere negations. Men cannot be inspired to any great effort, any great self-sacrifice, any great desire of sympathy and co-operation, but by some great positive idea. There never was great work done in this world but was done by strength and zeal, inspired by some great idea. The zeal of orthodoxy is inspired by a great idea, though an erroneous one—that of saving men's souls from the terrible doom of everlasting fire, and giving them an entrance into everlasting bliss.

We have a great idea too, but, unlike the orthodox, we neglect to concentrate our mind upon it, to make it permeate our whole being, to be the very centre of our thoughts. Our great idea is to make man noble, beautiful in life and character, the image of God, his Father and Original. And we tell ourselves, directly or virtually, that we know, too, the means of accomplishing the end. It is by neglecting, ignoring the dogmas that do not feed the soul, and setting before it the real bread of life that will feed it. But what is that bread of life? It is the living image of that nobleness, that beauty of life which we would seek and give. It is this alone which awakens the love of goodness. And the only instrumentality which will make men noble is that which will awaken in them a burning love for nobleness. Now here is our mistake. We do not concentrate our thought sufficiently on this our great aim, and on this instrumentality for effecting it. We do not let these permeate through all our being, and fire us with the glow of zeal and ardour which we need. Go next Sunday into our churches and Sunday schools, and notice in how many—alas! how many—the attention of teacher and learners will be occupied, not with that living image of excellence which fires the soul with yearning love for it, and burning desire to attain it, but with matters which lie around such image, and are only like fringe or framework to it. Here we listen to a lesson on archæology, which, because it is connected with the Bible, is supposed to be religion. Good food for the intellect, but it does not feed or fire the soul. Here we hear profound inquiries into the foundation of morals and religious belief. Good food again for the intellect, but starving to the soul. Here the teacher gathers together the chaff and straw of the orthodox errors dealt out around us, and makes splendid bonfires of them. The intellect again is warmed and quickened into triumphant activity by the blaze, but the soul receives little or no warmth of inspiration to the noble life.

It would seem as if we had not sufficient faith in our own principles. We are ever for proving them rather than using them. We boast of the grand estate of spiritual truth we have, but instead of entering into it and enjoying it, we make ourselves policemen to it, going round and round it to apprehend errors—vagrants that we think may have a design upon it. And we are so eager in defending it from without that we take up our abode in the lodge.

We know that many good practical souls will be impatient of these remarks as too theoretical, and they are all for action. Well, they are among the most valuable men we have; and yet they, too, lose a large portion of their labour because it is misdirected. They are for doing, doing, ever making plans for remedying this evil and effecting this improvement. Alas, they are only laying a network of pipes to refresh a city with water, and neglecting the means by which the water may be turned into them when completed. Our plans do not work because we do not carry with them and give with them the divine afflatus, that affords the motive power which is wanted in and through all.

How shall we set about attaining what we need? There is one principle for our guidance. Whatever will not tend to inspire men, to make them in love with the nobler life and God, its perfection—that is not an essential to our greatest work of inspiring the human soul and changing it to goodness,—we may leave aside in order to concentrate our minds on what is essential—the living image of that which we would love and cause to be loved.

We believe that if all of us would for a year only leave all our straw burnings, and our circumambulations, and all our pottering about the mere framework of our religion, and concentrate our thoughts on the work of presenting to ourselves and others the living image or images of the beautiful life and character to which we would form men, we should soon gain such life, such zeal—we should so feel the real bond of our union that, instead of being one of the coldest, we should be one of the most ardent; instead of being one of the least coherent, we should be one of the most compact of religious bodies.

A PHARISEE'S PRAYER.

THOSE who wander about from place to place, and from chapel to church, come across a diversity of characters, hear a variety of sermons, and see various phases of religious life. I have sometimes thought that it would be well if some of our travelling friends would publish in this, or some newspaper, journal, or publication, their observed experiences. It would serve many good purposes; enlarge our knowledge of, and deepen our insight into, the religious faculty of man; render us more truly liberal towards those who differ from us, by revealing to us the good that underlies all forms of worship, and the truth that is at the bottom of every creed; and would furthermore intensify our own devotion and spirituality. Strange is it that amongst the observed phenomena of the universe, this class of them should so generally escape being placed on record. Religious (so-called) newspapers have their notes upon ministers, churches, towns, and peoples, by "Crayon," "Rambler," or other wandering knights of the pen; but never, or hardly ever, do we have any light thrown upon the life of the people—their inner religious life, so far as that may be discerned in their church or home. During my travels I have come across, amongst others, a preacher of the Wesleyan body—a big man; somewhere about six feet in height, and a "long way round." He looks big, and thinks he is so. To hear him preach, is to hear some one preach once. This much you are tolerably certain of hearing—something new. I will give you an instance. "Paul, a man of God—a man of patience—had his share of troubles; more than his share of them." Meaning, as I suppose, that he bore vicariously those of some other person. This same Paul, according to my reverend friend, was an extraordinary person; but would he sympathise with his biographer's reverence for Satan? Quoth the parson: "Paul was an enemy, not of man, nor of God, but, I say it with all reverence, of Satan."

Strange as the good man's sermons may be, and at times they are strange enough, his prayers are still more so. In truth, they are not prayers at all, but something colder—more heartless than his sermons. The difference is, the sermon is preached to the people to tell them what God has done and said; the prayer is preached to God to tell Him what is being done, and what He ought to do. This may seem extravagant language, but it is somewhat below the truth. Maybe some of these days, I will give a brief report of one of these "sermons to the Deity," for the special instruction of our ministers. Will they thank me?

But of all the escapades of my Wesleyan friend and of all his remarkable utterances, the most extraordinary and, to me, the most shockingly irreverent, was indulged in on Sunday, August 1st, 1868. The evening was very hot, the sermon dry and tedious. A few young men in the gallery, who deserve no small credit for staying through the sermon, left immediately after, without waiting for the singing of the last hymn. During the singing of that a few others left, making, with their heavy boots, a considerable noise. The good man waited till all was quiet, and thus opened his heart before God (I try to give accent, as well as words, correctly):

"We pray Thee, O Lord, to give us more grace than those young men and young women have. They, it seems, do not need the prayer and benediction; there may come a time when they will need it. They do not mind treating Thee and Thy house with irreverence (sic). We beseech Thee put a BETTER spirit in us; and give us, O Lord, better manners, for it is very bad manners to leave before the service is over."

I perceive by the "station list" that the reverent gentleman will speedily take his departure to another circle of friends. I hope they will be warned in time, and acquire good manners, or that they will introduce some liturgical service. Failing these, and, with these, they will need charity and patience.

SEPTIMUS SMITH.

SERMONS.

THE Times has lately been indulging on the defects of Sermons. The Guardian thinks it is not worth while to condense laboriously its complaints, but that it is enough to say that, according to this authority, sermons are long, or dull, or both; that they are below mediocrity in composition, and are too superficial and empty to be addressed to an educated boy of twelve; that they are either delivered in "a monotonous tone on B flat, or in a voice which has a definite key-note of A three sharps," whatever that may be. Such are some of the common faults of our Sunday discourses; and a remedy is proposed which may partly meet them. The preacher is not to read his sermon from a manuscript, or to repeat it from memory. He is to study his subject carefully, write down on small note-paper (there is nothing like precision in directions), the outline of what he wishes to say; and then to look his audience well in the face, and express his thoughts in language originated in the pulpit. In that case, we are led to expect, the clergyman may succeed about as well as a member of Parliament delivering his speech, or a barrister addressing a jury. The Guardian, however, does not seem to think so highly either of parliamentary or forensic eloquence as the Times. It is not a matter of obligation with most members of the Lower House to make every week two speeches, each of the length of at least twenty minutes. They are supposed to speak only when they have something which they really want to say; and even then they do not always dispense with previous verbal preparation. Not long before the close of the last session, an honourable member tried to read a written speech, and excused this attempt at a breach of the rules of the House on the ground that he had not had time enough to prepare himself more thoroughly. And yet, is the standard of ordinary parliamentary speeches high? Does an average member of the House of Commons attain that easy fluency which is the least that we expect in the pulpit? A rumour has reached us from the Reporters' Gallery that most of our representatives would be horrified if a word-for-word report of their speeches met the eyes of their constituents; that wearisome tautology is of frequent occurrence, that bad slips of grammar are not uncommon, and that there is a frequency of those interjectory "hum's" and "ha's," which are recognised by necessity more readily than by Lindley Murray. It may be answered that there have been hitherto, and will probably be hereafter, a great many men of only average ability in the House of Commons; and it may be replied that there have been hitherto, and will probably be hereafter, a great many men of only average ability among the clergy. . . . Sermons are dull for various reasons. Sometimes they are dull in consequence of the essential dullness of the preacher. In this case a perfect cure is hopeless; and we can only desire that the audience should share the dullness of the clergyman, and consent to be edified in a slow, heavy, matter-of-fact way. Occasionally, it cannot be denied, the preacher has not sufficient interest in his subject; when this happens, the treatment wanted is moral and spiritual rather than intellectual; and the patient for the most part must minister to himself. These are examples of dullness absolute: there is also a dullness relative, which arises from a want of congruity between the sermon and the audience. Perhaps, in a large town, the incumbent of a Peel district, who has never had a regular University education, is vexing with his platitudes the sons and daughters of a manufacturer who has taken care that his children should be thoroughly well taught; while a few miles off in the country a former "Fellow and Tutor" is trying in vain to produce by point, rather than by force, an impression on dull, rural minds. An acute critic has lately observed, that if Dr. Newman had preached in former days one of his famous St. Mary's sermons before a Scotch town congregation, they would very likely have thought the preacher a "silly body." A student who has been living in the past from Monday to Saturday, and is saturated with the spirit of the books he has been studying, may fail at first to interest a listener who, like a recent writer in the Times, wants "to hear the faith of Paul, the love and hopes of John, the ethics of James, translated into modern phrase and placed in contact with the difficulties, the doubts, and the troubles of the age we live in." But if a preacher is not essentially dull, this relative dullness can almost always be modified, and can sometimes be quite overcome. Just as some fluent declaimers become utterly dreary when they have been heard half a dozen times, so some clergymen, who are quite uninteresting to chance listeners, gain a powerful hold over the regular attendants at their church. The habitual seeker after striking sermons may thus often sentence himself to that infliction of dullness which he is particularly anxious to avoid. Interest and sympathy in a common subject may convert an otherwise ordinary address into a strong bond between speaker and hearer, and this interest and sympathy should be cultivated by laymen towards clergymen, as well as by clergymen towards laymen. The preacher must quit his own groove out of regard to his congregation; and the listener must remember that it may be hard for ordinary teachers of religion to make a real impression on his mind in the course of a single lesson.

ROMANISM IN THE ESTABLISHMENT.

CONSIDERING that the Anglican Church is, as the Bishop of Oxford assures us, "the great bulwark of Protestantism," it is strange to see how very near its teachings can approach, on some leading points, to those of Romanism. Truly it may often be said "Thin partitions do their bounds divide." A good illustration is furnished us in a little work just published, called "The Plain Guide," by the Rev. J. S. Pollock, of St. Alban's, Birmingham. It is evidently intended to produce an effect on the people, for though it consists of 104 pages, and is well printed on excellent paper, the price of it is only twopence. One or two extracts will be sufficient to show what High Church doctrine is.

The following, we suppose, means that a good Christian must shut his eyes, and go only where his priest thinks fit to lead him:

"You must not choose your own religion; but believe all the truth that God teaches in His Church."

To one who knows anything of ecclesiastical history the next seems a somewhat bold assertion, but a true Churchman, of course, is bound to receive it on trust:

"The clergy of the Church of England trace their descent from the apostles whom the Lord Jesus ordained."

This is what you do when you sign yourself with the sign of the cross, which you can do "by making a line with your right hand from your forehead to your breast, and another line from your left shoulder to your right:

"When we use it with the invocation—'In the name of the + Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen'—it forms a short creed, meaning that we believe in three persons in One God, and that all our hope is in Jesus, who died on the cross." It acts, too, as a kind of charm, being "a defence against temptation, especially against evil thoughts."

These are among the advantages derived from the Sacraments, of course "duly administered" by "Divinely-appointed ministers:

"By Holy Baptism we are washed from the sin of our birth, and born again of water and of the Spirit."

"Holy Communion feeds us with the Most Precious Body and Blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ."

"Confirmation gives us the Holy Ghost to strengthen us."

"Absolution cleanses us from sins committed after baptism."

"By the ministry of God's priests in the Visitation of the Sick, our souls are saved in their last agony from the assaults of the devil."

This is what you are to do "when you go to your confessor:

"Keep in mind that Jesus Christ has sent him to you—that your Saviour knows the depths of your heart, and will Himself come to be your Judge. Kneel down, and think that you are at the feet of Jesus on His cross, who is ready to save you, and to wash you from your sins in His own most precious blood. When you see that the priest is ready to hear you, say 'Father, give me your blessing, for I have sinned.' When the blessing has been given, you may begin thus:

"I confess to Almighty God, before all the company of heaven, and to thee, my father, that I have sinned very much in thought, word, and deed, through my fault, through my own fault, through my most grievous fault. [You may 'smile upon' your breast each time you say the word 'fault!'] Especially, I accuse myself that since my last confession, which was — ago, I have — &c."

On the Real Presence, this is what Mr. Pollock says:

"God only can make God present anywhere. Nothing but the mighty words of Jesus, spoken by His priests in the Consecration Prayer, can 'bring Christ down from above.'"

How any one who ever looks into his New Testament at all can imagine for a moment that such things as these form part of the simple Gospel of Christ, is to us an utter mystery.

AMERICAN NOTES.

It has long been remarked that old-fashioned Quakerism is dying out, and that the peculiarities of dress and culture are going with it. Small as their body is, the Society of Friends has had its full share of schisms, and another, it appears, is now rending the body in America. This time it is on the subject of dress. Their peculiar uniform has been for a good while almost their only remaining distinction, and now they seem likely to lose that. A Baptist journal informs us that the Western Quakers have of late fallen so far into the ways of the world's people as to dress like other men, and a Mr. Daniel McPherson, otherwise a minister in good standing, was not allowed to speak at the Philadelphia yearly meeting, because of the depraved and worldly style of his personal appearance. A stiff controversy has arisen in consequence. "Friends" very likely would open their eyes if any one were to tell them the "dress" feature in their usages was only another development of the old spirit of ritualism and form, belonging to the same class of errors as that against which George Fox and his brethren made their protest.

The New York Evening Post is responsible for the following "comparison of notes" between an eloquent and reverend lecturer and the somewhat reckless reporter who attempted to put his remarks in type. Here is what the reporter said:—"The lecture last evening was a brilliant affair. The hall ought to have been filled, but we are sorry to say only forty persons were present. The speaker commenced by saying that he was by birth an ecclesiastical deduction; gave a learned description of Satan, and his skill in sawing trees. Among other things, he stated that the Patriarch Abraham taught Cærops arithmetic. We trust the eloquent divine may be induced to repeat the lecture at some future day." Here is what the lecturer said upon this:—"Dear Sir—In a report of my lecture in your beautiful city, you have made some mistakes which I wish to correct. You make me speak of myself as by birth an 'ecclesiastical deduction.' What I said was, that I was not by birth, but only ecclesiastically, a Dutchman. Instead of speaking of Satan as 'sawing trees,' I spoke of him as 'sowing tares.' I said nothing of Abraham, but spoke of the Arabians as nomads of patriarchal simplicity. I said that Cærops was the founder of Athens, and instructed the people in agriculture."

The New York Independent gives the following statement as coming to it with the endorsement of a responsible name:

"A ruling elder, who is also the Sunday-school superintendent in the Strangers (O.S.) Presbyterian Church, Leavenworth Co., Kansas, is quite badly afflicted with colourphobia. A few Sabbaths since he drove the teacher of the ladies' Bible-class from her seat, because, forsooth, she brought a neatly dressed small quadroon girl with her to Sunday school. The class had unanimously chosen their teacher; so, when told to leave, she said she would like an expression from the class. Whereupon the elder, seemingly filled with holy indignation, said: 'You can't have it;' very emphatically adding, 'We won't have any discussion. We ain't a-going to have any niggers in the Sunday school.' An Oberlin graduate—a member of the same church—arose: but the elder repeated, peremptorily, 'We won't have any discussion here.' So there is one church in 'the green prairie West' in which the men as well as the women must 'keep silence'—at least on one subject. It is said that, though this church has received 500 dols. from the church extension fund, it still owes on its neat little house of worship, dedicated some two years since, several hundred dollars. If any friends in the East are desirous of promoting a purely white Gospel, they may know from this where they can safely invest. A check addressed to the order of the Sessions of Strangers (O.S.) Presbyterian Church, High Prairie, Kansas, Leavenworth City Post-office, would doubtless be gratefully acknowledged by the earnest labourers for white salvation."

The retirement is mentioned in the pastoral office of the Rev. Albert Barnes, so well known in this country by his "Biblical Notes." In the States his reputation rests more upon his theological opinions, which are said to have given a tone to the "New School" section of the Presbyterian Church respecting the nature and origin of sin, human freedom, the atonement, &c. He was much persecuted thirty years ago by the rigid followers of Calvin, but the more liberal views which he has represented have made great progress since then. Mr. Barnes has been both an assiduous preacher and a voluminous writer. His latest contribution to theology is lectures on the "Evidences of Christianity," in which he deals with some of the leading objections of modern scepticism.

The heat in the States has been capping ours. A Washington correspondent, who writes with the thermometer, in his shaded room, standing at 98, which is 5 or 6 degrees lower than in Albany and towns in Connecticut, says:

"One is reminded of that state of affairs of which Wendell Holmes speaks:

"I saw a roasting pullet sit Upon a baking egg;
I saw a cripple scorch his hand
Extinguishing his leg;
I saw nine geese upon the wing
Toward the frozen pole,
And every mother's gosling fell
Crisped to a crackling coal."

Mr. Beecher, lately alluding to the way in which people pray "Thy kingdom come," and then cry out against every mode that God uses to bring about the coming of that kingdom, illustrated it by the difference between American hospitality, as considered theoretically and practically. We pretend, he said, to be an asylum for the oppressed, and yet grumble at being overwhelmed by Germans and Irish; a land of freedom for the enthralled, and yet are unwilling to give the negro man the legitimate results of freedom; a schoolhouse for the ignorant of the earth, and yet grant no means of advancement beyond manual labour, and no adequate means even of legal protection to the industrious but unknowing Chinaman. Last winter a bill came up in the California Legislature to allow Chinamen to testify in certain cases in the civil and criminal courts, but the Assembly rejected the bill, and virtually gave free licence to all ruffians and robbers, provided they are white men, to inflict such outrages as they choose upon the poor Mongolian, without fear of legal penalty. This is but a continuation in spirit of the barbarous laws that but lately stood upon many of our State statute-books, excluding the negro from the witness box as against the white man. It took a terrible war to overturn that relic of savagism—for as an instrument of unlimited torture and oppression, it is nothing else. The fifty thousand Chinese in California are, taken all in all, if not the most intelligent, highly educated, and wealthy, certainly the most patient, quiet, law-abiding, industrious, peaceable, and honest set that California can show.

An American High Church newspaper, as a proof that the doctrine of baptismal regeneration is not new in the Anglican Church, quotes the following epitaph, which it says is from a stone in the churchyard at Whitmarsh, Pennsylvania, full of very ancient tombs:

"Two harmless babes, they only came and cried
In baptism to be washed from sin, and died."

Another journal, taking the Evangelical view, asks if we are really to go to tombstones for our theology, and retorts upon its contemporary with the following, which it has copied from an ancient tombstone in a village not twelve miles from the city of New York:

"Here lies an honest man at rest,
As ever God with His image blest;
A friend of age, a guide of youth,
Who honoured God and loved the truth:
If there's another world he lives in bliss,
If there is none he made the best of this."

GODALMING, SURREY.—The annual services were conducted in Meadow Chapel on the 9th inst., by the Rev. H. W. Ellis, of Hincley. In the evening there was a meeting of the members of the congregation and others interested in it, the Rev. H. W. Ellis presiding. The reports of the secretaries of the congregation, library, and Sunday school having been read, the meeting was addressed, chiefly on matters relating to the work of the congregation and its institutions, by the Chairman, Messrs. Isaac Ellis, J. Cook, T. Potter, sen., John Ellis, J. Colman, Edwin Ellis, T. Potter, jun., and by the Rev. W. J. Smyth, minister of the congregation. The speeches of the members of the congregation implied much religious earnestness on their part, and gave promise of increasing congregational activity.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

MY CREED.

ALICE CARY.

I HOLD that Christian grace abounds
Where charity is seen; that when
We climb to heaven, 'tis on the rounds
Of love to men.

I hold all else named piety
A selfish scheme, a vain pretence;
Where no centre is can there be Circumference?

This I moreover hold, and dare
Affirm where'er my rhyme may go;
Whatever things be sweet or fair,
Love makes them so:

Whether it be the lullabies
That charm to rest the nestling bird,
Or that sweet confidence of sighs,
And blushes without word:

Whether the dazzling and the flush
Of softly sumptuous garden bowers,
Or by some cabin door, a bush
Of ragged flowers.

'Tis not the wide phylactery,
Nor stubborn fast, nor stated prayers,
That makes us saints; we judge the tree
By what it bears.

And when a man can live apart
From work, on theologic trust,
I know the blood about his heart
Is dry as dust.

QUEEN AND POET-LAUREATE.

THE Gartenlaube, a paper published in Berlin, gives the following account of an interview which is said to have taken place between the Queen and Mr. Tennyson:

Queen Victoria is one of the most ardent admirers of Tennyson's poems, and shortly after "Enoch Arden" had appeared, she heard that Tennyson's enemies and enviers charged that poem with being immoral and a glorification of concubinage. She applied to an eminent clergyman, and learned from him that cases of bigamy, it was true, were not very rare, and those whom such a misfortune befell might, perhaps, be pardoned by the Lord on the day of judgment, for the mercy of the God of Heaven and Earth knew no bounds; but that it indicated an alarming confusion on the part of the poet, to represent in a kind of halo a man who tolerated the continuance of such a sinful relationship between man and woman. This was what Enoch Arden was doing. Instead of appearing before his wife in order to resume his position as her husband, he lay down and died. The Queen was not a little disquieted on hearing this. It was true she was well aware that some of the High Church dignitaries were not very favourably disposed towards Tennyson. But since her husband's death the Queen had accustomed herself more and more to attach a higher importance to the voice of her surroundings than to her own opinions, and thus she was, for a while, unable to decide whether "Enoch Arden" really deserved the harshness with which it had been criticised or not. Finally, she thought she had better consult somebody else on the subject, and she happened to apply to a person who censured Tennyson's poem with still greater severity, which was no wonder, considering that this person was no other than the lady who is commonly believed to be the subject of one of Tennyson's earlier poems, the celebrated "Lady Vere De Vere," the poetical rejection of an aristocratic coquette, who had cast her nets after the poet when he was still a very young man.

After this twofold condemnation of "Enoch Arden," whose wonderful success had meanwhile fallen in a thousand echoes upon her ears, the Queen thought it would be best for her to speak with the poet himself on the subject which he had treated of in "Enoch Arden." She therefore extended her drive along the seashore that very afternoon beyond its usual length, and ordered the coachman to drive further west. Osborne, the Queen's country seat on the Isle of Wight, is rather distant from the house of the poet, who lives likewise on that island; but no distance is very considerable there, and the roads all over the island are excellent. She soon after saw the poet's house, which lies in the middle of a small grove of pines and firs, peering forth between the verdure and foliage around it. The Queen was accompanied by two of her daughters. When she perceived Tennyson's form in his garden—his long hair and full beard caused her to recognise him at a glance—she entrusted her sketch-book and the metal box in which she gathered flowers and plants for her herbarium to the Princesses, and walked alone to the low garden gate, whither Tennyson had already hastened to meet her. She did not want to enter his house, but, walking along with him along the shore, she explained to him what disquieted her in regard to his poem, on the beauties of which she dwelt with that refined appreciation which is said to be peculiar to her. The two thus walked along the high western shore—at their feet the blue sea, upon which many white sails, like scattered blackthorn blossoms, were scudding, while the neighbouring hedges resounded with the merry chirping of the robin redbreast and the wren, and innumerable seagulls, screeching, circled round the steep cliffs. At last a bundle of faggots obstructing the pathway arrested their progress. A light-haired, blue-eyed girl of ten or twelve years was standing beside it, not a little frightened at not having shouldered her burden yet; for, like all the islanders, she knew the Queen, and to have obstructed the path to the graveyard, before the entrance of which lay her faggots, seemed the more unfortunate to her as the high road, owing to its muddy condition on that day, could not be used by pedestrians. Tennyson assisted the little girl in binding and shouldering her bundle of faggots; the Queen asked her name—it was Annie—and gave her a piece of money, and the happy girl went slowly on her way.

"A sweet-faced child," said the Queen, gazing after her, as she was tottering along with her heavy burden; and, then, as if to lead the poet back to the subject of their previous conversation, she added musingly, "It is about thus your Annie Lee must have looked,—I mean at the time when she was the playmate of Enoch and Philip, and, to reconcile them in their boyish quarrels, promised them both to become their little wife."

"A painter really might use that little girl as a model for that purpose, your Majesty," replied Tennyson. He had stood still, in order to allow the Queen to pass a puddle of rain water, and the august lady, calling to mind a beautiful passage in Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," on seeing the ripple on the surface of the puddle, recited the lines. "But that inscription is Enoch, is it not?" asked the Queen, looking in passing at the epitaph on one of the moss-grown tombstones, and then answering herself:—"Sure enough, it is Enoch. It is strange how important something which we formerly regarded with utter indifference suddenly appears to us. Thus, for instance, this name, which I have so often read on these stones, among so many others from the Old Testament, during my excursion on the island." And, then, looking around, she added, "It is a pity that your Philip had not likewise a namesake here; people would not be long in believing that the two heroes of your poem are buried here, and they would, maybe, lay the scene of your whole poem in the shade of these walnut trees. But, tell me, Mr. Tennyson, what have you to reply to all those objections which I mentioned to you before?"

"Very little, your Majesty."

"What?"

"I should be sorry, your Majesty, if the little girl yonder had to bear the stain of illegitimate descent."

"What little girl?"

"The little girl disappearing just now behind the hawthorn hedge, your Majesty; I mean the child carrying the bundle of faggots."

"And what has that girl to do with your poem?"

"A great deal; for if the Bishop of N. had had his way, little Annie, yonder, would be considered a child born in illicit wedlock."

The Queen had stood still.

"You do not mean to say, Mr. Tennyson," she replied, "that on our little island here an event such as you related in your 'Enoch Arden' has really happened?"

And as Tennyson was silent for a moment, she continued, "Oh, I know you do not like to answer such questions. But tell me now; did Enoch Arden live here? and is he perhaps even buried underneath that tombstone?"

"Your Majesty," said Tennyson, "there occur among the lowly and poor many traits of heroism, for which historians might envy the quiet observer of the people. Happy he who can contemplate and comprehend such traits with an unbiased mind; happy he who is enabled to relate them in his poems without spoiling their simple originality too much; happy above all he of whom poets can tell such traits. His memory disseminates heavenly seed."

The Queen had walked across the lawn to the tombstone and laid her hand on its moss-grown edge. She stood there a long while in silence, her eyes fixed on the spot where Enoch had found his last resting place. At length she drew herself up, and, turning to go home, she said, "God bless him! He did right after all."

THE JEW'S USE.

THE Guardian, in two recent articles, has had some curious speculations, apropos of Mr. Disraeli, regarding the peculiarities of the Hebrew race. It says it is a very common observation made about the Jews, that they add nothing to the productive energy of those countries to which they belong. They are great in all the tactics of the counter, in the machinery of barter, in the diplomacy of retail; furnish them with material and they will dispose of it to the best advantage; they can wait for custom, they are media for the productions of others to pass through, and they are successful expositors of articles and goods, but they create nothing; they contribute nothing to the work of production in a nation. This is no accidental feature of the Jew, it accompanies him everywhere, it is something inherent in the stock. Who hears of a Jewish farmer? of a Jewish cattle-breeder? of a Jewish converter of any raw produce to use?

He is at any rate a great rarity. On the other hand, they line whole cities with their shops and bazaars. Nor is this to charge the Jew with uselessness; he has his use and his place in the economy of the community; but this is his use and his place. We observe an analogous feature in the character of the Jew as a politician and statesman; the observation of which is of service, as showing how the same characteristic can pass through different circumstantial media, can appear under different forms, and perform different functions.

What does everybody say, then, of Mr. Disraeli? That he is a tactician, an admirable tactician, an unrivalled tactician. His patience, his dexterity, his adroitness, his disputative art, his skill in dealing with sections and groups on the arena of the House—in a word, his management, is in everybody's mouth; that is to say, he is great in one branch of parliamentary government. But a nation cannot live upon tactics; it wants substantial food as well; it wants the origination of schemes and measures for the actual development of its resources, for the growth of its commercial limbs, for the fertilisation of its whole area. It wants its stomach filled with proper nourishment. What does the most dexterous set of moves on the chess-board of the House of Commons, with a number of benches of men looking on, and saying to themselves "How fine, what play, what fence!"—what does all this do to feed the nation? Nothing. It may be a part of parliamentary government, but it is the unproductive part of it, not the productive. Tactics are what Lord Bacon calls final causes in science—they are barren virgins, they have no offspring.

These being, then, the two great branches of parliamentary government, what has the Premier, so successful in one of them, got to show in the other? Have the brains of Mr. Disraeli, fertile as they are in chess moves, generated one single great or useful measure of finance, one single facilitation to trade, one single expansion of the commercial area of the country? Has he added one single spring to the activities, one single outlet to the resources, of the nation? In a word, he has been thirty years, and has he one single productive work to show? Whenever he has been in office he has simply followed Mr. Gladstone's lead on this ground, without attempting anything of his own. He has shown the good sense not to interfere with what has been done, but he has inaugurated and originated nothing. Is this accidental? It is not. It is a feature of the race. The Jew adds nothing to the productive energy of the country to which he belongs. He has his functions, his activities, his aptitudes; he is the medium in trade, the tactician in Parliament, but no inventor, no fertiliser, no provider of fresh matter, no discoverer of new resources. In that fountain and well-spring of creative energy—that process which forms the vital function of a prosperous, a flourishing, and a growing nation, he takes no part.

Mr. Disraeli has the good sense not to be ashamed of his race, and it would be unpardonable in anybody to taunt him with it; but his political life still bears the stamp of his race. It is impossible that a statesman can devote a whole existence to tactics, can fasten his eye for ever upon the moves and transpositions of a narrow arena, and can come out a perfect strategical conjuror, without having violently suffered from the process. He has been excluding himself all the time from the field of solid originality and production. This side of the statesman has simply withered for want of exercise. "Withered" do we say,—has he ever had it? Has he got this sort of work in him? We do not believe that he has. He is a master of finesse, he can arrange party resources, he can set out his wares admirably, his scales can weigh a man to a nicety, he has the inherent patience of his race in waiting for the best bargain; but he has not the stuff of an English statesman in him. The manager, the bartender, the retailer of political life is perfect; but the producer of solid material for the benefit of the country, the invigorator of its commercial blood, the originator of fertile and fruitful legislation, never existed.

INTELLIGENCE.

GLASGOW.—The annual excursion of the Sunday school took place last Monday. The scholars, accompanied by their teachers, parents, and friends, numbering in all nearly 200, left Glasgow by steamer in the morning and proceeded to Inellan. Among those present were Rev. H. W. Crosskey, minister of the congregation, Mrs. Crosskey, Rev. John Russell, and others. After landing and spending some time in a pleasant hill-side ramble, the party assembled in a field on the sea shore for games; tea followed, after which prizes were distributed to successful competitors, and all safely returned home.

MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.—We have received the annual report of the Unitarian church at this place, dated January 31, 1868. The average attendance at the morning services is 100, and in the evening 50. Several persons during the year have left the colony, as, for instance, Mr. Chas. Heape and Mr. G. G. Ellis, and the church has consequently suffered loss. In the early part of the year an exchange of pulpits was effected, the Melbourne pulpit being occupied one month by the Rev. J. C. Woods, of Adelaide, and another month by the Rev. J. Pillars, of Sydney, while the Rev. Henry Higginson for two months occupied the pulpit at Adelaide. The committee suggests that these exchanges should be for at least a year, and mention as evincing a strong feeling of vital practical Christianity in the congregation at Melbourne, that about £40 has been collected for charitable purposes. The gross income was about £420, but as there is a balance of about £50 against the congregation, the committee urge the members to save them the necessity of a personal solicitation by making their subscriptions voluntary, and conclude by saying:—"We do not pretend to be a wealthy congregation, nor do we seek to make our church a great financial success; but, while we believe in the truth of the doctrines we profess, and hold that without making any great mark amongst the churches of our adopted land, we are still beneficially influencing, and tending to liberalise, more popular teachings, it is our first duty to exert ourselves vigorously, to maintain our minister in an independent position, and our church free from the deadening incubus of debt."

STOURBRIDGE.—On Sunday week, the eighty-third annual sermon, in aid of the Wollaston-road Schools, was preached by the Rev. H. W. Crosskey, of Glasgow, from Luke ii. 52. The collection amounted to £40. 10s. 10d.—On the evening of the 9th, the members of the choir and some visitors were entertained at the schools, when votes of thanks were accorded to the Rev. H. W. Crosskey for his services on the previous day, and to sundry other persons.—On the 10th, the children had their annual treat at Wollescote, the residence of T. H. Pargeter, Esq., who kindly placed his grounds at the disposal of the schools for the day. At half-past four 217 children sat down to tea. When the children were marshalled for their homeward journey, Mr. Akroyd tendered the cordial thanks of the schools and friends to Mr. and Mrs. Pargeter for their very kind and hospitable attentions. Mr. Pargeter acknowledged the compliment in some suitable remarks.—The "Meeting of Ministers" (established in 1782) was held in the Presbyterian Chapel on the 11th, at half-past eleven o'clock a.m. The services were introduced by the Rev. R. H. Cotton, of Birmingham; and the Rev. H. W. Crosskey preached, taking as his text Acts x. 15—"What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." After service a meeting for business was held. In the afternoon the ministers were entertained at dinner by Mr. and Mrs. Akroyd, of Parkfield. The "meeting" was attended by the following ministers:—Revs. S. Bache and J. Wilson, Birmingham; M. Gibson, Dudley; H. McKean, Oldbury; J. Gordon, Evesham; H. Eachus, Coseley; W. Cochrane, Cradley; J. Dean, Tamworth; D. Maginnis, Stourbridge; A. Gordon, Liverpool; W. Robinson, Crewkerne; and H. W. Crosskey, Glasgow.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. D.—H. F.—Received.

No anonymous letters inserted; the writer of ever letter must append his name for publication.

All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors.

THE NEW CATHOLIC CHURCH.

To the Editors.—Cordially sympathising with the reviewer of the pamphlet under this title, whose article appeared in your number of 31st July, I would yet, with your permission, present a few thoughts in qualification of his criticism, and endeavour to set the question of a formal organisation, embodying the principles of the pamphlet, in a less unfavourable aspect than that in which he has placed it.

In his definition of the true church, if I correctly apprehend his meaning, I find myself perfectly at one with him. This church exists now, and has existed, and will continue through all time. The faithful of every clime, colour, and condition are its members. Whoever loveth God and worketh righteousness is in it, and of it; nor does it matter what his function, or what the remainder of his creed. That all life is sacred, and every true work a service of God, and every worker who dedicates his life and labour to the Father, a very priest in the temple whose roof is "grand immensity," the authors of this pamphlet, I apprehend, would join your reviewer in cordially affirming. There is no opposition between him and them in any of the general ideas he has expressed in this relation. But he would seem to be contented with the affirmation of the viewless, universal, spiritual church, whose members are scattered through all sects and societies of mankind; while they desire to seize the principles which are common to all religious sects, and embody them in a visible organisation, into which every member of the former may enter, and from which no one who professes these principles shall be excluded, except by his own will, ignorance, prejudice, or other internal limiting affection.

Mr. Hume-Rothery considers this "an impracticable dream." The impracticable dreams of one age, however, have, ere now, become the common realities of its successor; and although this dream may not be realised to perfection in our time, a beginning may be made which shall, at least, point the way to that consummation. Mr. Hume-Rothery will probably acknowledge that there is no recognised "church," or sect, or party, in our land which does not add more or less to the cardinal principles affirmed in this pamphlet; and that such additions constitute the barriers which exclude those whom its authors would include, and who may be said to be at present without any religious home; while, in virtue of affirming the very sum of Christian doctrine—the love of God and neighbour, on which "hang all the law and the prophets," as declared by the Master himself, whom all the sects profess to revere and follow—they would not necessarily exclude any votary of the more complex creeds. Is not a church based on such universal principles a want of the age? Grant that it would appear "only a new sect" (for I take it its projectors would scarcely admit it to "be" such), what then? It would hold out the right hand of fellowship to all the sects, and show them with unquerable logic, that their freedom to hold other tenets in addition to its simple principles being respected, they might, with perfect consistency, enter its broad fold, and maintain unity of spirit with variety of thought, realising at last "on earth peace and goodwill." What is to hinder all who have attained Mr. Hume-Rothery's own idea of the church, to form themselves into an organisation for the propagation of that idea, and all the grand issues involved in it? Would not this, in fact, be pretty much what the authors of this pamphlet contemplate—a church for the more speedy realisation of the church?

The verbal inconsistency which he points out in the sentences he quotes, finds its resolution in the different senses in which the word "church" is used; and this need not be further referred to. The "tremendous tyranny" which he finds in this New Catholic Church is surely a "bogy" of his own imagination. To give any support to it at all, he is forced to impute a "power of the keys," which I believe the authors of the pamphlet would be the first to repudiate, and for which there is not, to my observation, any ground in their production.

Other remarks occur to me as desirable to be uttered, but I have already trespassed enough upon your space, and am therefore constrained to reserve them.

How far the Unitarian church already fulfils the conditions and requirements of the New Catholic Church, and how soon and to what extent the purification and expansion going on within it will realise the "impracticable dream" of "Amicus," are topics which I should like to see treated. Will any of your readers "condescend" upon them, as the Scotch say, and oblige yours faithfully,

ANDREW DAVIDSON.

Liverpool, Aug. 10, 1868.

THE COMING WEEK.

Leeds: HUNSLLET.—On Wednesday next, opening services of the new Church. Tea party at five o'clock. Service by the Rev. C. Wicksteed, B.A., at seven o'clock.

Birth.

PARRY.—On the 14th inst., Mrs. Pierce Parry, of East-street, Bury, of a daughter.

Marriages.

ELLIS—LAIDLER.—On the 12th inst., at the Church of the Divine Unity, by the Rev. J. C. Street, Mr. Jonathan Barker Ellis, merchant, to Alice, youngest daughter of William Laidler, Esq., of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

GOODMAN—LOWE.—On the 16th inst., at the Great Meeting House, Coventry, by the Rev. G. Heavilside, B.A., Mr. Theophilus Goodman to Miss Jane Lowe, both of Coventry.

SMITH—TWOOT.—On the 15th inst., at Horsmonden, Kent, by the Rev. Hugh Smith Marriot, M.A., Albert Smith, Esq., elder son of Wm. Smith, Esq., of Camden House, Chatham, to Alice Tyler, second daughter of Richard Tyler Twoot, Esq., of Hayman's Hill, Horsmonden.—No cards.

SMITH—KERFOOT.—On the 17th inst., at the Old Chapel, Dukinfield, by the Rev. John Page Hopps, Mr. William Smith, of Town Lane, to Jane, second daughter of Mr. Edward Kerfoot, of Cheetham Hill Road, Dukinfield.

Death.

TATE.—On the 18th inst., aged 36 years, at his residence, 31, Clarence-street, Cheetham Hill Road, Manchester, Mr. Edward Booth Tate, only son of Mr. Councillor Tate, Salford.

NEW GOODS FOR THE SUMMER SEASON.

WILLIAM MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also Bannockburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits. FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at 11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED.

We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, clean-flavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY, WINE MERCHANTS, 26, MARKET-STREET, MANCHESTER;

And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apeley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing offices, No. 8, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, August 21, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 383.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 28, 1868.

PRICE 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing.....	276
What is saying on Church Matters.....	277
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XVIII.....	278
Something wanted in our Worship.—I.....	279
Dr. Bellows on the Condition of our Churches.....	279
Wesley's Foundry and Whitfield's Tabernacle.....	279
American Notes.....	280
The late John Wilson.....	280
The late Thomas Emery.....	281
Fire-side Readings: My Blessing.....	281
The Window that made Faces ugly.—Part VIII.....	281
A Plea for Short Words.....	282
Superstition in the Orkneys.....	282
Intelligence: Choppington, Clerkenwell, East Cheshire.....	282
Sunday-school Union.....	282
Correspondence.....	282
The Coming Week.....	282

CHARGE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ten lines and under.....	6d. a line.
After the first ten lines.....	5d. a line.
For 6 consecutive insertions, a reduction of 25 per cent.....
Half column.....	50 per cent.
A whole column.....	£1. 6s. 0d.
A whole page.....	£2. 10s. 0d.
A whole page.....	£5. 5s. 0d.

In sending Stamps for orders for short advertisements, parties must reckon five words for the first line, and eight words for each succeeding line. In cases where the amount sent is insufficient, we leave out unnecessary words to reduce the advertisement.

HEAP BRIDGE UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL.—On Sunday, the 30th August, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached in the above School by the Rev. H. E. DOWN, B.A., of Gas Cross, when Collections will be made in aid of the School Funds.

Service to commence in the afternoon at three o'clock, and in the evening at half-past six.

ROCHDALE, CLOVER-STREET.—On Sunday, September 6th, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached by the Rev. F. BISHOP, of Chesterfield. Service to commence in the afternoon at half-past two, and in the evening at half-past six o'clock.

A collection will be made at the close of each service in aid of the Sunday School.

OPENING OF A NEW ORGAN AT THE UNITARIAN CHAPEL, NEWCHURCH.—On Sunday, September 6th, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached by the Rev. G. H. WELLS, M.A., of Gorton. Service to commence in the afternoon at half-past two, and in the evening at six o'clock.

Colonel MUNN, J.P., has kindly consented to preside at the Organ, when a selection of Sacred Music from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, &c., will be sung by the choir of St. James's Church, Waterfoot.

Collections will be made in aid of the Organ Fund.

The Organ is built by Edward Wadsworth, Esq., of Manchester, and contains two full rows of keys, nine stops in the grand organ, and six in the swell pedal organ, C.C.C. to F, grand bourdon and grand octave bass, four couplers, and four composition pedals.

Tea will be provided in the Schoolroom, for the convenience of friends from a distance. Tickets, sixpence each.

UNIVERSITY HALL, GORDON SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

PRINCIPAL: E. S. BEESLY, M.A., Oxon, Professor of History in University College, London.

VICE-PRINCIPAL: J. J. WALKER, M.A., Trinity College, Dublin.

Students at University College are received into the Hall, and reside under Collegiate discipline. There are twenty-nine sets of rooms, some of which are now vacant, at rents varying from £12 to £48 for the session.

The Hall will RE-OPEN on the 2nd of October next, at the same time as University College, in close proximity to which it is situated.

SCHOLARSHIPS.—The Trustees of the Gilchrist Educational Fund have founded Three Scholarships of £50 per annum each, tenable for three years by students residing in the Hall, one being awarded every year to the candidate passing highest in the June Matriculation Examination of the University of London.

Further information may be obtained on written application, addressed to the Principal, or to the Secretary at the Hall.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.—Full Information as to the Subjects in which Candidates for Admission to the above Institution will be examined may be obtained on application to the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A., George-street, Chesham Hill, Manchester.

Applications from Candidates must be sent in, as above, before 1st September next.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—SATURDAY TO MONDAY AT MATLOCK.—Every Saturday until the end of October, 1868, RETURN TICKETS, at the following low fares, will be issued from the under-mentioned Stations to MATLOCK BATH, by the Midland Company's New Route, by any of the ordinary trains on Saturday, available for return by any train on the following Sunday or Monday.

FARES. First Class. Second Class.

Manchester..... 9s. 6d. 7s. 0d.

Guide Bridge..... 9s. 0d. 6s. 6d.

Stockport (Teviot Dale Station)..... 8s. 6d. 6s. 0d.

In Manchester, Tickets will be issued at Cook's Excursion Office, 43, Piccadilly, and at the Midland Booking Office, London Road Station.

JAMES ALLPORT, General Manager.

Derby, May, 1868.

OWENS COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD receives into his house, as members of his family, Young Men studying at Owens College. Two vacancies for next session. Mr. Herford will be glad to procure any information that may be desired respecting the terms, classes, &c., of the College.

1, Kersal Terrace, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

WANTED, by a Young Lady, a Re-engagement as DAILY or RESIDENT GOVERNESS in a family. Acquirements: English, French, Music, with Rudiments of German and Drawing.—Address Y, 140, Southgate Road, London.

THE Friends of a Young Lady (aged 19) wish to procure for her a Situation as RESIDENT NURSERY GOVERNESS, or to Assist a Lady in Household Duties. She is very fond of children, and willing to make herself useful.—Address C., care of Mr. Thew, 1, Castle-street, Liverpool.

GOVERNESS.—A Young Lady desires an engagement to instruct and take entire charge of Young Children.—Address, J. E., 11, Alma Villas, Richmond, Surrey.

WANTED, at Michaelmas, by an Uncertificated Mistress, the Sole Charge of a School. Testimonials from the Rev. James Martineau.—Address, Portland British Infant School, Little Titchfield-street, London.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.—Principal: C. du G. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthily-situated establishment Boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemanly education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G. 68, Guilford-street, Russi Square, London; or to Mr. A. G. 81, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

9, WELL CLOSE SQUARE, WHITBY.

THE Rev. JOHN and Mrs. OWEN wish to receive two or three Ladies or Gentlemen as BOARDERS during the season.

HIGH SCHOOL, 126, MUCH PARK-STREET, COVENTRY.—The Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., having taken extensive premises, is prepared to RECEIVE BOARDERS. Terms: 30 to 40 Guineas per annum. Full prospectus on application.

MOUNT VERNON HIGH SCHOOL, NOTTINGHAM.—SCHOOL RE-OPENED on Tuesday, August 4th.—During the erection of new premises, address 13, Regent-street.

EDWIN SMITH, M.A., Principal.

NOTE.—At the recent B.A. Examination of the University of London, one of Mr. Smith's pupils has successfully passed. This makes the fourth of his private pupils who have been prepared by him specially for the B.A. degree, and in each instance with success.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.

THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, Containing

Tunes to ALL Martinineau's Hymns.

London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6, Commercial-street; and of all music and book sellers.

BAND OF FAITH TRACTS.

A Specimen Packet containing one each of the following Tracts, post free, price sixpence.

The Appointed Way, by Caroline Shute.

Inaugural Address, by Principal J. J. Tayler.

Objects of Band of Faith, by Goodwyn Barnaby.

John Tyscovicius—Martyr.

Miss Betsy's Busybody, a Tale.

John Hiddle, our English Founder.

Love is a Sketch.

John Milne—Unitarian Confessor.

Unitarian Church Extension.

Address, Rev. GOODWYN BARMBY, Wakefield.

Just published, second edition, price 3d.

SUBSTANCE OF A LECTURE ON COMPULSORY EDUCATION. By THOS. AINSWORTH.

Read at Clifton, February 11, 1868.

London: Whitfield. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 150 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 7s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME

of the late

GEORGE BROWN,

Barrister-at-Law,

Containing 17 sermons preached by him in the Free Christian Church, Burnard Castle.

Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A.,

with

Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Burnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 3s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to

Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Burnard Castle.

In three vols. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES. Translated by SAMUEL SHARPE. Being a Revision of the Authorised English Old Testament. "Superior to any preceding revision of our English translation."—Athenæum. E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

PRESENT Condition of Unitarian and

Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 3d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

COMPLETION and RE-ISSUE of DR.

BEARD'S MANUAL of CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE

SUITED to the TIMES.

No. 8. The God of Revelation and the God of Idealistic Materialism.

N.B. This work, in Fourteen Numbers, will be issued complete in the form of an Octavo Volume about the end of October, when subscribers will receive their copies. The monthly issue will be continued. To afford opportunity for fresh subscribers, the subscription is re-opened. Subscribers' names, either for the complete volume, or for the volume in monthly parts, should be sent without delay to Mr. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

Subscription Prices: In One Volume, bound in cloth, 7s. 6d.; in Fourteen Monthly Parts, 6d. each. The trade price is 10s. 6d.

THE "HOME PAGES" TRACT SERIES.

The whole series of 236 Tracts (with the exception of one or two of the earliest) are kept in Stock.

All orders must now be sent direct to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,

Higher Broughton,

MANCHESTER.

Prices.

Single Tracts. Per dozen. Per 100.

4 pp. Tracts.... 1d. 6d. 2s.

8 pp. ".... 1d. 6d. 2s.

12 pp. ".... 1d. 6d. 2s.

The whole series, well bound, in 4 volumes, for 10s., or free by post 11s.

In cases where the Tracts will have to be sent by post, a penny in the shilling must be added for postage.

Mr. Herford will be glad to forward, on application, a complete list of the "Home Page" Tracts and Covers.

NEW EDITION of DR. EPHRAIM PEARBODY'S

"CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS."

Just published, neatly printed, and bound in bevelled boards, with red edges, price 2s. 6d., a new edition of

CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS.

By EPHRAIM PEARBODY, D.D.

London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

NEW AMERICAN UNITARIAN

BOOKS.—The following New American Books, published by the American Unitarian Association, may be had for Cash from Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester:

Altar at Home, 2nd series..... 4 0

Feasby's Sunday-school Teacher..... 5 0

Clarke's Doctrines of Prayer..... 4 0

Ware's Formation of Character..... 2 6

New Discussion of the Trinity, by various authors..... 2 6

Clarke's Orthodoxy; its Truths and Errors..... 7 6

Selections from the Works of Channing..... 3 0

Hale's Services of Sorrow..... 8 6

Ware's Silent Pastor..... 3 6

Noyes' New Translation of the Hebrew Prophets..... 14 6

Ditto ditto of the Book of Psalms..... 7 0

Ditto ditto of the Book of Job..... 7 0

Ditto ditto of Ecclesiastes and the Canticles..... 7 0

Noyes' Theological Essays, by Stanley, Jewett, &c..... 7 6

Bartol's Word of the Spirit to the Church..... 9 0

Hedge's Reason in Religion..... 9 0

Furness's Domestic Worship..... 3 6

Ware's Home Life..... 6 6

Channing's complete Works, in 3 vols..... 15 0

Smith's Christian Lessons..... 6 0

Norton's Genuinities of the Gospels..... 7 6

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED

AND OTHER NEEDLES.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of

Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE,

3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER.

(Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse).

J. BALL, Proprietor.

NEW GOODS FOR THE SUMMER SEASON.

William MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also

Bannockburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits.

FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8,

Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck

was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A curious controversy has sprung up at Moscow. M. Aksakof, in the paper called the Moscow, has been advocating religious liberty in Russia. He complains that the religious superintendence of the Government over a Russian begins with his birth, never leaves him one moment during his life, and accompanies him to the grave. The police regulations about his baptism extend to the most minute details. Still more particular are they about his catechising. He is required to be diligent in his attendance at church, especially on Sundays and civil festivals. Parents are bound, under severe penalties, to see that all their children over seven years go to confession at least once a year, and the civil and military authorities are to see that no parents fail in this. All adults are under the same rule, which in their case is to be enforced by the "civil and military authorities." "In the most private details of religious life the policeman stands sentinel over every Russian." Police regulations require him to attend church "with piety" and "without hurry," not to talk there, to treat the sacred pictures with due reverence; not to move from one part to another; to show "awe, silence, recollection, and reverence;" not to kiss the pictures except before or after the service. All particulars of the church decorations are carefully prescribed, and useless ornaments out of keeping with the sacredness of the place and carved images are strictly forbidden. Then as to religious liberty, any member of the Russian Church is subject to the forfeiture of all civil rights and exile to Siberia, or two years' service in a penal corps, if he joins any other communion. M. Aksakof has been pressing for the repeal of these laws, and has been answered in the Russia by M. Pogodine, who says:—"What in the world would you have with your 'liberty of conscience?' If the Government were to listen to you, we should soon have the population in different sects, and half the great ladies throwing themselves into the arms of charming abbés." M. Aksakof's arguments may be guessed. But a Paris correspondent says that the fact of their being freely discussed in newspapers at Moscow, shows that the press in Russia enjoys a degree of toleration, if not of liberty, which inclines one to hope that such laws as these, when once freely discussed, are not likely to be long unrepealed.

The Home Secretary of the London Missionary Society gives an encouraging account of the state of things in Madagascar. Such is the eagerness to listen to Christian preaching that on the Sunday previous to the departure of the last mail, 2,450 persons were counted out at Mr. Toy's church, while 230 were listening outside during the service. At another place, on the same day, the whole of the usual congregation turned out to make room for the crowd of people outside, that as heathens they might thus see the Christians were anxious that they should all hear "the joyful sound." The Queen and Government have publicly renounced idolatry; the great national idol has been sent away, and the Queen sends her household to attend Mr. Toy's ministry. The Government works have been stopped on the Lord's Day, and a representative of a Foreign Power on his way to the capital to obtain a ratification of a commercial treaty, having reached the last station on a Saturday night, instead of finding the usual escort, was informed that he could not be received at court until Monday. The eldest son of the Prime Minister, together with the Prime Minister's sister, are candidates for Church fellowship.

The Calcutta Englishman gives an account of the burial of the late Queen of Madagascar. The body was swathed in nearly 500 silk lambas, in the folds of which 20 gold watches, 100 gold chains, rings, brooches, bracelets, and other jewellery, together with 500 gold coins, were rolled. All the presents she had received from the Queen and the Emperor of the French were buried with her, and all her furniture and personal effects. Directly the Queen's death was made known, all the people, with the exception of about twenty of the highest officers, had to cut off their hair and put off all their clothing except the "lamba," and this only to wear from the waist to the knees, until after the funeral, when the shoulders were to be covered by the "lamba," but nothing else worn. No singing is allowed whilst mourning for a sovereign; no clay walls nor houses are to be built; no earthenware made, and a great many more things are forbidden.

The Queen's coffin was made of silver dollars, and is valued at about £4,500. The tomb is built like that of Radama I., only the little house on the top is painted scarlet, with gilt posts and eagles. There is a bar of silver across the door, and the inscription is laid in solid gold.

It is stated that Cardinal Antonelli has officially notified Count de Sartiges, that the invitation to the Emperor Napoleon to send a representative to the Council next year is a special measure, not to be connected with any resolution which may be taken hereafter as to other sovereigns. In reference to this subject, the Pope remarked to a cardinal, "Formerly sovereigns undoubtedly had rights here, and the sovereigns of the present day wish to retain those rights, but they wish also to be absolved from the obligations they impose." From this it would seem that some of the Catholic potentates are making it an object to be represented at the Council, and are met by hard conditions, the Holy See always exacting a quid pro quo.

Dr. Norman Macleod stated at a meeting of the Established Presbytery of Glasgow, that he is preparing for the press, with considerable care, a general statement of his views regarding Indian missions.

The great Protestant Demonstration at the Crystal Palace, which was intended to strike terror into the heart of Mr. Gladstone and all his deluded followers, turned out to be supremely ridiculous. Though great exertions were made to secure a large attendance, and a hundred thousand was the estimate made by its promoters, the truth-telling turnstile would not vouch for the presence of more than seven thousand, which, when the ordinary sight-seers are deducted, leaves but a small gathering of faithful Protestants, ready to do battle for the Irish Church. Even the Record is obliged to apologise for the miserable character of the whole proceedings, and to express regret that the "assertion (made by a Mr. Holden, from Manchester) that Judas Iscariot was a gentleman compared with Mr. Gladstone, should have been received with cheers and laughter."

One of the next things that Dissenters will have to struggle for is the right to have their own ministers to perform the last offices for their dead in the parochial burial grounds, instead of being liable to such treatment as that which the Times the other day reported as given by the Rev. R. T. W. Taylor, rector of St. Mewan, near St. Austell, in the case of two children of Mr. Choad, of the same place, who belonged to the Wesleyan body. He lost a boy in September last, on a Wednesday, and on the following Friday he told Mr. Taylor that the child was dead. He asked him when he wished to have him buried, and Mr. Choad said on the following day, and spoke to him about reading the burial service. He said he was sworn not to do it, and Mr. Choad would not wish him to break oath. On the following afternoon, when the funeral arrived at the churchyard, no preparations had been made, except the construction of a grave. The sexton and undertaker were there, but no clergyman, and the child had to be buried without any ceremony. The same thing occurred when Mr. Choad lost another child in November. For this cruel conduct, Mr. Taylor has been cited to answer before a commission of inquiry at Exeter, and is liable to lose his gown for three months.

At a meeting of the seatholders of the Doncaster Parish Church to consider what should be done in regard to a church rate, Dr. Vaughan, the vicar, pointed out that, under the new act, three courses were open to them. One was to levy an increased rate, and trust to the liberality of the parishioners to supply the necessary funds as heretofore, the rate being levied over a much smaller area than formerly; a second course was to abolish the rate altogether, and to increase in its place the rents of the seatholders in sufficient degree to meet the deficiency; and the third course was to abolish the rate and have an offertory, morning and evening, once a month, for the purpose of meeting those expenses hitherto defrayed out of the rate. The resolution came to was, that the abolition of the rate should be recommended, and a monthly offertory substituted, and the vicar promised to give the recommendation all the help in his power.

The Society of Friends, in their annual report on church rates, give the following figures as to distraints on the property of Friends:—Church rates, cases 39, amount £153. 19s. 4d.; rent-charge in lieu of tithes, cases 155, amount £1,716. 1s.; other ecclesiastical demands, cases 16, amount £33. 2s. 2d. These figures are for England and Wales, the principal total being in Essex, £624. 8s. 8d.; Warwickshire, Leicestershire, and Staffordshire are conjoined, the total being £37. 8s. 5d. The Lancashire and Cheshire Friends have been mulcted of £29. 6s. 8d., and those of Yorkshire have suffered to the extent of £65. 10s. 7d. In one case, for a claim of 3s. 3d., £6 was taken; and in another, for 2s. 4d., £3 was taken.

The Church Congress is to be opened in Dublin, by a sermon from Dr. Magee, Dean of Cork, on Sept. 29th. On the same day papers are to be read by Dr. Kay, of Lincoln College, Oxford, Professor Plumptre, of King's College, London, the Rev. R. Gregory, of Lambeth, and the Rev. Charles Rice, on "Our Religious Societies; how their economical and efficient Working may best be promoted;" "Hindrances at Home and Abroad to the Progress of Missions, and how these may be overcome;" "Relative Functions of Church and State in National Education." On September 30th, papers will be read by the Dean of Cashel, the Rev. Alexander Irwin, the Rev. F. W. Farrar, and the Rev. Edward Jackson, on "Church Work in Ireland," and "How the Church may best secure and retain the Attachment of her Younger Members." On October 1st, the Dean of Chester, Mr. Gambier Parry, Archdeacon Gilson, and the Rev. Dr. Reeves will read papers on the following subjects: "Authorised and systematic Lay Agency, Male and Female;" "The American and Canadian Churches, their Organisation and Practical Working;" "Convocation and Diocesan Synods in England and Ireland." On October 2nd, the Dean of Norwich, Sir Joseph Napier, Professor Jellett, and the Archdeacon of Dublin will read papers on "How the Efficiency of our Church Service may be increased;" "The Influence of the Increased Investigation of Physical Science on the Religious Views of those engaged in such Inquiries, and on Theology in general;" "The Church and the Periodical Literature of the Day;" "Biblical Illustration, i.e. the Bible as illustrated by Modern Science and Travel."

The following melody, we suppose, is intended for an electioneering song:

"Our dear old Church of England, new national song. Dedicated, by express permission, to the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli. Words by J. E. Carpenter. Music by J. L. Hatton."

The Rev. H. Christopherson, formerly an Independent minister, has been nominated to the incumbency of Bedford Chapel, St. George's, Bloomsbury, where he will succeed the Rev. J. C. M. Bellew, who, in an old caricature, played Treacle to Mr. Spurgeon's Brimstone.

A curious proposal has been made, not, it would appear, for the first time, on behalf of the spirit dealers of Edinburgh; viz., that they should erect a church or churches for their own special benefit. The suggestion is put forward under "aggravated feelings." A Free Church minister of that city refused to admit a spirit dealer as a member of his church, on the ground of his trade. The excuse was all the more singular as several wine merchants are already members of the church. Forthwith the Scottish Advertiser proposes getting up a fund to remedy this condition of things. "Let those in each city or town, head a subscription for the erection of churches for the convenience of their own body—the general members will soon follow, and the result will be emancipation from this kind of thing. None observe the Sabbath more implicitly and conscientiously than the members of the trade, as a body. In every town, so greatly have the different branches extended, and so numerous are the persons engaged in it as employers and employés, that nothing could be more desirable than that they should hold churches of their own, and cease to be dependent upon the caprices of the ministers of public churches, for the opportunity of discharging their religious duties."

The following advertisement from the Record shows how souls are still dealt in even in Evangelical quarters:—

"Episcopal chapel for sale, fashionable town; high-class congregation; average income, last seven years, £500 a year; present income rather low. First-rate opening for an Evangelical preacher. Immediate possession. Price only £1,700 for long lease, fixtures, and fittings. Principals only address —, Strand, W.C."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Spectator thinks that Bishop Hinds, in his plea for clerical freedom, goes just a little too far. He has not overstepped the limit to which any clergyman or layman has a right to push his investigations, or to propagate among other men the result they bring home to his conscience and his intellect. There is and can be no such limit, not if inquiry brings the inquirer to the dreary faith of the sincere Secularist, that man dies like the flower, or to the horrible faith of the Recordite, that the Almighty doomed some men from eternity to damnation, and then sent His Son on earth to mock them with the false promise of a redemption He had previously decreed for them should never be. Even that worst of conceivable creeds is not beyond the range of the sincere and conscientious delusion possible to men otherwise able to comprehend what justice and truth-speaking imply. But the Spectator is wholly unable to believe that there are no limits which an honest man, solely intent on propagating truth as a minister of a church, be it that of England, or Rome, or Wesley, or John Bunyan, is bound to respect. Upon the whole, it is of opinion that no man ought to remain a clergyman of the English Church who does not believe in God as a sentient Being who rules the universe, in Christ as divine, or in the right of the nation to decree the creed of the National Church.

After well combating several of the Bishop's views, the Pall Mall very justly adds:

"Even if we were satisfied, with Dr. Hinds, that the interests of the Church herself are promoted by those who have adopted more latitudinarian views than hers remaining in her ministry, we should hold this advantage dearly purchased by the prevalence of doctrines respecting the obligation of subscription such as he advocates, and such as would not meet with one moment's countenance from any one, if applied to any contracts or documents other than ecclesiastical. But we believe quite the contrary. It is the avowed opinion of many that the formularies of the Church need recasting, both with a view to greater liberality and greater precision, an opinion shared in by very many more who dare not express it. Now if it be recognised that subscription to formularies means nothing, of course any such reform becomes unnecessary, and is adjourned indefinitely. The secession of a very few men, at once conscientious and enlightened, would probably give a greater impulse towards the enlargement of the Church's barriers than any amount of disingenuous evasion."

Among the baits which Churchmen have set to catch Wesleyans, the oddest is that which has been tried by the Church Times. This is the form in which it puts it:

"If we believed in metempsychosis we should say that the soul of John Wesley was at this moment enshrined in Mr. Mackonochie. At all events we are certain that if Wesley could revisit the earth again there is no man living with whom he would feel more at home than the Vicar of St. Alban's." "And we would respectfully point out to them [Wesleyan laymen] how great and important service they might do, if they would, in conformity with the principles of John Wesley, utterly refuse ever to be present at any celebration of the blessed Eucharist where the celebrant was not a real priest."

With a view to aid the "No Popery" cry, the Rock has engaged the "great Tupper" to reproduce some of the horrible tales of female martyrs under the Inquisition, and this eminently Protestant print having at the same time been attacking Mr. Spurgeon in its feeble-forcible way, he reminds it that "The same spirit which blazed up at an auto-da-fé smoulders in an imprisonment for church rates; and the same principle which, in its manhood, dyed the Netherlands with blood in order to thrust in the Papacy, is that which thrusts in the Irish Church upon an unwilling people."

The Spectator thus introduces a speech (made, by the way, some two years ago) of the great Baptist preacher:

"Mr. Spurgeon, it is said, does not see why Nonconformist ministers should not interfere in politics. His brethren, deprecating such interference, remarked, that they were 'not of this world.' Mr. Spurgeon, who with a great many faults never can stand cant—and once, it is said, rather fiercely told a total abstinence that porter helped preachers—retorted: 'All that is metaphor. You might as well, being sheep of the Lord, decline a mutton chop on the plea of cannibalism.' Considering that some of the greatest crimes ever committed in the world owe their origin to political feeling, and some of the greatest acts of virtue to political heroism, not to mention that the legal accusation on which Christ was murdered was suspicion of treason—the notion that politics are beneath the attention of a minister of the Gospel is certainly a most grotesque display of the arrogance of caste. Do these men never scold or praise their cooks, that they are too holy to encourage or warn their representatives?"

Alluding to a half-treasonous comparison once made by him, when the Queen was still young upon the throne, the Scotsman thus sharply hits the great Liverpool Evangelical for his meddling with the subject of the Coronation Oath:

"There is reason to be thankful for what the Rev. Hugh McNeile has not said, or said again. Giving a hurried but comprehensive sketch of the history of 'the agency referred to,' he plunges somewhat wildly into scandal about Queen Elizabeth—but what about Queen Victoria?—what about the late lamented 'Jezebel?' The Rev. Hugh once made himself a great name by a startling and ingenious comparison between a certain British and a certain Jewish Queen. That celebrity proved only temporary—perhaps he has made a mistake in now seeking to snatch a like celebrity by like means. Nay, it may even be that, as events have proved the doctor quite wrong before, he may be wrong again, and we may be all right yet. For be it known to all men, except those few Liverpool men and many Liverpool women who will not believe it, that even the Rev. Canon McNeile, in spite of the excellent state of his foreign relations, is not infallible. He aims, indeed, at the position of a Protestant Pope, but his claims are not unimpeachable nor unimpeached. Some years ago, he charged Mr. Milner Gibson with not being a good Protestant, whereupon the hon. member said what, though we don't much like him, seems to be a good thing, and worthy to be here adopted and repeated—'I am a better Protestant than Dr. McNeile, for I protest against all that he protests against, and I protest, moreover, against Dr. McNeile.'"

The Pall Mall thus defines a Dean:

"He is a clergyman who receives a handsome income for regulating, in some sort of intermittent fashion, the services in a cathedral church. He is, in fact, a sort of clerical churchwarden, with the right to preach, and to appoint others to preach, and also to forbid others to preach. His work, in truth, is infinitesimally small, he has a handsome salary, and the house which is his official residence is comfortable. Consequently, deaneries are held to be the special perquisites of the English aristocracy, either in consideration of the Dean's personal or matrimonial relationships. Out of the twenty-seven English deaneries about one-half are held by gentlemen who are either the sons of peers, or have married the daughters of peers, or have some other connection with the territorial interests of the country. Lord Palmerston's rule, as suggested by Lord Shaftesbury, that, if possible, Bishops should be selected from the ranks of those whose names are not only in the book of life, but also in the peerage, is acted upon with even more fidelity in the making of Deans. The working cathedral clergy are the minor canons, with whom the dignitaries for the most part decline to associate in that smallest among small institutions, the 'society' of a cathedral city."

The Guardian speaks of Dean Goode, who was found dead in his bed the other day, as "almost the only man pretending to theological lore in the Evangelical school, and certainly the one who most showed it in his writings."

The Irish Churchman states, that a collection of statistics is being made with a view to show how much practical work has been done of late years in the various parishes of Ireland, and says:

"It is to be hoped that the mass of information thus acquired will be judiciously arranged, and then given to the public, in order that our friends in England may see how much injustice there is in the statements which represent the Irish Church as doing nothing. The notorious Dr. Littledale has bitterly accused the Irish Church of neither possessing the affections of her children, nor of drawing forth their sympathy towards good or charitable works. It is far easier to make such sweeping statements than to take the trouble of ascertaining facts; and it is to be hoped that Dr. Littledale (of whom it was wittily said, even when he was in a chrysalis state, that he was a Littledale that thought a great 'dale' of himself) will be clearly confuted by the evidence of facts and figures."

The "Cheshunt correspondence" still goes on. The Rev. Edward Fellows, of Great Malvern, "confesses to a warm indignation against priests of the Church of England doing or saying anything to strengthen the notion" in the President of the College, that he may "consider himself in all spiritual concerns equal to a priest episcopally ordained." And Mr. Fellows thinks

"If the English clergy would but honestly attend to their own duties, and not go out of their way to mislead the already deceived and to disgust those of their own order; if they would in their own churches to which they are appointed devoutly pray, day by day and week by week continually (as they have bound themselves to do), to be delivered 'from all false doctrine, heresy, and schism,' that all who profess and call themselves Christians may be led into the way of truth,' if they would show their love for their 'brethren' by being always at hand to advise, to help, to cheer, and to rebuke, if necessary; if they would show their belief by their works, that they are heart and soul in earnest about the salvation of souls; if they would follow St. Paul's advice and avoid those who cause divisions, and strive to win back those that are scattered—if, I say, the English clergy would carry out all this in practice, Cheshunt College would lose its work and its students, for there would be one fold, honestly collected into one by a straightforward course."

At the present season, when the Times and several of its contemporaries besides, are afflicted with the sermon fever, the Freeman wonders that lay preachers have escaped. It says:

"This may partly be attributable to the fact that the grumblers are members of the Church of England. Congregationalists, of either section, and Methodists, of all varieties, are less liable to the epidemic. They are stronger men, and their ministers frequently administer tonics, which keep them up to the mark. Evidently Nonconformists find the sermon more endurable than Episcopalians report it is, from which it is fair to conclude that there is more power and less prosing at chapel than at church. But how about the lay preachers?"

Take England through, a moiety, we should think, of the classes below the mechanic, who attend places of worship, are led in their devotions by unprofessional ministers of the Lord Jesus. Such men merit recognition. In common with other preachers, and perhaps beyond most, the 'volunteers' of the pulpit indulge in long sermons. Sometimes lack of preparation, and, occasionally, the want of thoroughness in thinking out a subject, accounts for the undue length of the discourse. Brevity is the result of a painstaking condensation of matter. To pack closely a man must work hard, and patiently, and skillfully. Many sermons occupy an hour because the preacher had not time to concentrate his thoughts, or to separate the chaff from the wheat. This being the case, it is not surprising that the preachers who have the least leisure should preach the longest sermons. And yet of all congregations those they minister to most require brevity. The uneducated are not accustomed to continued meditation or sustained thinking. Neither agricultural labourers nor city costermongers are fitted to thread their way through the labyrinthine intricacies of an involved discourse. For such hearers the path should be made narrow, so as to admit of no wandering; plain, so that the careless even may not fail to see it; and brief, in order to conduct the weakest to Him who is the end of preaching. Every sermon to the unlettered should be simple, straightforward, and short. An hour's service usually suffices, and a twenty minutes' discourse is long enough. An editor, perhaps, is scarcely justified in assuming the airs of a professor, and delivering a lecture on homiletics; but, in the interest of hearers, he may be excused for saying to lay preachers, let thoroughness characterise your preparations and brevity your preaching."

Dean Close writes to the Record to try and whip up the zeal of his brother Evangelicals in the cause of the Irish Church. A single extract from his letter will be enough to show that his logic still admits of considerable improvement:

"If this great act of spoliation, of wrong and robbery on the Irish Episcopal Church be accomplished, for the first time one of the three kingdoms will be stripped of its character as a Christian country, and turned adrift to be the prey of anarchy, and sectarianism, and Popery. Christianity will not be persecuted or denounced, it will only be placed on a level with Judaism, Swedenborgianism, or Mormonism. Ireland becomes a secular State! If there is no national Church, there is no national religion, no form of worship,—nay, no God, no Church recognised as the 'god of the country.' It will be cut down lower than most of the pagan nations, who have learned even by natural religion that the acts of the Government of a people should recognise their gods!"

It is confidently stated that the Rev. Robert Gregory, of Lambeth, who married the relative of a member of the Government, is to be the new Dean of Ripon, and that the Premier is thus to reward the services of another of Mr. Hardy's committee at the Oxford election. The Record severely lectures Mr. Disraeli upon the contemplated appointment. It says:

"The friends and supporters of the Government, who are also the friends of Protestantism and the pure Gospel, whether in India or in England, ought surely to warn Mr. Disraeli and his colleagues that, by his Ritualistic and Ultra-Church ecclesiastical appointments, he justifies the rumour which alleges that he is in these matters only the tool of the Bishop of Oxford, a Prelate who probably knows less of the real state of the Church of England than almost any other Prelate on the Bench, the Archbishop of Canterbury only excepted."

A correspondent of the Daily News makes the following ingenious suggestion:

"The supremacy of the Crown and the unity of the Protestant Episcopate," he says, "have hitherto been regarded as the two chief bonds of union and guarantees of order amongst English Churchmen in all parts of Her Majesty's dominions. But all this is now changed, and the Duke of Buckingham has, we understand, invited the Archbishop of Canterbury to apply for a mandate to consecrate a second Bishop for Natal. It is certain that the example here set must soon be followed at home—at least if dissentient English Churchmen are to be treated with even-handed justice in the diocese of Sarum as well as in that of Natal. The Bishop of Salisbury has made himself at least as obnoxious to the Evangelical clergy by his open avowal of Roman doctrine, as has the Bishop of Natal by his commentary on the Pentateuch. As far as the Evangelical and Protestant clergy of the diocese of Salisbury are concerned, the Bishop may be said to be 'spiritually deposed.' Let, then, those of the clergy who are dissatisfied with the teaching of Dr. Hamilton lose no time in electing a Bishop of sound Protestant principles, and then proceed to memorialise the Government to issue a mandate for his consecration as Bishop of Dorchester, to have jurisdiction over all the Protestant clergy and laity who may wish to transfer to him their allegiance from the present Romanising Bishop of Sarum."

Dr. Pusey writes a long letter to the Times explanatory of his communication to the Conference, in which we cannot see that he really explains anything, though he pays one or two compliments to the Wesleyans, as "the most religious body external to the Church," and thinks "they would not wish to promote a plan by which, until our sons should be removed from the university, soul-destroying worship should be taught to the members and future ministers of the Church of England." In the course of his letter, he says:

"I certainly do believe that we are in a state of revolution, and that as a part of that revolution, in all human appearance, the days of Establishments are numbered, whether, in fact, the disestablishment comes a little sooner or a little later. I have for some time expected the Irish Establishment to be modified or abolished first, then the Scotch, then the English. I naturally do not wish for disestablishment, but it is well to be prepared for anything."

We have more than once referred to the theological movement which is going on among the "Friends" in Manchester and the neighbourhood. The author of a good pamphlet on "The Exercise of the Intellect in matters of Religion" thus alludes to the subject:

"Whilst these pages have been passing through the press my attention has been drawn to a circular issued from Manchester, respecting certain doctrinal opinions said to be held by some members of that meeting, and indirectly calling for the interference of the yearly meeting to assist in dealing with the subject, intending, we must suppose, either to put down with a strong hand the opinions in question, or perhaps to expel those holding them from the society. The circular gives little precise information as to the nature of the points at issue, nor is it needful that they should be discussed here; it is sufficient to know that they identify those professing them with the 'rational,' rather than with the 'evangelical' party, and that there is no charge against the 'heterodox' members of delinquency in Christian life or conduct; they are, on the contrary, stated to be 'friends of high character, of great natural ability, and considerable intellectual power, possessing many excellent gifts, both of head and of heart (and leading many followers after them)'. That within a religious body which owes its peaceable existence to the recognition of the rights of conscience and which, for many a long year, fought a heroic battle in defence of those rights; which, moreover, has from the first persistently avoided requiring from its members a formal subscription to any articles of faith,—that within such a society it should be thought necessary at this day to pursue the course apparently desired by the author of the Manchester Circular, is, of itself, a more than sufficient justification of the present essay. The mere possibility of such a course being taken ought indeed to stimulate every one who respects his own conscience, and who regards a living, though it may be an erroneous belief, better than a cold and lifeless orthodoxy to show plainly on which side he stands. What could be more astounding than to find a large section of a society which professes to be emancipated from the bondage of all formalism, thus distinctly refusing to accept as sufficient the simple and practical tests of discipleship which our Lord himself enunciated ('By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.' 'Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit; so shall ye be my disciples'), yet perhaps ignoring these, but adding thereto tests and formulæ of a widely different character?"

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENT.—We understand that the Rev. Wm. Bines, late of Birkenhead, has accepted an invitation to become minister of the congregation at Bridgewater.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XVIII.

SUBJECT: The affection of the Hebrew writers towards God.

Read Isaiah lxvii. 7; lxiv. 12. "I will mention the loving kindness of Jehovah." He has been the Saviour of Israel. In their affliction He was afflicted. In His love and in His pity He redeemed them. Take notice that in these later writings God has begun to be called a father. Doubtless, Thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not. Thou, O Jehovah, art our father, our redeemer. The prophet prays for a better religious spirit among his countrymen. Why, O Jehovah, hast Thou made us to wander from Thy ways, and hardened our hearts from fearing Thee? However, he expresses his trust that God will pardon. We shall be saved, he says. Our righteousness is as filthy rags. But, now, O Jehovah, Thou art our father. Be not wroth very sore. Behold, see, we beseech Thee, we are all Thy people.

Read also Psalms xxvii. Jehovah is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear? Jehovah is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid? Leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation. When my father and my mother forsake me, then Jehovah will take me up. From the Psalms might be gathered a large number of loving thoughts towards God. The Psalmist cries out in the bitterness of his distress, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee."

More than all ancient religions that we know of, and more than most of our modern forms of Christianity, the Hebrew religion breathes a love of God. Not merely a gratitude for His blessings, but a love of Him for Himself without these blessings. The prophet Habakkuk beautifully expresses this, iii. 17—19: "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, although every sort of famine is over the land, yet I will rejoice in Jehovah, I will joy in the God of my salvation." This passage has been put into verse by Mrs. Barbauld, Hymn 135, Martineau's Collection:

"And when every blessing's flown,
Love Thee for Thyself alone."

SOMETHING WANTED IN OUR WORSHIP.

I HAVE often been painfully sensible of the meagreness of the more devotional part of our services. In endeavouring to avoid the complications of the rituals of the Romish and English Churches, we have fallen upon a form of service which, from its very simplicity, is frequently barren and unprofitable, so that our congregations too often pass it by with the listlessness of indifference, looking to the sermon as the redeeming feature of it, forgetting that that place which they call their "place of worship" would not be a place of worship were it merely a place for the preaching of sermons.

This want of interest on the part of our congregations, in the devotional portion of our religious services, I look upon as a great misfortune.

And the question which for years past has quietly forced itself upon my mind in the view of it has been, "How can we create more interest in our forms of worship? How make them more attractive and more profitable?"

I had the pleasure of listening, now about twelve months since (in the Madeleine at Paris) to an eloquent discourse of a well-known and popular abbé. He spoke of the difference between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism, and he summed up the difference by saying that Protestantism was preaching and reading the Scriptures, and Roman Catholicism was devotion. Now, he said, devotion is religion, but preaching is not religion, and reading the Scriptures is not religion; so that there is, in effect, no religion in Protestantism! The abbé was rather sweeping in his conclusion, and yet I felt that it was not without some truth, and felt that the truth was shown in none more than in ourselves—in us who are Protestants of the Protestants.

That this is so often the case in our churches is due to that formalism which, as Unitarians, we abhor, but which, it must be confessed, we are wonderfully under the influence of. Our more orthodox dissenting neighbours, in their church assemblies have, with similar forms, less of formalism,—for their prayers are free and extempore, and those who join in them, join in them with more of heart; they have thus saved themselves from falling into that formalism which has too often been a pitfall to us

Some of our ministers, feeling the need of improvement in this regard, have looked for it to the Liturgy, and various forms of Liturgy have been introduced amongst us,—all bearing considerable likeness to that of the English Church.

But too often the evil I refer to has not been even modified by this change. Instead of the long prayer, you get indeed the shorter prayers and collects of the Liturgy—and they might be an improvement upon that long prayer—but it often happens that the want of fervour, which spoils the long prayers of the minister, spoils those shorter prayers of the Liturgy; and I have often heard in our chapels those prayers gone through with perfect coldness, and the congregation listening with a feeling of utter carelessness to the clerk repeating the responses, and saying "Amen."

The fact is, I take it, there is no special virtue in any form whatsoever. All forms are helpful to those who, in a deep sense of their value, adopt them. The forms of worship most common with us are such as have been handed down to us from our fathers. We have pruned them and lopped them on every side, and reduced them to proportions such as our fathers who first had recourse to them would have thought painfully diminutive. The two prayers have been in many cases reduced to one; the "long prayer" has been cut down from an hour to ten minutes, and yet it is often thought too long. And perhaps it is fairly open to doubt now, whether, in some instances, even our brief devotional service does not produce more feeling of weariness than their long services—for long they were—did to our fathers. Of course, much of the difference in our habits and feelings in regard to these matters is due to political circumstances. Were we so circumstanced that we could not meet together now to offer up a prayer without imperilling our lives and properties, we should hardly be Englishmen if, in meeting together, we did not offer up very long and very earnest prayers. I imagine the longer prayers of our Presbyterian ancestors were as much due to the excitement they laboured under in consequence of the persecuting spirit of their age, as to a superior belief in the efficacy of their prayers.

But, however this may be, it is impossible to look back to those times and not feel, when we seem wrestling whole days in prayer with God, "there have been giants on the earth." Here, e.g., is an account of a day spent by the Westminster Assembly of Divines. It is from the journal of Dr. Baillie, principal of Glasgow University, who was one of the Scotch deputies to that Assembly. He calls it "spending from nine a.m. to five p.m. very graciously:"

"After Dr. Twisse (the prolocutor) had begun with a short prayer, Mr. Marshall prayed large, two hours. After, Mr. Arrowsmith preached an hour. Then a psalm. Thereafter, Mr. Vines prayed nearly two hours, and Mr. Palmer preached an hour, and Mr. Seaman prayed near two hours; then a psalm. After, Mr. Henderson preached; and Dr. Twisse closed with a short prayer and blessing."

So that at that single meeting three prayers were offered, each of about two hours' duration, and three sermons, each nearly an hour long! We do not wish to see those times revived. If we extended our long prayer to the ancient proportions, and crowned it with a sermon as long as our prayer, I am afraid that our congregations would not feel like people ought to feel who have spent their time—to use Dr. Baillie's phrase—very graciously. What I desire to see effected, in regard to our services of devotion, is not so much an extension in their length as a quickening in their interest and power. In times such as those I have referred to, the very atmosphere seemed full of the spirit of excitement, and a man could pray in the congregation for two hours together without either himself or his congregation becoming wearied. But I must confess I should dislike quite as much as any of our laity dropping into a house of worship where some Mr. Marshall was "praying large, for two hours." Two hundred years have made a great change in the political state of churches. We have fallen upon times of peace, profound peace. There is no longer the old excitement in the air. No breeze of political persecution sweeps sharply through our conventicles, causing us to gird up our loins, and prepare for the exigencies of wintry weather; but soft, luxurious zephyrs breathe into us the spirit of languor and sluggishness. Under such circumstances, Mr. Marshall "praying large, for two hours," instead of sustaining our attention and feeding our zeal and devotion, would, I fear, do us no better service than sing our lullaby.

It becomes highly necessary, therefore, in such a state of things, for us who are ministers, as we respect our "calling," and wish it to be respected, to consider by what means our religious services can be improved, made more attractive, more interesting, and more helpful to those who engage in them.

I regret exceedingly that when questions of such importance as this are constantly pressing for our consideration, we so often allow the opportunities which occur for seriously discussing them to slip by unused.

Only a few weeks have elapsed since we had our great annual meeting. What better occasion could we have had for considering this and similar questions? And yet we allowed it to be frittered away in a discussion which, from any point of view in which our congregational advantage is concerned, must be regarded as utterly futile and absurd. There are earnest men amongst our laity who go up to the annual meeting of our Provincial Assembly, hoping to be helped and encouraged by the words they may hear spoken there, and they return home utterly hopeless of seeing any good come out of it; and I believe no good ever will come out of it until some of us, who think that there is something worth aiming at—something worth our aiming at—put our shoulders to the wheel, and move, what I fear is a very old rickety coach, out of the rut into which it has fallen, and where now for some years it has stuck fast.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, AUGUST 28, 1868.

DR. BELLOWS ON THE CONDITION OF OUR CHURCHES.

THE recent visit of Dr. BELLOWS to this country has been a source of great interest to our body generally. We believe it has tended to encourage our churches, by the good feeling it has excited. Dr. BELLOWS has received a warm welcome from this side of the Atlantic, not only from his own personal merits, but as an envoy conveying to us peace and goodwill from our American brethren. He has earned a title to our respect and gratitude by the urbanity which he has constantly displayed, by the masterly discourses and speeches he has delivered, and by the hopeful spirit he has stirred up. We could have wished to have been able to show him a greater denominational prosperity. We know but too well the weakness of our churches, and the great need there is among us of a new inspiration. We are apt sometimes to look despairingly on our position, to mourn over our lack of enthusiasm. Yet, altogether, comparing the present with the past, if we are yet in the day of small things which we are taught not to despise, we may rejoice in some amount of progress made, and a hopeful outlook into the future.

In the admirable speech made by Dr. BELLOWS at Liverpool, just before his departure from our shores, very gratifying reference was made to this fact. This reference was the more marked and satisfactory because, if Dr. BELLOWS saw our denomination under some of its best aspects, he had special opportunities of observing it in some of its very worst. We cannot forbear quoting the following extract from his speech on the above occasion:

"I desire to express to you the extreme delight and joy, nay, I must say, even surprise, with which I have passed through those of your churches and societies with which I have acquainted myself. I have met your ministers and laity in England within the last ten weeks, and have noted the degree of strength and hopefulness, preparation for noble victories, and the degree of social influence and dignity and importance that belong to the Unitarian cause in England. I am prepared to say that instead of being less than I feared, it is far greater than I hoped. (Cheers.) I was here twenty years ago, and I recollect that in the short visit I paid them I was struck with the shabbiness of your church edifices, and the dirty and cob-web air that prevailed; the smallness of the congregations I met, and the apprehension that the good old times had gone by—that the thing would last as long as they lasted, and 'after us the deluge.' (Laughter.) That seemed to be rather the feeling that prevailed amongst the Unitarians at that time. Such was the state of things I encountered twenty years ago. After twenty years' absence, I find elegant and costly structures where I found before old, dilapidated, dispiriting chapels. I find excellent congregations wherever I have been. Out of twenty occasions when I have had to address Unitarian congregations in England, I have not looked upon anything that could not be considered full and devout audiences. I find, amongst the ministers here, men in all respects equal in learning, equal in spiritual zeal, in elevation of tone, and in mutual sympathy and co-operative spirit to our brethren at home. I find among you men of whom I should not venture to say that they are a whit inferior to those we are able to present in my own country, and that, for an American, is saying a good deal. (Cheers and laughter.)"

We do not wish to receive such an eulogium with any other feeling than that of modesty. If Dr. BELLOWS can discern so desirable a change for the better, in our denomination, we cannot but be conscious of our own shortcomings and the need of greater faithfulness. But we would refer to it as affording reason for thankfulness that our cause has not grown weaker in our hands, and as an encouragement to yet more zealous labour. With some among us moving within the sphere of our denominational activities, and acquainted with the real position of our churches, a not unnatural discontent occasionally arises at the apparent feebleness of our congregational life. Those in our midst are not always the best judges of our condition. It is therefore peculiarly pleasant to us to receive such a testimony from Dr. BELLOWS, concerning the improvements manifest in our body during the last twenty years.

On another matter which has in some quarters been the subject of unnecessary lamentations, Dr. BELLOWS, in the speech before referred to, made gratifying allusion. Much apprehension has occasionally been expressed, concerning the alleged decline of a learned ministry among us. We have sufficient respect for learning and the intellectual character of our ministers, to be anxious that no deterioration whatever should take place in their educational status. Much as we rejoice in the new elements of life infused in our body through the Home Missionary Board, we should greatly regret if thereby the general culture of our ministers should be lowered. We do not think this will be the case to any appreciable extent; and we are glad to find Dr. BELLOWS referring so significantly to the character of our younger ministers as in the following paragraph:

"Let me also add that I have been very much delighted—and I am old enough, I think, to be permitted the privilege of expressing an opinion upon that subject—I have been truly delighted with the character and promise of the younger portion of the ministers who have fallen under my own eye, and come within my own knowledge. I confess that when I came here I was sufficiently under the prejudice of my own particular notions to be a little disturbed that a certain licence of thinking and speaking, as it seemed to be, was common amongst them; but the longer I have been here, and the more intercourse I have had with the younger ministers of the Unitarians, the more disposed I am to think and say that they have been subjected to a kind of training, a thoroughness of discipline, which entitles them to hold their own opinions."

We are personally much obliged to Dr. BELLOWS for the encouragement given to us in the statements already quoted. Coming from a land where everything religious is less hampered by traditions than in this country, and from a denomination which enjoys many privileges denied to English Unitarianism, Dr. BELLOWS has spared us any humiliating comparisons, and has done much to cheer us by his genial testimonies to the progress of our liberal cause. We are glad to feel that our body has received a new impetus from his friendly presence and wise counsel. We are assured there is a better hope amongst us through his most acceptable visit. We have not much to boast of in the way of progress. But we have learnt that we have moved and are moving. We trust such an inspiring fact will serve to revive our spirits—too often prone to droop—and give to us a greater courage in the difficult work which, as a body, we have to do.

WESLEY'S "FOUNDRY" AND WHITFIELD'S "TABERNACLE."

WHITFIELD'S "Tabernacle" is about to be replaced by a larger building on the same site; and this gives occasion to the Christian World for a brief retrospect in connection with it, from which we take the following:

Early in the last century existed in Moorfields, near the windmills, the celebrated "Foundry," where the Government brass ordnance was cast, where the great bell of St. Paul's is said to have been born, and where, subsequently, the world-renowned George Whitfield and John Wesley preached to assembled thousands.

Pennant, writing about Moorfields, gives an anecdote worth repeating:—"Here, too, religion set up its stage itinerant, beneath the shade of the trees; and here the pious, well-meaning Whitfield long preached so successfully as to steal from a neighbouring charlatan the greater part of his numerous admirers, in defiance of the eloquence of the doctor, and the witty sallies of his pious attendant. The faithful Merry Andrew told his master not to be discouraged; he would engage soon to dislodge his powerful adversary. He accordingly climbed a tree above the head of the zealous preacher, who, in the midst of an ecstatic attitude, received from the impious wretch the full effects of a most active drug, and was forced to quit his discourse with the utmost precipitation. But Andrew found it difficult to escape with his life, for he was assailed on all sides by showers of stones from the justly-enraged congregation, and long felt in his battered bones the consequences of his wit. Mr. Whitfield used often to relate the adventure with much humour; and I received the account from a gentleman who heard him describe his piteous mishap."

Wesley in his "Journal," under date Sunday, June 17, 1739, thus writes:—"I preached at seven in upper Moorfields, to (I believe) six or seven thousand people, on 'Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters.' In the afternoon I saw poor R—d T—n, who left our society and the church. We did not dispute, but pray; and in a short space the scales fell off from his eyes. He gladly returned to the church, and was in the evening re-admitted into our society. At five, I preached on Kennington Common to about 15,000 people, on those words, 'Look unto Him, and be ye saved, all ye ends of the earth.'" On Sunday, Sept. 9, he "declared to about 10,000 people in Moorfields what they must do to be saved. My mother went with us about five to Kennington, where were supposed to be 20,000 people." And on the 23rd he again addressed another 10,000 in Moorfields "with great enlargement of spirit."

But the time was drawing on when a great change produced some beneficial results. Wesley, writing Sunday, July 20, 1740, tells us:—"At Mr. Seward's earnest request I preached once more in Moorfields, on 'the work of faith, and the patience of hope, and the labour of love.' A zealous man was so kind as to free us from most of the noisy, careless hearers (or spectators rather) by reading meanwhile at a small distance a chapter in 'the Whole Duty of Man.' I wish neither he nor they may ever read a worse book, though I can tell them of a better." In the evening he went with Mr. Seward to the love-feast in Fetter-lane Chapel, and at its conclusion he read a paper, stating that he and the congregation having differed in opinion, he must leave them then and there to God. With him left eighteen or nineteen of the society, and on Wednesday, the 23rd, "our little company," writes he, "met at the Foundry instead of Fetter-lane. About twenty-five of our brethren God had given us already, all of whom think and speak the same thing. Seven or eight and forty likewise of the fifty women that were in band desired to cast in their lot with us."

On Thursday, Sept. 18, he again writes:—"The Prince of the Air made another attempt in defence of his tottering kingdom. A great number of men having got into the middle of the Foundry began to speak big, swelling words, so that my voice could hardly be heard while I was reading the 11th chapter of the Acts. But immediately after, the hammer of the Word broke the rocks in pieces, all quietly heard the glad tidings of salvation, and some, I trust, not in vain."

The "Foundry" Chapel is described by Silas Told in his "Life" (edited by Wesley, 1789), who tells us that in July, 1740, "Mr. Charles Gaspar Greaves, the young bricklayer, introduced me among the people called Methodists," and on a Sunday morning following he went to hear Wesley there. "When we entered the Foundry," writes he, "I gazed about me to make observations. Finding it a ruinous place with an old pantile covering, a few rough deal boards put together to constitute a temporary pulpit, and several other decayed timbers, which composed the whole structure, I began to think it answered the description given of it." In one corner sat three or four old women, one of whom appeared like a statue, with her apron over her face, nor was she uncovered during the whole service. The enemy of souls immediately suggested that she was a hypocrite. My friend Mr. Greaves stood close behind me to prevent my going out, to which I was strongly tempted; and had it not been for the multitude of people assembled together, and the profound seriousness which appeared in the countenance of every person, I should have given way to the temptation, and thereby have lost the greatest blessing I ever experienced." His description of Wesley is curious:—"Exactly at five o'clock a whisper ran through the congregation, 'Here he comes! Here he comes!' I had a curiosity to see his person which, when I beheld, I much despised. The enemy of souls suggested that he was some farmer's son, who, not able to support himself, was making a penny in this low manner. He passed through the congregation into the pulpit, and, having his robes on, I expected he would have begun with the Church service; but, to my astonishment, he began with singing a hymn, with which I was almost enraptured; but his extemporary prayer was quite unpleasant, as I thought it flavoured too much of a Dissenter."

In 1791, Wesley and Whitfield became opponents. The event is recorded by the former in his "Journal" thus:

"Sat., 28 March.—Having heard much of Mr. Whitfield's unkind behaviour since his return from Georgia, I went to hear him speak for himself, that I might know how to judge. I much approved of his plainness of speech. He told me, 'he and I preached two different Gospels, and therefore he not only would not join with or give me the right hand of fellowship, but was resolved publicly to preach against me and my brother wheresoever he preached at all.' Mr. Hall (who went with me) put him in mind of the promise he had made but a few days before, that 'whatever his private opinion was, he would never publicly preach against us.' He said that promise was only an effect of human weakness, and he was now of another mind."

Wesley preached in the Foundry previous to the separation, and he preached there after. The time was five in the morning and seven in the evening, and the men and women sat apart, not in pews, but on "forms" or benches. Whitfield preached, it is said, mounted on the top of a grocer's sugar hoghead, but his eccentricity did good.

In 1752 the old building gave place to the one lately dismantled. Rough and unsightly as the structure looked, it yet gave accommodation to 4,000 Independents. On the 10th of June, 1753, George Whitfield himself preached the opening sermon; and one hundred and fifteen years after, on the evening of Sunday, July 12, 1868, the Rev. W. Grigsby preached therein the last, and many of those that heard the last words preached in the old edifice were descendants of those who heard the first words preached therein more than a century ago.

Whitfield died in America, and Wesley preached his funeral sermon on Sunday, the 18th of November, 1770, at Tottenham-court-road Chapel, wherein "an immense multitude was gathered together from all corners of the town."

Eight years after, in 1778, Wesley removed from the Foundry to his new chapel in the City-road, facing Bunhill-fields. In his house there he died the 2nd of March, 1791, in the eighty-eighth year of his age, and was buried in the vault prepared by him, not only for himself, but for other itinerant preachers dying in London. "He had no illness," writes Lackington, the bookseller and near neighbour, "but the wheel of the machine being worn out, it stopped of course." He laid in state, and forty to fifty thousand persons paid their last respects. When he was buried, so great was the crowd that he had to be carried to the grave on Wednesday, March 9, between five and six in the morning, Dr. Whitehead preaching his funeral sermon, and even at that early hour great numbers being unable to get near the chapel. And for weeks afterwards hawkers assembled in a body in the neighbourhood, and vended "the only genuine" life of this good and worthy Christian.

AMERICAN NOTES.

A MAN appealed to Ward Beecher as follows:—

"Lancaster, February 5th, 1867.

"Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.—Sir—I hardly know how to address so great a man. You said in a sermon, some time ago, that honesty ought to be rewarded. I am honest with my fellow-man, myself, my God. Can get recommendations (the best) from lawyers, doctors, preachers, &c. Get me an easy (sic) situation. Honesty may be rewarded.—C. C."

An extract or two from Mr. Beecher's reply may serve to amuse our readers:

"Surely a man as honest as you are has been rewarded already. What? 'honest with your fellow-men, yourself, and your God!' There are few men who can say so much. Honest with your fellow-men! How long has it been so? Have you come to it gradually, as the winter apple ripens, or has it always been so? Excuse these questions, I am deeply interested. You belong to an exceedingly small class. You have few fellows on earth. Indeed, when you say that you are honest with yourself, I cannot keep company. You are ahead of me; and that clause—honest with your God—takes you entirely out of my sight. Why do you come to me? I ought to sit at your feet. You are my master. No doubt you can get 'recommendations from lawyers, doctors, preachers, &c.' You place these gentlemen doubtless in a climax. Lawyers are proverbially honest—doctors never deceive—preachers always practise what they preach. Recommendations from any of these would smack of self-laudation. Every man praises his own virtues. Get some one not so inevitably good to recommend you. Are there no editors, no members of Congress in your neighbourhood? But I am come to the most important part of your letter: 'Get me an easy situation, that honesty may be rewarded.' I am ready to do all in my power for you. Had you signified the sort of easy place you would prefer, I should have been less perplexed. Let me see. You are a born president! All parties are looking out for you. They want a man 'honest to his fellow-men, to himself, and to his God.' What a motto is that to run a race with! Thus far they seem not to have found just the man. If I were to divulge your name no doubt you would be ravished away to Washington in spite of your screams. And the only reason why I do not disclose your whereabouts is, that I fear the presidency would not prove that 'easy' place which you justly think is due to your honesty. Don't be an editor if you would be 'easy.' Do not try the law. Avoid school-keeping. Keep out of the pulpit. Let alone all ships, stores, shops, and merchandise. Abhor politics. Keep away from lawyers. Don't practise medicine. Be not a farmer or a mechanic; neither a soldier nor a sailor. Don't think. Don't work. None of them are easy. O my honest friend! you are in a very hard world! I know of but one real 'easy' place in it. That place is in the grave! How is it in Lancaster? Can they not serve you there? Even graves are very dear here. Try and get suited at home."

An Episcopal minister of Rhode Island is to be tried before an ecclesiastical court next month for permitting a Baptist minister to occupy his pulpit upon a certain Sunday when he himself was preaching for the Baptist Church. It is held that one of the canons of the Episcopal Church prohibits such an interchange of pulpits, though of this there are some doubts. Some Churchmen seem to be incensed at the Bishop for yielding his consent to the procedure, while the defendant is assured of the sympathies of all Protestants in the Episcopal Church.

The Rev. Dr. McCosh, recently appointed to the presidency of Princeton College, United States, is to have a hearty reception from his friends in the States. The New York Evangelist says that, as a suitable preparation for his coming, some gentlemen of that city have raised a fund of 60,000 dollars to endow his chair. This will be a double advantage—of securing to him an annual income of 4,000 dollars, and leaving untouched the present salary, which is continued to the retiring president, Dr. McLean. Six thousand dollars have also been raised to furnish a house for Dr. McCosh. The principal subscribers are stated to be Scotch-Irish Presbyterians.

The New York Independent, writing about dull ministers, says:

"Every man knows ministers who, without a trait of brilliancy, are yet part of the vital force of their whole country. No matter if their reiteration of simple truths becomes a little fatiguing; it is always to the point. No matter if their jokes at the parish tea-tables are time-worn; they are hearty. These men know every child in town, because they recall its grandfather. They superintend the schools, they watch over the village morals; and their life is one long struggle against that anti-Christ, the tavern-keeper. They even cope with him in town meeting, and refuse him a licence unless he behaves himself. What would any New England village be, for instance, without its dull minister? And these know their limitations, and have sober wishes. Their more showy neighbours are, one by one, drafted away to city parishes. There they save souls in the best styles, with the latest improvements, regardless of expense. The dull ministers stay behind and occasionally peruse the discourses of their old friends. Their wives perchance are indignant, and opine that some other people's sermons would read quite as well in the Christian Thunderbolt. We believe it. 'Smart' preaching is a great deal worse than dull preaching. But, after all, why should any preaching be dull? Any man who speaks simply from his heart, and does not go beyond his depth, can make something worth saying out of the commonplace of every week. Any gossip can make these subjects attracting in her day; cannot the minister in this? The trouble lies chiefly in a false method. The dullest discourse could commonly be made interesting by shortening it one-half, chopping each sentence into two or three, striking out most of the doctrinal argument, and filling in with such simple illustrations as one would use in conversation. Let each man, in addition, make three-fourths of what he says extemporaneous, and remember that grown people are, after all, much like children, and need, like them, to have everything simplified and illustrated. With this method we should in time have a new race of country ministers, better than the old, retaining all the heartiness and escaping much of the dullness."

One of the editors of the Revolution, Mrs. E. C. Stanton, who has been rusticated at Peterborough, N. Y., writes thence to her paper:

"On last Sunday morning we had the pleasure of preaching in 'the Free Church' on the 'Women of the Bible' to a large and attentive audience. At five p.m., as is the custom here, the congregation assembled to criticise the morning discourse, where we had quite a spirited discussion on the whole question of suffrage for women. At the close, a rising vote was taken, which was almost unanimous in the affirmative, only one maiden lady and one coloured youth, Theodore West, rising in opposition." The same lady, in another article in the Revolution, tells us that the Methodist Church in America has lately struck the word obey from its marriage service.

The late John Wilson.

THE announcement of the decease of this excellent man, at Cambridge, yesterday, August 3rd, 1868, after a protracted illness, was received just as we were going to press. The intelligence will bring sorrow to many who have been acquainted with his worth, and indebted to his accuracy and intelligence for kindly-rendered and helpful aid. He has been known for some years in this community as an accomplished printer and proof-reader, allowing no error to escape his eye. Everybody who had a book or anything else to put to press, felt themselves fortunate if it was intrusted to his taste, skill, and revision. But remarkable as he was in his calling, he had higher claims to regard.

Mr. Wilson came to this country from England, a man of culture and full of information upon the subjects that chiefly engaged his attention. He was well read as a theologian, and published several books in illustration and defence of his cherished faith as a Unitarian, that exhibited great research and painstaking. Besides these, he was the author of a volume of great practical value, entitled "A Treatise on Punctuation," in which he embodied in a condensed form a vast amount of useful matter; making, in fact, a model manual.

He bore an unblemished character; and showed the sincerity of his convictions in his thorough uprightness and his many Christian graces and virtues. We have no time or space to speak of him as we would, but are quite sure of the concurrent assent of his troops of friends when we merely add, that his life was one of unwearied diligence, and that in all relations he commanded esteem and won affection for his simplicity of manners, unswerving truthfulness, patience under embarrassments, resignation when afflicted and bereaved, conscientiousness in discharge of his duties, cheerfulness, hopefulness, and endeavours to be faithful as a true man.

To the above (taken from The Boston Transcript), a friend who knew and valued Mr. Wilson desires to add a few words. John Wilson, in the year 1834, left Belfast and settled in Manchester. Obtaining employment as a printer in the office of the Manchester Guardian, then conducted by its founder, John Edward Taylor, he, without delay, joined the Unitarian congregation assembling in Greengate, Salford, under the ministry of Rev. John R. Beard. At once putting his hand to the plough, he rendered valuable services in the Sunday school, and many a young man now in easy circumstances, and some useful in the church, owe to their respected teacher the best of what they possess. Of special value were the instructions he gave in a Bible class which he conducted for several years, winning the love and respect of his pupils, as well as filling their minds. Bringing to the task accurate and extensive information, and possessing a well-disciplined intellect and a very kind heart, also a conscience no less strong than pure, he made his class a kind of training ground for the intellect as well as the character, and so produced impressions and fostered habits which were indelible as well as truly religious. Mr. Wilson had a great natural aptitude for exact learning. Had he enjoyed opportunities in early life, he would have made a first-rate scholar. As it was, he produced works which would do credit to a man whose profession was literature. As the decided bearing of his nature was religious, so did his pen unavoidably turn to religious topics. Moreover, Mr. Wilson having tasted the bitterness of Calvinistic orthodoxy, could well relish the sweetness of Unitarianism, and being a man of simple earnestness, he was not ashamed to call Unitarianism by its proper name. Accordingly, his first work was an octavo volume, entitled "Illustrations of Unitarianism"—an excellent manual for young persons and inquirers after religious truth. The work relates conclusively to the Scriptural doctrine of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, which it treats exhaustively. More than once did the writer urge on his friend the composition of a similar work on the Scriptural doctrine of the Atonement. Such a treatise is still needed; but, alas! in this day of clouds, shadows, mists, and moonshine, where can we find the solid acquirements, and orderly intellect, and lucid pen of John Wilson? Another work, entitled "Concessions of Trinitarians," is a compilation of passages from Trinitarian writers, which either directly or indirectly yield the points at issue between them and Unitarians. This volume, afterwards published by the American Unitarian Association in a somewhat altered form, with the title of "Unitarian Principles, confirmed by Trinitarian Testimonies," has had a most extensive circulation, and exercised a most beneficial influence. The latter effect is not a little owing to the spirit of the author. John Wilson honoured a broad creed by cultivating a large as well as tender heart. If before all things he wished and laboured to promote Unitarianism, it was because, believing it to be the gospel of Jesus Christ, he knew that its great central truths, sympathies, and aims are of the widest and most comprehensive nature, and as such subversive of bigotry, zealotism, exclusiveness, and partiality, tending of necessity to make the human race a family of brothers under the one visible Head, Christ, the Son of God, and under the one invisible Sovereign, God, the equal Father of all.

In the religious society with which he connected himself, Mr. Wilson found a congenial circle of friends by whom his aid was welcomed, his studies assisted, and his worldly interests promoted. Specially valuable, as contributory to his writings, was the large yet neglected collection of books pertaining to bygone ages which bears the name of "Chetham's Library." With its and other aid, he made himself acquainted with Greek and Hebrew, and acquired a certain facility of reading texts and consulting passages in other languages. But he was something more than a compiler. He had a fervour of mind which fused into a homogeneous whole the materials that had been collected by his industry. Yet his patience and perseverance deserve high encomium. When once he had set himself a task he never stopped or relaxed his efforts until it was accomplished. With him labour was a kind of genius. During the years he spent over these and other compositions, he had to earn a livelihood for a large family by a pursuit which was exhausting in the degree in which it was useful, and in the midst of domestic circumstances little favourable to literary pursuits. The writer well remembers the reluctance and even grief with which, at Mr. Wilson's request, he wrote a few words wherewith to introduce, on the other side of the Atlantic, one who was so highly esteemed and so much loved at home. In his adopted country, however, he, though most unobtrusive, soon acquired other friends, thus creating an additional tie between the Unitarianism of the Old World and that of the New. His departure is one more added to the "innumerable company" of "just men made perfect," who linger around the inner verge of paradise, not content to pass into its central glories until they can go hand-in-hand with some who are still detained here below.

The late Thomas Emery.

A FEW months ago we recorded the death, at Leicester, of Mr. Whetstone, an old attendant at the Great Meeting House, and a man of mark in the town. Mr. Coe has now lost another useful member of his congregation—Mr. Thomas Emery, editor of the Leicester Free Press—very much respected, and of whom he thus speaks:

"I have lost one of my best and staunchest friends, one who was for many years a regular attendant upon my ministry, and one who was in no small measure the support of that ministry, by ever helping me to keep a lofty idea of my office, and by expressing his special sympathy with whatever was most earnest and most fraught with a Christian faith and spirit. Mr. Emery was born in humble circumstances, and in striving to recall the past, by the help of others, I see him first a steady apprentice, receiving proofs of his employer's favour; then a thoughtful workman, on whose lips no idle or profane word was ever heard by one who worked in constant company with him, but whose mind was often musing, amid the routine of toil, on those problems of religion and of politics which it was the business and the recreation of his after life to solve. Next we see this meditative side of his character leading him to become a debater, a lecturer, an author of essays, worthy of the prizes which they gained, and of the approbation with which they were received. Meanwhile, the working man from the loom manages to become a bookseller and news-agent; and thus both by the intellectual processes of his mind, and by the outward circumstances of his life, he is being prepared for the arduous, the delicate, and the not very enviable office of a newspaper editor. This work, which became the occupation of his ripened manhood, was done ably; it was performed in a thoroughly independent spirit. He wrote according to the truth that was in him, whatever patrons might say, or whatever the popular opinion might be. He was ever ready to use his pen as a means by which wrong might be redressed; and with this end in view, he was always accessible to those who stood in need of his help, and to those who were ready to avail themselves of his sound advice. His power as a writer was maturing to the last; his wit grew more refined, and his utterance came with a greater power."

At the funeral, which took place on Tuesday week, P. A. Taylor, Esq., M.P. for the borough, was present, along with many of the members of the Town Council and respectable inhabitants of the town, and a proposal has been made to erect a suitable monument over his grave at the public expense.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

MY BLESSING.

I LAY my hand upon thy head,
And bow my own above, and shed
A tear or two thereon, instead
Of love's caressing;
A kiss hath not so tender touch;
Smiles say of kindness ne'er so much;
What is the import, then, of such
A heartfelt blessing?
Not a light wish of loving mood
To compass only worldly good.
My heart would not be understood
In want so shallow;
Not what is termed a life of ease,
Perpetual sunshine, changeless peace,
Nor, whatsoever the charm, a bliss
Whence doth not bellow.
I bless thee with a quiet mind,
Obedient, steadfast, and resigned,
That scorns in trifling things to find
Its fullest measure;
I bless thee with a generous heart,
That will not shrink from care or smart,
So to enlarge or to impart
Its choicest treasure.
I bless—oh, friend, forgive the strain,
Since loss is often richest gain,
And joy is sweetest after pain—
Thy life with sorrow;
Some clouded days, some nights of tears,
Some sacrifices, conflicts, fears,
Showers where the bow of hope appears
For God's to-morrow.
I bless thee with a work to do,
A holy purpose to pursue,
A faith to keep and to renew
By love and duty;
With strength to climb a toilsome hill,
With patience for thy Father's will,
Or the stern strokes that polish still
The gem of beauty.
I bless thee with a constant ray
Far down the future's doubtful day,
And heaven-lights all along the way
For guide and warning;
And when earth's sun shall sink to night,
I bless thee with the promise bright,
"At evening time it shall be light,"
And heaven at morning.
I bless thee thus in wish and prayer,
Content if thou the portion share
Thy Father sees thee fit to bear;
And so confessing,
To Him would I commend thy youth,
Thy life and love, grief, joy and truth
All to all-perfect love: in sooth
This is my blessing.

Sabbath at Home.

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

PART VIII.

WHEN the father had finished the two terrible stories of his fellow-apprentice and his own sister, which had filled up the measure of his abhorrence of orthodoxy, there was for some time silence in the sick chamber where little Harry was lying. Presently, however, the nurse, as if she felt something was expected from her, said:

"Well, sir, I must confess, you have put it in a very terrible light. I never saw it in that light before. But, after all, if the doctrine of everlasting torment is true, it is true, and our not liking it won't help it. I mean, won't make it not true. All you have said, sir, only shows what a 'fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God'; 'for He is a consuming fire.' And if the Bible reveals the awful doctrine, we are bound to believe it, however much it goes against our weak nature. I do not see what good it will be to us to make to our own minds a God of our own, just as we should like Him to be."

"But, nurse," said little Harry, whose heart had been deeply touched by his father's stories, and whose hatred and horror of the doctrine of hell-fire was now fully excited, "mayn't we misunderstand the Bible? There is something in me that tells me now that it cannot, cannot be true that God is such an awful, cruel tyrant."

"And you mean," said Mr. Warner, seeing that he paused as not knowing exactly how to express himself; "you mean that you are sure you understand that which speaks in your heart, and you may not be sure that you understand the Bible?"

"Yes, that is just what I mean, father."

"Well," continued Mr. Warner, "I shall show you in my next conversation that people have misunderstood the Bible in supposing the doctrine of eternal torment, and by literal fires, to be really its teaching. I shall show you that the doctrine has come from heathen books and heathen superstition, and been foisted into Christianity, to which it does not belong."

About a week after the last conversation, as the boy seemed able to bear it, his father and mother, and little Jane and Joey, and nurse, took their places in his bedroom again, and Mr. Warner thus began:

"I told you that for a long time I lived without religion; I had been frightened away from God. On Sundays, at that time, I mostly took long walks into the country. One day I had walked a considerable distance from town, and came about half-past two in the afternoon to a quiet little village with a green, on the edge of which stood an old ivy-covered chapel. Fields spread behind its little yard where the dead reposed, and a row of trees waved their branches before it. It looked so quiet and cool, that as the people were just making their way towards it I was tempted to enter also. I did not know to what sect it belonged. The prayers seemed to be in a style different to anything to which I had been accustomed. God was addressed as a tender, loving father, in simple, natural language, and I missed the old stereotyped phrases. But when the minister, a scholarly-looking grey-haired man, came to the sermon, he took his text from Mark ix. 47, 48,—'To be cast into hell-fire, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.' Now, thought I, we are to have one of the old-fashioned sermons about brimstone and fire, and I disposed myself in the corner of the pew, determined, if possible, to sleep and not to hear it. The minister's first words, however, made me open my eyes and look towards him, and what followed so interested me, that when I got home I wrote down the sermon as well as I could from memory. 'The words of my text,' he said, 'have a very different meaning from that which is usually put upon them. They do not refer to a dark cavern and lake of fire and everlasting torment. They are figurative; intended to represent, not the mere punishment of sin, but the terrible condition of the sinful mind itself. The hell in which millions of Christians believe, and which is preached from thousands of pulpits, is not the hell of the Gospel, but the hell of the heathen poets. Let me try to show you what was the kind of hell of which Jesus spake:

"Standing on the western wall of Jerusalem, and at the southern angle, the spectator looks down a valley which bends away to the south-east, and which formerly had been one of the greenest, pleasantest valleys about Jerusalem. In very ancient times, some hero of the name of Hinnom seems to have encamped there, from whom it was called Ge-Ben-Hinnom,—that is, Valley of the Son of Hinnom; shorter, Ge-Hinnom; by-and-by corrupted into Ge-Henna. This valley was associated in the minds of the Jews, in the time of Christ, with everything horrible and fearful. Let me tell you how this came to pass. Many hundreds of years before, this valley had been the scene of the most horrible idolatry. We will put ourselves in the place of Jeremiah in his own days. We will stand on the hill above and look down into the ravine of Gehinnom, and describe what we see. We see first, then, a huge brazen idol towering aloft, made in the shape of a bull, with several heads. It is the idol of Baal, the Lord—or Molech, the King,—of heaven. It is a solemn day. The idol has been smeared with pitch to make it inflammable, and then set on fire, and crowds of worshippers fall down and adore it as a symbol of the awful deity. When the idol is heated to the utmost, mothers, who have been selected by the priests, bring forward their children, their dear first-born children, to offer them in sacrifice. They are placed on the outstretched arms of the idol, and roll down into an opening in the bosom, where they fall into the heated oven within, the priests keeping up a horrid din with drums and cymbals all the time to drown the crying of the children.

"Horrid thought, was it not, that God could be so unutterably cruel as to need His children to crush the holiest, tenderest feelings of their hearts, and offer to him their first-born darlings, thus committing them to the flames to appease His wrath or win His favour? And yet is that thought more terrible than that of many Christians of their God—that he does require millions of His children to pass eternity in flames, and that even that will not appease His anger or win His mercy? Ah, friends, such Christians little think it, but they are holding the old idolatry still, and the God whom they worship is but the old Baal under another name.”

(To be continued.)

A PLEA FOR SHORT WORDS.

JUST now, when it has become so much the fashion to use big Latinized words, the following clever plea for short racy Saxon ones appears in season:

Some men fear to use us in their grand books, or in the course of their speech, as if we were not so good as they would like, so I mean now to show that no one need think that we are bad as well as small. I can do my work best if I may tell a dream; when I have told my dream, those who hate us may laugh and jeer if they can. In my dream it came to pass that all short words were put out of use by a few proud men, who took an oath that they would not stoop to use a short word; they swore a great oath that they would not have a short word said in the house or out of it, and that a breach of this strict law should be paid for by a large fine. This was a sad case for us poor things. How this new law would work was more than I could guess, but as there was to be no more need of me, or such like, I made up my mind to spend a whole day that I might find out how the proud world would get on with big and fine words. I set to work as soon as I could, and kept at it all the day, so that I might tell just what took place, and let wise men know what fools had done. In the first place, just at peep of day, the poor maid-of-all-work was found in a nice fix, for she, too, was bound by the grand law. Not one short word might she use. All her life long she had not learnt a long one, so now it was hard for her to make her wants known. She could not ask either for wood or coal that she might light the fire; pots and pans she could not so much as name, nor could she ask for match, chip, wood, or brush, so there she stood as mute as if she had been born deaf and dumb. Down came the cook next, and she, too, soon found out what is meant by a dead-lock. How could she tell the maid to clean the knives and forks, to lay the cloth, to boil the eggs, to make dry toast, to heat the rolls, or broil the ham? She had the look of one who had gone daft, yet, though she was in what the boys call “a wax,” she could not—she dare not—call the maid a goose or an ass. Poor cook! I felt much for her, yet my pride kept back the sigh which would fain have come at such a sight. I soon heard the step of the head of the house, and then my pride fell, for I thought he would know how to keep the law which he had made. It was hard work for him, though. I saw a twitch from his lips now and then, as if a short word had just made a dash at him. It was soon clear that he was quite as much in a fix as the maid or the cook, for he could not ask his wife to pass the bread, to hand the eggs, or to pour out the tea; nor could he ask his son to draw the blind and shut out the sun which shone full in his eyes. When he came to him for the work of the day he was shut up for want of words. He could not ask for his coat, his hat, his stick, his horse, his gig, or his whip. He was quite as bad when he got to town, for he could not call for pens or ink, nor could he say that he would pay his bills, or draw a cheque on the chief bank in the place. As to the health of his friends, he dare not say one word about it—pains in the head, corns on both feet and on all toes, stiff arms, sore hands, weak backs, and game legs, were all left without a hint or a word that could tell how much pain they had brought into the poor flesh. The wife of this great man was in a poor plight all the day; when I tell half her tale, it will be seen what a wreck she was: first of all, she could not say that she would buy a dress; she lost her bunch of keys, but could not ask if it had been found; she would have told her maids to wash or darn, to bake or sew, to sit still or go out, or to lie down or to stand up, but not a word could she say on one of these points. Was she not, then, if not a wretch, at least a wreck? From the house, I went to find out how men who think and write would get on with big words, and the scene will long haunt the eye of my mind. The men who write news found that their trade was cut up by the roots; pen and ink were, of course, both gone; and books, desks, maps, and globes had gone with them. The men who try their hands on great books, were quite as much at sea; not a line or page could they name; no one could be told to stitch or bind their books; and not a shop or stall that would show the loose leaves for sale. I then went to look at the trades, and found that all of them felt the grip of the hard law. Men could not ask for saws, planes, nails, or screws, nor could they call for wood, stones, slates, glass, lime, lead, paint, or glue; in short, the whole world was fast; time and tide stood still; sun and star said they would not shine; and as for the shy moon, she put on a veil, and went by like a girl in a pet. Such was my day's work as shown in my dream. In the course of my dream, the small words, as if bent on a plot, met to talk of the strange state to which they had been brought. All the small words were there; in fact, they came in a rush to the scene of war. A fine old word, whose name is Wise, was put in the chief seat. Strong was on his right hand, and Bright on his left, and at the far end of the room, close to the door, Big, Blunt, Sharp, Keen, and Smash, stood in a knot as if they had made up their minds that their lives were of less worth than their rights. Strong was in a fierce mood; when he said in a loud voice that he would not spare the foe, there was a clear, shrill cry of joy in all parts of the large room, and three cheers were a proof that Strong had laid his hand on the right chord. This brought him up a peg or two; and as he stood there with his hands at full stretch,—and his voice, now as round as a drum and then as sharp as a file,—I felt that the cause which we all had so much at heart was more than safe. When Strong sat down, young Brag took the floor, and in less time than I can dip my pen, he shook his fist in the face of the foe. His speech was in the grand line. “What,” said he, in a tone which was meant to start the hair on end, “what can the big words do if we don't help them? Look at us and see what force we have!” (A loud “Hear, hear” broke in at this fine point.) “But for us, small though we are, where would be the hills, the dales, the woods, the streams, the sun, the moon, or the great sea, that wails like a dirge, or moans like a sad—sad—sad” (a slight smile was on Keen's face) “a big word would help me, but I spurn its aid. Can we not run, sit, climb, walk, or fly just as we please? Can we not dream by night and work by day? If they cast us out, how will good folks pray, or preach, or sing, and bad ones drink, or brawl, or lie? In time of war, how will men fight their foes, fire their guns, draw their swords, lift up the shield, or thrust with the spear? In time of peace, how will men plough their fields, sow their corn, reap their crops, send the young to school, or the old to church?” The short words were now in high glee; and they all felt that for the good of the cause they must vent their joy in three cheers more. The cheers brought my dream to a close; the noise woke me, and as the light of a new day broke into my room, I felt that, though big words might have a good use of their own, yet the time was a long way off when short words would not help to sing their joys, to tell their woes, and show the depth of their thought and love.

SUPERSTITION IN THE ORKNEYS.

THURSDAY is esteemed the luckiest day in the week for marriage. In former years the belief prevailed that if a cow were killed when the moon was in the wane, the beef would dwindle in the pot. Should the first lamb of the season be white, the omen is still regarded as fortunate, and the appearance of a black lamb is deemed unlucky. So late as 1814 there lived an old beldame in Stromness, named Bessie Miller, who sold favourable winds to mariners at the low charge of sixpence. Bessie is described as having been a withered, sharp-featured woman, with two light-blue eyes gleaming weirdly in her corpse-like face. She must have been kith and kin to Sycorax, the “blue-eyed hag,” mother of Caliban, “That could control the moon, make flows and ebbs.”

The Stromness Hecate boiled her kettle, muttered her incantations, and so raised the wind both for herself and her dupes. Kin to Sycorax, she was also the “weird sister” of Steine Bheag, the Ross-shire witch, whose wonderful deeds were recorded by Hugh Miller in his “Scenes and Legends.” Though Bessie has left no successor in the sale of winds trade, there are old crones lingering about the Islands who possess charms for curing toothache, and for ensuring safety in childbirth. One of these charms is a little pamphlet of two or three pages, containing a “Copy of a Letter written by our Blessed Saviour Jesus Christ; King Agbarus's Letter to our Saviour, and our Saviour's Answer; His Cures and Miracles; Lentulus's Epistle to the Senate of Rome concerning Jesus Christ.” The Letter of Jesus Christ, “faithfully translated from the original Hebrew copy now in the possession of Lady Cuba's family at Mesopotamia,” promises happiness and prosperity to the household in which a copy of it shall be found, and thus the pamphlet is greatly prized and carefully preserved by superstitious old women. First introduced perhaps by a travelling merchant, or “yagger,” in the palmy days of the great Kirkwall Fair, it still circulates quietly among some of the cottagers in Orkney and Shetland.—Corrie's “Summers and Winters in the Orkneys.”

INTELLIGENCE.

CHOPPINGTON.—On Sunday afternoon and evening last, open-air services were held at the above place, in which the Revs. J. C. Street, E. W. Hopkinson, and Messrs. Brown, Watson, and Pilkington took part. The congregations on both occasions were large.

CLERKENWELL.—On Tuesday, 18th instant, the Sunday-school children of this mission went in vans to Chingford, Essex. In the course of the day the school was admitted to view the interior of old Chingford Church (now a ruin), and there, in the part still kept in repair for occasional services, they sang several sacred pieces. On returning home they gave three hearty cheers for all who had contributed towards their real day of enjoyment.

EAST CHESHIRE UNITARIAN SUNDAY-SCHOOL UNION.—The third annual meeting of the members of this Union was held in the schoolroom at Styal, on Saturday, August 22nd. The three schools at present composing the union, viz., Congleton, Styal, and Dean Row were pretty fully represented, there being about thirty-five teachers present. After tea, the chairman of the union, Rev. A. Payne, opened the proceedings in an interesting speech, in which he dwelt especially on the questions of secular instruction and of doctrinal teaching in Sunday schools. The reading of the minutes of the previous meeting, and the secretary's statement of the various incidents of the last year gave rise to considerable discussion, much of which turned on the best mode of carrying on the teachers' library of reference, for which over one hundred volumes have already been collected. As one means of increasing its usefulness, it was determined that a fund should be established by the subscriptions of the members of the union for the purchase of valuable recently published works. Considerable discussion on the question of secular instruction in Sunday schools, as well as on the subject of religious services for the children, took place.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. E. C.—A. J.—A. L.—Received.

A MISSION FOR WIGAN.

To the Editors.—It is pleasing to see the amount of good done by the East Lancashire Unitarian Association, in establishing places of worship in various towns for the dissemination of the religious views we hold dear. Seeing this, I am induced to ask why it is that we have no mission in Wigan, where there is a population of from thirty to forty thousand souls? I am aware that several attempts have been made which were not successful, and I have heard people say, “That Unitarianism cannot live there.” With this opinion I beg to differ. I believe there are now about a dozen families living in the town, who find it inconvenient to go two miles and a half to Park Lane on a Sunday. These people send their children to other Sunday schools, because there is none of the right stamp at Wigan. Here is the nucleus of a congregation. Surely we are not to be told that Unitarianism can live in Hindley and Park Lane, and not in a town with a population like this.

I hope these few words will draw attention to the matter, and lead to something being done.—Yours truly, WILLIAM MOSS, Market-street, Manchester.

THE COMING WEEK.

Heap Bridge.—On Sunday, afternoon and evening, school sermons, by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A.
Leeds: HUNSLER.—On Sunday, continuation of opening services of the new church. Preachers: Morning, Rev. T. R. Elliott; evening, Rev. Brooke Herford.
Penmaenmawr: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. C. Beard, B.A., service at eleven a.m.

Marriages.

HARWOOD—MARSH.—On the 27th inst., at the Congregational Chapel, Heaton Mersey, near Stockport, by the Rev. S. Hooper, George Harwood, B.A., second son of Richard Harwood, of Bolton, to Alice, youngest daughter of the late James Marsh, of Worsley Messes, Wigan.
KEARSEY—ALDROFT.—On the 23rd inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, Swinton, by Mr. William Harrison, Mr. Edward Kearsley, of Bury, to Hannah Aldcroft, of Irlams-o'-th'-Height, Pendleton.
STANHOPE—BRADLEY.—On the 24th inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, Belper, by the Rev. Lees L. Lloyd, Mr. George Stanhope to Miss Ann Bradley, both of Belper.

Deaths.

ELGOOD.—On the 19th inst., at her son's house, Sale, near Manchester, Elizabeth Elgood, in her 64th year.
EMERY.—On the 13th inst., at Leicester, Mr. Thomas Emery, editor of the Leicester Free Press, aged 43 years.
SQUIER.—On the 21st inst., aged four years, Mary Victoria, only daughter of the Rev. W. C. Squier, of Stand, near Manchester.
WILSON.—On the 3rd inst., at Cambridge, U.S., Mr. John Wilson, aged 63 years.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,
FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS,
23 NUN HILL, BIRMINGHAM.
Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at
11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED.
We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, clean-flavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,
WINE MERCHANTS,
26, MARKET-STREET, MANCHESTER;
And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 877, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing offices, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, August 28, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 384.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing	284
What is Saying on Church Matters	284
Conference to Pusey	286
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XIX.	286
Review: An Antidote against Arianism	286
Something wanted in our Worship.—Part II.	287
Dr. Pusey and the "Nicene Creed"	287
A Story of Spirits	288
Religion and Science	288
The Secularists	288
Dulness in Sermons	289
Fire-side Readings: Sailing up the Firth	289
Flowers from Persian Gardens.—X.	289
The Window that made Faces ugly.—Chap. IX.	290
Longevity of the Jews	290
An Abyssinian Legend	290
Intelligence: Aberdeen, Hunslet, Newcastle, Seaton Burn	290
The Coming Week	290

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.

On Sunday next, the Rev. Dr. CHAS. STEVENS will PREACH in the morning, and the Rev. J. K. APPELBEET in the evening.

ROCHDALE, CLOVER-STREET.

On Sunday, September 6th, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached by the Rev. F. BISHOP, of Chesterfield. Service to commence in the afternoon at half-past two, and in the evening at half-past six o'clock.

A collection will be made at the close of each service in aid of the Sunday School.

OPENING OF A NEW ORGAN AT THE UNITARIAN CHAPEL, NEWBURY.

On Sunday, September 6th, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached by the Rev. G. H. WELLS, M.A., of Gorton. Service to commence in the afternoon at half-past two, and in the evening at six o'clock.

Colonel MUNN, J.P., has kindly consented to preside at the Organ, when a selection of Sacred Music from the works of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, &c., will be sung by the choir of St. James's Church, Waterloof.

Collections will be made in aid of the Organ Fund.

The Organ is built by Edward Wadsworth, Esq., of Manchester, and contains two full rows of keys, nine stops in the great organ, and six in the small pedal organ, C.C.C. to F., grand bourn and grand octave bass, four couplers, and four composition pedals.

Tea will be provided in the Schoolroom, for the convenience of friends from a distance. Tickets, sixpence each.

ELLAND: On Sunday, September 13th, TWO SERMONS will be preached on behalf of the Sunday Schools, by the Rev. JOHN ELLIS, minister. Afternoon, at half-past two; evening, at half-past six.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

THE SECOND TERM of the Academical Year, 1868-9, BEGINS on Monday, September the 7th.

JOHN R. BEARD.

DOMESTIC MISSION.—Received, with thanks, from a friend in Cheshire, £5.

R. D. DARSHIRE, Treasurer.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.— Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-
CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.—Principal: C. du G. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthily-situated establishment Boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemen education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G., 68, Guildford-street, Russell Square, London; or to Mr. A. G., 21, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

9, WELL CLOSE SQUARE, WHITBY.

THE REV. JOHN and Mrs. OWEN wish to receive two or three Ladies or Gentlemen as BOARDERS during the season.

THE Misses SMALLFIELD'S SCHOOL

RE-OPENS on Monday, September 15th, 1868.
33, Kensington Gardens Square, Bayswater, London, W.

TO BE LET, Unfurnished, at 32, Nelson Square, Blackfriars Road, S.E., TWO ROOMS, with large front Kitchen. No other lodgers, and only three in family.

OWENS COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD receives into his house, as members of his family, Young Men studying at Owens College. Two vacancies for next session. Mr. Herford will be glad to procure any information that may be desired respecting the terms, classes, &c., of the College.

1, Kersal Terrace, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

A YOUNG LADY, experienced in teaching, desires a RE-ENGAGEMENT as daily or afternoon GOVERNESS. Highest references.—Address D., care of Mr. Young, bookseller, Liverpool.

WANTED, by a Young Lady, a Re-engagement as DAILY or RESIDENT GOVERNESS in a family. Acquirements: English, French, Music, with Rudiments of German and Drawing.—Address Y., 140, Southgate Road, London.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.

THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, Containing Tunes to ALL Martinian Hymns.

London: Novello and Co., 1, Berner's-street, W. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6, Commercial-street; and of all music and book sellers.

ALL Friends of Free Religious Thought and the Free Expression of it should read the TRUTH-
SEEKER. Edited by JOHN PAGE HOPPS. Published monthly; price Threepence. Any bookseller will supply it to order on receiving the name of the London publisher: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL PENNY

MAGAZINE for SEPTEMBER contains:—The Proud King. Chapter I.—The Wedding Garment.—The Boys' Adventures. Chapter VII.—Aunt Ruth's Almanacs. Chapter II.—Servants which Every Man may Keep.—Judas Iscariot as a Boy.—How the Sun, the Moon, and the Wind went out to Dinner.—Contentment.

Published by the Manchester District Sunday-School Association. London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson, 59, Market-street. General Agent: Mr. T. P. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

In three vols. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES. Translated by SAMUEL SHARPE. Being a Revision of the Authorized English Old Testament. "Superior to any preceding revision of our English translation."—Athenæum.

E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

A SELECTION OF TRACTS FROM HOME PAGES, illustrative of Unitarian Christianity. Price 9d., made up into packets containing one each of the following Tracts:—

A Common-sense View of the Bible.
Are not we Christians Also?
Trying to believe in God.
Socrates the Martyr.
Love to Christ—the true saving faith.
Two Schemes of Salvation.
Common-sense view about Man's Nature.
Saved, yet so as by fire; or the object of future punishment.
Christianity as Christ preached it.
Do Men Mean what they say?
Christ our Saviour, not our Substituted.
What Christ has done for us.
Think for Yourself.
The Work of the Spirit in Man's Heart.
Not what Men believe, but what they are.
Repentance the true Atonement.
For 2s. a packet containing six of each of the above Tracts.

All orders must now be made direct to Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

SECOND-HAND ENGLISH & AMERICAN UNITARIAN BOOKS, SOME NEW.—The following Works, FOR CASH, may be obtained from JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester:

Plummer's Debates on the Trinity	5 s. d.
Peabody's Christian Consolation	1 6
Christian Doctrine	3 0
Palfrey's Sermons	2 6
Coquerel's Protestantism in Paris	3 6
Sear's Pictures of the Olden Time	2 6
Elliot's Lectures to Young Women	2 6
Lectures to Young Men	2 6
Early religious Education	2 0
Judd on The Church	3 6
Life of Judd	3 6
Walker's Sermons	2 6
Livemore's Discourses of Concord	4 0
Brooke's Simplicity of Christ's Teachings	3 9
Badger's Memoir	3 6
Select Discourses of Channing	2 10
Lyra; or, Thompson's Hymns on Heaven	4 6
Burnap's Christianity	4 0
Belsham's Sermons of Concord	4 0
Spear's Names and Titles of Jesus	3 6
Larned's Life and Eloquence	2 6
Chapin's Humanity in the City	3 6
Bartoli's Spirit and Life	3 6
Hill's Jesus the Interpreter of Nature	3 6
Extracts from Abbott's Sermons	4 4
Noyes' Translation of Psalms (nearly new)	5 0

Beard's Biographical Dictionary	5 0
Walker's Sermons, 4 vols., good condition	13 6
Sheppard's Divine Origin of Christianity, &c.	7 0
Carpenter (Dr.) on Practical Subjects	4 0
Holland's Sermons, 2 vols.	8 0
Sydney Smith's Sermons, 2 vols.	8 0
Cogan's Sermons, 2 vols.	6 6
Bruce's Sermons, 1 vol.	4 6
Evanson's Sermons, 2 vols.	4 6
Belsham's Discourses, 2 vols.	4 0
Chasold's Last Hours of Eminent Christians, 1 vol.	6 0
Landay's (James), D.D., Sermons, 1 vol.	5 0
Cappe's Discourses on Practical Subjects	2 6
Cappe on the Providence, &c., of God, 1 vol.	2 0
12 Discourses, various, by Beisham and others, 1 vol.	3 4
Harrison's (Ralph) Sermons, 1 vol.	4 3
Ree's Practical Sermons, 2 vols.	6 6
Eathon's Sermons on Religious Indifference	4 0
Jay's Discourses, 2 vols.	7 0
Logan's Sermons, 2 vols.	6 6
Bransby's Discourses, 1 vol.	3 0
Giles's Christian Records, 1 vol.	2 6
Turner's (H.) Sermons, 2nd edition, 1 vol.	2 6
Hinck's (John) Sermons, 1 vol.	6 6
Kenrick's (T.) Discourses, 2 vols.	7 6
Houghton's Sermons, 2 vols.	7 6
Turner's (W.) Sermons, 1 vol.	2 6
Webb's (F.) Sermons, 1 vol.	6 6
Snapp's (J.) Sermons, 1 vol.	3 6
Buckminster's Sermons, 3 vols.	12 0
Wilson's Spiritual Catholicity	5 0
Britland's Sermons, 2 vols.	6 6
Acton's Memoir and Sermons, 1 vol.	3 6
Enfield's Sermons, 3 vols.	3 6
Robinson's Sermons, 1 vol.	2 0
Holland's (J.) Sermons, 2 vols.	7 6
Kentish's (J.) Sermons, 1 vol.	4 0
Hawkes' (W.) Sermons, 2 vols.	7 0

PRESENT Condition of Unitarian and Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 3d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.,

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME

of the late

GEORGE BROWN,

Barrister-at-Law,

Containing 17 sermons preached by him

in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle.

Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A.,

with

Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 8s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to

Mr. JOSEPH LEE,

Barnard Castle.

"GO TO SPACKMAN, MERCHANT

CLOTHIER, HATTER, AND OUTFITTER, BELFAST.

"For all you want in CLOTHING. I get all I possibly can from him myself. He has the largest, best, most fashionable, and cheapest stock of READY-MADE CLOTHING in the WORLD."—Extract from a recommendation to an American friend visiting Europe, by Mr. Cook, the Great European and Transatlantic "Excursionist."

COALS! COALS!—NOTICE OF

REMOVAL.—JAMES WELLS, Coal and Coke Merchant, Keeper Wharf, Ratcliffe, E. Office: 23, Coborn-street, Bow Road, E.

J. W. takes this opportunity of informing his numerous customers, friends, and the public generally, that he has REMOVED to the above address, where he hopes, by strict attention to business, to merit a continuance of their favours.

He would remind them that Coals are now at the lowest prices for the present season, and would advise them to purchase as soon as possible. A trial is solicited. Quality guaranteed at prices advertised in the daily newspapers.

Orders by post punctually attended to.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,

FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS,

23 SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE,

3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER.

(Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse).

J. BALLS, Proprietor.

NEW GOODS FOR THE SUMMER SEASON.

WILLIAM MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also

Bannockburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits, also

FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of

Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant,

STOCKPORT.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8,

Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck

was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 71, Lower

Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted

to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

WHITFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and

SAVES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS,

CASH and DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c.,

&c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITFIELD & SONS,

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET,

EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE,

BIRMINGHAM.

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED

AND OTHER NEEDLES.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS

of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical

Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital.

Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET,

EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE

BIRMINGHAM.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use

WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE

USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at

11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED.

We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, cleanflavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical

Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,

WINE MERCHANTS,

26, MARKET-STREET,

And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool. MANCHESTER;

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The Calcutta Englishman gives an account of the burial of the late Queen of Madagascar. The body was swathed in nearly 500 silk "lambas," in the folds of which 20 gold watches, 100 gold chains, rings, brooches, bracelets, and other jewellery, together with 500 gold coins, were rolled. All the presents she had received from the Queen and the Emperor of the French were buried with her, and all her furniture and personal effects. Directly the Queen's death was made known, all the people, with the exception of about twenty of the highest officers, had to cut off their hair and put off all their clothing except the "lamba," and this only to wear from the waist to the knees, until after the funeral, when the shoulders were to be covered by the "lamba," but nothing else worn. No singing is allowed whilst mourning for a sovereign; no clay walls nor houses are to be built; no earthenware made, and a great many more things are forbidden. The queen's coffin was made of silver dollars, and is valued at about £4,500. The tomb is built like that of Radama I., only the little house on the top is painted scarlet, with gilt posts and eagles. There is a bar of silver across the door, and the inscription is laid in solid gold.

It appears that notwithstanding the abhorrence which the Pope has evinced of journalists and newspaper correspondents, he has himself taken to dabbling in the evil thing. He seems to have caught the infection while reading the proofs of the Civiltà Catholica, for it is from the annotations he then made that he has composed several articles which have appeared in the official journal at Rome. The last Giornale de Roma contains some anonymous strictures by the Holy Father on a canon of Vienna, Father Egidio Dalla Vallez, who held the condemned doctrines of Febronius, and lately died unrepentant.

The Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall gives the following extraordinary statement about a new saint:

"Nothing is now talked of at Rome but the new saint, Maria Taigi, a washerwoman in the service of the Chigi family, who died here in 1837, in the odour of sanctity. A great sensation has been created by her prophecies, which were confided to her confessor, Father Natali, now 90 years of age, who has faithfully related them as the events successively happened. The proofs of her present residence in heaven are incontestible, though her body is still on earth, having just been exhumed. The corpse was found perfectly fresh and flexible, and is now exposed in a chapel ardente, raised at the expense of the Princess Barberini, in the aforesaid church, where everybody in Rome, with the exception of myself, has kissed its feet. The exhumation was ordered on the demand of the Postulator for her canonization, on his adducing the proofs of her beatitude, which state, among other wonders, that her image was sent to the Capitol last October, with an intimation that the building was threatened by a great danger, which nothing but this palladium could avert. The next day brought the insurrectionary attack, at the time supposed to have been repulsed by the troops, but now admitted to having been foiled by the miraculous image. The Marquis Cavaletti, senator of Rome, is determined to commemorate this event in a becoming manner, the Capitol being under his care; and he has ordered it to be represented in a picture, which will be placed in one of the galleries. The other day the confessor was asked whether Maria Taigi prophesied any further danger from the Garibaldians. 'Yes,' he answered, 'and in those days we shall see the Tiber as full of corpses as it now is of fish.' At this moment fish are so abundant in the Tiber, owing to the floods from the Sembra, that the Romans pick them out of the water with their hands. The soldiers in the camp of evolution are preparing for the evil time; and to-day they will engage in a sham fight at Albano, when the Zouaves will defend the town against assailants from Ariccia and Castelgandolfo."

The same correspondent is assured, on good authority, that the next promotion to the cardinalate will include Dr. Manning, Archbishop of Westminster, and, possibly, the Archbishop of Paris, who at last has consented to sign a retraction.

The accounts from Paris give proofs of the growing activity and influence of the Protestant Churches there. The power of the priesthood over the working men is gone, and they are craving for a faith which will satisfy at once their reason and their religious nature. M. de Pressensé's church have opened several mission stations, which are said to be crowded with hearers, and he, with his co-pastors in the Taitbout Church, and others, contemplate founding a Theological Seminary or Faculty in Paris for the training of ministers and evangelists. If conducted on really free principles, such a school of theology may play an important part in the present state of religion in France.

The cathedral in memory of Cardinal Wiseman is about to be built in Westminster. £50,000 is to be spent upon it. It is to contain a shrine by Mr. Pugin, to be placed first over the Cardinal's grave, in Kensal-green, and transferred with his remains to the contemplated edifice, when ready to receive the deposit. Special interest is attached to the building, as it will be the first Catholic Cathedral which the Catholics have been enabled to erect since the Reformation.

A new church has been opened at Brighton to meet the wants of those who, not satisfied with the Establishment, are yet not disposed to enter the ranks of Dissent. Both within and without its appearance is that of a "high" church. The sermon of dedication was preached by Dr. Cumming, and the prayers were read by a clergyman of the Church of England, who is permanently associated with the duties with Mr. Winslow, the incumbent, while the sermon in the afternoon was preached by the vicar of Portsea. The service was that of the Liturgy of the Church of England, strictly followed, with two exceptions, namely, that in the Absolution the word "power" was omitted; and in the Apostles' Creed, the words "He descended into hell." Mr. Winslow repudiates Dissent, and declines to rank himself as a seceder from the Established Church. In fact, many absolute members of the Church are gathered together among his congregation, which has not to be sought, but was organised before the church was built. The church, in short, is not to be the instrument of forming an ecclesiastical following, but springs from the wants of a large body of religionists seeking organisation, and who propose to describe themselves as of the Free Church of England.

The Rev. Canon McNeile's devotion to Disraelism and the Irish Church has been rewarded. He is appointed to the vacant deanery of Ripon.

No successor to Dr. Jeune in the see of Peterborough has yet been appointed; but as Mr. Disraeli has promoted a moderate man like Dr. Atlay, and an extreme Evangelical like Dr. McNeile, the High Church party think it is now their turn to have something good from him. The Church News is anxious for the appointment of Archdeacon Denison, but we should hardly think the outspoken Archdeacon had much chance of being turned into a Bishop.

A Methodist college has been opened in Belfast, the erection of which has cost the body £24,000. The Methodists of America have contributed £10,000 towards an endowment fund. The president is the Rev. William Arthur, ex-president of Conference.

As a farewell testimonial to Dr. McCosh before leaving for America, a handsome silver service was presented to him in Belfast from friends belonging to various denominations.

It is stated that a son of Mr. Gladstone's will be a candidate for holy orders at the Christmas ordination of the Bishop of Winchester, and will be ordained to the curacy of St. Mary-the-Less, Lambeth, of which the Rev. R. Gregory is the incumbent.

Some shrewd practical laymen of the Establishment, foreseeing the inevitable disestablishment of the Irish Church, offer to come to the rescue, by starting a fund, not for raising a cry, but for the purposes of the Church when it shall have been disestablished. Two laymen offer £1,000 each, with a promise of more when the fund shall have been started.

A project is on foot to establish in Manchester a branch of the Brotherhood of the Holy Redeemer, an order founded some years ago by the rector of East and West Torrington, Lincolnshire. The object is to assist in the revival of religious life in the Church of England, chiefly through the instrumentality of young men as mission priests, lay helpers, schoolmasters, organists, &c.

The dispute, respecting the appointment of a successor to the late Dr. Lee, between the congregation and the town council of Edinburgh, still continues, and excites great interest throughout Scotland, as bearing on the subject of patronage. The people have set their hearts on the Rev. R. Wallace, the minister of an adjoining congregation, and as two of the clergy, Dr. Glog and Dr. Taylor, who were proposed for their acceptance, have declined the presentation on account of the attitude assumed by them, it seems likely that, if they hold on, they will gain their point.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The writer of "Conference Sketches" in the Methodist Recorder says of the Rev. Thomas Jackson's letter to Conference:

"I cannot help noticing the hearty response which the sentiments of this letter elicited. Some few did not appear to like this strong expression from the lips of the sunny old conservative, but they were only units in comparison to hundreds. The Church of England, in the persons of many of her sons, insults us constantly by insolent denials of our ecclesiastical claims, or by proposals for absorption; but until she cleanses herself from the bastard Popery and skulking infidelity which now disgrace her, she cannot hope or ask for our support, and she ought to thank us if we do not lift our hands to strike her. Strict political neutrality we are all agreed to observe, but an active moral support of the Church of England, in her present condition, it would be impossible to secure from the Conference, and it would be improper to give."

The Rock has the following pretty little bit of clerical assumption:

We cannot altogether endorse much of the prevalent criticism on sermons. Too many of our critics, in their irreverence and disrespect, on this question seem to forget that the clergy are set in authority to teach them, and that they have no authority to teach the clergy."

The Methodist Times considers that good may arise from the way in which the Times and the Saturday Review have taken up the subject of preaching. It says:

"We may be grateful that through channels so unusual, the subject of preaching will be presented to thousands of alienated minds. Reflection may end in conversion. We hope that the readers may inquire for themselves, why it is that the sermons they hear are not more interesting. We believe that in some cases the honest thinker will conclude that the parson's purpose and subject have repelled, and not the defective mode in which the speaker has enforced the claims of Divine truth upon his mind. There is a strong temptation to a guilty audience to offer the parson as the sacrificial victim for their conscience sins. This disposition tinged, with an offensive die, the spirit of these public censors of the pulpit."

After mentioning that Sir Roundell Palmer tosses aside with contempt most of the reasons which have commended themselves to Mr. Disraeli as good for "cries," that he scouts as "nonsense" all the talk about the Coronation Oath, the Act of Union, and the Supremacy of the Crown, and ridicules the idea which "some excellent people have got into their heads, that it is the abstract duty of the State to have some Established Church everywhere," the Scotsman points out the weakness of the ground on which the great lawyer rests his support of the Irish Church—namely, that, from want of habit, the Episcopalian Protestants are not, and never will be, able to provide for themselves. Our contemporary justly says:

"In Ireland, and not less in Scotland, experience presents insuperable obstacles to Sir Roundell's theory, that from having so long possessed endowments, Irish Episcopalian Protestantism is disqualified not only now, but apparently for ever, for existing without them. Irish Roman Catholicism, whose adherents are in the main the poorest of the poor, has lived and thriven without endowments throughout those same three hundred years in which Irish Protestantism has pined and dwindled with endowments; and Sir Roundell forgets that the Irish Roman Catholics formerly possessed the endowments which in one day were transferred to the Protestants. Is this power of existing without endowments given only to Roman Catholic and denied to Protestant Churches? The most recent, if not the strongest, answer is supplied by Scotland. Not to go back to earlier and smaller cases of the same kind, something like a half of the Established Church of Scotland—men trained under the endowment system—chose, one day, to throw up endowments; and, from the very day after, have found no difficulty in providing for their spiritual wants without endowments. That new and unendowed Church, composed of men formerly accustomed to rely on endowments, now provides without endowments 900 clergymen, and includes a population nearly double the whole number of adherents of the Irish Established Church. Wherein does Irish Episcopacy differ from Scotch Presbyterianism as to anything bearing upon this question? The only visible difference is this—that the Scotch Presbyterians who have so provided for themselves are, generally speaking, poor; whilst the Irish Episcopalians who are declared unable to provide for themselves are, generally speaking, rich and powerful. There is another difficulty about this argument of Sir Roundell's, that the Irish Episcopalian Protestants cannot provide for themselves owing to want of habit—if it is good at this time, it is good to the end of time, and indeed will get better or stronger with every century. The Irish Protestants, says Sir Roundell, cannot swim, because they have never needed to go into the water, and therefore it would be very cruel to induce them to go into the water: endowments are things that may be begun, but never ended—may be given, but never resumed. This, which is his main position, Sir Roundell Palmer supports by some outworks, to which it is wonderful that so able a man should have put his hand."

Punch informs us that that Anglican out-and-outer, Archdeacon Denison, is deeply disgusted with Dr. Pusey's letter to the Wesleyan Conference. He declares its animus is Pusey-I-animous.

Mr. Burgon, of Oriel, Oxford, writing to "Dear Dr. Pusey" on the same letter, tells him that he has read it "with unmingled astonishment and concern;" and after describing his plan for preserving the religious character of the University, he says: "I freely declare that of all the wild expedients I have ever seen committed to paper by a good man, I never in my life met with anything more wild, more impracticable than this." "It must not be thought for an instant that you have expressed the sentiments of this University, or even of any considerable number within it. Your proposal is entirely your own; a proposal which I venture to assert that you will not find five Churchmen in the place to endorse." "The bill of Mr. Coleridge, irreligious as it was, would have been far less mischievous in its operation than the proposal of which you are now the advocate. From his scheme there would have been an escape at some future day, if the University and the country at large were ever to come to a better mind. From yours, there never could be any. You are for stereotyping the evil, and for making it irremediable." "How you can possibly contemplate with any measure of complacency the confiscation of Church revenues for the permanent endowment of schismatic bodies in Oxford, and then call your scheme 'religious,' I am unable to understand. A more irreligious spectacle I can scarcely imagine, or one more certainly destructive of any definite faith at all. I question if religious Dissenters would be parties to it. I am sure they would repent of their folly if they did. What you say about endowing Socinianism bewilders me quite." "Would to Heaven that I could convince you and others, that the way out of our present difficulties is neither to propose a compromise with the Romanists on the one hand, nor with the Wesleyan body on the other. The Papists (excuse me) will only smile, and put your book on the Index. The Methodists will only stare, and wonder why the author of the Eirenicon should address overtures to them. Believe me, my friend, no such methods will be of the least avail. With Rome, until she revokes her blasphemous dogma of 1854, there can be no concordat. With Dissent, so long as it remains Dissent, there can be no compromise. There must be no sitting on the same platform with Methodists on the one hand; no ignoring of our differences with the Papists on the other."

Referring to the same subject, the Guardian remarks:

"We doubt the wisdom of making direct overtures to those who are on the watch for opportunities to proclaim their absolute determination to refuse them. By all means let charity, and proper courtesy, be carefully observed towards the members of religious bodies external to our own communion: we shall gain nothing—perhaps lose a great deal—by anathemas or affronts. Charitably and courteously we may watch for opportunities favourable to reconciliation with those who have been estranged from us. But we shall not create the opportunities by an attitude of entreaty which corresponds as little to our own inward convictions as to the sentiments and prejudices of those in whose presence we assume it. If Wesleyans are to be won back to the Church, it must be through their own persuasion of the justice of her claims, and, still more, through their admiration of the beauty of the religious life and spiritual training which she provides. The craving for unity which our own Church principles have taught us to feel has no proper existence with them. Keen emulation between rival communities is a religious idea with which they are much more familiar. We do not like to say that our busy and pious negotiators are sowing the seed in vain: it may spring up, let us hope against hope, hereafter; but assuredly it will be after many days. England must be other than she is, before her divided children can begin to be of one heart and mind in religion again."

On Dr. Pusey's scheme, the Pall Mall makes the following pertinent remarks:

"Suppose that Oxford was divided, as he suggests, amongst a variety of denominations—that University was given to the Jews, Magdalen to the Roman Catholics, Balliol to the Unitarians, Oriel to the Baptists, Brasenose to one set of Wesleyans, and New College to another, whilst the dean and canons of Christ Church still appertained to the Church of England. When the division was complete, what effect would be produced on the minds of the students, who, as we are constantly told, do now receive at Oxford definite dogmatic teaching as the teaching of the university? What could they possibly learn except that all the tutors, professors, fellows, masters, and other university authorities contradicted each other upon religious subjects? And to what result could this lead except the very one which Dr. Pusey regards with such horror—the practical admission that the truth in these matters is unascertainable, and that a bond fide search after it ends in irreconcilable difference of opinion? But if you must come to this at last, why not admit it at first? What is the good of building with immense labour and trouble an edifice which must infallibly fall to pieces and destroy you when it is erected? Is such a process anything else—can it be anything else—than an elaborate insertion of one's head into the sand in order to avoid an unpleasant sight? The fact we have to deal with is that religion is, and from henceforth must and will be, matter of opinion. We are forced to recognize this at some time and in some form or other, and whether we do so at once and frankly by adopting the principle of Mr. Coleridge's bill, or in a roundabout reluctant way by adopting Dr. Pusey's suggestion, the fact remains unaltered, and, what is more, the practical result will ultimately be the same, subject always to this—that Dr. Pusey's scheme would direct the attention of the young men in the most pointed way to religious differences, whilst it would at the same time intimate to them in the most emphatic manner that those differences were of little real importance. No youth of the commonest intelligence could help asking himself, in such a state of things, why, if Socinianism was such a terrible thing, the State had endowed a Socinian college, and why the undergraduates who went there were so very like those who went to the Wesleyan or the Church college? Dr. Pusey ought to know better than most people the sort of answers which such questions usually receive."

Like the English Independent,

"We find it hard to understand how Anglican writers and speakers can, with unblushing boldness, talk about the religious influences of the colleges. Dr. Pusey looks forward with great alarm to the probable consequences of opening the fellowships on the minds of young men who, 'in the first excitement of the fresh feeling of intellectual power, before judgment is matured, and when they themselves are disposed to embrace anything which looks to them new and bold, should be committed to irreligious novelties which may destroy their faith.' But granting the possibility of this peril, surely it exists now, and the system of subscription has failed to check it to any appreciable extent. Dr. Pusey is conscious of this, but he thinks that the trifling with the obligations of subscription is a temporary thing, that the influence of these lax views is declining, and, 'if the university is left to itself, will pass away.' This is, to say the least, a very sanguine calculation, and is certainly not justified by past experience. Subscription having utterly failed hitherto to give that security which he desires, it is surely idle to expect that it will become more efficient in the future, and to talk of maintaining it as a bulwark of orthodoxy and religion. Nor must Dr. Pusey forget—when he condemns those who, treating subscription as an obsolete form which must not be allowed to interfere with free thought, have felt themselves at liberty to inculcate Rationalist views—there are numbers who think that he and his friends have been just as guilty on the other side, and who, while they would be very unwilling to see the universities converted into 'propagandas of unbelief,' are just as displeased to see them become what they have too often been—Propagandas of Romanism. To earnest Protestant Dissenters outside, it appears impossible that the minds of young men could be exposed to greater peril in a state of perfect freedom, than they are now under the restrictions of a system which has sought to enforce uniformity, but whose whole history is one of egregious failure. If, indeed, these were the colleges provided by the Anglican Church for the education of her clergy, she would be entitled to govern them as she should see best. There may be foundations in Oxford and Cambridge answering to this description, and with their management no one would propose to interfere. But colleges which are the property of the nation ought to be available for all classes of the people, and to this point we are, through much misconception and mystification, slowly but certainly making our way."

In an article on Madagascar, the same paper says:

"The history of Christianity there has no parallel, except that of its victories over the Paganism of Greece and Rome in the first centuries. The devotion of the missionaries, the simplicity of the earliest converts, the fierceness of the persecution which quickly arose, the steadfastness and heroism with which the fury of the idolatrous Queen and populace were endured, the change of opinion which the faithfulness and purity of the Christian natives gradually wrought, the alternations of fear and joy which attended the accession of each new sovereign to the throne, and the gradual progress of the new religion under all alternations of frown or favour from the ruling powers, are among the most satisfactory attestations to the power of the truth in modern times, and the best credentials of modern missionary enterprise. Only a few months ago the fears of those who were watching the progress of Christianity in the island were awakened by letters describing the discovery of a plot against the Government, in which some of the native Christians were said to be implicated, with the apprehension of the supposed conspirators, followed almost immediately by the death of the Queen. But before any explanation had been received, or the probable issues of these events could be calculated, it is announced that the new Sovereign has disclaimed idolatry in a way which none of her predecessors had either been inclined or had ventured to do, and that her people have at once, and, as it would seem with the utmost readiness of mind, generally adopted Christian usages—such as the observance of the Lord's-day. The Christian places of worship are crowded, and idol worship is neglected. And this popular acceptance of Christianity has been accompanied by a curious leap into civilisation. The Government encourages education, and gives permission to build houses with brick and stone."

The Athenæum says that "a swan from Norwich is yearly presented to the Pope as a tribute of respect from a devoted son of the Church of Rome." Whether it is that rara avis, a black swan, our contemporary does not inform us.

In a brief notice of "A Tract on the subject of our Bishops and Mr. Voysey," the Guardian observes:

"Mr. Voysey may be insignificant, but the quiet toleration of his outrageous language is not so. Our Bishops, in the present state of the law, may well shrink from acting. Yet is it not a case wherein it is a duty to act without regard of consequences?"

In a second letter to the Times on "pulpit cowardice," S. G. O. says:

"I do not deny that we see evidence on all sides of great money expenditure, in really good religious and philanthropic works at home, that there is a great apparent zeal for the extension of Christianity in foreign lands. I do not dream of a day when the principles and precepts of our holy religion shall triumph universally in any favoured spot of our globe. What I do see to mourn over, that on which I clearly foresee danger to the Church is, that all this savours but too much of the reception of a creed to which we pay thus far great deference, but are, alas! stopping far short of doing much else which it equally demands. We rub the platter very hard, make a great noise in doing it, polish it to the utmost, for ever point to the success of the operation, declare year after year it never looked so well, and yet are content thus to claim on the credit of its service that it really reflects good from a valuable and substantial basis, when we know well how much of our work is wholly superficial. There may be legions of communicants, vast and increasing masses of people who make up congregations, churches may have so increased that already the face of the land is churchpocked, Ecclesiasticism has become eruptive, and the evidence of its inoculation meets the eye in all directions; and all this does not blind me to the fact that the machinery, however vast, however fed with material, has failed, is failing, to do the work with reason to be expected. The world, were its followers to call their devotion to it religion, would soon prove that, however they may accept the Church as a wholesome institution to uphold a teaching to which they are willing to offer some deference, they will not accept it as that to the rebukes of which against their lives they will yield. All the money devoted in one year by the members of the Church for philanthropic purposes would scarce amount to that risked on 'a Derby'; the money spent in one year to uphold the Turf would, I believe, far exceed all contributed for the same time to increase church accommodation and extend the knowledge of the Gospel to other lands. Strange to say, the betting-book and the Prayer-book will be often found in company, the owner using either as the scene he frequents may demand. Is not the worlding in a position to claim his triumphs if he chose to thus depreciate those of the Church?"

The Freeman, referring to Dr. Pusey's letter to Conference, observes:

"He is a good, amiable, and religious man, and thoroughly sincere; but he certainly does not comprehend us. We have had far too much of denominational ticketing already. We do not desire to perpetuate the evil in seeking equality at the Universities. If Churchmen are dissatisfied with equality of education at the National Universities, and at the charge of the national property, then let them seek another educational Alma Mater, where they may enjoy the pleasures of regarding themselves as the ecclesiastically élite. Such, however, happily is becoming less and less the temper of English laymen, and budding "successors of the Apostles" must join the majority or seek their own Gamaliels. But, like sensible people, they will be content to learn on all general subjects from the best men, and to seek the theological professors of the church of their choice."

A correspondent of the Methodist Times gives a lamentable account of what the Homilist is doing in certain quarters, especially among a certain class of young Wesleyan ministers, who take it as their model, and who, in consequence, are "shallow, pedantic, and priggish, and souls are not converted under them." It says:

"In the Homilist we have had ambiguous reference to the Deity of Christ, hazy and uncertain references to His Cross, something Socinian on the atonement, and a radically unsafe and unsound reference to the blood of sprinkling. Now this is the periodical which in a great measure supersedes the study of the Bible, and which so many of our young readers patronise. What has caused the decadence of orthodoxy in the English Congregational pulpit, within the last few years—a decadence which filled the late Dr. John Campbell's great soul with much sorrow before he died, and which is still exciting the apprehensions of many venerable ministers who are yet spared to us, such as Parsons of York and Kelly of Liverpool? We reply, the Homilist, more than any other cause. Let a preacher select it as his model of sermonising, and from that hour his weakness and barrenness may be dated."

CONFERENCE TO PUSEY.

No, Pusey, no; it is no go:

Your overture's made in vain.
Any green in our eye, do you think you spy,
That you seek our aid to gain?
We know your creed, and we can't, indeed,
In the same boat pull with you.
We must decline; take your own line,
And paddle your own canoe.
For to ourselves we'll keep ourselves,
Your Colleges' plan won't do.
We shall not drown, if you go down;
So paddle your own canoe.

No peace with Rome, or those at home
Who wear Rome's mask, say we;
And there the vest upon your breast
Is branded with M. B.
Nay, Pusey, nay, away, away!
We never can join your crew:
You're adrift on the tide, to the Tiber's side:
No, paddle your own canoe.
For, &c.

You offer one hand to the Papal band,
And the other to us extend;
Do you really hope that we and the Pope
Can acknowledge a "mutual friend?"
You tell us our bark is not an Ark;
We don't believe that's true.
We'd trust a raft before your craft:
Just paddle your own canoe.
For &c.

Of an ocean trip in partnership
Our principles won't allow.
You had better, a deal, have the Fisherman's Seal
Stamped fairly on your brow.
We must leave in the lurch, both you and the Church
'That encourages yours and you.
Our fingers don't itch for a touch at pitch:
Go, paddle your own canoe.
For &c. Punch.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XIX.

SUBJECT: The Hebrew writers teach that God Himself is our Saviour and our Redeemer.

Read Isaiah xliii. 1—25. Jehovah tells the Hebrew nation not to fear, for He has redeemed them, He has called them by their name; they are His. He, Jehovah, is their God and their Saviour. He reminds them that they are His witnesses and His servant, whom He has chosen to come to the knowledge and belief and understanding that He is God. "I, even I, am Jehovah, and beside me there is no Saviour." This people whom He has formed for Himself, they shall show forth His praise. And He assures them that, though they have burdened Him with their sins, and wearied Him with their iniquities, "I, even I, am He that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and I will not remember thy sins."

Read also Isaiah lix. 1—20. The Prophet declares that Jehovah's hand is not shortened that it cannot save, neither is His ear heavy that it cannot hear; but it is our iniquities that have separated us from God, and our sins that have hid His face from us. Yet notwithstanding that we have transgressed and departed from God, the writer goes on to tell us Jehovah needeth no intercessor, His own arm worketh salvation. He is to come clothed both with vengeance and salvation; that is to say, He is to bring with Him punishment and forgiveness. In reading this passage we may remark that while the Jews had gained views of God's patient correction of sin, they had by no means learned that His forbearance was to be dealt out equally to all mankind. We have here two different treatments—a severer retribution for the nation's enemies, a more forgiving treatment for the favoured people. Thus we read, verse 18, "According to their deeds, accordingly He will repay, fury to his adversaries, recompence to his enemies." But a little further on, He is to come a Redeemer unto Zion and unto those that turn from transgressions in Jacob.

REVIEW.

An Antidote against Arianism. By Erasmus Warren, Rector of Worlington. London, 1712.

THIS old duodecimo, which is in the form of an exposition of the Athanasian Creed, brings before us an interesting phase in the history of the Trinitarian controversy. The author writes in strong condemnation of the modal or Sabellian explanation of the Trinity, then prevalent, and plumes himself on putting forth a final and satisfactory hypothesis, which he calls "The vital Trinity." This is, in brief, that the three persons are three lives, existing in one essence, or having a "specific unity," though in what way the substitution of the word life for person, which is, in fact, the sum total of his work, in any way solves the difficulties of the doctrine, it seems hard to see. He, however, was clear that it somehow did, and, confident in the brilliance of his discovery, speaks most candidly of the popular Trinitarianism:

"To a great deal written of the Blessed Triad even by learned men, I may too fitly apply Hermias his expression (Illis. Gent. Phil.), "All is but darkness of ignorance, and black mistake, and infinite error, and imperfect thought, and incomprehensible foolishness." (Preface.)

"For Christians to enjoy the blessed Gospel almost 1,700 years, to be baptised into the faith of a Trinity, and to own and successively profess that they believed it as a prime and fundamental article, and yet during all these centuries to have no notions of it, even amongst the most learned and wise, but what was light, and vain, and empty, silly, impertinent, and nonsensical—to say no worse, if searched to the bottom, is not this sad and dismal to consider? Yet this was not the worst. . . . [For when thus in the dark, they, taking the best means to remain there] determined it to be a profound mystery, and then never attempted to unfold it, as concluding it to be inexplicable." p. 75.

That a Gospel which was to be that of the poor should be composed of subtle mysteries, he admits to be incredible:

"How can it comport with God's infinite goodness, or consist with His infinite wisdom, and so conduce to His honour and glory, to make the main article of saving faith to Christians so puzzling and intricate as that none of them yet could ever thoroughly understand it themselves, or explain it competently unto others?" (Preface.)

"For my own part, I declare that it will be very hard for me to think that the doctrine of the Holy Triad which the meanest assent to at their initiation into Christ, and are to adhere to and profess ever after, should be deeply mysterious, or so cloudy and obscure as not to be competently understood." p. 75.

He considers his own hypothesis to be free from mystery. It is in effect, as we have indicated, merely that more Tritheistic view currently adopted in the present day, though perhaps few of our modern divines of similar opinion would endorse his admission of the Son's natural inferiority to the Father:

"Between the Father on the one side, and the Son and Holy Ghost on the other, there is as much difference as can be between a Being self-originated and those that are derivative from it. And then certain it is that, in point of co-ordinative parity, they must differ. . . . Is there not, and must there not be, difference between their eternities, when that of the Father is most absolute, and the Son's dependent on His?"

He considers that prayer may be offered to all three Persons, but admits that the Lord's Prayer, whether taken as an absolute form or as the model of prayer, teaches us to pray to the Father only, and concludes that "Should right apprehension of the Father's pre-eminence in self-originated excellency induce any to direct their devotions to Him primarily, by and through the Son and Holy Spirit (in other respects like Him and equal to Him), this . . . would be very approvable. He being really what He has styled Himself, Psalms xc. 3, the Lord, the great God, and the great King above all Gods."

After these evidences of Mr. Warren's independent mode of thinking, our readers will not be surprised to find him maintain that "The Holy Three have each of them an image in human figure, symbolically representing their adorable selves." p. 84.

Such a theory has often been suggested with regard to the Son, but never before, to our knowledge, of the Father, though it is plain what advantage it gives the advocate of Biblical inspiration in explaining anthropomorphic allusions. Mr. Warren asserts it also of the Holy Ghost, though this is the most difficult task for him to prove, saying that He,

"As well as the other two divine persons, does now and will for ever grace us by wearing a body, a most glorious body, of the form of ours."

Orthodoxy, much as the term has been perverted, means, after all, right opinion, that is, truth. In such a sense we heartily echo the prayer with which Mr. Warren enters on his labours:

"And now I make it my most humble and importunate petition to the Almighty, that whatever I have written of this kind may prosper no farther than it is orthodox; and if anything in it is opposite to truth, or has the least tendency that way, may it be immediately and eternally blasted." (Preface.)

SOMETHING WANTED IN OUR WORSHIP.

PART II.

In how many of our old Presbyterian chapels is the worship droned through with a most unmeaning formalism! I was in a chapel a few months since where the hymns were regularly performed on a hand-organ, without any sort of vocal accompaniment, and where, peradventure, if the prayers and the sermon had been performed in like manner, they would have been, every whit, as effective! Of course, THE PEOPLE did not attend that place of worship, and the reason, I have a suspicion, was, not that our Unitarian doctrines and forms of worship were quite above their comprehension, but that, so far as that pretty little chapel was concerned, those forms and devotions were merely formal and unmeaning. This is an extreme case, but it is a real one.

I sometimes fear that as a body of people we have lived so long apart in our cold, big chapels, that we have lost something of the natural warmth of humanity and of the brightness of human activity.

I have known earnest ministers who have laboured—on taking spiritual charge of one of these venerable buildings—to infuse a new spirit into the worship conducted in them, by introducing a new form of service. With this view they have adopted a liturgy with collects and responses. At first the change has proved a little beneficial, but soon things have settled down to the old level of unmeaning formalism. The venerable fathers have nodded in their pews, while the venerable clerk has responded a sleepy "Amen."

Fortunately for us, in this part of England, there is so much of the overflow of life that we cannot fall into so inert a condition, and in busy Lancashire we cannot be other than active and earnest.

Yet, even here, though we do not "praise God by machinery," we might perhaps improve our church services, and make them so attractive and so acceptable as that our people, and especially our young people—for, thank God, we have young people—might take part in them with something of real pleasure, and not without the earnestness of devotion.

It seems to me that, in almost all our churches, we might improve our services by giving to them more variety, both in regard to form and to tone. The one great drawback to them at present is their monotony.

However interesting they may be in themselves, it is impossible (human nature being such as it is) to resist altogether the effect of this monotony. As a general rule, our devotional services have become painfully monotonous. The prayers, and the lessons of the sacred Scriptures, and the very "Amen" which used to belong solely to the congregation and which never ought to belong to the minister,—are all now left to the minister; and for the most part the only change upon the sound of his voice which relieves the ear of his congregation is that produced by the singing of hymns.

Now, this seems to me a most unhappy state of things, for surely if we would keep up an intelligent interest in our devotional services, our people must take an active and audible, and a very interested, part in them, and not only throw their heart into them, but also more variety of sound and voice. The constant tick of the clock sends one to sleep, and the continual tone of the officiating minister acts like a soporific influence upon his accustomed hearers. However earnest he may be, the preacher will inevitably lose much of his proper influence through the excessive monotony of his tone of voice,—especially will this be the case in our devotional exercises.

Cannot we vary these exercises, then? I think we may with great advantage. We do not approve of the Methodist plan of calling upon our brother laymen to pray. The plan is a good one, but practically it does not work well, for the prayers so offered are not always acceptable to those on whose behalf they are offered. But there is another plan, and in some respects it is a better one; it is that of chanting some well-known form of prayer and praise; take e.g. the Te Deum. It is chanted in some of our congregations every Sunday, and all who have adopted it feel it to be one of the most delightful parts of the devotional service. Why should not all our congregations adopt it? What nobler words of praise, adoration, and prayer could they join in the reverent utterance of?

But I would not merely have our congregations adopt the chanting every Sunday of the Te Deum. The minister in our chapels reads a psalm;—instead of his reading a psalm, why should not the congregation join in reciting one—reciting it in the strains of some well-selected chant? If I want to note any speech with double attention, I take care to read it. Most people understand better what they read than what they merely hear read. On this principle, I would urge that our congregations should always read a psalm together,—reading it, of course, in that musical strain which is so admirably adapted for the purpose, and which strain we know as chanting.

But not only would I introduce chanting, so as to enable the congregation to join together in one voice and heart in reading certain psalms and prayers, I would commend to the use of all our congregations one of those short responsive services which are used with such good effect in the Church of England, and which Dr. Philip Carpenter has compiled in his Chant Book, where the minister speaks certain words and the congregation reply. What, e.g., could be more suitable for a devotional exercise than, after the hymn with which we usually commence our services and before the prayer, for the minister to stand up and repeat with reverence these simple and solemn petitions,—the people chanting softly the accompanying responses:

M.—O Lord, show Thy mercy upon us,
And grant us Thy salvation.

M.—O Lord, bless Thy people,
And mercifully hear us when we call upon Thee.

M.—Endow Thy ministers with righteousness,
And make Thy chosen people joyful.

M.—O Lord, save Thy people,
And bless Thine inheritance.

M.—Give peace in our time, O Lord,
Because there is none other who fighteth for us, but only Thou, O God.

M.—O God, make clean our hearts within us,
And take not Thy holy spirit from us.

The minister could then pray that prayer which is known amongst us as the “short prayer,” and, to give greater solemnity to it, and to enable the people, if so inclined, to join in it audibly, I would always couple with it the Lord’s Prayer, the choir and congregation chanting the “Amen.”

Then might follow the lesson from the Old Testament. Then a psalm might follow, which, as I just now suggested, should be chanted by all the congregation.

And thereupon the lesson from the New Testament might be read.

Now, as what I wish to do is to break, so far as our congregational worship is concerned, the very back of formalism, I would always, by notes and comments, strive to make the sacred Scriptures intelligible and interesting to my audience.

Very few people understand the sacred Scriptures. We read their lessons, but they awake no thought. I think, then, it behoves our ministers to endeavour, in reading the sacred Scriptures, to make them plain and intelligible, and especially to bring forth into strong relief that RELIGIOUS LESSON which is the immediate object of consideration.

I have heard some ministers give quite a lecture on the preparation of skins for bottles, when they came to the text: “Put not new wine into old bottles.” The congregation got some clear ideas on that oriental use of skins; but lost sight, like their minister, of our Saviour’s lesson about the new wine and the old bottles.

But, avoiding such errors, we should spare no pains to make the sacred Scriptures intelligible.

At the close of the New Testament lesson a short pause seems desirable, and I would urge the chanting by the choir in a very soft, gentle, strain, and without rising from their seats, or making the slightest movement, these words:

“Lord have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep thy word!”

The words seem so appropriate, and the music set to them is so soft and gentle, that it seems impossible to find a better way of approach to the Te Deum than they present. The Te Deum having followed with its noble strains of praise and prayer, the minister then silently and solemnly proceeds to offer that prayer which may no longer be called “long,” for after the preliminary exercises of devotion, a short, quiet, prayer—touching upon such topics as seem most appropriate—will be all-sufficient for the occasion. Such a prayer will not be wearisome consequently in its length, whilst coming after the other exercises, in one low, calm, quiet tone,—will touch the heart with its solemnity, and prove anything but a tedious prayer. The prayer could be concluded with a suitable collect, to which the people might appropriately chant “Amen.”

The hymn might then follow, and prepare the way, as usual, for the sermon.

In this way, it seems to me, that, without disturbing the simple framework of our Presbyterian form of service, we could give it a greater variety of tone, and deprive it of its meagreness. And if to some these few slight alterations in their accustomed order of service should seem somewhat confusing, let them not unintelligently oppose themselves to all change, for if it must be allowed (and I have never met a single person who was inclined to dispute it) that our commonly recognised form of worship is painfully bare and unattractive, then some change is desirable; and any change which is calculated to make our worship less the act of the minister and more that of the congregation of assembled worshippers; is worthy of earnest consideration. In many of our congregations chanting has been adopted of late years, and with great success. If, in addition to the chant, the congregation responded (musically) “Amen” to all the prayers of the minister, this though in itself a very slight change, would be found a very advantageous one; and if, in addition to this, was added that soft, sweet response after the reading of the Scriptures which I have recommended, it would be found, not only a very apt preparation for that second or “long” prayer which is always too “long,”—but a delightful variation to the dull monotony of our Presbyterian forms of worship.

The problem which the minister has to propose to himself, and which every earnest minister will be continually endeavouring to solve, is, how to make our church services attractive to our young people without too much disturbing that recognised routine which, in spite of its meagreness, long familiarity has made dear to the elders.

To the writer of this paper, this seems to be the problem of problems. And in the hope that our more enterprising laity will heartily co-operate with our ministers in seeking a solution to it, he throws out these suggestions. Our laity may not think all of them desirable, he only wishes them to consider if some of them might not be advantageously adopted; for himself, he longs to see our devotional services become more the act of the congregation, for then he feels sure they will be less open to the charge of dulness and formalism than now they often are.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1868.

DR. PUSEY AND THE “NICENE CREED.”

DR. PUSEY, in his recent letter to the Wesleyan Conference, suggests that the “Nicene Creed” should be hereafter adopted as a test to keep out Socinians, infidels, and atheists from the chairs of Oxford and Cambridge. He supposes, and we have no reason to question his conclusion, that the bulk of orthodox believers agree with him at least in thinking the belief of most of the dogmas contained in this creed of the utmost importance to the preservation of religion in this world, and the salvation of man hereafter.

The letter, then, may be taken as a striking testimony of the extent to which orthodox minds have gone astray from nature and fact in their notions as to what constitutes religion, and what operates with man to save him—that is, save him from sin, and make him more in the image of God.

For what is this “Nicene Creed?” It is a jumble of dogmas about subtleties that belong to the great eternity of the past, and the relations thereof of different hypostases of the Divine nature—regions utterly beyond man’s knowledge or comprehension. And they are subtleties, too, which can have but the smallest, if any, effect on a man’s moral being, to make it better, purer, or stronger. They are subtleties evolved from the mind of an age that mistook opinion for faith, and speculation for religion—when all classes of Christians thought it of the utmost importance that they should have right notions as to whether the Logos was begotten in time before all worlds, or from all eternity itself—whether he was of one substance with the FATHER—“homoousion,” or only of similar substance—“homoiousion.” “When,” says EUSEBIUS, “Bishop rose against Bishop, district against district, only to be compared to the Symplegades dashed against each other on a stormy day. Sailors, millers; and travellers sang the disputed doctrines at their occupations, or on their journeys. Every corner, every alley of the city was full of these discussions—the streets, the market-places, the drapers, the money changers, the victuallers. Ask a man ‘how many oboli,’ he answers by dogmatizing on generated and un-generated being. Inquire the price of bread, and you are told ‘The Son is subordinate to the FATHER.’ Ask if the bath is ready, and you are told ‘The Son arose out of nothing.’”

And it was to settle these disputes as “to the ineffable relations of the godhead before the remotest beginning of time,” as Dean STANLEY calls them, that the Council of Nicæa, in Asia Minor, was convoked, by which the Nicene Creed was composed, now fifteen centuries ago. The sort of men who constructed the creed may be somewhat inferred from the subtleties which, in a world like this, they thought all-important. But our idea of them will be very defective still if we leave out of account their violence and their animosities against one another. The prelude to the Council was to send to the Emperor, its president, a multitude of letters containing the most violent invectives and accusations against one another. And the Council itself was more like a meeting of Billingsgate women than Christian Bishops. But one of them, not content with invectives, proceeded to blows, and struck ARIUS on the jaw. The Council, following the maxim, “speak daggers, but use none,” could not exactly countenance this, so the offender was committed to prison and deprived of his mitre and pall; but the story soon got abroad that CHRIST had appeared to the prisoner, and bestowed upon him his pall again, thus approving what he had done to vindicate his honour, as being homoousion and begotten from all eternity.

But once more, to judge of the truth of the Nicene Creed, we must know the sort of men who formed it by noticing the superstitions which they and their age were capable of believing. Among those who went up to Nicæa to confound the Arians, and settle for ever the eternal generation of the Son, was SPYRIDION, a simple-minded Bishop of Cyprus. He fell in at a caravanserai with some other Bishops travelling to Nicæa for a similar purpose. They despised their simple brother, and, afraid that he might compromise their cause by his awkwardness, rose before light, and to hinder SPYRIDION’S further progress, cut off the heads of his mules, and then went on their journey. When SPYRIDION rose he was met by his terrified deacon, and informed of the slaughter of his mules. The saint, however, bade the deacon attach the heads to the dead bodies, when the two mules, with their restored heads, shook themselves as if from a deep sleep and started to their feet. When, however, the day broke, it was found that the deacon, having fixed the heads in the dark and in haste, had mistaken which was which, so that now the white mule had a chestnut head, and the chestnut mule the white head belonging to his partner.

If this story—for which see Stanley’s “Eastern Church”—cannot be proved to have been believed by the actors in the Nicæan Council, it was believed soon after their time. It most likely originated with them, and at all events is but an ordinary specimen of the superstitions which their class, even the most learned, in that age believed. And it is the cobweb subtleties span by these subtlety-mongering superstitious men—men who had so dim a perception of the great realities which concern the soul, that they could think their gossamer speculations these realities—it is these subtleties that we are asked, in this age by men like Dr. PUSEY, to accept as the basis of our religion, the pledge of our future hope, as well as the standard of thought by which we are to judge of the fitness of men to carry on the highest education in the country. It seems an insult to our understanding. It is like asking us to enfeeble our limbs, and soften our brains, and go back to childhood again, as the best preparation for doing the highest work of manhood.

O how is it that the great body of our educated laity do not rise against the insult, and say, "We do not know whether the subtleties of your Nicene Creed be truths or not, neither do we believe you know. But this we know—that they have nothing to do with religion, nothing to do with moulding our souls to goodness, or kindling in them a love of God. The sooner men reject them, ignore them, forget them, the better, the sooner will there be a chance of the cultivation of real religion, and the attention to real moral improvement in society."

A STORY OF SPIRITS.

DR. CHUFIN, physician to the King's County Asylum, at Flatbush, in the United States, in a report just published, gives the following instructive narrative of the case of Mrs. H. K., a Wisconsin lady of strong sense and considerable intellectual power, who set herself to the work of exposing the imposture of spiritualism. Puzzled, however, by what she saw and heard, and mortified at failing to find the clue to what she had believed was susceptible of rational solution, her mind became agitated and unsettled. She was in great anxiety about her son, who had gone to California and ceased to write to her; and in an attack of nervous or irritable fever she suddenly discovered that she was herself "a medium," and learnt from the spirits who communicated with her that she must visit her son forthwith. Keeping the disclosure a secret, she obtained money from her husband under pretence of going to see her married daughter in Michigan, who was not in prosperous circumstances, and might need some aid. She determined to go first to New York, where she calculated on being able to find a gentleman whom she had known, and to get directions for taking her journey. It was quite dark when she reached Jersey city, and, prompted by her unseen monitors, she left her luggage (retaining the check), and, with her satchel in her hand, followed, as she was directed to do, a lady and gentleman who had sat in front of her. She went after them by the ferry-boat and into the New York street-car, and got out when they got out. In a few minutes they ascended some steps, and disappeared from her sight. For a moment she stood in doubt, but was directed to walk on. At the corners of the streets she stopped occasionally to consult with the spirits, and turned to the right or to the left in accordance with their dictation. Believing that alone and at night she would not be admitted to a first-class hotel, and afraid to enter one of a less respectable character lest she might be robbed, after much seemingly purposeless wandering her weary steps were guided to a restaurant. Here she remained until admonished that it was time to close. Asking to see the proprietor, she requested of him to be allowed to remain sitting where she was until morning. He was surprised at the request, but his wife, after a little conversation, kindly offered to make her as comfortable for the night as the limited apartments which she occupied over the restaurant would allow. In the morning, the keeper of the restaurant obtained accommodation for her at a respectable hotel in the neighbourhood. She now began to look for her friend, in which vain search she exhausted two most fatiguing days. Persons upon whom she called to make inquiries usually treated her kindly, but occasionally, when she chanced to allude to her being in communion with spirits, she was derisively advised to ask them to direct her to the house of her friend. Since she lay on her sick bed at home, the communications of the spirits to her had not been generally oral, but by touching some part of her person they would indicate to her if the thought or project that was occupying her mind at that precise moment was the proper one to be acted on. When in doubt, if walking, for instance, or if questioned, she would stop a moment, until her true course or reply should be thus made known to her.

During her wanderings about the streets of New York, she was several times accosted by ladies who kindly offered their services, but being invariably touched at the thought she could do without them, she so expressed herself, and thanking them, passed on. Unable to find the gentleman she sought, she was directed to call upon a distinguished clergyman in Brooklyn. His residence she readily found, but he was not at home when she called. Hoping to find him early in the morning, she returned to take lodgings at an hotel in that city. During the evening, meeting some ladies and gentlemen in the parlour of the hotel who seemed interested in the subject of spiritualism, she entertained them with a recital of her experience, and the purpose for which, under the guidance of the spirits, she came hither. The next morning, to her surprise, the proprietor of the hotel introduced to her a gentleman whom he called by the name of the clergyman already alluded to. Though he bore not the slightest resemblance to his photographic likenesses, which every one has seen, yet, as he had not a moment to spare, she did not stop to consider this, but accepted at once his kind offer to escort her to his mansion. At the door of the hotel she was presented to two gentlemen, who said they came to call upon her, and to talk with her upon the subject of spiritualism and kindred topics, with which they had been informed she was familiar; but they said they would not detain the party, and so they all walked on together conversing as they went. But the pretended clergyman was a police detective, his mansion a house of detention, and the two gentlemen in search of information were physicians sent to test her sanity. Before noon she was conveyed to the lunatic asylum. At first she was in a very dejected state, and with difficulty could be induced to take any food; but as soon as her innate inclination for argument revived, she began to recover, and then all belief in these supernatural communications completely vanished. At the end of a month she was well. Her son's silence had been caused by his being ill, and wishing his mother not to be "worrying herself" about him. The news of his being well had much to do with her speedy recovery.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE.

ANIMADVERTING on the way in which, in his Association address, Dr. Hooker slid into the common mode of treating Religion and Science as two ladies that have a good deal to do with men and with each other, but of whom the latter was made by him to act as prima donna, the Pall Mall Gazette has the following just observations:

No cause of error has been more prolific than the tendency to personify words, and the attempt which is so closely connected with it to adjust the relations between imaginary persons or things. If anyone doubts this, let him look at the debates which have arisen about the relations between Church and State, or at the strange difficulties which have been found in adjusting the claims of the Reason, the Will, and the Conscience, which writers of high reputation have been in the habit of regarding as three little men living inside every human creature, and having all manner of distinct and often conflicting rights and duties. If people would but speak plainly and dismiss from their minds the notion that there are distinct personages called Religion and Science, or Faith and Reason, or whatever else it may be, each of whom has a province within which she is to reign, and from which her rival is to be carefully excluded, and would realise in their own minds the real meaning of such words, they would find it almost impossible to talk so much nonsense about them. Let us consider for a moment what is the real meaning of the words religion and science. Religion is a general name for the opinions, the feelings, and the practices founded upon and expressive of those opinions and feelings, which men entertain about the Divine interest in or superintendence over the affairs of men, about men's power of communicating with God by prayer or otherwise, and about the prospects of men after death. Science is a general name for human knowledge in its most definite and general shape, whatever may be the object of that knowledge. It is clear from this that in so far as religion is the name of a set of opinions, or propositions, it is absurd to oppose it to science or to allot separate provinces to the two. Religion is your opinion upon one set of subjects, science your opinion upon another set of subjects. Let us take a particular instance. A man is of opinion that the events related in the early chapters of the book of Genesis were the first incidents in human history, and coloured the rest of it. This opinion would no doubt form an important part of his religion. In course of time various considerations lead him to believe that nothing of the sort took place, and that, on the contrary, the human race has subsisted for many thousand years, and that there is no trustworthy evidence that Adam and Eve ever existed at all. The history of Adam and Eve has now ceased to form part of his religion, but how can this change be regarded as a contest between religion and science? How can you make anything more out of it than a change of opinion about facts produced by the consideration of matters which were not originally before the person who has changed his views? It either is or else it is not true that Adam was the first man, and that he was created about 6,000 years ago. It either is or else it is not true that certain flint arrow-heads made by human hands were found in a place where no human hand can have put them, say for 20,000 years. Unless it can be shown that the question as to the truth or falsehood of these facts is to be determined in each case by a different method, it is idle to oppose religion and science. When all is said, religion is only your opinion about one set of facts, and science your opinion about another set. This is a result from which it is impossible to escape except by finding out two separate sorts of truth, and two distinct methods of investigation.

In remarking on that part of Dr. Hooker's address to the British Association, in which he charges the clergy with hostility to science, the Freeman wisely says:

"For ourselves we cordially welcome every verified discovery of science. We have not the slightest jealousy of the facts it can bring to light. Pulpit cautions against the most fearless pursuit of science we regard as pulpit folly, indeed worse, for they dispose men, young men especially, of a scientific turn to estimate religion itself by the apparent ignorance of its professed teachers. God certainly created scientific facts. And that the earth moves round the sun, and that it was not created in the way which our grandfathers and many of our fathers supposed they had learned from Genesis, no man of the humblest education now doubts. This should teach us the unwisdom of setting our traditional theological interpretations and theories, in opposition to even the dawning light of science; for science is as truly a revelation from God as the Scriptures themselves. If the scientific man may, for a while, misinterpret the works of God, it is certain that theologians may grievously misinterpret His word. If theologians charge each other mutually with error, they must not wonder if the man of science does not think them infallible. But assuredly what either can demonstrate from the word or from the works of the living God, is a portion of that truth which abideth for ever."

THE SECULARISTS.

(Abridged from the Christian World.)

It is said of Sir Godfrey Kneller that he was deeply shocked at hearing a common labourer invoking imprecations on his own head. Some such feeling must be entertained by the old-fashioned, scholarly sceptics at all times met with in highly intellectual communities. Religion was a good thing for the poor; it taught them to know their place, to be humble, industrious, and not to murmur when deprived of their rights, or made to bear wrongs. For such religion was intended. And for such considerations it was right and proper that it should be accepted by society, sanctioned by the law, and its ministers salaried by the State. It was from such feeling that Napoleon the Great said, if there were no God it would be necessary to invent one; and proportionately do the philosophers feel alarm and indignation when the working man, for whom religion has, as it were, been discovered—for whom an Establishment, the most richly endowed in Christendom, rejoices to call itself the poor man's Church,—turns round, and in his coarse, rough way, says, "Ladies and gentlemen, I am much obliged to you. I see your little game. Pray don't take any trouble on my account. Please to leave me to go to the bad in my own way. Give me the right to the free inquiry you claim for yourselves, and don't quarrel with me on account of its results." Really it seems to me the Secularist has the best of it. I may regret his conclusions. I cannot blame his independent spirit. Of the men who talk in this way it may be said that Robert Owen was the teacher and apostle. He was the first to proclaim to the masses that there was no such thing as moral responsibility; that a man's character was formed for him partly by nature, and partly by the external influences to which he was exposed. There was for him no choice of right or wrong. Any religion, and emphatically that of Christ, which proceeds upon the supposition that man is a responsible being, is false, and to be rejected with disdain. Owen was a man of blameless life, who made great sacrifices of wealth, and time, and labour, on account of his ideas. As his last apologist says, "his condemnation of religion was not the result of libertine excesses, nor of a philosophical conceit, but followed honestly from the shallow theory he had adopted." Among the poor, sharp denizens of our crowded cities he was hailed as the regenerator of society, and made many converts. Nor are they to be blamed. Owen met with an attentive hearing from such men as Brougham and Bentham, Earls Liverpool and Aberdeen, Jefferson and Van Buren, the Duke of Kent and the King of Prussia. It is true in his old age he became a believer in spirits, and was buried in the little church-yard of Newtown, Montgomeryshire, in the sure and certain hope of a glorious resurrection to eternal life; but by that time the doctrines he had proclaimed had sunk into many minds, been re-uttered by many tongues, and commended to the working classes by no less a master of language and argument than George Jacob Holyoake. In his hands Owenism, under its new name of Secularism, certainly lost none of its power. The master was apt to be egotistic—dogmatic—much given to repetition—very wearisome—in short, dull. Mr. Holyoake's enemies cannot say he is that. His friends claim for him talents of no common order. A shop in Fleet-street was opened—the Reasoner was established—and Mr. Holyoake went all over the land to emancipate the human mind, spell-bound by priestcraft, and to roll back the double night of ages and of ignorance. In a little while he retired from business, the shop in Fleet-street was shut up, the Reasoner reasoned no more—Mr. Holyoake ceased perambulating. Still we have a genuine apostolical succession: Mr. Bradlaugh takes up the wondrous tale, and the National Reformer records the triumphs of his cause. According to him, all is prosperous. Hope paints a glorious future—when man's "Regenerate soul from crime

Shall yet be drawn,
And Reason on this mortal clime
Immortal dawn."

Yet what is the fact? The National Reformer costs £10 a week, and does not pay. Its readers tell us their name is legion; yet it is constantly appealing to its public for support. In all our great hives of industry the Secularists boast their thousands. All the intelligent operative manhood of England is, according to their own account, theirs; yet their organ is very weak on its legs, and very short of wind.

The head-quarters of the Secularists is Cleveland-row, a street lying in that mass of pauperism at the rear of Tottenham-court-road Chapel. In that street there is a Hall, originally erected, I believe, by Owen himself. At any rate, it is the resort of the illuminated to whom his philosophy has opened up a new moral world,—which, as regards appearances, is little better than the benighted Egypt out of which they have departed. Here you will find no free Gospel. The Secularists are determined to make the best of this world. If you wish to enter, you must pay; if you wish to show your gentility and sit near the lecturer, you must pay twopence more. Previous to the lecturer commencing, a boy goes up and down the room selling copies of the National Reformer, and a table at one end is devoted to the sale of publications of a similar character.

Every Sunday evening the Hall is devoted to what are called Popular Free-thought Lectures. The programme for the month of August will give an idea of what is meant by free-thought:—On Aug. 2, Mr. Charles Watts—An Impartial Estimate of the Life and Teachings of the Founder of Christianity; on Aug. 9, Iconoclast (Mr. Bradlaugh)—Capital and Labour, and Trades' Unions; on Aug. 16, Mrs. Harriet Law—The Teachings and Philosophy of J. S. Mill, Esq., M.P.; on Aug. 23, Mrs. Harriet Law—The late Robert Owen: a Tribute to his Memory, drawn from a Comparison of Present Institutions and their Effects, with those Advocated by that Eminent Philanthropist; on Aug. 30, Mrs. Harriet Law—An Appeal to Women to Consider their Interests in Connection with the Social, Political, and Theological Aspects of the Times.—Discussions are invited at the close of each lecture, and, as might be anticipated, after a discussion the combatants remain of the same opinion as before. Nevertheless, the Secularists enjoy these discussions immensely—and no wonder, as on such occasions they form not a majority merely, but almost the entire assembly. It is not often they find their match. Men who can meet them on a common platform are rare. A sincere Christian is shocked and pained, and loses his temper. Every cock can crow on his own dunghill; and at Cleveland Hall the Secularists have it all their own way, and are merry at the expense of their opponents.

I have said Cleveland Hall is the head-quarters of the society, for there is a society of which Mr. Charles Watts is secretary. There is another hall in the City Road; lectures are also, I believe, delivered elsewhere in London, on a Sunday evening, and there are at least four or five secular societies. In the summer time they have open-air lectures on a Sunday morning in different parts of London. When I have been at Cleveland Hall, the room has generally been half full of respectable, sharp working men, all very positive and enthusiastic. Not many women are present, but, of course, there is the irrepressible baby. The lecturers are generally the persons whose names I have given, who occasionally vary the scene of their labours by provincial engagements. Their work, whatever it may be, has now been going on for some years. This argues some special fitness in them, and an adaptation of what they say to the class whom they address. In this respect they set many of the clergy a good example. The people at Cleveland Hall don't call out for quarter of an hour lectures. Nor do they require anything in the way of music, or choral performances, or floral decorations, or altar lights, to make the service interesting. For children, whether they go to church or chapel, you must provide shows. For men, nothing more is needed than logic and the human voice.

HEAP BRIDGE, NEAR BURY.—On Sunday, August 30th, two sermons were delivered by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., of Gee Cross, when collections, amounting to £24, were made on behalf of the Sunday school.

DULNESS IN SERMONS.

THOUGH the stories are rather old, there is something deserving the consideration of ministers in the following extract from Dean Ramsay's "Pulpit Table Talk":

The clergy are under an obligation to make their sermons to a degree attractive to their younger hearers: for if they exhort godfathers and godmothers to call upon their godchildren to "hear sermons," they should at least take some pains that such hearing of sermons shall not be, from their own fault, an irksome task. One thing, however, is quite clear to my mind, and the result of a pretty long experience, and that is, no quality can be more fatal to the influence of a sermon than that of dulness. The witty Sydney Smith used to say, somewhat profanely, "Sir, in a sermon, the sin against the Holy Ghost is dulness." I often think of the remark made to me by a dear relative, of high mental qualities and endowments, in regard to preaching: "Rather than see you dull and commonplace, I would see you bordering upon the eccentric or startling." Sterne, who was certainly as much removed from the charge of dulness as most men, offered this excuse to the Archbishop of York for the eccentric manner in which one of his published sermons commenced. He was determined to stop the wandering thoughts of his hearers, and secure their attention to him. So, after giving out his text from Eccles. vii. 2—"It is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting"—he flatly commenced his sermon with these words, "That I deny." A similar case of determination to rouse the attention of his audience to his text, though of a less refined character than Sterne's, I have heard told of an illiterate but clever Methodist preacher, who was a collier of the district in Somerset where I held a curacy for seven years. He gave out for a text—"I can do all things." He then paused, and, looking at the Bible keenly, said, in his own native Somersetshire dialect:—"What's that thee says, Paul—I can do aal things? I'll bet thee half-a-crown o' that." So he took half-a-crown out of his pocket and put it on the book. "However," he added, "let's see what the Apostle has to say for himself." So he read on the next words, through Christ that strengtheneth me. "Oh!" says he, "if that's the terms of the bet, I'm off." And he put the half-crown into his pocket again, and preached the sermon on the power of Christian grace. But, although dulness in sermons may be an evil, extravagance and eccentricity may be worse evils. It is the part of wisdom and of well-regulated zeal to avoid all extremes. What we want in the pulpit is the earnest, unaffected manner in which a sensible and feeling mind would desire to communicate to others sacred and solemn truths which are, to himself and hearers, all important for the interests of time and of eternity.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

SAILING UP THE FIRTH.

Upross the sun through opening clouds of grey,
And at his touch the misty hills unveiled,
And all gave promise of a glorious day
As up the Firth we sailed.

At every step he took, the upper clouds
Thinned into gauze; the wakening morn looked Through,
And soon, withdrawing e'en her gauzy shrouds,
Came forth in radiant blue.

A rippling breeze was with us, just enough
To turn the waters into crisping curls;
You could not say the Firth was calm or rough—
It danced in crested pearls.

Along the rocky ribs of Galloway
A margin of white foam crept to and fro;
And up the steep cliffs rose the snowy spray,
Silent to us as snow.

Then into view swung Ailsa Craig's huge bulk,
And raised an old-world rapture in the blood;
Far off it loomed like some great stranded hulk,
Left there by Noah's flood.

As we approached, our paltry tongues were stilled;
The bold sky-pictured craig stood more defined;
We sailed within a presence row that filled,
And e'en distressed, the mind.

Round its sun-burnished peak the seabirds flew
In idle numbers, never to be told;
They wheeled and slid across the skiey blue,
Like sunbeam-specks of gold.

And still we strove the mighty rock to clasp
'As one big grandeur' all unto the breast;
Its greatness only mocked our feeble grasp,
And on we sailed distressed.

Along our starboard lay the Carrick shore,
And Kyle, the classic, hid in warm white haze;
However hid, revealed for evermore
To the poetic gaze:

The bonnie Doon, and Cassilis Downs green,
The Twa Brigs, flying almost side by side,
The ancient town of Ayr, and scene by scene
Of Tam O'Shanter's ride.

And on our left lay Arran, sharp and clear,
Its Holy Isle and hidden loch behind,
Within whose reaches ships for shelter steer,
When storms are in the wind.

But Goatfell, with the tattered Arran peaks,
Took all our eyes—piled up so sheer and high?
Twas nature's easel—this her freak of freaks,
Her canvas the blue sky.

A sudden cloud came o'er them, and anon
The Arran hills in dark-blue blackness lay;
Surely not all the Highlands can put on
So grim a scowl as they!

They were alive with passion; we beheld
Their knitting eyebrows and their gleaming eyes;
But soon their dark brows lifted, and they smiled
Grandly at our surprise.

Then, also on our left, the Isle of Bute;
So like to what a paradise should be,
That all declared the name would better suit
With an accented é.

There Kean, the tragic, built himself a cot
Beside its little lake, a sylvan scene,
And thought to cast in solitude his lot;
Alas, for tragic Kean!

As well expect the lion to turn hound,
The eagle to forget the soaring wing;
He came to Bute and solitude, but found
The play was still the thing.

Upon our right the Cumbraes, sister isles,
Were passed with small remark, though fairy splores,
And devil-built dykes, and warlock wiles
Are rife about their shores.

Then landward Largs, with its old battle-field,
Where Alexander fought the invading Dane,
And made him the last hope of conquest yield,
Never to come again.

But all around us Beauty infinite,
And History, and Old Tradition vied
Which should be minister of most delight,
And preached from side to side:

Till Greenock's noisy piers lay on our beam,
And luggage dragged us back to common earth,
And finger-pointing porters broke our dream
Of sailing up the Firth. F. L.

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—X.

NEAREST thou news which will afflict a heart, be thou silent, and let another bear it. O nightingale, bring thou the good news of the spring; leave to the owl tidings of evil.

He who offers advice to a self-conceited man, needs himself advice from another.

To the ignorant man nothing is better than silence; and were he aware of this, he would no longer be ignorant. When you are not possessed of perfection or excellence, it is better that you keep your tongue within your mouth. The tongue brings disgrace upon men. The nut without a kernel is light in weight.

The beast will not learn of these how to speak; learn thou of the beast how to be silent. Whoever reflects not, before he answers, will probaly utter inappropriate words. Either adorn thy speech with the intelligence of a man, or sit in silence like a dumb animal.

Whoever enters into argument, in order to display his learning, with a man more learned than himself, will thereby be taught that he is unlearned. Though thou mayest be well informed, if one wiser than thyself take up the discourse, be not thou ready to start objections.

Publish not the secret faults of others, for you inflict disgrace upon them, and procure thereby no honour to yourself.

Were every night a night of power, "the night of power" would lose its value. Were every pebble a ruby, the ruby and the pebble would be of equal worth.

It is very easy to deprive the living of life; to give back life to him from whom thou hast taken it is impossible. The archer should be patient ere he draw the bow; for when the arrow has left the bow, it returns no more.

The friend whom it has taken a life-time to acquire, it is not right to estrange in a moment. How many years does it require to turn the stone into a ruby? Thou wouldst not, surely, destroy it with a stone.

I heard a fellow of mean disposition slandering a person of distinguished rank. I said, "O, sir! if thou art unfortunate, why is it a crime to be one of the fortunate? O, do not invoke misery on the envious man, for the condition of that man is misery in itself. What need of pursuing one with enmity, who has such an enemy perpetually at his heels?"

The bird will not alight upon the seed, if it see another bird caught in the snare. Take thou warning from the misfortunes of others, that thou give no occasion to others to take warning from thee.

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

CHAP. IX.

"It is supposed that the place where these horrible sacrifices took place was afterwards, on this account, called by the stricter Jews Tophet, i.e., Abomination, or that which produces disgust. Jeremiah saw these horrors, and described them in the words which you will find in Jeremiah vii. 31 to 33.

"The good King Josiah—the Edward VI. of Hebrew history—carried into effect the reformation of which Jeremiah, like a Wickliffe, had prophesied. Under him the zealous reformers pulled down the altars, broke up the image, and abolished the worship of Tophet. And in order to express their horror of it, and to hinder its return thither, they desecrated the valley with everything horrible that would defile it to the imagination of a Jew. They threw over it the bones of the dead and other abominations; and from that time to the time of Christ it was used as a receptacle of everything abominable from the city—the carcases of animals unclean or unfit for food, or that had died of disease; the bodies of the worst kind of criminals, together with all kinds of offal. There often lay the refuse, putrefying under an Eastern sky—carcases, a mass of corruption, defiling the air—with the worm that in that valley never died; that is, generation after generation of worms succeeded one another, so that the race never died, but were always wriggling and seething in the corruption which bred them. And then this refuse was finally destroyed by great fires kept constantly burning, and whose dark and filthy smoke went up day and night, overshadowing the place.

"You can scarcely imagine any scene in the world more fitted to excite horror and disgust than this valley of 'Tophet' abomination. Think of its old memories—the dark deeds that had been done there—the defilement—the cursing by the prophets—the pollution by everything that was most offensive to sight, to smell, and imagination, and you will see this.

"The valley seemed to haunt the Jewish mind. To be cast out there when dead—denied to friends, denied decent burial, to lie exposed to sight amid the carcases of the unclean beasts and vilest criminals and all abominable offal—a prey to the undying worm, and then to be cast into those filthy fires to be consumed—that was the most dreadful fate a Jew could possibly imagine. Now, observe it was not the suffering he feared in this fate; it was the shame and the abhorrence of it. You have the feeling exactly expressed in the words of Isaiah—"They shall go forth and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against Me, for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorrence unto all flesh." (Isaiah lxvi. 24.) Now, from passages in the prophets like this, it gradually grew to be the belief of the Hebrew people before the time of Christ, that the severest punishment of the future would be to be cast out and suffer shame and contempt as the very refuse of the world, just as all things vile were thrown out into the valley of Hinnom. In the writings of the Jews, between the prophets and Christ, we have this idea appearing. Thus, in Daniel xii. 2, "And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." Observe there is nothing here about torment, but shame and contempt. So in Ecclesiasticus, or The Wisdom of the Son of Sirach, vii. 17, we have, "The vengeance of the ungodly is fire and worms," evidently still alluding to Gehinnom. So in Judith xvi. 17, "Woe to the nations that rise up against my kindred. The Lord Almighty will take vengeance of them in the day of judgment in putting fire and worms in their flesh, and they shall feel them and weep for ever."

"This last passage shows the form the belief had attained a little before the time of Christ, and which we find also expressed in the Book of Enoch. It was that in Gehinnom, the accursed valley, would be assembled all the wicked and all the nations that would not bow to the supremacy of God's elect—the Jews, and here they would be punished. As the belief appears in the Book of Enoch, the idea of suffering seems to have come into greater prominence, and the terrible raging fire performs a greater part.

"Now these, observe, were the ideas prevalent in the minds of the Jews in the time of Christ; and he who came not so much to teach a new religion as to gather up what was best and noblest in the old Hebrew religion, took up these ideas, and used them—used them as he used other ideas which were prevalent—in a spiritual sense, as figures to represent his spiritual doctrines."

LONGEVITY OF THE JEWS.

THE high rate of mortality among the French and other European emigrants in Algeria has drawn attention to the question of differences in the vitality of races, and the power of acclimatisation which some possess in whatever part of the globe they settle. Contrary to what might have been expected, it is well known that of all the contingents of the grand army of Napoleon, the natives of Southern Europe, and notably the Corsicans, best supported the rigour of the Russian campaign. It is supposed by some that what bestows such peculiar aptitudes is the living in a climate which is characterised by great meteorological changes, by great extremes of heat and cold. Some curious statistics, furnished by the London Review, seem to favour this view. Palestine is said to be such a climate, and the Jewish race the most privileged of any in respect to its powers of acclimatisation. Throughout Europe (with the exception of Norway and Spain, from which he is excluded), throughout Asia, the Jew flourishes as if at home. Even in Africa he exhibits no inferiority to the natives in constitutional vigour. Morocco numbers 340,000, Algiers 80,000, and a considerable portion of Jewish blood exists in Abyssinia, the mountains of the Atlas, and even as far south as Timbuctoo. Dr. Neufville, of Frankfort, states the average duration of life of the Jews of that city to be 48 years 9 months, that of the rest of the population 36 years 11 months. During the first five years of life the deaths of Jewish children are scarcely more than half those of the Christians. One-fourth of the total number of the latter die before they are seven years old, whilst of the former three-fourths attain the age of 28 years. Half of the Christians have succumbed at 36, whereas half the Jews live to be 50. Beyond 59 years 10 months, a quarter only of the Christian population will be found alive; but a fourth of the Jewish live to be 71. Dr. Glatter has instituted a comparison between the longevity of the Jewish race and three others in the Austrian dominions, from which he finds that out of a thousand persons deceased, the number who attained an age between 70 and 100 were—of Hungarians, 54.4; of Croats, 70.6; of Germans, 86.7; and of Jews, 120.0. The longevity of the Jews was noticed by Haller, and attributed by him to their sobriety and careful diet. Doubtless sobriety must be admitted amongst the causes of their longevity, perhaps even as the most potent; but it does not seem improbable that the same energetic vitality that enables them to become citizens of every clime is also operative in prolonging the duration of their existence,—has, in fact, endowed them with a longer average term of life. In India, the mortality amongst the children of European soldiers is four times greater than amongst children of similar ages in England. And no instance is known of a third generation of the European race ever having existed in India, all the individuals being of pure European descent, and having been born and reared in the country.

AN ABYSSINIAN LEGEND.

IN Mr. Plowden's "Travels in Abyssinia," he says a tradition there states that when Solomon began his reign in Judæa, Axum was the seat of a serpent king, for whose appetite a virgin had to be daily provided. Saba, a virgin of high birth and pure spirit, by her prayers and tears, obtained the favour of heaven, and some celestial warrior in earthly form slew the dragon, and delivered the damsel; on her foot, however, the saliva of the serpent had fallen, and caused incurable ulcers and lameness. Having, by universal acclaim, been appointed queen of the nation (Queen of Sheba?), she crossed the seas to seek for cure at the hands of the wise and far-famed Solomon, and after various adventures returned to Abyssinia pregnant with a son by that monarch. On her departure Solomon gave her a golden staff, as the proof his son was to bring him if the child should be a male, and a diamond ring to be presented if a daughter. In due time she bore a son, who was named Menelek. At the age of sixteen, having previously informed his father of her intention by letter, she sent him to Jerusalem with the golden staff. Aware of the searching mind of Solomon, and being herself quick-witted, she apprehended that the pledge might be mistrusted, and in her final instructions she bid her son beware of too hastily bestowing it on the person he might find seated on his father's throne, but first to examine his own countenance in a mirror, and search amid the throng of courtiers for a maturer resemblance of himself. Following this advice, he presented the staff to his father, whom he detected seated on the ground in humble attire, while another in gorgeous robes filled his usual seat. Thereupon Solomon acknowledged him as his son in wisdom, as in blood; and after keeping him some years, sent him to govern Ethiopia, accompanied by the eldest sons of many Jews of rank and consideration. From Menelek are said to descend the kings of Gondar to this day.

INTELLIGENCE.

ABERDEEN.—The annual excursion of the Sunday school took place on Saturday last. This year, by the kind permission of the Earl of Kintore, they went to the grounds of Keith Hall. The scholars, accompanied by the minister, teachers, and parents, enjoyed themselves at various games and sports.

HUNSLT.—On Wednesday evening week, the new church, which has been erected by the Unitarians of Leeds for the Hunslet district, was opened with religious service. Previous to the service a tea meeting was held in the new schoolroom, at which a large number of friends from the Mill-hill and other congregations of the district assembled. Among those present were the Revs. T. R. Elliot (minister of the congregation), M. C. Frankland, Chowbent; R. Wilkinson, Holbeck; C. Howe, Dewsbury; Brooke Herford, Manchester; Joseph Smith, Idle; Messrs. Arthur Lupton, Wm. Brown, Joseph Lupton, Joseph Buckton, Dr. Greenhow, George Buckton, H. J. Morton, Frederick Jackson, Joseph Cliffe, Grosvenor Talbot, &c. At seven o'clock the friends adjourned to the church, which was completely filled by the congregation. The service was conducted by the Rev. Charles Wicksteed, formerly the pastor of the Mill-hill congregation, who in an eloquent and stirring sermon, on the words "Ye also as living stones are built up a spiritual house," dedicated the new church to the worship of the one only living and true God, and to the preaching of the gospel of Christ. After the sermon the offertory was taken. The church is to be conducted entirely on the "open church" principle, there being no appropriation of seats, and the support being by the ancient and scriptural plan of the offertory. The building is of Potternewton delphstone, with Meanwood sandstone dressings, designed in early English gothic, and consists of a chapel, 52 ft. long by 30 ft. wide. Open benches are arranged in two aisles, and at the end of the chapel a light screen separates it from the schoolroom, 56 ft. long by 28 ft. wide, built crossways, so as to form with the chapel the letter T. The screen is partially movable, so that if requisite on any occasion the chapel and schoolroom may be thrown together, and in front of it is the communion table and pulpit. There are also a vestry, class room, kitchen, and two cloak rooms and hat lobbies, with separate yards and entrances to the schoolroom for boys and girls. The total cost, including the land, is about £1,700. Mr. Alexander Crawford, of Leeds, is the architect.

NEWCASTLE: UNITARIAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of the Missionary Society in connection with the Church of the Divine Unity, was held on Monday evening last, in the boys' schoolroom. At six o'clock an excellent tea was prepared, after which the Rev. J. C. Street presided. Mr. B. J. Williamson, secretary, read the committee's report of the operations of the past year, showing what had been done against what might appear insurmountable obstacles. The appointment of the Rev. J. Whitworth, who entered upon his duties at Sunderland, in May last year, had justified every anticipation of the committee. The Rev. E. W. Hopkinson had been engaged as a missionary, and commenced his duties in April last. Respecting the success of this gentleman the committee were sanguine. The long established mission at Rumby Hill had effected its desire and migrated to Crook. For a time a suitable place of worship had been secured, but bigotry had raised its head, and the little community would soon be driven from its place of meeting. But the friends, after carrying on the work for about eight years were not to be daunted, and had already raised £40 towards the erection of a chapel of their own. Since July, 1867, the Rev. J. C. Street, by invitation, had expounded the principles of Unitarian Christianity to large audiences at Choppington, Seaton Delaval, Blyth, Seghill, Seaton Burn, and other places. A chapel for the use of the friends at Choppington, under the pastorate of the Rev. E. W. Hopkinson, was in course of erection. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association had continued its generous aid of £100 per annum. The treasurer's account showed that at the beginning of the year there was £68. 5s. 2½d. in hand, which added to the income amounted to £339. 4s. 10½d. After meeting all expenses there remained a balance of £66. 11s. Several resolutions were passed, and addresses delivered during the evening.

SEATON BURN, NORTHUMBERLAND.—On Saturday evening, August 29th, the Rev. J. C. Street conducted a religious service in the Colliery Schoolroom at this place. There was a good attendance, consisting principally of pitmen, and great attention was manifested while the preacher unfolded some of the leading principles of Unitarian Christianity. At the close of the service a long conversation took place between Mr. Street and a gentleman who had been brought into the neighbourhood by the body of Christians called "Disciples." Tracts were distributed to all who were desirous of reading more fully about our religious principles.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. W. E.—F. A. W.—W. H. R.—Received.

THE COMING WEEK.

LONDON: CLARENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—On Sunday morning. Preachers: Rev. Dr. Chas. Stevens; evening, Rev. J. K. Applebee.

MANCHESTER: STRANGWAYS FREE CHURCH.—On Sunday next, Rev. Brooke Herford will resume the pulpit. The communion at the close of the morning service.

NEWCHURCH.—On Sunday, afternoon and evening, opening of new organ. Preacher: Rev. G. H. Wells, M.A.

PENMAENMAWR: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. J. Wright, B.A., service at eleven a.m.

ROCHDALE: CLOVER-STREET.—On Sunday, afternoon and evening, school sermons, by the Rev. F. Bishop.

Birth.

BOWEN.—On the 89th ult., at George-street, Edgbaston, the wife of George Bowen, of a son.

Marriage.

TURTON—LAYCOCK.—On the 3rd inst., at the Upper Chapel, Norfolk-street, Sheffield, by the Rev. J. Lettis Short, Frank, youngest son of the late Joseph Turton, Esq., of Sheffield, to Clara Jane, second daughter of William E. Laycock, Esq., of Stumperlowe Grange, Sheffield.—No cards.

Deaths.

BROMHEAD.—On the 22nd ult., at the residence of his daughter, Frenchay, Timothy Bromhead, Esq., aged 68 years.

CRIDLAND.—On the 26th ult., at Kingsdown, Bristol, Elizabeth, wife of Mr. George Cridland, aged 68 years.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing offices, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, September 4, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 385.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing.....	292
What is saying on Church Matters.....	292
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XX.....	294
Something wanted in our Worship.—Part III.....	294
Dr. Vaughan on Disestablishment and its Results.....	295
Church Work in Hawaii.....	295
The Wanderer.—VII.....	296
An Outline of the History of Modern Theology.—Part I.....	296
Church and State.....	297
Fire-side Readings: Wishing.....	297
“Couple Heaven with 10”.....	297
The Window that made Faces ugly.—Chap. X.....	297
Ready Replies.—II.....	298
Intelligence: Bury District Sunday-school Union, Burnley, Colyton, Cumbach, Heywood, Middlesbrough, Preston, Yewell.....	298
Correspondence.....	298
The Coming Week.....	298

ELLAND: On Sunday, September 13th,
TWO SERMONS will be Preached on behalf of the Sunday School, by the Rev. JOHN ELLIS, minister. Afternoon, at half-past two; evening, at half-past six.

BIRMINGHAM FREE CHRISTIAN SOCIETY, Lower Fazeley-street.—ANNIVERSARY SERMONS, Sunday next, Sept. 13th. Morning, Rev. E. MADELEY; evening, G. R. TWINN.—TEA MEETING on Monday, Sept. 14th, at six o'clock.

LONDON UNITARIAN LAY PREACHERS' UNION.—A MEETING for important business on Wednesday, 16th inst., at eight o'clock, in Stamford-street Chapel. All interested in the diffusion of New Testament Christianity in London are invited to attend.

R. SPEARS, Secretary.

HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

NEW SUBSCRIPTIONS.
Samuel Collinson, Nottingham.....	0 10 0
Wm. Lewis.....	0 10 0
Woodward, Clark, and Co.....	1 1 0
Edward Smith.....	0 10 0
R. G. Johnson.....	1 1 0
G. K. Cowen.....	0 10 0
Mrs. Barnes.....	0 10 0

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

SESSION, 1868-69.

The SESSION of the FACULTY of MEDICINE will COMMENCE on Thursday, October 1st. Introductory Lecture by Professor ERICHSEN, 8 p.m.

The SESSION of the FACULTY of ARTS and LAWS, including the department of the applied sciences, will BEGIN on Friday, October 2nd. Introductory Lecture by Professor G. CROOM ROBERTSON, M.A., at three p.m.

THE EVENING CLASSES for Classics, Modern Languages, Mathematics, the Natural Sciences, History, Education, &c., will COMMENCE on Monday, October 13th; those for Law on Monday, October 26th.

The SCHOOL for BOYS between the ages of seven and sixteen will RE-OPEN on Tuesday, September 22nd.

Prospectuses of the various departments of the College, containing full information respecting classes, fees, days, and hours of attendance, &c., and copies of the regulations relating to the entrance and other exhibitions, scholarships, and prizes open to competition by students of the several faculties, may be obtained at the Office of the College, on application either personally or by letter.

The College is very near the Gower-street station of the Metropolitan Railway, and within a few minutes' walk of the termini of the North Western, Midland, and Great Northern Railways. JOHN ROBSON, B.A., Secretary to the Council.

August, 1868.

UNIVERSITY HALL, GORDON SQUARE, LONDON, W.C.

PRINCIPAL: E. S. BEESLY, M.A., Oxon, Professor of History in University College, London.

VICE-PRINCIPAL: J. J. WALKER, M.A., Trinity College, Dublin.

Students at University College are received in the Hall, and reside under Collegiate discipline. There are twenty-nine sets of rooms, some of which are now vacant, at rents varying from £12 to £48 for the session.

The HALL will RE-OPEN on the 2nd of October next, at the same time as University College, in close proximity to which it is situated.

SCHOLARSHIPS.—The Trustees of the Gilechrist Educational Fund have founded Three Scholarships of £50 per annum each, tenable for three years by students residing in the Hall, one being awarded every year to the candidate passing highest in the June Matriculation Examination of the University of London.

Further information may be obtained on written application, addressed to the Principal, or to the Secretary at the Hall.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE

(in connection with the University of London, and University College, London.)

University Hall, Gordon-square, London.

PROFESSORS: Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLOR, B.A., Principal, and Professor of Biblical and Historical Theology, with the Truths and Evidences of Christianity.

Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, Professor of Mental, Moral, and Religious Philosophy.

RUSSELL MARTINEAU, Esq., M.A., Professor of Hebrew Language and Literature.

The COLLEGE SESSION COMMENCES on Monday the 5th of October.

STUDENTS and CANDIDATES are required to ATTEND on Friday the 2nd of October, at 11 a.m.

The OPENING ADDRESS will be delivered in the Hall, at four p.m., on Monday the 5th of October, by the Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, and is open to the public.

All or any of the classes may be attended by the public on payment of the regular fees. Particulars may be obtained by letter from the College Librarian, at University Hall, or either of the secretaries. The hours of lectures will be fixed, and may be learnt after the Session has commenced.

R. D. DARRISHIRE, B.A., 26, George-street, Manchester, } Secs.

CHARLES BEARD, B.A., 13, South Hill Road, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, S. }

Manchester, Sept., 1868.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE

(in connection with the University of London, and University College, London.)

University Hall, Gordon-square, London.

SESSION 1868-9.

Candidates for admission into the College at the commencement of the ensuing Session are requested to FORWARD their APPLICATIONS and TESTIMONIALS, without delay, to either of the Secretaries, from whom all needful information may be obtained.

R. D. DARRISHIRE, B.A., 26, George-street, Manchester, } Secs.

CHARLES BEARD, B.A., 13, South Hill Road, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, S. }

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

THE AINSWORTH SCHOLARSHIP.

The Committee offer to those of its students who shall obtain a gold medal in the M.A. Examination at London University, a SCHOLARSHIP of ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. Competitors for this scholarship must graduate as Students of Manchester New College, either on taking their Bachelor's or Master's Degree. If the former, they must have previously spent not less than two years at Manchester New College; if the latter, not less than one year.

The Ainsworth Scholarship is open to any Lay Student of University College who has previously enrolled himself as a Student of Manchester New College, gone through his Undergraduate course under the direction of the Principal of that College, and attended the classes for religious and ethical instruction which it provides for its Lay Students. Subject to these limitations, the Scholarship is open to every Gold Medalist in the Examination for the Master's Degree in any one of the branches of Classics, Science, or Philosophy.

Payment will be made to successful competitors in two yearly payments of Fifty Pounds. The Scholarship will be continued until notice to the contrary is given. Two years' notice will be given previous to its withdrawal.

Further particulars respecting the Scholarship and the plans of study at Manchester New College, may be obtained on application to R. D. DARRISHIRE, Esq., B.A., one of the Secretaries of the College, 26, George-street, Manchester; or to the Rev. J. J. TAYLOR, B.A., Principal, at University Hall, Gordon Square, London.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—SATURDAY

TO MONDAY AT MATLOCK.—Every Saturday until the end of October, 1868, RETURN TICKETS, at the following low fares, will be issued from the under-mentioned Stations to MATLOCK BATH, by the Midland Company's New Route, by any of the ordinary trains on Saturday, available for return by any train on the following Sunday or Monday.

Stations. First Class. Second Class.

Manchester..... 9s. 6d. 7s. 0d.

Derby..... 9s. 0d. 6s. 6d.

Stockport (Trevor Dale Station)..... 8s. 6d. 6s. 0d.

In Manchester, Tickets will be issued at Cook's Excursion Office, 43, Piccadilly, and at the Midland Booking Office, London Road Station.

JAMES ALLPORT, General Manager.

Derby, May, 1868.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an

Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

A YOUNG LADY, experienced in teaching, desires RE-ENGAGEMENT as daily or afternoon GOVERNESS. Highest references.—Address D., care of Mr. Young, bookseller, Liverpool.

WANTED, by a Young Lady, a Re-engagement as DAILY or RESIDENT GOVERNESS in a family. Acquirements: English, French, Music, with Rudiments of German and Drawing.—Address Y., 140, Southgate Road, London.

WANTED, by a middle-aged Lady of experience, a situation either as HOUSEKEEPER, MATRON, &c., or to give a mother's care to children. Address S. F., care of C. I. F., 65, Earl-street, Sheffield. Reference to the Rev. Brooke Herford.

TO THE FRIENDS OF FREE THOUGHT.

A trained, educated TEACHER, with twenty years' high moral and intellectual character, and some literary experience, WISHES to meet with scholastic or any other EMPLOYMENT where Rationalistic views, quietly and unobtrusively maintained, would not be objected to. Address PHILLO-DARWIN, post-office, Great Russell-street, W.C.

A LADY, especially qualified by education and experience, desires an ENGAGEMENT in October to head a gentleman's establishment, or as secretary to an invalid gentleman. Best references.—Address X. Y., Mr. Joseph S. Stott, West Croft, Halifax.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.

Principal: C. du G. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthy-situated establishment, Boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics; gentlemanly education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G., 68, Guildford-street, Russell-square, London; or to Mr. A. G., 81, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

NEW EDITION OF DR. EPHRAIM PEABODY'S "CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS."

Just published, neatly printed, and bound in bevelled boards, with red edges, price 3s. 6d., a new edition of

CHRISTIAN DAYS AND THOUGHTS.

By EPHRAIM PEABODY, D.D.

London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

The two hundred and fiftieth thousand now ready of

"WHAT DO WE, AS UNITARIAN CHRISTIANS, BELIEVE?" By the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. Two shillings a hundred.

"LIGHT FOR BIBLE READERS."

Notes on a hundred passages of Scripture. By the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. A new edition (eighth thousand) now ready, on toned paper. Price threepence. May be had of all the usual agents and booksellers.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.

THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, Containing

Tunes to ALL Martinieau's Lyrics. London: Novello and Co., 1, Berner's-street, W. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson, Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6, Commercial-street; and of all music and book sellers.

PRESENT Condition of Unitarian and

Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 3d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

COMPLETION and RE-ISSUE of DR.

BEARD'S MANUAL of CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE SUITED to the TIMES.

No. 8. The God of Revelation and the God of Idealistic Materialism.

N.B. This work, in Fourteen Numbers, will be issued complete in the form of an Octavo Volume about the end of October, when subscribers will receive their copies. The monthly issue will be continued. To afford opportunity for fresh subscribers, the subscription is re-opened. Subscribers' names, either for the complete volume, or for the volume in monthly parts, should be sent without delay to Mr. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

Subscription Prices: In One Volume, bound in cloth, 7s. 6d.; in Fourteen Monthly Parts, 6d. each. The trade price is 10s. 6d.

In three vols. cloth, price 7s. 6d.

THE HEBREW SCRIPTURES. Translated by SAMUEL SHARPE. Being a Revision of the Authorised English Old Testament. "Superior to any preceding revision of our English translation."—Athenaeum.

E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME of the late

GEORGE BROWN, Barrister-at-Law.

Containing 17 sermons preached by him in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle.

Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLOR, B.A., with

Memorial Sketches, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 3s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to

Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Barnard Castle.

"GO TO SPACKMAN, MERCHANT

CLOTHIER, HATTER, & OUTFITTER, BELFAST, "For all you want in CLOTHING. I get all I possibly can from him myself. He has the largest, best, most fashionable, and cheapest stock of READY-MADE CLOTHING in the WORLD."—Extract from a recommendation to an American friend visiting Europe, by Mr. Cook, the Great European and Transatlantic "Excursionist."

COALS! COALS!!—NOTICE OF

REMOVAL.—JAMES WELLS, Coal and Coke Merchant, Keeper Wharf, Ratcliffe, E. Office: 28, Colborn-street, Bow Road, E.

J. W. takes this opportunity of informing his numerous customers, friends, and the public generally, that he has REMOVED to the above address, where he hopes, by strict attention to business, to merit a continuance of their favours.

He would remind them that Coals are now at the lowest prices for the present season, and would advise them to purchase as soon as possible. A trial is solicited. Quality guaranteed at prices advertised in the daily newspapers.

Orders by post punctually attended to.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,

FURNISHING IRONMONGERS and CUTLERS, 23 SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE.

3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER. (Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse.)

J. BALLS, Proprietor.

NEW GOODS FOR THE SUMMER SEASON.

WILLIAM MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also Bannockburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits.

FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of

Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8,

Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck was formerly in Paris for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London. W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

WHITFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and

SAVES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS, CASH and DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITFIELD & SONS, VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, NEWBURY PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED

AND OTHER NEEDLES.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A committee, consisting of the Earl of Harrowby, Sir Joseph Napier, Bart., Major-General Sir W. Hill, the Bishop of Meath, the Deans of Canterbury, Chester, and Cork, with the Bishop of Gibraltar as president, has been formed for the purpose of establishing an Italian Church Reformation Fund. The object is to be the assistance of those Italians who have evinced a tendency towards reforming their own church after the example of the Church of England.

Among various signs of progress, may be noted that the evangelical Religious Tract Society announces the publication of a "Paragraph Bible with Emendations." The work is to be completed in six parts, two of which have already appeared, comprising the Pentateuch and the Gospels. The two leading points in which the work differs from ordinary editions of the English Bible are—(1) An improved form and arrangement of the Text; and (2) Emendations of the Authorised Version. The aim has been to give to English readers the benefit of all such emendations as have the sanction of the best authorities, and at the same time to avoid encumbering the work with any which are either doubtful or trivial. Explanations of obsolete words and translations of Hebrew and Greek proper names and phrases have also been added.

From statements made at the late Conference, it appears that the Wesleyans have three Theological Institutions, two which have been at work for five and twenty years, and a third which has been recently erected at Headingley, near Leeds, at a cost of upwards of £20,000, and is to be opened immediately. This will accommodate 40 students, the Richmond 60, and the Didsbury 70. The students at Headingley and at Didsbury are intended for the "home work"—that is, they are to be ministers in Britain. The Richmond students are for "foreign work"—that is, they are to be missionaries abroad. These three clerical colleges are supported by the voluntary contributions of the Wesleyans, in the form of subscriptions and collections.

The Marquis of Westminster, the Earl of Radnor, Viscount Folkestone, Sir J. P. Boileau, Sir George Rose, the Bishop of London, and other gentlemen have entered into a subscription for the purpose of restoring the French Protestant Episcopal Church, Bloomsbury-street, formerly in the Savoy Palace in the Strand.

A committee, consisting of Sir R. Murchison, Sir John Herschel, Sir Henry James, &c., has been formed for the purpose of carrying out a survey of Mount Sinai, with a view of determining the line of march of the children of Israel, and the true Mountain of the Law.

Father Ignatius saw a crowd of City men to his one o'clock Friday services. A fortnight ago, preaching from the words "Thy creditor is come," he at once arrested the attention of his large auditory by the naive declaration that creditors were a nuisance—a fact which, he said, would scarcely be disputed in that great city, where little else than debtors, creditors, and money-making were ever thought of. He also said the congregation would be horrified to hear that the rich people who assembled in such large numbers there on the previous Friday morning gave only £3 to the offertory collection, while a poorer congregation assembled on the following Sunday evening gave double that amount.

Dr. George Smith, of Trevor, author of the "History of Wesleyan Methodism" and other works, died last week at the age of sixty-eight.

Difficulties have again arisen respecting the consecration of Dr. Gray's Bishop for Natal. According to some of the Church papers, these have been caused by the interference of Sir Travers Twiss, the Archbishop of Canterbury's Vicar-General; according to the Church News, by that of the Duke of Buckingham. It is understood that Dr. Gray will leave England next month, whether Mr. Macrorie is consecrated by that time or not.

Letters from Rome state that the health of Cardinal Bonaparte, whom some thought not unlikely to be the next Pope, continues to decline. His Eminence, it is said, grows more and more emaciated every day, and his medical advisers suspect that he is attacked with the same malady, cancer in the stomach, which proved fatal to Napoleon I., and to his father before him.

Speaking of Parliamentary candidates, the Guardian observes:

"It is not really known what view our operatives will, as a body, take of religious questions: their support is probably hoped for by the Dissenting interest, which is seeking to be very directly represented in Parliament. Mr. Clayden, who has had experience both as a newspaper editor and an Unitarian preacher, appears to be a popular candidate for Nottingham. Political Nonconformity is nowhere more vigorous than in Wales; and Mr. Richards, who has declared at Merthyr Tydvil in favour of the separation of Church from State in England, is an appropriate man in an appropriate place. At Barnstaple, Mr. Thomas, one of the candidates, is said to be the son of an Independent minister who has also been an aggressive journalist; and Mr. Ernest Noel, who is standing for Dumfries, is a son of Mr. Baptist Noel, who seceded from the English communion."

For what reason we know not, but the Burial Board of Carlisle have refused to allow the daughter of the late Mr. John Daly, formerly a comedian, and latterly clerk of Carlisle races, to place upon his tombstone the words "Not lost, but gone before." The same body some time ago objected to the words "Sacred to the memory of" being placed upon the headstone of Dean Close's son.

Mr. Hooper, the delegate to Congress from Utah, says that the Mormons, in twenty years, have built up that place, from a desert waste which was 1,200 miles from either settlements or navigable rivers, into a flourishing young State, containing 100,000 inhabitants, with a territorial extent of 75,000 square miles. There are 86 flourishing towns in this, with near 100 post-offices, while the grist and saw-mills, woollen manufactories, and many other branches of the mechanic arts are quite equal to those of the other States. There are 100 churches, 120 schoolhouses, and three theatres, which equal in appearance those of the older States. The Mormon emigration from Europe, from 1850 to 1867 inclusive, is estimated at an annual average of 2,000 souls, or an aggregate of 36,000; while the emigration from the old States during the same period has been about 24,000. The estimated cost of taking these people to Utah is $8,300,000. The emigration from Europe this year is put down at 4,000 souls. About one-third of the emigrants have paid their own expenses; the remaining two-thirds have been aided by the "Perpetual Emigrating Fund," which has been in organised existence about twenty years, and is composed of contributions, tithes, legacies, and funds drawn from various sources both in Europe and America. The fund is kept up by the beneficiaries repaying, when convenient, the expense incurred in their emigration, so that others may receive like assistance. During the present year $150,000 was contributed in Salt Lake City alone, to enable others to reach America.

A Mayence paper publishes a letter from a Pontifical Zouave, written in the name of nearly 300 German comrades, who have been arrested for attempting to desert. The writer endeavours to justify desertion by citing the lying promises made by the agents—two premiums, amounting to 560f. and 5d. pay daily, instead of which they have had no premium whatever, and get only 1½d. per diem, not to mention bad treatment, which made their position intolerable.

The late Cardinal d'Andrea, who was supposed at one time to have lost his faith, maintained his charity to the last. His will concludes with the following paragraph:—"I leave to the Holy Father, the cardinals, the prelates, and my other enemies, my sincere and complete pardon."

The Record, which is always abusing somebody or other, takes severely to task the family of the late Rev. Henry Venn Elliott, a well-known evangelical, for selecting Messrs. Macmillan as the publishers of the biography of that clergyman. The objection is an amusing one, and still more amusing is the same paper's pious horror at the licence given to the publishers to stitch at the end of the book an advertising list of their publications, which it appears enumerated the works of Colenso and Maurice. Where would the world be if it had not the pious Record to keep it right?

A case of pluralism in the diocese of Manchester is bringing out some angry remonstrances. The Bishop has appointed the archdeacon (Durnford) to the vacant canonry in the cathedral, worth £600 a year, the same venerable gentleman enjoying nearly £2,000 a year as rector of Middleton, and £200 a year from the archdeaconry, making a total of nearly £3,000.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

In a review of a new theological work, entitled "Ecce Agnus," the Athenaeum says:

"It is impossible for any person who knows anything of Socinian to repress a smile when he hears Socinian used as the especial term of reproach for a modern Unitarian. The famous heresiarch was so much nearer to orthodoxy than those who now go by his name that the Trinitarian disputants, if they knew all, would be as loth to use the term Socinian as the Unitarian to bear the name."

Writing of Mr. Raikes, who is commonly called the "founder of Sunday schools," we are glad to observe that an orthodox contemporary acknowledges the claim which Mr. Lindsey has to this honour:

"He was not alone in his noble work; and without wishing in the slightest degree to depreciate his share in the undertaking, unquestionably some tribute is due to the memory of his less-known coadjutor, the Rev. Thomas Stock, rector of St. John and St. Aldate, Gloucester, whose name should be associated with that of Raikes in grateful recognition. With whom the project originated of assembling the children of the very poor, to be found in the suburbs of Gloucester, half clothed, half fed, and abandoned to every vicious practice, at the early Sunday-morning service in the cathedral, and by degrees disciplining them into a due observance of at least the outward ceremonies of religion, will be found to be matter for widely varying conjecture. But that these estimable men worked together, each according to his means, in carrying out and perfecting that blessed scheme, we have sufficient direct testimony to show. Neither of the Gloucester worthies, indeed, can be credited with having first put forth the idea of Sunday-school teaching, as we find a school, which would appear to be the first on record, established in 1763-4, in Catterick, Yorkshire, by the Rev. Theophilus Lindsey, conjointly with a benevolent lady named Cappe, of Bedale, in the same county. A Miss Hannah Ball, of High Wycombe, also opened and carried on successfully a Sunday school in her native town in 1769; and her pious example was followed by a humble individual named James Heys, more generally known by the familiar appellation of 'Old Jemmy o' th' Hey,' who lived in the village of Little Lever, near Bolton, Lancashire, and who in the year 1775 instructed the poor 'bobbin boys' or 'draw-boys' on the Sabbath, in reading and spelling. The cottage of a neighbour afforded a front room large enough for the purpose, and was cheerfully granted. There 'Old Jemmy' met his pupils—children and young folks—morning and afternoon, every Sunday, the time of assembling being announced by the ringing, not of a bell, but an excellent proxy—an old brass pestle and mortar. But although Stock and Raikes cannot be said to have opened the first Sunday-school in the kingdom, they may justly divide the credit of originating the system. For, as has been truly observed, 'whilst the existence of the few previous establishments of the kind already referred to was known only in their immediate localities, the success which attended the first Sunday school established in the ancient and important city of Gloucester by the joint labours of Mr. Stock and Mr. Raikes, and the publicity given to its results by the latter through the medium of his own paper, the Gloucester Journal, were unquestionably the means of awakening public attention to the subject, and of leading to that rapid and wide extension of the plan which has since happily taken place.'"

The Rev. F. G. Lee, the well-known Ritualist, from whose letter to Mr. Gathorne Hardy the Tory journalists are culling fresh stories of Mr. Gladstone's secret negotiations with the Church of Rome, writes thus mildly and moderately of the Protestant Reformation in England:

"The religious changes of the sixteenth century were commenced by a monarch who had murdered his wives, carried on by a statesman who had murdered his brother, and completed by a queen who had murdered her guest."

A correspondent of the Guardian says:

"There is a large and unscrupulous party both in and out of Parliament, who are tolerant of everything but orthodoxy and dogmatic truth. This party will do doubt in the ensuing struggle stir heaven and earth to retain their hold, by State control, of the doctrine and discipline of the Irish Church. They detest free Churches. Their great aim and ambition is to liberalise, that is to rationalise, the creeds and doctrines of the English Church, to make them mean anything or nothing. They boast already that half the Articles are obsolete beliefs, and that they have got rid of the true and Catholic sense of no small portion of the Creeds, and that the residue are but open questions. It would never do for them to have at their doors a sister Church, orthodox and dogmatic on all those points which they may have succeeded in eliminating from the barren creed they would leave us. They know well enough that if the Irish Church is free to regulate her own affairs without any State interference, and to decide her own doctrine, and to enforce her own proper discipline, there could be no place, no not for an hour, for such unbelievers as Dr. Colenso. This opprobrium, scandal, and disgrace, under which we unhappily are labouring, would never exist in a Church truly free—that is, possessing the freedom which the Liberals, with all their liberality, would refuse us, of getting rid of its rotten and unseemly members."

Noticing the decline of Church Sunday schools, the same paper observes:

"Time-honoured institutions are now put into the crucible and tested; nothing has an unquestioned value; the fashion is not to assume but to prove the efficacy of means once cherished, and to reject them if found wanting. Among several institutions at present undergoing this scrutiny we may reckon Sunday-schools. They have always, perhaps, been spoken of as 'necessary evils,' but we have now got a stage beyond this decision. A doubting spirit casts its pale colour over the argument respecting them, and men are found who, not content with calling them 'evils,' tell us that they are not even 'necessary.' Is it to this spirit that we must attribute their decline? Is it this which has withdrawn the vigour once put forth in managing them? Has the opinion so often expressed, that in proportion to the improved efficiency of week-day schools Sunday-schools ought to decline, proved to be the actual cause of that decline? But Dissenters entertain a different opinion, pursue a contrary policy to this. They know the value of Sunday-schools; esteem them as means of feeding their chapels and recruiting their ranks; throw all their spirit and vigour into them, and find in so doing their reward. Compared with Dissenters Churchmen had need reconsider their present line of action. They may learn that it is not a proof of wisdom to disparage and allow to pass from their hands a powerful instrument, with which when rightly used they may influence the people. It is to be hoped this may not be learnt too late."

According to the Rev. James Skinner, it does not seem to follow that Canons should be familiar with canon law, for of Dr. McNeill's recent meddling with it he says:

"There are two things very apparent which I desire to state publicly, with all due deference to Canon McNeill. First, that he seems to be entirely ignorant of the place of the Decretum Gratiani in the canon law. Secondly, that he misrepresents wholly the character of the passage in the Decretum to which he appeals. And I add that it is hardly possible to exaggerate the loss to the truth which such controversialists, through such ignorance and misrepresentation, are certain to bring sooner or later."

Speaking of the appointment of the "great and good" Canon, as he called himself, to the Deanery of Ripon, the Guardian says:

"Dr. McNeill does not possess a student's acquaintance with theology that will enable him to supply the learning lost to the Evangelical party by the death of his predecessor; but his promotion will be popular among them. It comes fitly, too, from a Premier who has made 'No Popery' his election cry."

With reference to the same appointment the Record has the following observations:

"The home appointments had become of late nearly as objectionable as the Indian. Dr. Atlay may not be a Ritualist in the extreme sense of the term, but he was too much of a disciple of the Bishop of Oxford. The same may be still more strongly said of the appointment of that prelate's chaplain to the important vicarage of Leeds; whilst the rectory of Lullingstone, perhaps under strong political influence, was given, as the Ritualistic journals told us, to one of the most decided 'Catholics' of the ultra-ritual school who long after reunion with Rome, and reject Nonconformists as schismatics belonging to the company of Korah. Other appointments equally objectionable were believed to be in prospect when Winchester or Bath and Wells should be vacant. It has been publicly announced that the Duke of Beaufort had recommended that Archdeacon Denison should be elevated to the see of Peterborough, and his Grace's recommendation is spoken of as almost equivalent to a command. We had been accustomed to associate the Duke of Beaufort's name with the turf and the hunting-field, or with legal proceedings in which the Brighton races and the pastimes of 'Aunt Sally' received a ducal explanation and a ducal celebrity. We never before heard of the Duke of Beaufort as a bishop-maker, or as at all skilled in theology or ecclesiastical affairs. But the very fact that Archdeacon Denison was condemned for heretical opinions on the Real Presence by a court over which Archbishop Sumner presided must of course recommend him to the Ritualistic leaders. The appointment of Canon McNeill arrives under these circumstances most opportunely to the relief of the Government as well as of the Church. It will in itself be regarded as a pledge that Mr. Disraeli has not, as was alleged, sold himself either to the Ritualists or to an ultra Church demi-Ritualist prelate; that he has not embarked in the crazy vessel which the Bishop of Oxford mistakes for the Church of England, and will not give heed to the words uttered by that subtle prelate in the House of Lords, when, speaking of the Ritualists in the debate on the Vestment Bill, he sung out, 'Except these abide in the ship ye cannot be saved.'

On the other hand, the Church News is very wrath at Dr. McNeill's preferment. It says:

"It is an uncalculated and deliberate insult to the whole High Church party, and is perfectly indefensible. To have appointed a mere platform orator, a coarse Irish Orangeman, neither a scholar nor a divine, and remarkable only for having characterised himself as 'a great and good man,' is a blunder of the first water. Even if the appointment is meant to balance the promotion of Archdeacon Denison to Peterborough it is an unprincipled piece of finesse too transparent to delude even a semi-idiot."

Some of the Methodist body are beginning to speak out plainly concerning the alliance of Church and State. On laying the foundation stone of a new chapel at Ilkley, Mr. E. Holden, of Bradford, said "He had no respect for any denomination that was connected with the State."

In replying to Mr. Burgon's animadversions on his University scheme, which we referred to last week, Dr. Pusey, who is sure that if Mr. Coleridge's Bill were carried it would be "regretted by all except Socinians or Socinianising bodies," says:

"To Socinians then, Deists, Atheists, Pantheists, among others, the education of the youth of Christian England would have to be entrusted. But I do not think that, when any thought has got hold of the English mind, it can be successfully resisted as a whole. How many points have been carried, one by one, in the last forty years? And the thought that the Universities, as places of education, should be open to all alike, has, to those who do not think what education is, a character of fairness about it, which has given it such a hold. Mr. Coleridge's scheme is, indeed, utterly impractical; for what sort of education would it be, in which a young man is successively to be subject to the teaching of a Quaker, a Baptist, a Wesleyan, a Socinian, a Materialist, who would teach him that he had no responsibility; or Deist, Atheist, Pantheist, who would teach him that there was either no God, or none to whom he should be responsible? Still the thought itself has got hold of the English mind, and so will, sooner or later, be carried out in some way; and I think that it is our wisdom to consider which is the least of two evils."

S. G. O., whose pen is very lively just now, has written a long letter to the Times, in which he brings a heavy indictment against the Church to which he belongs. He urges the folly of contending that she has loyally upheld the faith of Protestants, and asserts not only that she has broken the terms of the last covenant with the State to do this, but that she appears at present determined to go further in the same direction. After denouncing the boldly-avowed Romanising course of certain members of the Church, he urges that if it can in any way be proved that there is a liberty within the terms of the union of Church and State for all this, the time is at hand when either a severance must ensue, or fresh terms must be made. He holds that "if the Church is Protestant, she fails grievously, in that she does permit not only bishops, but clergy of all ranks, to teach and practise that which is in direct opposition to this her character." As to harmony in spirit and general submission to discipline, the matter is still worse. "The bishops are as little guided by the archbishops as the clergy are seemingly disposed to be directed and taught by either;" and as to discipline, where is the least proof that the rank and file have any disposition to acknowledge their officers' authority? The conclusion at which his lordship arrives from these considerations is that "the Church must be reformed, even if the process of reformation should endanger its very existence." He cannot see who are its governors, who it governs; he knows not where to look for its laws; he is utterly at sea as to its doctrines; he beholds it at one time boastful of its elasticity—that lion and lamb may lie down together under its shelter; at another he sees its lions quarrelling with each other as to the best means of devouring the lambs. Nevertheless, he believes there is time yet to save the Church, but he is satisfied that unless reform comes from within soon, the attack will be from without, and that the attempt to reform will either destroy her altogether, or leave her an object of compassion to all who ever loved her, of derision to her enemies.

Dr. Littledale has published his notorious Liverpool lecture, and has not had the sense to remove from it, or to soften down, the passages in it bespattering the martyrs of the English Reformation which justly gave so much offence. The Daily News, in noticing it, says

"The famous vituperation of the Reformers as a 'set of miscreants' is there, and Lord Palmerston's name is still preserved as that of a 'frivolous old heathen'; but the only passages to be placed beside these expressions are one where Edward VI. is styled a 'young tiger cub,' who would have burnt Dr. Littledale if he had had the chance; and another, where Archbishop Cranmer is said to have been 'arrested in his wicked career by the Divine vengeance.' The lecture, however, is one long indictment of the men who committed the unpardonable offence of making the Church of England a Protestant body; and nothing seems too bad to be laid to their charge. It is quite in Dr. Littledale's way to remark quietly that if Cranmer did not seduce the woman whom he actually married, 'it might be fair to give her some of the credit, or to assume that her cunning, sharpened by long intercourse with students, was more than a match for her admirer.' With equal ease Dr. Littledale writes the Archbishop down as the 'most infamous personage in English history.' Latimer, too, it seems, was a 'coarse, profane, unscrupulous bully.' In short, the martyrs, as we have been accustomed to consider them, provoked their fate by their crimes. True, their execution was a bad business, but then we are told 'it is not strange' that their contemporaries thought that 'the only way was to deal with the peril as we did with the Sepoy mutiny and the cattle plague.' The worst of it is that the terrible fire in which Cranmer perished did not purge his sins, and he has gone to hell. The evidence on this point is, of course, of an inferential character, but to Dr. Littledale's mind it is very clear. Accordingly we are told that if a word of regret had dropped from his lips expressive of regret for his conduct as Archbishop, we might be justified in entertaining a hope 'that his fiery punishment on earth might have served for his purgation. But he died, so far as history and his own words tell us, absolutely impenitent for all these and similar crimes, and went thus to his own place.' We might multiply extracts of this character, but perhaps our readers have by this time had enough of the opinions of the Rev. Dr. Littledale, 'Priest of the Church of England.'"

Dr. Pusey does not seem to have taken anything, save a good deal of ridicule, by his fishing in Conference waters. The Methodist Times thus speaks of him:

"In younger days we had a dim ideal of this devout doctor of the Protestant Church, which was very influential in raising our anti-Popish blood. We always thought it queer that this great Father of the Anglican Tractarianism, or, as it is now developed, Ritualism, should yet be a professed Protestant, or at any rate, a tutor in one of the great seats of Protestant learning in this country. Of course, since then, such anomalies have become so common that we have ceased to wonder at them at all. Well, but having settled down in presence of such an anomaly, we are all at once startled from our seats to behold another wonder. The dim ghostly shape of the Doctor is suddenly changed into what, for the present, is nondescript, and perhaps transitional. He approaches the great Methodist conclave with overtures of union for himself and party. It was indeed no wonder that "the reverend Fathers and Brethren" rubbed their eyes and cocked their ears with amazement. Had the Holy Pontiff himself sent them an epistle, they could not have been more surprised. There are those, we know, who will not wonder at this singular freak, for they suppose that the good doctor, true to the ritualistic notion of 'Apostolic succession,' may see the link of 'organic union' between the Methodist Conference and the 'Anglican branch of the Catholic Church,' in the episcopal ordination of Wesley, and the transmission by him of the mystic afflatus which makes a man a priest in the sacramental sense. But in our judgment Dr. Pusey gives up this distinctive point in his High Church, and would henceforth make a basis of catholic union out of the mere acceptance of a creed, to wit, the 'Nicene.' This is a great stride, and will tell its tale yet. For the present we are well content with the manner in which such overtures have been disposed of."

The Pall Mall says:

"Not content with his sacrilegious assault on the Irish Church, Mr. Gladstone has begun to throw stones at the Scotch Church. Our Conservative contemporaries will doubtless be shocked, 'but hardly surprised, at this fresh proof of this insatiable malignity. In a recent correspondence, Mr. Gladstone has not scrupled to apply the term 'Debased Gothic' to the parish church of Biggar—one of the oldest fabrics of the Scotch Establishment—dating, it is believed, from the 16th century, and highly venerated by the people of the district. The phrase has given great offence in the neighbourhood, and Mr. Gladstone's friends are vainly trying to explain away its obvious hostility to the Presbyterian religion, and to represent it as a mere technical term of art."

Some correspondents of the Daily News have been proposing a strike among the curates. One of them, "A Curate without a Cure," describes his own case, which he rightly terms an edifying one:

"Ordained nearly eighteen years ago, I went on flourishingly for the first six with my curacy and college fellowship. Then I married. The inevitable family (pace Lord Amberley) came. I was forced to turn pedagogue, and for the last eleven or twelve years, though possessed of the highest credentials of character and ability, I have found one rock ahead in every effort I have made towards preferment—viz., the question 'How many thousands can you invest?' Of course the natural solution of the regulars would be that I am incapable. I can only say that, for all these years, besides my school work, I have taken Sunday duty, as a sort of clerical 'casual' or episcopal 'ticket of leave man,' and never preached in any church without being asked to do so again (not always by the incumbent, but always by the churchwardens and congregation); and, moreover, I have, during all that period written sermons weekly, at a high price, for those of my brethren who have not 'leisure or inclination' (that is the euphemism) for the composition of their own discourses. So, perhaps, the less said about incapacity the better."

To illustrate a process in the Church which he thinks might well be called "blackwashing," as opposed to "whitewashing," S. G. O. relates a tale which, as he says, is "scarcely credible:"

"It appears that the patronage of certain small incumbencies is held by gentlemen who we are, I suppose, bound to presume, use them for the charitable purpose of restoring the ecclesiastical status of clergymen who have got into moral or other difficulties. A certain bishop—and there is no one living more sensitive as to the honourable character of the clergy of his diocese—happens to have one of these loci penitentiae in his diocese. The present patron is a clergyman, but, I believe, doing no duty in the church. I will take three successive appointments. In the first, I cannot find that this patron was actually answerable. I believe the nomination was acquired from the then patron, a well-known bankrupt and something more. I care not to go into the circumstances under which this incumbent sought and obtained this very small, out-of-the-way preferment; he left it under circumstances that I was assured, from excellent authority, and believed myself, to be such as would prevent his gaining any licence to do duty elsewhere. I sawance by the newspapers that—he be licensed or not—he had just had a silver snuffbox presented to him as a testimony of gratitude for the manner in which he had performed the temporary duty at a place named. No. 2, I have reason to believe, came in a questionable shape, nominated by the philanthropic clerical patron; he left, I know not why, but I do know the bishop for good reasons refused to countersign the signature of the clergy who had signed his testimonials, who, as I believe, knew very little about him. He thus made way for No. 3, who had held a living in another diocese; as I have it before me, his father was patron, and found it advisable that it should be sold—i.e., I presume the next presentation to do this his son had to accept some other preferment; the philanthropic patron gave him this vicarage of Blackwash; but now it appeared that his bishop, for good reasons, would not countersign his testimonials. Here there were three cases of the Blackwash pastorate, all with singular features. In the first, I think, the good people of that singularly retired spot would be surprised to hear that No. 1 had got the snuff-box; in case 2, the bishop of the diocese into which he went said he could not refuse to institute him on the ground of the want of his former bishop's counter-signature. This said former bishop, finding himself in the same dilemma as to No. 3, had to institute him with his testimonials not countersigned!"

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XX.

SUBJECT: The constant looking forward of the Hebrew writers to times of an improved knowledge of God and the better practice of virtue.

Read Jeremiah xxxi. 27–40. After a time of troubles Jehovah promises that He will restore the nation, like as I have watched over them to pluck up and to break down and to throw down and to destroy and to afflict, so will I watch over them to build up and to plant. They are to have a better perception of right and wrong. They shall no more lay the blame of their misdeeds upon their fathers, but every man shall bear the responsibility of his own conduct. Jehovah will put His law into them and write it on their hearts. They shall have also a clearer knowledge of God. They shall no more need to teach every man his brother, saying know Jehovah, but they shall all know Jehovah from the least of them to the greatest of them.

Read Isaiah xxix. 17–24. This writer also looks forward to a time, and that very near at hand, when the deaf to truth shall hear the words of the book, and the eyes of the blind shall see out of darkness; when the meek shall increase their joy in Jehovah and the scorner and the wicked shall be cut off. They also that erred in spirit shall come to understanding, and they that murmured shall learn doctrine.

Read also Zephaniah iii. 8–13. Jehovah declares

He will give to the nations a clean lip, that they may all call upon the name of Jehovah to serve Him with one consent. The Hebrew nation has done wrong, but Jehovah shall turn their adversity to good. He shall take away out of the midst of them the proud and haughty. He shall leave only an afflicted people, who shall put their trust in the name of Jehovah. The remnant of Israel shall not do iniquity nor speak lies; neither shall a deceitful tongue be found in their mouth. This last passage may be noticed as one of the earliest in the Old Testament, which shows a wish that the truer knowledge of God should spread beyond their own nation to the Gentiles.

SOMETHING WANTED IN OUR WORSHIP.

PART III.

If we go to our places of worship in order to worship, it becomes us by all means to see to it that we do not miss our object. Our people have long been accustomed to complain of the wearisomeness of the devotional services. The "long prayer" has been an object of alarm, I suppose, ever since those days when Mr. Marshall used to "pray large for two hours." But if we are in earnest we shall not be content to complain of these things, but we shall take care to improve them. If, as Unitarians, our principle is, to worship "with the spirit and the understanding also," we shall take care in our acts of worship, not to stifle the spirit or belie the understanding. But we do both, when we publicly take part in services which have little or no interest for us.

If our devotional services are in fault we must improve them. The first thing to be done in the way of improvement, is to make them less the act of the minister and more the act of the congregation. The congregation, in short, must take part in our acts of worship. It may not be desirable after the Methodist manner to call upon this or that person to pray in the congregation, but it is desirable that when the minister prays, the congregation should devoutly follow him, and heartily respond to his prayers. It is not for the minister to respond "amen" to his own prayer. The practice is absurd. And yet we should not like his prayer, however long, to be interrupted by the noisy "amens" of the audience. We might, however, break up the prayer into one or two parts, each of which could be concluded with one of the fine old collects, and the choir and congregation could then chant in response a soft "amen." In this way our prayers—even the "long prayer"—might in a manner become the act of the congregation.

In our old chapels it was customary to have a clerk, one of whose duties it was to lead the congregation in responding "Amen." In course of time the congregation became careless, and neglected to follow the clerk; his office as a leader thus becoming obsolete, it was wisely abolished. But still the people did not like to discontinue the use of the old response. It seemed as though a prayer was not a prayer; nor a sermon, a sermon—without the "Amen;" and, as they were too careless to utter the response themselves, they committed the absurdity of relegating the office of uttering it to the minister, and now, in all our places of worship, we Unitarians, who are the great enemies of formalism, show how fast we are bound by the iron chains of it, when, instead of responding "amen" to the prayers and exhortations of our ministers, we sit quietly in our pews, and listen to the minister as he, all unaided and alone, responds "amen" to his own utterances!

We are shocked if some honest Methodist in a neighbouring pew ejaculates out of the fulness of his heart, and in defiance of all the proprieties, "Amen" to the petition of him who prays; it offends our sense of decorum. And yet it is the Methodist, and not we who ought to be shocked; unless, indeed, we are shocked at our own absurdity; for certainly nothing could be more absurd than that a minister, standing up in the congregation to preach or to pray, should be left to ejaculate "Amen" to his own words.

If we continue the use of this venerable response, it would certainly be well for us to use it intelligently and with a meaning, and if we object to the Methodist use of it, let us use it musically and blend our voices together in the congregation in chanting "Amen" to the prayers of the minister.

Certainly, if our services of devotion are to be interesting and helpful, our congregations must take an active part in them. It would be one step in the way of their doing so, if they would relieve the minister of the duty of responding "Amen" to his own words. Another step would be for them to recite a psalm together, instead of the ministers reading it. The people might read it alternately with the minister, but the better way would be for all to join in chanting it. But as I dwell on this point, as well as on the use of responses, in my former paper, I need not return to them in this, unless it be to point the finger to them in passing, to direct attention to them as affording admirable ways of engaging the congregation in the services of devotion.

But not only is it necessary, if we would make our devotional services really interesting and useful, that our congregation should take an active part in them, it is also necessary to attend to many little circumstances which are apt to disturb our devotional feelings, and hinder their free exercise, e.g., an unfitting posture. We sit in our prayers; I call this an unfitting posture. When we bow our souls in prayer, we should bend our knees along with them. Our fathers used to stand in prayer. But we have got into the way of standing in singing hymns, and we sit in prayer. This, to me, seems a careless, negligent way of offering up our prayers. Let us kneel at the throne of God. I wish I could see in all our places of worship our congregations kneeling when they pray. I am persuaded that this posture would promote solemnity and earnestness in our prayers, and would therefore be to the advantage of our devotional feelings.

It would be to their advantage:—1. From the felt adaptation of the posture to the work; and (to take a physical view) 2, from the relief which such posture would afford to the body after standing and sitting. This latter, perhaps, is a very practical view of the matter; but it is one not to be overlooked, for whatever helps to put our minds in harmony with our work as worshippers, is favourable to the successful performance of the work. There are three great postures of the body—standing, kneeling, sitting. We rightly have recourse to them all in our acts of worship, for we sit when we merely listen, we stand when we sing and chant, and we kneel when we pray. Somehow we have set aside the posture which, to an Englishman, is most suggestive of reverence and devotion; let us return to it, and KNEEL in our prayers.

This, after all, is only a mere outside matter, but some of these mere outside matters have a sensible effect on our tone of mind. I think we do not attend to them quite enough. We cannot have everything that surrounds us when engaged in worship too decorous and orderly. This suggests another thought. It is this. Of course it matters in itself nothing whether the minister preaches with his coat on or off, but his congregation would be rather shocked if he preached to them with it off; and what he said, though it might otherwise have left its impression, would, under such circumstances, very likely be said in vain. For these reasons, I think, without being very particular, our ministers ought to be a little careful in their dress; and I am inclined to think the use of the old Presbyterian, Genevan, or black gown not a disadvantage. We like to see judges and barristers wear the black gown; it seems to me not undesirable in the pulpit. It gives a certain solemnity and dignity to our worship, and certainly we cannot make our worship too solemn nor too full of dignity. If the prejudices of people are opposed to the use of the gown—though that can hardly be the case amongst us, seeing that so many of our ministers wear the gown—I do not think it would be advisable to move in the face of such prejudices; for in doing so we are apt to lose more in the way of communion and unity of the spirit than we gain in solemnity and dignity; and if communion of spirit be wanting, the sense of dignity and the feeling of solemnity would be very difficult, if not impossible, to preserve.

Some people have a great dread of being thought imitators, and do not like to be thought to affect this or that party of religionists.

But the improvement of our devotional services is not a question about parties, but about our own health and prosperity as a religious body. Something needs to be done; and if we are afraid of doing this and afraid of doing that because it smacks too much of this church or of that church, it is certain we shall do nothing.

For my part, I lay it down as a principle that, because I am a Unitarian, I can be and I ought to be an eclectic. If in my walks abroad I see a beautiful flower in a neighbour's garden, I get a specimen of it and plant it in my own, and thus I bring together all beautiful flowers into my own little garden. My church is my garden. I am not restrained in my action in it by written codes or articles, nor do I fear the decisions of Privy Councils. But what in the surrounding churches I find good for my soul, and helpful to me in my worship, that I am only too glad to avail myself of. Whether I borrow a good thing from Methodists or from Churchmen I care not,—all that concerns me is, and all that need concern me is, that it is a good thing. Our church is made up of men, some of whom have Presbyterian, some Independent, some Church of England, some Methodist affinities. But whatever may be our affinities, we are all bound together in a desire to serve Jesus Christ according to our consciences. For the rest, we have one common object, and it is to promote piety in our congregations, and make our church a living and not a dead church. If any of the other churches can put us in the way of accomplishing that object, we ought to be only too glad to have their assistance.

But, belonging to a body of Christians which professes to be guided, not merely by the spirit, but by "the understanding also," we ought above all things to avoid a barren formalism, and strive in the full view of our human weaknesses to adapt our devotional exercises to the felt needs of the members of our own communion,—borrowing from every side what seems best calculated to promote amongst us "religion and piety for all generations."

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1868.

DR. VAUGHAN ON DISESTABLISHMENT AND ITS RESULTS.

AND the wild and incoherent ravings which form the staple of clerical utterances in the present crisis of the Irish Church, it is refreshing to meet with something like calmness and common sense. The Rev. Dr. VAUGHAN, vicar of Doncaster, is a thorough churchman, and withal a man of unquestioned sincerity and piety. Unlike many of his fellows of the Mrs. Partington school, who vainly struggle with their little clerical mops to keep back the tide of change, he has frankly accepted the late abolition of compulsory churchrates as practically the coup de grace to the whole churchrate system, and has avowedly thrown his church for the future upon the offertory for those expenses which formerly were borne by the rates. On the first Sunday on which the new collection was made he preached a special sermon, in which he referred, with great candour, to the condition and prospects of the Established Church. Among other things he said:

"So rapid has been the course of events in late years, that Church people must prepare themselves, I feel sure, for a speedy, a scarcely gradual, demolition of all that has been distinctive, all that has been exceptionally advantageous, in their position. An eminent man and excellent bishop, who was laid in his grave last Friday, was wont to say, 'If I live ten years, I shall be the last bishop of Peterborough.' It is more than probable that some of my younger hearers this evening may live not only to see what we call the Church of England thrown altogether upon voluntary offerings for its maintenance—in which case some of them may remember in old age this first collection made in the Parish Church of Doncaster for the repairs of the fabric, and the expenses of its service—but also to find it at least an open, perhaps a very doubtful question, to whom shall belong the churches themselves and the glebe houses—whether, indeed, there shall be left to the old Church of England, as we still fondly call it, any vestige of that legal standing, which has made her hitherto the calm shelter of her children, the admiring wonder of foreigners, and the mark of obloquy or envy, as the case may be, to thousands of her domestic enemies."

Many of our friends have been accustomed to regard the statements of the Liberation Society as to the progress of opinion on the subject of disestablishment of the Church of England as exaggerations, so that it is peculiarly interesting to find one of the shrewdest and most moderate of churchmen uttering anticipations which we ourselves should hardly have dared to entertain. That pleasant little euphemism, the Church's "legal standing" may be admitted for the sake of the admission which precedes it. It is astonishing how intelligent men can blind themselves by a phrase! The Episcopal church of England will have a "legal standing" when on a level with all the other churches of CHRIST in England, just as much as it has at present; all that it will lose will be its exclusive standing as the only church at present recognised by the State as capable of performing religious functions. Nor is it quite fair to talk about the "domestic enemies" of the Church of England. The Church ejected the Puritans, and persecuted the Quakers, and turned out the Methodists; and then, when these branches of the Christian church in England endeavour, by perfectly fair and legal means, to bring about simple religious equality, the Establishment twits them as "domestic enemies!" And it is the more unjustifiable in Dr. VAUGHAN to speak in this way, because he immediately goes on to deprecate the idea of the Church of England being injured by these changes which yet he can only attribute to domestic enemies:

"I am far from regarding this prospect, be it far off or near, with unmixed alarm or dismay. I never believed that the 'Establishment,' as such, was CHRIST's Church in England, or that the withdrawal of the favours of the State would be the putting out in our communion of the Divine shekinah. It is not so much for the Church that I fear, for I firmly believe CHRIST's words, 'Lo, I am with you always,' and doubt not that the old, the everlasting benediction, is able to repeat itself in many new, many diverse forms."

What then is it that is to be feared? If the Church does not suffer, where can there be injury? To us this bugbear of vague apprehension is inexplicable. We can understand the fears of narrow Anglicans, who believe in no church but their own; but what can a man like Dr. VAUGHAN be afraid of?

"I fear something for the State, when it ceases to have a religion. I fear something for the average tone of religion in our cottages and in our palaces, where there is no longer one form of worship which has upon it the stamp of pedigree and of custom—when it is an evenly-balanced question with every man and with every family, whither shall I go this day for God's worship—whither, or whether any whither? I fear there will be more and more in many houses of a cold, indifferent scepticism—a Christless education and a Godless life. I fear that more and more may reach old age ignorant of a Saviour, and go to their graves without any sure and certain hope of a resurrection to eternal life. For the Church itself I fear not."

Oh, pitiful conclusion! This wonderful bugbear is—the condition to which "the State" will be reduced "when it ceases to have a religion." If we were surprised at a man like Dr. VAUGHAN deluding himself by such a mere phrase as the Church's "legal standing," what must we be to read of his fear of the State "ceasing to have a religion?" What can he mean? "The State" must be either the government, or the nation. But can a government have a religion? We are puzzled by the idea. Religion, we always fancied to be something individual and personal. The members of a government may have a religion; sometimes we believe they have; parliament notoriously has a good many religions. And how the disestablishment of the Anglican Church would alter this, we are at a loss to understand. But if this meaning of the words quoted be untenable, what must be said for the alternative interpretation? Can Dr. VAUGHAN really be in earnest when he speaks of his fear lest indifference and irreligion should become more frequent, and "more and more reach old age ignorant of a Saviour?" From whom has it been, then, that the great mass of England's poor have heard of a Saviour? Not from the Church of England. More than from any other church, from Methodism in its various branches; from churches that have had nothing of "legal standing." If this is the worst peril, we are not afraid to face it. We thankfully accept Dr. VAUGHAN's prognostications of speedy disestablishment, but we cannot share his fears.

CHURCH WORK IN HAWAII.

THE Bishop of Honolulu has published a narrative of the origin and progress of Christian work in Hawaii, a brief outline of which may be interesting to some of our readers.

Twelve years after Captain Cook's discovery of the Hawaiian Archipelago, when, in 1792, Vancouver visited it, Kamehameha the Great was then founding his dynasty. John Young and English prisoner of his—the grandfather of Queen Emma, who a short time back visited this country—became the interpreter between him and Vancouver; and the latter, after much friendly intercourse, promised on his return to England to request King George to send out "a teacher of the true religion." His efforts, however, led to no result, and, in 1819, Kamehameha I. died, as he had lived, in the faith of his country. Still, though no missionary had visited the islands, that faith had, from various causes, been greatly shaken; and on the accession of Kamehameha II., the singular spectacle was exhibited of a nation abolishing its old religious system before it had anything else to substitute in its place. The word went forth, the idols were abolished by edict, the "taboo" was broken, the Heiaus (sacred enclosures serving as their temples) were thrown down, their ruins being still visible in several spots on the islands. In this remarkable movement the high priest, Hewahewa, himself took the lead.

The following year witnessed the first arrival of missionaries. They were Presbyterians and Congregationalists from New England. But the chiefs, remembering Vancouver's promise of religious teachers from England, received them with a hesitation which was not entirely overcome till they were reinforced by some Dissenting missionaries from the old country. Of the work of these early pioneers, the Bishop says:

"The arrival of Messrs. Tyerman and Bennett (of the London Missionary Society) in 1822, and of the Rev. W. (now Dr.) Ellis, then a missionary at Tahiti, proved of much use in removing the suspicions with which at first the objects of these earnest men were regarded. The language was put into a written shape, a task of no little difficulty. Ere long, the New Testament, and some time later the whole Bible, were translated into Hawaiian. In these respects we, who are called to 'labour in the vineyard' at this more advanced stage in the history of the Hawaiian kingdom, may truly say, 'Other men have laboured, and we are entered into their labours.'"

There was, however, still a longing after some more direct connection with England, and in 1823 Kamehameha II. and his Queen embarked on a visit to this country. The voyage may have had political objects, but it had a religious one too.

In acknowledging the gift of a schooner sent out by the British Government for his use, the King, in a letter to George IV. (Aug. 21, 1822), had remarked, "Our former idolatrous system has been abolished, as we wish the Protestant religion of your Majesty's dominions to be practised here."

The expedition was unfortunate. The King and Queen died in London, and their remains were sent back to the islands with all due honour in a British man-of-war. Kamehameha III., the brother of the deceased King, succeeded to the throne. During his reign a Roman Catholic mission succeeded, after much difficulty, in establishing itself in the islands. It was at first vehemently opposed by the chiefs, acting under the inspiration of the Congregational missionaries; but in 1839 the unanswerable argument of the guns of a French frigate secured to it not only toleration but substantial advantages.

Up to this time the English Church had no representative in the islands. But a large white population had been gradually growing up, which contained some English Churchmen and many American Episcopalians, and a growing need was felt by these for a clergyman of their own. A favourable opportunity for satisfying this was opened by the death of the King in 1855, and the accession of his nephew, Kamehameha IV., who had been carefully instructed from boyhood in the English language, and with his brother had made the tour of Europe:

"These young Princes met with kindly notices at our own Court as elsewhere. They made a very favourable impression, and gathered new ideas, which were not lost upon them as regarded both the English State and the English Church. At Westminster Abbey they attended divine service, with the beauty and solemnity of which they were much struck. The writer has been permitted to hear read portions of the diary which the late King, then Prince Liholiho, kept during his stay in England. It records the sights and events of each day, with the impression that they left upon this young chief's mind, written in excellent English and in good taste."

A bishop and clergy were sent out to Honolulu in 1862, and reached their destination just in time to find the royal family and the whole nation overwhelmed with grief at the sudden death of the heir to the throne, whom they had come out hoping to baptise as the godson of Queen Victoria. Within a year afterwards, the King himself, broken-hearted by the blow, pined and died, and his widowed Queen came hither with a chivalrous resolution to carry out the objects on which her husband's heart was set. The new King, Kamehameha V., has not varied from the policy of his brother. "I regard the Church as a sacred legacy bequeathed by my predecessor," were his words on the day of his accession, and his subsequent acts have shown that they were sincere.

The Bishop says with such powerful support the Church prospers. A cathedral is partially built, and attractive and hearty services in a temporary church at Honolulu are attended by a regular and devout body of worshippers, both foreign and native. More than £400 a year has been raised on an average from local sources in the capital alone, since the Bishop's arrival in 1862. Stations have been opened also on the other islands, occupied in two instances by American clergymen under the Bishop's jurisdiction. Schools have been established for boys and girls, with a special reference to the peculiar needs of the islanders. A Sisterhood is actively at work, which had the advantage, at its first establishment, of Miss Sellon's personal superintendence. In short, real work is everywhere going on.

THE WANDERER.—VII.

In the Greek Church, London Wall, we found the priest, dimly visible through a gap like a half-door in the altar screen—which, with its window-like panels marvellously resembles the front of a house—saying mass to about eight auditors. Thence we passed on to East-street, which is close at hand. Here the Roman Catholic church, St. Mary's, attracts a large congregation. Nor are other creeds unrepresented; immediately across the road a huge Wesleyan chapel enters its remonstrance against the Papacy; and within St. Mary's shadow, on the other side, a small "Welsh Baptist Chapel" represents a yet grimmer Protestantism. But a few yards again beyond this, Mr. M. D. Conway's weekly reflections on things in general entertain a select auditory. We chose the more ancient faith, and passed into its temple. It is a fine structure; the arched ceiling bears handsome paintings, and beyond the altar and a screen of marble columns you see upon the wall a large fresco of the Crucifixion, which produces a striking effect. The sermon, by the Rev. Father Clare, a Jesuit, was on the duty of mercy. Eulogising it as the virtue peculiarly recommended by Christianity, he proceeded to dwell on the Divine example of its exercise, with a startling luxuriance of orthodoxy. Moved by feelings of mercy, he told us, the Son of God "rose from his throne, made a plunge and lighted upon earth," was content to assume human flesh, and "so disfigured his Omnipotence as to annihilate his Deity." It was mercy that gave us the amazing spectacle seen in Bethlehem's manger, there amid its squalor and its bareness lay "a God quivering with the cold of a winter's night." Nay, not only did he so yield up his Divineness for us, but since his Ascension he does yet more, "he crushes up his humanity into a wafer," that we may feed on it, that—as St. Austin boldly says—"his very body and blood may become ours, and we may have a material, as well as a spiritual, oneness with him."

What a singular feeling comes over one on entering a Catholic Chapel. You have left behind you the 19th century in the street outside, with its bustle and its sunlight; and in stepping over the threshold you have crossed a gap of four centuries. The Bishop of Rome is still the arbiter of the universe and the source of truth; science is a dream, and political progress a nightmare; and the daily world around is as full of miracles as a fairy tale. Religious controversy is a holy war waged only in some distant land of the pagan, and no breath of criticism blows away the dust which is obscuring the sacred features of the Son of Man.

I have heard Archbishop Manning preach on St. Vincent de Paul, and tell with perfect faith how a priest, haunted by doubts of the Church's infallibility, overcame them for a time by stretching his arm towards Rome and meditating on the Pope. But how at last this device failed, and then he was miraculously enabled to transfer his doubts to St. Vincent, who thenceforth was tormented by them, while he went free. The Archbishop in the same sermon said "Protestantism is dead. Mark the word! It was an old tradition, partly social, partly political; a fragmentary Christianity without coherence. But the Protestantism of 300 years ago is as dead as though it were already buried." In his appeal on behalf of a charitable society of St. Vincent, he described the work it was doing for poor boys, whom, he said, "it taught to earn an honest livelihood by blacking the shoes of the passers-by." I was much shocked to find an Archbishop and a D.D. so disgracing the pulpit as to use words which simply conveyed his meaning. Of all the learned divines under whom I have suffered, no other, I am sure, would have descended to such degrading plainness. No! they would have said that the shoeblacks "obtained precarious but adequate pecuniary remuneration by removing the indicia of travel from the integuments of pedestrians," and would then have concluded with three or four allusions to the Patriarchs, a quotation from the genealogies in Nehemiah, and an exhortation to the boys to remain contented in their station; probably remarking, subsequently, that the Israelites in all their wanderings never had their shoes blacked, and drawing thence a lesson of gratitude, and a hit or two at Bishop Colenso.

CYRIL.

AN OUTLINE OF THE HISTORY OF MODERN THEOLOGY.—PART I.

WE all remember the commotion that was caused in this country by the publication of "Essays and Reviews," but that was nothing to the consternation in the clerical camp on the appearance of the "Wolfenbüttel Fragments." Since the days of Luther the infallibility of the Bible had reigned supreme over the realms of theology. In England, indeed, a few earnest men rose up towards the end of the 17th century, to protest, in the name of common sense, against the burdens which the popular theology laid upon their backs. Their influence, however, was not great in this country; they were too far before their time to get a patient hearing; but in Germany their effect was more palpably felt. Whilst the upper classes were being influenced by the cutting satire and sparkling wit of the illustrious Frenchmen who gathered about the brilliant court of Frederick the Great, the middle classes were imbibing the calm sober sense of the English Deists. Up to this time the theology of Germany had undergone but little change. A few men, here and there, such as Semler and Bahrdt, had at intervals stirred the waters, but stereotyped orthodoxy was almost universally prevalent. The garrison of the Church were invincible against the scoffs and blasphemies of French infidelity. The jokes that were bandied about in Berlin at the expense of the orthodox were regarded by the old veterans as the mere flashing of signal rockets betraying the position of the distant foe. The fosse and the drawbridge were secure. The gray battlements and lofty turrets, filled with the trophies of the Crusaders, slept there in solemn silence. No sound was ever heard within those sombre walls save the dull notes of the bells tolling to prayers. All looked safe and strong, and likely to stand for ever. When, in the direction of Wolfenbüttel, a bright flash was seen, a thin blue smoke curled up, and something crashed in amongst the old walls, sending the owls and the bats screaming up into mid air, and awoke the slumbering guardians of the church's stronghold. Old arms, spears, battle-axes, and shields, worm-eaten and rust-eaten from the disuse of centuries, were now raked up in hope of doing service against the shot and shell of modern warfare. The sneers of Voltaire and the scoffs of Nicolai used to be regarded as nothing but the light rattle of musketry of some advanced skirmishing party; but now the first cannon shot had struck, the enemy was at the gate, a breach had been made in the wall, the foe was pouring in, there was a hand-to-hand struggle for life or death—a struggle on which the fate of the Church depended—it was the taking of the theological Bastille.

The publication of the "Wolfenbüttel Fragments," which was only Lessing's edition of a manuscript by Reimarus, of Hamburg, entitled, "Vindication of the Rational Worshippers of God," was important merely on account of the sober earnest spirit in which it is written. The tendency of the work was to rationalise the history and doctrines of Scripture. In the introduction the author gives an account of how he came by the opinions put forth. He had been carefully brought up by his parents in the principles of Christianity, in hope that he would become a theologian; but doubt after doubt so increased that it soon became evident he could never be connected with the theological faculty. In the first place, he renounced the doctrine of the Trinity; then the necessity of all men being saved by Christ, as he could not believe that God would abandon to destruction so large a portion of the human race, because, through no fault of theirs, they were ignorant of Christ. He then entered into a criticism of the various narratives of Scripture, pointing out with great ingenuity the contradictions in the accounts of the resurrection, thus showing the fallibility of the writers. Unimportant as this work may appear to us, it marks the beginning of a new epoch in theology. The orthodox complained that they were unfairly used. The Rationalists replied that the Church had brought these disasters upon herself; that instead of keeping pace with modern science she had spent her time in doting over old traditions and doctrines of dark ages. The infallibility that she claimed for the Bible, manifest contradictions proved to be untenable. With the dogmas of the writers it was much the same. Peter holding one position, Paul another, whilst all of them were wrong about the coming of the Lord. Then the doctrine of the Trinity, which, as popularly taught by the orthodox, amounted to three self-consciousnesses in the Godhead, was not only contrary to reason, but a matter of which it was impossible for man to know anything. And further, said the Rationalists, your doctrine of a God-man—a being perfect God and perfect man—is loaded with contradictions. The Church maintains that the second person of the Trinity is identical with Jesus Christ; but facts in the life of Jesus seem to be irreconcilable with that opinion. For instance, Jesus said "My Father is greater than I." Now, whatever subject egotism can be predicated of must have personality; so that a being or nature could not say I without having personality. If, then, Jesus, in using the above words, referred to his divine nature, that nature must have been inferior to the Father—Arianism; but if he referred to his human nature, that nature must have been personal—Nestorianism—heresies that were long ago condemned by the Church. Now the perfection of a nature consists in its possession of personality; therefore "two whole and perfect natures" involve two personalities. So the dilemma stands thus: The divine nature in Jesus was perfect, or it was not; if it was, the human nature could not have been so, in which case he could not have been perfect man; but if it was not perfect, he could not have been perfect God. To this the orthodox replied that the whole thing was a revealed mystery of the Catholic faith, "which faith except every one do keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly."

At this juncture of affairs, when the contest between the Rationalists and Supernaturalists had reached its height, a third party stepped in to effect a compromise—honest, earnest, deep-thinking men, thoroughly versed in the literature of all lands, and gifted with dialectic powers unequalled since the days of the Stagira—Schleiermacher, Hegel, De Wette, and Daub. These men said both parties were right and both were wrong. For instance, the doctrine of the Trinity was true, but the definition given of it was false. It is allowed on all hands, said they, that God is the Infinite Thinking; but the very notion of thinking implies that there is an object thought of. Now, as there cannot be anything outside of God—He being infinite—it follows that He must be object to Himself—must separate Himself from Himself. But this separation can only be an ideal one, so that the two—subject and object—are again identical. God, then, as subject, is the Father; as object, He is the Son; and as the identity of the two, He is spirit. This compromise, however, was rejected by both parties: the Rationalists said it was a cloud-castle, and the old divines replied it might be very philosophic and perhaps very true, but it was in no way the doctrine of the Church. Paul of Samosata, about the middle of the third century, had broached similar opinions, and lost his bishopric in consequence—a warning to all good Christians not to Platonise. Besides, similar explanations of the doctrine of the Trinity had been offered to the world by all the mystics, from Proclus to Tauler, without having gained one inch of ground—proof enough that the common sense of Christendom could not receive them.

The Incarnation of the Logos was next discussed. The orthodox, by adopting the Chalcedonian doctrine of "two whole and perfect natures," joined together in one person, had been driven to the most contradictory conclusions. The Rationalists, arming themselves with weapons borrowed from Nestorian and monophysite philosophers of the sixth and seventh centuries, carried confusion into the very centre of their opponents' stronghold. The dilemma in which two perfect natures and but one person had involved them, could only be got rid of by the cry, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Once more the mediating party came forward. The doctrine of two natures, said they, like the others in the orthodox system, is partly right and partly wrong—it is ethically true, but metaphysically false. There can be only one original ground or life of all things, as duality is inconsistent with infinity. But this original life develops itself as contraries which mutually condition each other, so we have reason and conscience on the one side, lusts and passions on the other—the spiritual man, and the carnal man. These two have constantly been in struggle for the mastery. But reason and conscience, from their very nature, are destined to rule and extend themselves, while the selfish inclinations are born to submit, and be limited in their action; so that the perfect man must be one whose lower nature is subsumed into the higher—the human taken up into the divine—a process which the creed calls "the taking of the manhood into God." This subsumption took place in Christ, so that he was the perfect man—the realisation of God's wisdom or word. This solution of the problem was thought to account for all the mysteries connected with the Incarnation; they were all capable of a good meaning. But this explanation by no means satisfied the orthodox party. So another member of the philosophic school came forth, declaring, with the trumpet of an apocalyptic angel, "That war should be no more." The long-looked-for consummation of all things—the golden reign of the millennium that hung, as an ideal picture, before the prophetic soul of the great Seer of Israel, was now about to descend upon earth. The curtain that covered the shrine of the goddess, upon whose temple was written "I am that is, and that was, and that shall be, and no man hath ever yet lifted my veil," was now about to be drawn aside, and the mystery of mysteries explored. The mists that hung around the weary wanderers over the wastes of theology were now to be dissolved by this new sun of philosophy, after, whom should come night or no one, and whose beams would enable the wayfaring man to exclaim:

"Darkness and doubt are now flying away,
No longer I roam through conjectures forlorn,
Breaks on the traveller, faint and astray,
The bright and the balmy effulgence of morn."

Such were some of the expectations that preceded the great prophet of the modern Gospel. The question of the day was how to reconcile the doctrine of perfect God and perfect man with the results of speculative philosophy. The answer may be condensed in a few lines. The infinite life or reason of the universe is not, per se, self-conscious, it only arrives at this state when it has developed itself into human spirit. Every object in nature, from a block of granite to the mind of man, is a mode or form of the original reason which develops itself by virtue of its own inherent force. This evolving force has a twofold tendency: a tendency to develop itself out of itself; and a tendency to return back into itself, i.e., to reflect. The objectifying force must, in the first instance, preponderate over the other; and must continue to manifest itself in higher and higher forms until its store is exhausted. But it is evident that the development is not perfect until the return force has gained its object—self-reflection,—a point it first attains in the human spirit. So that God is not perfect until he exists in the form of the finite spirit. But the perfection of man consists in being spirit; therefore the perfect man and the perfect God are identical. All parties admit that Jesus of Nazareth was perfect man, consequently he was perfect God. And thus was the riddle read, and the Athanasian Creed confirmed.

CHURCH AND STATE.

M. JULES SIMON has a good article in La Liberté de Conscience in favour of the absolute separation of the Church and the State. He shows, first, that such separation is necessary for the independence of a church. If the State protects a religion, if she only gives it edifices and a salary, this religion becomes, in spite of all efforts to the contrary, a part of public administration. It enters into the State—in the same manner as any other branch of the police of the State—with the obligation to submit to its policy, to respect and to cause to be respected the constitutional laws. In France, for example, where the Catholic religion is as free as it has the power to be under protection, the Government exercises a large part even of the spiritual administration of this church. It names the bishops, and approves the nomination of clergymen. By this it secures the individuals; and the right of naming those who are judges of the Catholic faith can be exercised by a Protestant or a Jew. Is not this both a degradation and a danger for a church? Protected and salaried priests are evidently officers of the State. They are obliged to say certain prayers, and to render to the civil authorities certain honours. It is clear, therefore, that the protection of Government clips the liberties of the churches, and that a religion is not in its own true sacred character unless it is permitted to separate itself wholly from the State.

Another argument against such government is that it inevitably gives an unequal position to the churches. It is evident that if the distribution of benefits is made with partiality, if one sect gets a larger share than another, it is not because of its own merits, but by the State's choice. This gives a blow to religious liberty. Can we always reckon on a division strictly proportional, and on a justice always equal in this respect? The members of the Government, will they not belong to one communion or another? Even supposing the leaders of the State always just and honest, how could they hold the balance equally between a majority and minority? In such matters statistics are very hard to obtain, and are in their nature very variable also. Thus injustice is inevitable; neither disinterestedness nor ability can guarantee the contrary.

If a State provision for worship could fairly assess the tax payers in a case where one religion only is concerned, what difficulties present themselves where all religions and all sects are received upon the same conditions. They must, by reason of their difference of organisation, be unequally paid. Nay more; we have hitherto spoken of sects already existing; but will the legislator found his laws on the prevention of new sects? This would be an abridgment of liberty. Is the right gained by usage? This establishes in favour of certain sects a claim of eldership, and replaces one State religion by several. Therefore, if the older sects receive a proportional salary, how can the same advantages be secured to the new worshippers? This creates inextricable difficulty, for we must not spend on the first teacher who presents himself the whole provision, and yet how is it to be avoided? The duty of paying creates for the State a right of control. It becomes, therefore, the duty of the Minister of State to decide whether the proposed worship is a pretence or a truth. It therefore follows that a new religion must obtain Government licence entitling it to receive taxes, and be recognised by the Commissioner of Police. Behold then how, through this necessity, liberty of worship is destroyed, or largely compromised, and the State, transformed into a theologian, and a powerful theologian who, by principle, is indifferent alike to all religions. Who is not afraid of such consequences? I therefore repeat that, in order to insure the independence of churches, the equality and liberty of worship, and for avoiding unjust and unequal taxation, the suppression of State provision, and the absolute separation of the Church and the State must be effected.

A State Church is also a limited church, because the State determines the extent of propagandism. The publication of a book, the opening of a chapel, are no longer questions of faith, but of State policy. If the salaried sects are thus restricted in their practice, and especially in their extension, by the protection of the Government, the sects not salaried are in a position more grievous still, because they have not any of the profits of the protection, and they support all its charges.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

WISHING.

Of all amusements of the mind,
From logic down to fishing,
There is not one that you can find
So very cheap as "wishing."
A very choice diversion, too,
If you but rightly use it,
And not, as we are apt to do,
Pervert it and abuse it.

I wish—a common wish indeed—
My purse was something fatter;
That I might cheer the child of need,
And not my pride to flatter;
That I might make oppression reel
As gold can only make it,
And break the tyrant's rod of steel
As gold can only break it.

I wish—that sympathy and love,
And every human passion
That has its origin above,
Would come and keep in fashion;
That scorn and jealousy and hate,
And every base emotion,
Were buried fifty fathoms deep
Beneath the waves of ocean.

I wish—that friends were always true,
And motives always pure;
I wish the good were not so few,
I wish the bad were fewer;
I wish that persons ne'er forgot
To heed their pious teaching;
I wish that practising was not
So different from preaching.

I wish—that modest worth might be Appraised with truth and candour;
I wish that innocents were free
From treachery and slander.
I wish that men their vows would mind,
That women ne'er were rovers;
I wish that wives were always kind,
And husbands always lovers.

I wish—in fine—that joy and mirth,
And every good ideal,
May come erewhile throughout the earth,
To be a glorious real;
'Till God shall every creature bless,
With his supremest blessing,
And hope be lost in happiness,
And wishing be possessing.

"COUPLE HEAVEN WITH IT."

A CORRESPONDENT sends the following to one of our contemporaries:

One hot summer's day, several years ago, on the old road leading from Rochdale to Bury, near the Oakden-road, a tall, thin, old man had just laid down a heavy burden on a low stone wall at the roadside. His burden was a large skip, full of coarse cotton cops; which he was picking from Spodden Mill. As I neared the man he was wiping the perspiration from his bald head and face with a coarse cotton rag, which he had taken out of his pocket. Many times had I held the most delightful conversation with this Christian. Having had "much forgiven," he "loved much." Till nearly sixty he had lived "without God and without hope in the world." When the change came, it was a change indeed! God's providence, grace, and goodness were his daily themes. He joined the church at Comfort; and, fine weather or foul, James was found in his pew. The moment I saw him I determined to put his faith to the test.

"Well, James, how are you to-day?" I inquired.
"Very well, John, I am happy to say. How are you?"

Just then a very costly carriage, drawn by two valuable horses, was passing. The only occupant of the carriage was a stout, red-faced gentleman, with folded arms, leaning back at his ease.

"Do you know that gorgeous equipage and the fat gentleman?" I inquired.

"Yes; so do you," was James's answer.

"Well, what do you think of this Providence of which you sometimes speak? You see yonder man? you know he is an ungodly man; yet he spreadeth himself like a green bay tree. His eyes stand out with fatness; he is not plagued as other men; while you, believing that all the silver and the gold is the Lord's, serving Him and trusting in His Providence, are toiling and sweating in your old age for about seven shillings a week, getting little more than bread and water. How can you reconcile this with a just Providence?"

James looked at me with amazement, and with the greatest earnestness, replied, "Are you trying me, John?—are you trying me? Couple Heaven with it! Couple Heaven with it!"

Never shall I forget the old man's answer! Amidst the many sorrows through which I have passed, from that moment to this, "Couple Heaven with it!" has sweetened many a bitter cup. On the grave of James the stone was laid, and in letters newly engraved, I read, "Here resteth the body of James Lord, aged seventy-three." As I stood over the grave, the hot summer's day, the heavy burden, the sweating old Christian, the rolling carriage, and fat squire, also since dead, all came fresh to memory, and from that grave the voice again sounded, "Couple Heaven with it!"

THE WINDOW THAT MADE FACES UGLY.

CHAP. X.

THAT Christ uses the expression "Gehenna of fire" only figuratively, we can see from Matthew v. 22, where he speaks of the punishment of the future as having three degrees of severity like those that were then in vogue in Jerusalem. "Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment, and whosoever shall say to his brother Raca shall be in danger of the Council, but whosoever shall say thou fool shall be in danger of the Gehenna of fire." For an ordinary offence against the civil law, such as murder, a man was tried by the civil, i.e. the Roman magistrate, and, if guilty, condemned to be put to death by beheading with the sword as James was. That is the judgment. A man who committed an offence of a more ecclesiastical character, such as sacrilege or heresy, was brought up before the Council of seventy elders, and, if guilty, was condemned to die of being stoned, as Stephen was. That was the Council. And one who was guilty of still greater offence was condemned, in addition to being stoned, to be cast out as a carcass of a beast into the horrible valley of Gehenna, to be eaten of worms and burnt in the offal fires, and be an abhorrence unto all flesh.

Now Christ means to say that there will be three degrees of punishment in the future like these. Of course he uses all these as illustrations in a figurative sense. No one would take literally the judgment and the council, the punishment by the sword or stoning, as the punishments of the other world; so neither ought we to take literally the Gehenna of fire. We ought to understand that he meant that the worst sinners would be exposed to shame and contempt like that which one endures who is cast out into the valley of abomination or Tophet. I think Christ meant by this fearful image to make his hearers feel the repulsiveness, the deformity, the utter hatefulness of sin. He wishes them to feel that the sinful mind was in itself something abominable, fearful, disgusting, as that valley of Hinnom, that place of Tophet. And you can easily realise the thought of Christ for yourselves. Go, in imagination, into some of those courts and alleys in London where the worst and lowest of the population herd together.

Look at the faces you there behold. There, talking together under the lamp-post, are several whose countenances are well known to the police as those of noted thieves. There, in that low beer-house through the window, you see a set of brutal-looking fellows, several of whom are known as garotters; one or two are suspected of horrible murders. Among them are women whose faces have lost all that makes woman womanly and lovely. One and all—men and women—live by crime.

Listen to the language that comes from that den of ruffians and their debased companions! How foul, how brutal, how blasphemous. Look at those countenances—how crime has set its seal upon them! What hard selfishness, what sensuality, what grossness, what stupidity, mingled yet with low cunning—what brutality, what reckless defiance of all law, all authority, all restraint—of every thing noble and divine; what merciless cruelty that would spare neither friend nor foe!

Now, how do you feel towards these faces and the characters behind them? Do you find them lovely, pleasant to think about? Are they such as you can take delight in? How would you like to be condemned to dwell in such scenes—to have this language constantly in your ears—to have these degraded beings your daily companions—constantly before your eyes! O! you turn away with a shudder—a feeling of utter loathing and abhorrence.

Every character there is as loathsome and hateful to you as would be that valley of Gehenna. Nay, you would as soon be condemned to pass your time within sight and smell of such a valley as in such companionship!

You feel that in their case sin does make the mind a place as hateful as Gehenna. Yes, the vice—the grossness—in those minds and lives seem to you worse than the heaps of corrupting offal!

In those impure sensual thoughts that fill them and come out in words as well as acts, are the worms crawling amid the corruption and living upon it.

In the deadness of every better, purer feeling in these souls, there are the dead bodies lying only to increase the corruption. In the foul passions raging, roaring, burning, and yet sending up clouds of dark smoke—I mean influences that cloud all the better nature—there are to be found the lurid and hateful fires that are not quenched.

You see, then, that Christ could hardly have found an image to represent the hideousness, the loathsomeness of a soul defiled by sin more fitting than the valley of abomination, and I cannot doubt that it was as an image, and because he felt its fitness that he used it.

The Gehenna of fire, then, or hell, is in the sinful soul itself. Milton makes Satan express this in "Paradise Lost":

"Myself am hell,
And in the lowest deep a lower deep
Still threatening to devour me, opening wide,
To what the hell I suffer seems a heaven."

And now you have only to imagine a sinner awakened from his unconsciousness to see himself as others see him, to know and feel what he really is, and then he seems to you like one who awakes and finds himself a carcass in that valley of Gehenna, dead and yet conscious of his death, with the worms of foul thoughts preying on him, the heaps of offal on him and around him, consumed and knowing that he is being consumed by the flames of passion,—that is the highest realisation of hell. To this hell some awaken in this life, and are smitten with abhorrence at themselves. Some have even been driven mad at discovering what they were, but many have hastened to escape from this hell by repentance and a new life. But where the poor sinner does not come to himself in this life, we have every reason to suppose that he will come to himself in the life to come. He will wake, and find himself in Gehenna, and cry out "Myself am hell." But even then, if he repents, and aspires towards a better life, he may escape in time. There is no never-ending torment, no never-ending punishment. All the words translated everlasting and eternal in the Scriptures mean simply very long, or time of an undefined length. And we do not even need the assurance of the Scriptures to convince us that the punishment of sin—the consequences of sin—stretch through a long time. We see it in this world when a mind has deeply corrupted itself with sin, it takes years to overcome the bad habits, subdue the evil passions, banish the evil thoughts, and altogether heal the disease of the soul caused by the previous life of wrong-doing. This whole view, then, though it does away with the old belief in hell, does not make light of sin. On the contrary, it shows what an awful thing it is, and how true it is that "God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."

READY REPLIES.—II.

GEORGE II. and his suite were on one occasion charged nearly £100 by a Dutch landlord for a luncheon of eggs, coffee, and gin. "Eggs are scarce, I suppose, Myuher," said the King, when he perused the bill. No, your Majesty, but kings are," replied mine host. George consented to pay the bill.

A minister, noted for his solemnity in the pulpit and his hilarity out of it, was rallied by one of his brethren for the inconsistency; he replied, "I give vent to my nonsense in private, but you ventilate yours in public."

"My child, have you been brought up in the fear of the Lord?" asked a travelling preacher of a child that he happened to meet. "No, sir," she answered, "I have been brought up in the love of God." Would it not be well if all could say the same?

A Scotch minister in a strange parish wishing to know what the people thought of his preaching, questioned the beadle. "What do they say of Mr. —?" (his predecessor). "Oh, said the beadle, "they say he's no sound." Minister: "What do they say of the new minister?" (himself). Beadle: "Oh, they say he's a' sound!" Exit minister.

A theological student, supposed to be deficient in judgment, in the course of a class examination, was asked by a professor, "Pray, Mr. E., how would you discover a fool?" "By the questions he would ask," said Mr. E.

A snarling unbeliever, who was always trying to bring a lady-tract distributor into contempt, was prevailed upon by her, on one occasion, to accept and read a tract entitled "The Converted Infidel." On her next visit, she inquired what he thought of it; in reply, he directed her attention to the figure of an ass, drawn by himself, on the last leaf, as the expression of his opinion of the character of the subject, at the same time asking her what she thought of that. The lady, with a calm presence of mind, wrote underneath, "A perfect likeness of the artist," and returned it for his further reflection.

INTELLIGENCE.

BURY DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—On Sunday, September 6th, about 170 members of this union met at Stand, and after tea, the Rev. W. C. Squier presided. After reading and confirming the minutes of previous meeting, and arranging for the next meeting at Heap Bridge, on the 18th October. Mr. J. K. Wright read a paper on "Should Sunday Scholars be compelled to attend Chapel?" A discussion followed, in which Messrs. Darbyshire and Wm. Hilton (Stand), Wm. Freeston (Heap Bridge), John Reynolds, Thos. Holt, Richd. Kay, D. Wormald (Bury), and the chairman took part.

BURNLEY.—The Accrington District Sunday School Union held its second annual meeting on Saturday last at this place, when about seventy persons were present. After tea, Mr. Geo. Smith, of Lower Mosley-street schools, presided. The reports read showed that the Union was in a satisfactory condition and doing good work. Speeches were made, bearing more or less on the report and chairman's address, by the Rev. J. K. Smith, and Messrs. Matthews, Fern, Mills, Hollins, and Bibby.

COLYTON.—The annual Sunday-school tea party took place on Thursday, the 3rd inst., after which, through the kind permission of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Berry, the children, accompanied by the minister, the teachers, a large party of friends, and the poor of the congregation, went to the grounds of Colyton Cottage, the residence of the late Commander George Eyre Powell. Various games were heartily engaged in by the young, whilst the aged watched with delight their youthful gambols, and wandered through the grounds, charmed with the beauty of the place. It may be remarked that the Unitarian cause at Colyton has much improved, and the congregation increased, during the able ministry of the Rev. A. McCombe, who is deservedly respected, not only by his own flock, but by every denomination.

CWMBACH: ABERNANTY-GROESUCHA CHAPEL.—This place of worship, after being closed for three weeks for cleaning, painting, and other alterations, was re-opened on Sunday, the 30th ult., when services were conducted, both morning and evening, by the minister, the Rev. E. W. Lloyd. Many used to be the complaints made by frequenters of the chapel respecting its shabby appearance, and that it did not reflect much credit on the congregation, but we are happy to state that the cause of such complaints has been removed, and that the internal and external appearance of our comparatively old sanctuary will bear comparison with any place of worship at Cwmbach.

HEYWOOD.—On the 31st ult. a social tea meeting of the Heywood Unitarian congregation was held for the purpose of congratulating its minister, the Rev. J. Fox, on the event of his marriage, and of giving a cordial and friendly welcome to Mrs. Fox. About one hundred sat down to tea, and others came at a later period of the evening. After tea Mr. John Nuttall occupied the chair; and an address of congratulation and welcome, read by the secretary, was followed by addresses from the Rev. John Wright, of Bury, and Messrs. J. Chadwick, J. Mitchell, S. Kay, and J. Ingham.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—The anniversary sermons in connection with this chapel were preached by the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, on Sunday, August 30th, to a large and attentive congregations, and collections were made on behalf of the chapel funds. On the following evening, the annual congregational meeting was held. W. Fallows, Esq., occupied the chair, when the secretary and treasurer's reports were read.

PRESTON.—The Percy-street Sunday school children, with their teachers and friends had their annual treat last Saturday in a field kindly lent by Mr. Dobson. The weather was all that could be desired, and abundant provisions in the way of refreshment being dispensed by Miss Ward, the party enjoyed themselves thoroughly till evening.

PRESTON.—"Unitarian Heresy Exposed" was the title of a lecture announced for one of the State Churches in this town last Sunday evening. Some members of the Unitarian congregation went to hear it, not expecting any new arguments, but willing to listen to a new statement of the old ones. The announcement, however, turned out to be only a sensational heading to attract visitors, and this so-called exposure of Unitarianism formed but one division of a sermon on salvation by grace. As the whole occupied less than half an hour in delivery, and as the portion specially devoted to us was freely interlarded with denunciations of Unitarianism as a "soul-destroying heresy," a "damnable heresy," one "more properly called Socinianism," &c., &c., you may suppose the preacher had not much time to spare for scriptural argument on the subject, the whole "exposure" consisting in a hasty reference to two passages from Paul's epistles, an amended translation of one of which, at variance with that in the common version, has been approved by a bishop and archbishops of the English Church.—Cor.

YEovil.—The Western Gazette reports at considerable length the farewell services of the Rev. John Ellis. Two years ago Mr. Ellis left Mossley for Yeovil, and during his stay at the latter place has been very active, not only in his religious duties, but also in social and political movements in the town. At the close of the evening service, on Aug. 30, an address, signed by "George Henderson, secretary," and "Samuel Ralls, treasurer," was presented to Mr. Ellis on behalf of the members of the congregation, thanking him for his labours. On Monday evening Mr. C. Clinker, on behalf of the members of the Reform Union, presented him with a purse of sovereigns for his political and social labours; and on Tuesday evening the congregation had a farewell tea party, at which the Rev. William James was present.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IRERNE.—Received.

A. L. and E. H.—We regret that we are not able to find room for your letters.

SOMETHING WANTED IN OUR WORSHIP.

To the Editors.—The introduction of the Te Deum, chanting, responses, repetitions will all prove of little avail to arouse a congregation which custom, fashion, or pride deprives of the "spirit of utterance." Many are the chapels where all these "aids" to congregational activity exist, but they are banished to the organ gallery. The liturgical prayers, familiar as they must be, are too generally silently followed with open book, as though the minister were reading a Scripture lesson.

But I had the pleasure lately of witnessing in one of our western chapels the whole congregation joining most heartily in the singing and chanting. The secret was that the choir consisted of boys and girls (for the most part), whose heartiness became infectious. Let us banish "paid" singers, and revive the good old amateur choir of all ages and both sexes—especially children's voices; and with such spontaneous fuglemen, depend upon it, congregational singing will revive amongst us.

That the devotional part of our services may be advantageously altered so as to alternate the voice of the multitude with that of the minister admits, I think, of no question. The repetition of the Lord's Prayer and the "Amen" responses might very well be done by the congregation (not by the organ however). I have frequently heard the Sunday scholars repeat the Lord's Prayer and say Amen in a half audible tone after the minister; why not aloud? I have always asked myself.

The remedy for the cold formalism complained of, as existing pre-eminently in our body, rests with the congregations themselves, and not with their ministers. With the former any innovations in the manner, matter, or order of service must originate, and it is also theirs to put such changes to a practical test. The minister may advise or co-operate (as far as he may) with his people, but it is not fair to charge him with setting a poor example to his flock in these matters. I have seen a minister conspicuous above all the dumb sheep around him for joining in the singing, from which strain upon his voice he might very well be excused.

WILLIAM S. PRYER.

THE COMING WEEK.

BIRMINGHAM: FREE CHRISTIAN SOCIETY.—On Sunday next, anniversary sermons, by Rev. E. Madeley and Mr. G. R. Twinn; on Monday, tea meeting. ELLAND.—On Sunday afternoon and evening, school sermons, by the Rev. John Ellis. LONDON: LAY PREACHERS' UNION.—A meeting at Stamford-street Chapel on Wednesday evening. PENMAENMAWR: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Mr. F. H. Jones, service at eleven a.m.

Birth.

HOLLAND.—On the 21st ult., at Port Elizabeth, Cape of Good Hope, the wife of Joseph R. Holland, of a son.

Marriage.

ROBINSON—ARNOLD.—On the 6th inst., at Highfield Chapel, Idle, by the Rev. T. W. Freckleton, of Plymouth, Mr. Seth Robinson, hon. sec. of the Bradford Free Church, to Ann Sophia, eldest daughter of Mr. W. H. Arnold, all of Bradford.

Deaths.

COMMINS.—On the 4th inst., at the residence of her daughter, Martha, widow of the late Mr. John Commins, in the 79th year of her age; much beloved and lamented. LANGLEY.—On the 4th inst., at Castle Croft, near Wolverhampton, Rachel Langley, the devoted wife of John Langley Esq., merchant, Wolverhampton. ROBSON.—On the 4th inst., William Holbrook, in his 19th year, a young man of the brightest promise, and only child of William Robson, Esq., of Mornington Road, Regent's Park, London. TALBOT.—On the 4th inst., aged 76 years, George Talbot, Esq., of Southfield, Burley, near Leeds, late of Honey, near Kidderminster.

HERFORD'S REFORM CLUB CLARET.

In quarts, 21s.; pints, 11s. Nett cash. C. J. HERFORD, Carlton Buildings, Cooper-st., Manchester.

SCARLET FEVER, &c. S. WHITFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE BIRMINGHAM.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at 11s. PER DOZEN, BOTTLES INCLUDED.

We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, clean-flavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY, WINE MERCHANTS, 26, MARKET-STREET, MANCHESTER; And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsey Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing offices, No. 8, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, September 11, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY

REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 386.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing.....	300
What is saying on Church Matters.....	300
What a Sermon should be.....	302
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XXI.....	302
Review: The Leeds Tune Book.....	302
An Outline of the History of Modern Theology.—Part II.....	303
The Failure of the Churches.....	303
The London Rough's Sunday.....	303
Catechising at St. Alban's, London.....	304
American Notes.....	304
Plaint-spoken Orthodoxy.....	304
Fire-side Readings: Nature's Teaching.....	305
Church Curiosities.—XII.....	305
The Music of St. Mary's Court.....	305
Intelligence: Birmingham Free Christian Society, Eiland, Hastings and Battle, Padham, Preston, Rochdale.....	306
Correspondence.....	306

DUKINFIELD OLD CHAPEL SUNDAY SCHOOL.

The ANNUAL PARTY for the parents, teachers, and former scholars and teachers of the above school, will be held on Saturday the 19th inst. Tea at five o'clock. Tickets, 6d. each, may be had from the Misses Schofield, Princess-street, Stalybridge, and Mr. Tom Ingham, King-street, Dukinfield.

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.—

THE SIXTH GENERAL MEETING of members and friends of the Midland Christian Union will be held at Evesham, on Tuesday next, 22nd of September. Public worship at half-past eleven; luncheon at two; after which BUSINESS MEETING, HERBERT NEW, Esq., in the chair.

D. MAGINNIS, } Hon. Secs.
W. R. WILLIS, }

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY BOARD.

Mr. J. Collier, Birmingham: Subscription increased from 10s. to..... 1 0 0
Donation from do..... 1 10 0

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE

(in connection with the University of London, and University College, London),
University Hall, Gordon Square, London.

Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A., Principal, and Professor of Biblical and Historical Theology, with the Truths and Evidences of Christianity.

Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, Professor of Mental, Moral, and Religious Philosophy.

RUSSELL MARTINEAU, Esq., M.A., Professor of Hebrew Language and Literature.

The COLLEGE SESSION COMMENCES on Monday the 5th of October.

STUDENTS and CANDIDATES are required to ATTEND on Friday the 2nd of October, at 11 a.m.

THE OPENING ADDRESS will be delivered in the Hall, at four p.m., on Monday the 5th of October, by the Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, and is open to the public.

All or any of the classes may be attended by the public on payment of the regular fees. Particulars may be obtained by letter from the College Librarian, at University Hall, or either of the Secretaries. The hours of lectures will be fixed, and may be learnt after the Session has commenced.

R. D. DARBISHIRE, B.A., } Secs.
CHARLES REARD, B.A., }

13, South Hill Road, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, S.
Manchester, Sept., 1868.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE

(in connection with the University of London, and University College, London),
University Hall, Gordon Square.

Candidates for admission into the College at the commencement of the ensuing Session are requested to FORWARD their APPLICATIONS and TESTIMONIALS, without delay, to either of the Secretaries, from whom all needful information may be obtained.

R. D. DARBISHIRE, B.A., } Secs.
CHARLES REARD, B.A., }

13, South Hill Road, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, S.
Manchester, Sept., 1868.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

THE AINSWORTH SCHOLARSHIP.

The Committee offer to those of its students who shall obtain a gold medal in the M.A. Examination at London University, a SCHOLARSHIP OF ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. Competitors for this Scholarship must graduate as Students of Manchester New College, either on taking their Bachelor's or Master's Degree. If the former, they must have previously spent not less than two years at Manchester New College; if the latter, not less than one year.

The Ainsworth Scholarship is open to any Lay Student of University College who has previously enrolled himself as a Student of Manchester New College, gone through his Undergraduate course under the direction of the Principal of that College, and attended the classes for religious and ethical instruction which it provides for its Lay Students. Subject to these limitations, the Scholarship is open to every Gold Medalist at the Examination for the Master's Degree in any one of the branches of Classics, Science, or Philosophy.

Payment will be made to successful competitors in two yearly payments of Fifty Pounds. The Scholarship will be continued until notice to the contrary is given. Two years' notice will be given previous to its withdrawal.

Further particulars respecting the Scholarship and the plans of study at Manchester New College, may be obtained on application to R. D. DARBISHIRE, Esq., B.A., one of the Secretaries of the College, 25, George-street, Manchester; or to the Rev. J. J. TAYLER, B.A., Principal, at University Hall, Gordon Square, London.

OWENS COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.—

The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD receives into his house, as members of his family, Young Men studying at Owens College. Mr. Herford will be glad to procure any information that may be desired respecting the terms, classes, &c., of the College.

1, Kersal Terrace, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

TO LET, Unfurnished, No. 32, Nelson Square, Blackfriars' Road, London, S.E., TWO ROOMS, with large front kitchen. No other lodgers, and only three in family.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

WANTED, by a Young Lady, a Re-engagement as DAILY or RESIDENT GOVERNESS in a family. Acquirements: English, French, Music, with Rudiments of German and Drawing.—Address Y., 140, Southgate Road, London.

AN Engagement as HOUSEKEEPER, or useful COMPANION, required by a gentlewoman of experience. An excellent needlewoman, and accustomed to children. Highest references.—Address W., 58, Menzies-street, South Hill Road, Liverpool.

A LADY, especially qualified by education and experience, desires an ENGAGEMENT in October to head a gentleman's establishment, or as secretary to an invalid gentleman. Best references.—Address X. Y., Mr. Joseph S. Stott, West Croft, Halifax.

WANTED, a Situation as HOUSEMAID or NURSE, in a small family.—Address M. O., 109, Upper Brook-street, Manchester.

A YOUNG Person, who has gone through a course of training as Pupil Teacher, and has been mistress of a British School for two years, desires a Situation as NURSERY GOVERNESS in a Unitarian family.—Address to Rev. E. PARRY, Kidderminster.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.—Principal: C. du G. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthily-situated establishment Boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemen education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G., 68, Guildford-street, Russell Square, London; or to Mr. A. G., 31, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

HIGH SCHOOL, 126, MUCH PARK-STREET, COVENTRY.—The Rev. G. HEAVISIDE, B.A., having taken extensive premises, is prepared to RECEIVE BOARDERS. Terms: 80 to 40 Guinea per annum. The next quarter will COMMENCE on October 8, 1868. Full prospectus on application.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

EDUCATION.—14, GREAT STANHOPE-STREET, BATH.

Mrs. JEFFERY receives a small number of Young LADIES, whom she educates as members of a family.

Bath is considered a healthy locality, and offers great facilities for securing the services of efficient masters.

Terms on application to Mrs. Jeffery. References: Rev. W. J. ODGERS, Bath; Rev. T. E. POYNTING, Monton, Manchester; Rev. W. COCHRANE, Cradley, Worcestershire; J. MURCH, Esq., Bath; E. COBB, Esq., Bath; W. A. CASE, Esq., M.A., late Vice-Master of University College School, London; J. SHUTE, Esq., Clifton Down, Bristol.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME of the late GEORGE BROWN, Barrister-at-Law.

Containing 17 sermons preached by him in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle.

Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A., with Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 2s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Barnard Castle.

THE "HOME PAGES" TRACT SERIES.

The whole series of 238 Tracts (with the exception of one or two of the earliest) are kept in Stock.

All orders must now be sent direct to Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, Higher Broughton, MANCHESTER.

PRICES. Single Tracts. Per dozen. Per 100.

4 pp. Tracts.... 1d. 8s. 2s.
8 pp. " 1d. 8s. 4s.
12 pp. " 1d. 1s. 6s.

The whole series, well bound, in 4 volumes, for 10s., or free by post 11s.

In cases where the Tracts will have to be sent by post, a penny in the above sum may be added for postage.

Mr. Herford will be glad to forward, on application, a complete list of the "Home Page" Tracts and Covers.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.
THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, Containing Tunes to ALL Martin's Hymns.

London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6, Commercial-street; and of all music and book sellers.

A BERESFORD TO THE RESCUE. See the "NONCONFORMIST" of Wednesday, September 16, which also contains articles on the Prussian Move towards Disarmament, Liberal Disunion, J. G. Rogers on Ritualism, Correspondence from Dublin, Dr. Temple's Speech on the Irish Church, &c. Price 5d., or stamped 6d.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF DUBLIN'S CHARGE. See the "NONCONFORMIST" of Wednesday, September 9, which also contains articles on the Irish Elections, Mr. Beveridge Johnson at Sheffield, Personal Government in France, Ecclesiastical Notes, full and authentic Election Intelligence, the Press on Dr. C. J. Vaughan on Church and State, &c., &c.

Arthur Miall, 18, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, and by order of all news agents.

The two hundred and fiftieth thousand now ready of "WHAT DO WE, AS UNITARIAN CHRISTIANS, BELIEVE?" By the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. Two shillings a hundred.

"LIGHT FOR BIBLE READERS." Notes on a hundred passages of Scripture. By the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. A new edition (eighth thousand) now ready, on toned paper. Price three pence. May be had of all the usual agents and booksellers.

PRESENT Condition of Unitarian and Liberal Christianity Everywhere, Historical and Statistical. Price 8d. Whitfield, 178, Strand, London.

HERFORD'S REFORM CLUB CLARET. In quarts, 22s.; pints, 11s. 6d. Nett cash.

C. J. HERFORD, Carlton Buildings, Cooper-st., Manchester.

"GO TO SPACKMAN, MERCHANT CLOTHIER, HATTER, & OUTFITTER, BELFAST. For all you want in CLOTHING. I get all I possibly can from him myself. He has the largest, best, most fashionable, and cheapest Stock of READY-MADE CLOTHING in the WORLD."—Extract from a recommendation to an American friend visiting Europe, by Mr. Cook, the Great European and Transatlantic "Excursionist."

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS, FURNISHING IRONMONGERS and CUTLERS, 23, SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE, 3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER. (Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse.)

J. BALLS, Proprietor.

NEW GOODS FOR THE SUMMER SEASON.

WILLIAM MOSS has just received a large assortment of Angola Cloths for Tourists' Suits, also Bannockburn Tweeds for Fishing and Shooting Suits.

FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8, Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

WHITEFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS, CASH and DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITEFIELD & SONS, VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED AND OTHER NEEDLES.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITEFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at 11s. PER DOZEN, BOTTLES INCLUDED.

We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, clean-flavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY, WINE MERCHANTS, 26, MARKET-STREET, MANCHESTER; And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool.

COALS! COALS!!—NOTICE OF REMOVAL.—JAMES WELLS, Coal and Coke Merchant, Keeper Wharf, Ratcliffe, E. Office: 23, Coburn-street, Bow Road, E.

J. W. takes this opportunity of informing his numerous customers, friends, and the public generally, that he has REMOVED to the above address, where he hopes, by strict attention to business, to merit a continuance of their favours.

He would remind them that Coals are now at the lowest prices for the present season, and would advise them to purchase as soon as possible. A trial is solicited. Quality guaranteed. Best Wallsend, 24s. per ton; best Inlands, 22s. per ton for cash.—Orders by post punctually attended to.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Pius IX. during his reign has seen no less than eighty-four Cardinals pass away. We believe scarcely any other Pope has had so many hats to bestow.

According to the Weekly Register, the bishops of the Greek, Armenian, and Nestorian Churches are to be invited to attend the Ecumenical Council, and to take part in the discussions, but not in the voting. The reason for this is that the Catholic Church has always recognised the orders of these churches to be valid, although they are in schism. On the other hand, there never was any question of inviting the Anglican prelates, because the orders of that communion have always been deemed invalid, and both bishops and clergy looked upon as mere laymen. It is supposed that the Russian Government will do its utmost to prevent the bishops of the Empire from attending the Council, and also the bishops of Greece proper; but from all parts of Turkey, Bulgaria, Asia Minor, Palestine, and Syria a great number of Greek prelates will proceed to Rome.

On the 6th inst. there was a grand procession in Rome in commemoration of the second centenary of the battle of Lepanto, which saved Christendom from Mahometan conquest. Nearly all the Cardinals and high dignitaries were present, and the image of the Madonna Salus Infirmorum was brought forth, before which Pius V. was praying at the moment that the Christian fleet put the Turks to flight, and the glorious victory was revealed to him by inspiration. Of course, the image, which is a fine work of art, and was adorned with a crown of gold and gems, works miracles, and is held in great veneration by the Romans, who thronged the streets to see it pass.

Reading the account in the Church News of what took place at the eleventh anniversary of the A.P.U.C. (i.e. Association for Promoting the Unity of Christendom) at All Saints', Lambeth, we might certainly suppose that we were reading the description of some Roman Catholic ceremony. It was "on the Eve of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary." "At 8 o'clock a procession was formed in the following order:

Taper Bearer.	Crucifer.	Taper Bearer.
	Two Precentors.
	Choir Boys.
Acolyte.	Banner.	Acolyte.
	Choir Boys.
Acolyte.	Thurifer.	Acolyte.
	Two Precentors.
Acolyte.	Banner.	Acolyte.
	Choir Men.
Acolyte.	Banner.	Acolyte.
	Choir Men.
Taper Bearer.	Crucifer.	Taper Bearer.
	Banner.
	Society of S. George.
	Banner.
	Society of S. Augustine.
	Banner.
	Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.
	Banner.
	Society of S. Joseph of Nazareth.
	Banner.
	Society of English Benedictines.
Taper Bearer.	Crucifer.	Taper Bearer.
	Priests.
	Banner.
Acolyte.	Preacher.	Acolyte.
	Two Masters of the Ceremonies.
	Sacristan.
	The Vicar

With Assistants and Attendants. The taper-bearers were vested in cottas and scarlet cassocks, the thurifer and banner-bearers in violet cassocks and cottas or rochets; the precentors wore the proper tippets in addition to surplices and cassocks. On arriving at the sanctuary the Miserere was sung kneeling as an act in deprecation of the judgment of the Almighty for the wicked and lamentable rents made in the Church, the Mystical Body of our blessed Lord and Saviour, &c., &c." The Rev. W. P. Ward thinks it was "perhaps the most striking function ever witnessed in the Church of England for the last 300 years," and grows most enthusiastic in its praise, declaring that "every action was a symbol, that spoke at once to the understanding and the heart."

The same paper has likewise a description of a young lady taking the veil at Feltham nunnery, which smacks even more of Rome. The postulant was dressed as a bride, and the "father superior" cut off her hair, having a towel spread over his knees to receive it. "While the novice's hymn, 'Farewell, thou world of sorrow,' was being sung by the sisters, her long black hair was all cut off, the black long tresses falling on the ground around her." Her dress was changed, and she put on the Benedictine habit. She walked to the altar steps, holding her lighted taper, and "while she was receiving the sacrament the choir curtain fell, and neither she nor the other sisters were seen any more." The Feltham nuns, it appears, lead a life of strict seclusion, never going out, and only seeing visitors through a grating. They recite the Benedictine office and observe the Benedictine rules. And all this takes place under the superintendence of persons within the communion of the Church of England.

Dr. Marcus Beresford, archbishop of Armagh, like the Archbishop of Dublin, considers that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be a terrible thing. This seems but natural, when it is remembered that, in three generations, his family are computed to have drawn between three and four millions sterling from the ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland; that his relative and immediate predecessor in the archiepiscopal see is calculated during his ministry to have netted no less a sum than £800,000, and Dr. Beresford himself has not been kept on a short-allowance of loaves and fishes.

The pious doubts which some entertained whether our most religious Premier had ever been baptised, have been set at rest by the publication of the following certificate:

"Parish of St. Andrew, Holborn, in the City of London, and in the County of Middlesex.—Extract from the Register Book of Baptisms; page 80.—Baptised July 31, 1817, Benjamin, said to be about twelve years old, son of Isaac and Maria D'Israeli, King's-road, gentleman. Ceremony performed by S. Thimbleby, (No. 633)—the above is a true extract from the register book of baptisms kept in the parish registry. Witness my hand this 8th day of September, in the year 1868, A. J. Ross, Lecturer." The Freeman, on the strength of this, seems disposed to claim Mr. Disraeli as a Baptist.

On Friday last the foundation-stone of the new Chapel which is to be built on the site of the well-known Whitfield's Tabernacle, in Moorfields, was laid by Mr. J. Remington Mills, M.P. There was a large attendance of leading dissenters, both ministers and laymen.

Father Ignatius seems to have given offence to some of the city men by his severe reflections on Lombard-street and on the morality of the City generally. On Friday week, he said that Jericho was not so bad, inasmuch as there the people "never raised up a god of gold and worshipped it." The consequence was that last Friday afternoon a well-dressed crowd surrounded his church and greeted him with derisive shouts and hisses as he drove off in a cab, and it was only through the interference of the police that he was saved from assault.

Dr. Green, Dean of Natal, writes to the Guardian to say that he is "anxious to form a Guild or Brotherhood in England, whose work shall be to assist the Bishop and clergy of Natal in maintaining the faith and building up the Church in that land." The way in which this is to be done is by raising funds for an increase of the numbers of the clergy in the colony.

A local paper publishes the following extraordinary advertisement:

"A Protest.—I hereby protest against the practice of worldly-minded, unregenerate clergymen in this neighbourhood posting up bills in this town to induce the young people of this parish to attend dances and scenes of dissipation, which, in a large number of cases, end in intoxication, night-walking, adultery, fornication, and gross violations of the law of God. Surely such clergymen are not ministers of Christ. Immortal souls, fly from their ministry! They are blind leaders of the blind. They and their hearers will fall into the same ditch—the awful pit."

"GEORGE CHUTE, Vicar of Drayton-in-Hales.
"Market Drayton, Aug. 19, 1868."

Mr. Councillor Clapham, of Leeds, whose case we mentioned some time ago, has issued a bill in which he says that he has, during the present summer, been compelled to pay £91 in fines (exclusive of costs), for giving performances of sacred music on Sundays, for the working classes, in the Leeds Royal Park.

The Rev. Philip Hains, vicar of St. George's Wigan, has been in the habit of receiving a grant from the Pastoral Aid Society for the maintenance of a curate. As he was known to be in favour of Mr. Gladstone's Irish Church policy, he received a hint from the society that their grants were not given to men occupying prominent positions in the political world. On his remonstrating, the society's secretary expressed a hope that "it would not be necessary to write again on the subject." Mr. Hains accepted this as a hint that if he adhered to Mr. Gladstone's policy the grant would be withdrawn from the curate. This, however, has not prevented him from telling the story at a public meeting held at Accrington last week; nor from speaking strongly in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church at a meeting of the Reform Union in Manchester last Tuesday.

The Bishop of Chichester has inhibited the Rev. J. Knapp, on account of his having been one of the preachers at the inaugural services of the Free Church at Brighton, from officiating in his diocese, until he shall have satisfied his lordship that he has purged himself of this offence. In consequence of this inhibition, the Rev. J. Clay, who had promised to preach in the same church, has felt himself obliged to decline doing so. With our poor heretical light, we are unable to see how it should be an "offence" to preach the Gospel anywhere.

The Church News informs us that Father Ignatius is getting up an Anglican Order of "Perpetual Adoration of the Sacrament." On which the Weekly Register observes:

"We thought that in the 25th and 28th Articles of the Church of England it is expressly forbidden that 'the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper' should be 'reserved, carried about, lifted up, worshipped, or gazed upon.' No wonder that on the one side Dr. Colenso and Mr. Voysey are allowed, when, on the other rank Romanism is permitted. Have the Thirty-nine Articles—to which every clergyman in the English Church must subscribe before he is ordained—any meaning at all?"

We learn from the Church Times, an organ of the Ritualists, that at a harvest thanksgiving at St. James's, Haydock, among the offerings placed on the altar were eggs, pats of butter, and, odder still, a pig's head!

The following advertisement in a Roman Catholic paper shows that there is a form of that faith in this so-called enlightened country of ours as gross and low as that which is to be found in the villages of Spain and Belgium:

"A HARD CASE.—For love of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament help me to go on with the Church I have begun to build, and to undertake a presbytery. In this large district my makeshifts for chapels are a schoolroom and a closed-up butcher's shop—a sore trial for a priest's health and spirits, as little good can be done under such circumstances. Seven long weary years I have been struggling here, hoping to build this church. Our position is so truly distressing that for years I have even been forced to guard the Blessed Sacrament in a most unbecoming apartment of my house. The smallest donations thankfully received, even a few postage stamps. My thank-offering is a mass weekly, and the rosary daily for benefactors, living and dead.—J. GILLIGAN, Barking, Essex."

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Referring to Dr. Beresford's assertion in his recent charge, that the church property of the kingdom is property devoted to God, consecrated to the maintenance of the national religion, the Telegraph asks the Primate whether, if ecclesiastical property be thus inalienable, the Church can ever sanction any arrangement by virtue of which any part of that property has been alienated by the State? If she cannot, Dr. Beresford must undertake a slightly unpleasant as well as difficult work. The greatest nobles in England and Ireland were enriched by what was once Church property. Does the Lord Primate deny the right of these nobles to their possessions? Would he despoil them? Would he have great part of England and Ireland again owned, as it once was by the clergy? If not, perhaps he may see the expediency of making less immoderate pretensions in favour of the Church to which he belongs. Perhaps, also, he may see he wisdom of abandoning a theory of ecclesiastical rights which would convict Spain, France, and Italy of robbery for taking back the overgrown Church lands of which they had been bereft by the clergy.

The Pall Mall thus analyses the Archbishop of Dublin's very Irish Charge:

"His Grace takes for his text that ancient motto upon which we have so long governed Ireland—'Fiat justitia, ruat cælum.' Ergo, says Dr. Trench, you must not touch the establishment, because if anybody else has a right to its revenues the Roman Catholics have that right; and inasmuch as the Roman Catholic clergy refuse to receive them back again, Anglicanism ought not to be disestablished. There is no limit, indeed, to the nonsequiturs which an archbishop may not pass upon his audience especially in Ireland; but certainly a man must be both an archbishop and an Irishman to appreciate the force of the argument that, because the Roman clergy declined to be paid by the State, therefore the Protestants have an indefeasible claim to the property which was taken from Rome three hundred years ago by the king and Parliament. Again, says the archbishop, what if the establishment is a badge of conquest? Are not the lord lieutenant and the Queen herself badges of conquest also? As we have not the smallest wish to insinuate that Dr. Trench is a Fenian in disguise, this delightful theory must be set down to the peculiarities of the archiepiscopal views on logic. Further, it is not true that the Irish establishment has failed in its mission, because something of the same kind may be affirmed of every church under the sun; ergo, says the archbishop, keep up the Irish Church. That is, other churches are partial failures; and therefore do not abolish this one church, which is a total failure. But the archbishop's views on Irish history are fully up to the standard of his syllogisms. The Irish Anglicans are few, he admits, but the cause of their paucity is the extent to which they were massacred 200 years ago by the Catholics. During the rebellion of 1641 not less than 40,000 Protestants were murdered by the bloody Papists. Now, says the archbishop triumphantly, according to the ratio of increase in the Irish population, these 40,000 would by this time have amounted to 160,000, and the whole Anglican body, which is credited with the entire increase, would have reached the number of 860,000! Let not the reader imagine we are jesting at his grace's expense. This assertion is seriously put forward as a ground for not touching the revenues of established Anglicanism."

The Guardian does not think that Dr. Trench's charge will afford much satisfaction to its readers or any one else. It says:

"His Grace scarcely attempts to discriminate between the questions of disestablishment and disendowment, and uses arguments of which others might avail themselves in favour of transferring the Irish endowments to Roman Catholics."

On Dr. Vaughan's sermon to which we referred last week, the same paper has the following remarks:

"He thinks it necessary to say that he looks forward to the disestablishment of the English Church. Church people are to prepare themselves, he feels sure, for a speedy, scarcely a gradual, demolition of the advantages of their position. He sees that it has become a mere question of time, and of a very short time. The change is inevitable: and he tells us all to make up our minds to it. We ask ourselves, what is his reason for saying this; what end had he in view, and what effect did he propose to produce in the minds of his hearers? It is obviously not a thing which can be said to be certain, and manifestly imminent. It is more than conceivable that the course of events may take an entirely different turn from what he anticipates. People's minds are not accustomed to the idea, and there are a good many things of a solid and weighty character to interfere with its being realised. At the utmost it only, as we say, looms in the distance. Of course it is natural that disestablishment in Ireland should bring into men's minds the thought of disestablishment in England. It is probably true, also, that disestablishment there lessens the obstacles to disestablishment here. But it is acknowledged on all hands that the two questions stand on perfectly different ground, and that considerations of great weight in the one are absolutely irrelevant to the other. Unless we choose to make one, there is no necessary connection between the two questions. Why, then, does Dr. Vaughan think it necessary to bring the certainty of a speedy demolition of the English Establishment before us? He does not wish it; he would deprecate it most earnestly, and he points out all that the country as well as the Church would suffer from its coming to pass. We can see no reason for his telling us that, in hoping for the continuance of the Establishment in England, we are hoping in vain, and in fighting for it are fighting a losing battle, except that irresistible impulse which comes upon men in days of excitement and crisis, to turn their misgivings into prophecies."

At the close of an address just issued by the Society of Friends, we have the following reference to the Irish Establishment:—

"One of the professed objects of maintaining the Protestant Church in Ireland has been the conversion of the Roman Catholics. But so far from this having been accomplished, it now appears that the proportion of Roman Catholics to Protestants is greater at the present time than it was a century ago. Is it, then, for the purpose of preserving a Protestant ascendancy that the Irish Church system is to be maintained? What is Protestant ascendancy? We have here at once an illustration of the danger and difficulty resulting from the union of the State with the Church. The State may lawfully exercise authority to maintain its own ascendancy and to enforce civil obedience. But what is the ascendancy of a Christian Church? Is it the ascendancy of earthly dignity and power, or is it not rather that of faith and holiness, of zeal and love? Of old the Church overcame not by carnal but by spiritual weapons, and by the same weapons must it overcome now."

At a Conservative meeting last week, Archdeacon Denison said:

"In some respects I am disappointed at the state of feeling in regard to the Irish Church. I am sorry to say the clergy of the Church of England are not one hundredth part enough awake to what is going on. I have sat in the hot weather in the hottest part of London issuing papers to every part of England and Wales, asking the people if they are for endowment or disestablishment, and I have tried to poll the laity and the clergy. But whether the people are so hot, or whether they are gone out shooting, or whether they like to smoke, they have not given the answers we expected."

The author of "The Curate's Discipline" thus represents, we believe very correctly, the feeling of the Roman Catholic clergy towards their Anglican imitators, who never dream that they can be looked upon as simply schismatics:

"Since his arrival at Summerly he had heard a great deal of Mr. Marsh, and had once quietly slipped into St. Paul's and watched that gentleman's mode of officiating, looking on with a bland, good-humoured contempt that the old rector's torpid, drowsy ministrations or the unpretending services at the Independent chapel would have failed to excite. For Mr. Marsh himself he had much the same feeling that an aristocrat of the haute régime might have entertained for a bourgeois farmer-general, or the head of an old county family for a retired stockbroker or tradesman, who might have bought a neighbouring estate and was attempting, by sheer outlay, to pass himself off as one of the members of the local aristocracy."

"The Bishop of Capetown," says the Post, "has postponed his departure from this country for a month. In the meanwhile, let him re-consider the step which he proposes to take in setting up a bishop of his own in the diocese of Natal. He has already shown himself a little pope in his way, but may perhaps see, on reflection, that he will be carrying his imitation of the genuine Roman Pontiff too far by perpetrating an act of Anglican aggression."

In a letter to the Pall Mall, in which it seems to us there are several fallacies, W. R. G., remonstrating against Mr. Gladstone's policy with regard to the Irish Church, writes thus strongly of the influence of Catholicism in Ireland:

"I would speak with tenderness and forbearance of any creed sincerely held by fellow-Christians and fellow-countrymen, and for the Catholic religion in particular, in its highest form and in its best phases, I feel unfeigned respect. But those must be strangely unacquainted with the facts of the case who do not recognise, however reluctantly and regretfully, that Catholicism, in the character it assumes in Ireland, is the worst foe to Irish progress and pacification; that the influence of the priests is steadily, systematically, energetically, and ruthlessly exerted to oppose all those measures and proceedings which well-informed and thoughtful Liberals know to be most essential to the improvement and salvation of the country. They encourage early and improvident marriages; they discourage emigration; they support the peasantry in resisting the consolidation of farms into acreages on which a family can live in decency and comfort; they set their faces obstinately against the system of mixed education. Nor is this all, though this is much. Ultramontanist is now rampant in Ireland, and is doing all it can, on principle and by orders from Rome, to render the government of Ireland impossible, and that of England difficult, except on terms which sooner or later must involve for the former island something very like restored Catholic ascendancy."

Dr. Temple, of Rugby, delivered a speech at Clitheroe, yesterday week, on the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, which presented a striking and most favourable contrast to the utterances of the anti-Irish episcopate and most of the clergy on the same subject. In reply to the question often put, "How can you, ministers of the Church of England, advocate what is in reality an attack upon that very Church which you serve?" he said:

"He felt so deeply the importance of doing justice to Ireland—he felt so convinced that the measure of disestablishment was absolutely necessary to do that justice;—he felt so struck with the discredit which attached to the Church of England as long as it maintained in the sister country an establishment which could only number an eighth part of the population; he felt that so strongly that he was sometimes tempted to reply, even if the very next result was the disestablishment of the Church of England too; and he could not be a party to the maintenance of an establishment which required that such injustice should be done. And if it was said that they were to look on to future consequences, and imagine to themselves that the inevitable result of the disestablishment of the Irish branch of the Church was that the English branch was to go with it, he must say this, that there was, it appeared to him, only one claim which a church conscious of the dignity of its own mission from God could possibly make upon any nation whatever to maintain it as an established church, and that was, was it really doing the work which an established church ought to do?" "Whenever the day should come when the nation should say, 'You cost more than you are worth,' he held that it was the only dignified position for the Church to take to say, 'Then, by all means, let the Establishment cease, and let us do our duty.'"

In answer to the plea that respect was to be paid to ancient institutions, and we were not with a dreadful wrench to tear out that which has so long fastened on people's minds, he pointed out that the men who, like Goldwin Smith, had most carefully studied the history of the past, were most strongly in favour of the changes which the Liberal party proposed. And what, he asked, had caused the hesitation of that party on the question now most prominently before the nation?

"He hardly knew any writer on the Liberal side for the last forty years who had not spoken of the Irish Church as an opprobrium to England. He hardly knew any pamphleteer, who had ever spoken of it at all, who had not remarked what a blot and disgrace it was that that Church should still be maintained; and what was it that had held back the hands of the Liberals? It was because they had, whatever might be said of them, the deepest reverence for the past; it was because they respected what was old, and were delicate in touching that which had been so long established. They had waited until patience was exhausted; nay, had they not waited until they had betrayed their own leader into a false charge of an untruth? They knew from Mr. Gladstone's published speeches that he had come to the conclusion that it was distinctly unjust to maintain the Irish Church; and yet he was compelled to say, by the aspect of politics 'only three or four years ago, that he did not see any chance of that question coming really before the public within any practical limit of time. They had waited long enough; it was time now to do that act of justice which had been so long in their minds, and which really they ought to have been ashamed not to have done before.'"

Referring to the idea that the removal of the Establishment would give an advantage to Popery, he said, "he was deeply convinced that if there was one thing more than another which helped to maintain Roman Catholicism in Ireland it was the presence of the Irish Protestant Church." And he put the case to his hearers thus:

"How would they think if the case was reversed, if Ireland was the larger island of the two, and if she consequently had maintained her Roman Catholic religion and her Roman Catholic establishment, and had compelled England by force to accept that establishment for the benefit only of the Roman Catholics in England, whilst the great bulk of the nation was excluded? Did they think they would not feel that it was quite impossible for them to listen to the arguments of men who came to them from such a position as that? He believed that the Irish Protestant Church, when disestablished, would address itself to the people with far more effect, with ten thousand-fold more power than ever it had had before; because he believed it would then be standing on the only footing on which it was possible for a church to stand, namely, on the footing of justice. It would be doing as it would be done by; and until it began with justice, he could not conceive that it could succeed."

On a paragraph respecting the origin of Sunday schools which we gave last week, a correspondent writes:

"Great as were the services done to the cause of Sunday schools by Stock, Raikes, Lindsey, and others mentioned in your last impression, I am inclined to believe neither of them was the originator. In Dr. Thomas Rees's 'Nonconformity in Wales,' it will be found that there was a Sunday school at Neath, and another at Ty'r Dwnwyn close by, as early as 1697. It would seem stranger, however, if the idea did not present itself to many long before this. Some ideas seem destined to rise and vanish, and that repeatedly, from age to age, until some master-mind lays hold of them, and by popularising gives them life and strength to go about doing good."

The Rev. Walter Chamberlain, vicar of St. John's, Bolton, who had been taken to task by the Manchester Guardian for calling the priests of "another Christian denomination," namely, the Roman Catholic, "cursed," writes:

"Allow me to reply that I hold the opinions of our Reformers in all their pristine simplicity and force, abating not one jot or tittle from them. To me, the Church of Rome is not a Christian, but an apostate, Church, and certain of her doctrines blasphemous and dangerous conceits; to me, she is basely idolatrous, and her priests like priests of Baal. My Book says, 'If any man preach any other gospel, &c., let him be accursed.' When I cease to entertain these opinions I will leave the Church of England, as every ritualistic clergyman ought at once, in honesty, to do; but so long as I hold these opinions, which are those of my Church, I shall not fear to express them, notwithstanding the prevalence of Irish ruffianism."

On the failure of the Rev. E. Clay to fulfil his promise to preach in the Free Church at Brighton, referred to in "What is Doing," the Rev. Robert Ainslie thus commented in his sermon last Sunday:

"Our Brighton Luther has thought discretion to be the better part of valour. If a clergyman wishes to preach the Gospel to two or three thousand people in an unlicensed place, he should think well before he takes the step. He is not under the law of Christ, or he would fearlessly do it; but he is under the law of ecclesiastics. When about nineteen years of age, I could have entered the Church of England with prospects of success. But when urged to do it, my reply was, 'If I give my assent and consent to everything in the Book of Common Prayer, I shall tell a lie; and to enter the office of the ministry with a lie in my right hand, would make me miserable through life.' I have never repented of my decision. I have been free. I have preached in hospitals, asylums, workhouses, churches and chapels, village rooms, the open air, on board ships, and am ready to preach anywhere, and to let any man of good repute preach for me. I have had a life of hard work; but never have had a rich living. Could I have told a lie, I might have been a vicar, an archdeacon, or even a bishop. But God gives me health, and work. The former I am grateful for, and will take all the care of it, that hard work (which I really love) will permit me to do. Had I had a mitre, it might have been a curse to me, if I had attained it by polluting my conscience."

WHAT A SERMON SHOULD BE.

JUST now when so many are giving their opinions what a sermon should not be, the following lines describing what it should be will not seem out of place:

It should be brief; if lengthy, it will steep
Our hearts in apathy, our eyes in sleep,
The dull will yawn, the chapel-lounger doze,
Attention flag, and memory's portals close.

It should be warm, a living altar coal,
To melt the icy heart and charm the soul;
A sapless, dull harangue, however read,
Will never rouse the soul, or raise the dead.

It should be simple, practical, and clear;
No fine-spun theory to please the ear;
No curious lay to tickle lettered pride,
And leave the poor and plain unedified.

It should be tender and affectionate,
As his warm theme who wept lost Salem's fate;
The fiery laws, with words of love allayed,
Will sweetly warn and awfully persuade.

It should be manly, just, and rational,
Wisely conceived, and well expressed withal;
Not stuffed with silly notions, apt to stain
A sacred desk, and show a muddy brain.

It should possess a well-adapted grace
To situation, audience, time, and place;
A sermon formed for scholars, statesmen, lords,
With peasants and mechanics ill accords.

It should with evangetic beauties bloom,
Like Paul's at Corinth, Athens, or at Rome;
While Epictetus some or Sterne esteem,
A gracious Saviour is the gospel theme!

It should be mixed with many an ardent prayer,
To reach the heart, and fix and fasten there;
When God and man are mutually addressed,
God grants a blessing—man is truly blessed.

It should be closely, well applied at last,
To make the moral nail securely fast;
Thou art the man, and thou, alone will make
A Felix tremble, and a David quake!

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XXI.

SUBJECT: "The Hebrew writers hold forth the character of God before us. His kindness is to be the measure of our kindness to others, His great deeds are His title to our obedience, His holiness the reason for our holiness."

Read Deut. x. 17.—xi. 9. Jehovah your God regardeth not persons, nor taketh a bribe. He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and the widow, and loveth the stranger. "Love ye therefore the stranger," says the writer. Follow his example of kindness, "for ye also were strangers in the land of Egypt." Further on in the same passage we are reminded of the greatness of Jehovah, His mighty hand and His stretched out arm, His signs and His deeds which He did for His people in Egypt and in their wanderings. "Your eyes have seen all the great deeds of Jehovah which He did," therefore, says the writer, are ye to believe on Him and to obey Him. "Therefore shall ye keep all the commands which I command you this day."

Read also Leviticus xix. 1.—18, where it is commanded to the children of Israel, "Ye shall be holy, for I Jehovah your God am holy." They are desired to reverence every man his mother and his father, to turn from idols, to share their plenty with the poor, to be truthful, honest, and upright; and the reason is given after each of these commands, "For I am Jehovah, your God."

Again, from the same book of Leviticus, read a few verses of chap. xx. 22.—26. I am Jehovah your God, who have put a difference between you and other people, ye shall therefore put a difference between clean beasts and unclean. . . . And ye shall be holy unto me; for I Jehovah am holy. These passages from Leviticus show the thoughts of a time when the purity and holiness of God had begun to be understood. The earlier books give a number of precepts much like these, by observing which the Jews are to be distinguished from the nations around them. But the writer of Leviticus, without changing the old customs and ceremonial observances, endeavours to give a new and a higher reason for them.

REVIEW.

The Leeds Tune Book. Compiled and mostly arranged by Joseph Lancaster. London: Novello, Ewer, and Co.

To produce a collection of hymn tunes that should take the place of all the miscellaneous assortments now in use in our chapels would be almost as impossible as to produce a hymn book or a liturgy that should satisfy all. Even though the same tunes are to a considerable extent used in many different places, some of the old standards to the ordinary metres being almost universally known, yet even these are differently arranged according to local variations of musical taste or tradition; while there are few congregations that have not acquired by long familiarity a preference for the tunes which have been associated to their favourite "peculiar metre." Mr. Lancaster, however, the able and efficient organist of the Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, has wisely not attempted anything so comprehensive, "this work," as he says in the preface, "being intended more as a supplementary one to the hymn tune books now in use." As such a supplement, we think it will be found very widely acceptable. Mr. Lancaster's name is sufficient guarantee for the correctness and beauty of the musical harmonies, while his experience as organist in a congregation that has always endeavoured to have its psalmody thoroughly congregational, has guarded him from producing a work that, like some others we could name, would be of little use, except in such of our churches as are blessed—or otherwise as the case may be—with expensive professional choirs. It has hitherto been a drawback—almost the only one—to Mr. Martineau's "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home," that tunes to many of its most beautiful hymns were only accessible in works so expensive as "Jowett's Musæ Solitariae," and that most exquisite collection, "Ogden's Holy Songs," and that, moreover, in arrangements, which when procured are for the most part too complicated for ordinary congregational use. We believe that Mr. Lancaster's work, which is very well got up, and yet announced at a price that places it within the reach of all, will go far to supply this want. Without pretending to offer any detailed musical criticism of the work, we can recommend it as containing a large number of beautiful tunes, many of which are new, and some of which will, we are persuaded, become popular. Among these we may safely include a "Sevens" (No. 144), adapted either for a Christmas or Easter hymn, each line ending with Hallelujah, of which it is difficult to speak too highly; "O'er Kedron's streams" (No. 170), and "From foes that would the land devour" (No. 179), two of Mr. Lancaster's own composition; "We covenant with hand and heart" (No. 193), and "O God, protector of the lowly" (No. 199). When we add that the collection contains among its 232 tunes, many of the best known and most popular, "Holiest, breathe an evening blessing," "Jerusalem the golden," "Thursley," &c., and a selection of the best old standard tunes for the ordinary metres to furnish sufficient variety for use, even without any other psalmody, we think we have said enough to secure from those of our readers who are interested in such matters the attention it well deserves.

AN OUTLINE OF THE HISTORY OF MODERN THEOLOGY.—PART II.

DURING the discussion of abstract theological doctrines, which followed in the wake of the "Wolfenbützel Fragments," the new critical school, headed by Schleiermacher and De Wette, had gained enormous concessions from the orthodox party. The doctrine of an infallible Bible had, for some time, been given up, but the genuineness of the gospels remained unassailed. That Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John wrote the books which bear their names is a tradition of the Church; but the question arose, is that tradition well founded. Were the gospels as we have them written by the apostles whose names are affixed to them? Justin Martyr, who lived about the middle of the third century, quotes several passages from the "Memoirs of the Apostles." Now, if those works quoted by Justin then bore the names they now bear, how came he never to mention the fact? But when we compare the passages quoted with the corresponding passages in our gospels, we find a great discrepancy—Matthew, Luke, and John being jumbled together. And what proves that these "Memoirs" could not have had canonical authority is, that under the same title Justin quotes passages which could only have been in apocryphal gospels. There can be little doubt that at the time of Justin there existed a great many written accounts of the sayings and doings of Jesus. It is but natural to suppose that when the apostles, or any of their immediate followers, visited a distant church, the people should have been anxious to write down the accounts of one who had seen the Lord, and should mention the name of the disciple from whom the accounts were received. And so, in fact, we have gospels according to Thomas, according to Peter, according to Bartholomew, and according to the twelve apostles; besides a gospel according to the Hebrews, and one according to the Egyptians. The contents of these documents were, of course, substantially the same, differing principally in details, and modes of expression. When, therefore, Justin or his contemporaries quote passages, the substance of which is found in our gospels, but expressed in different words, we are obliged to suppose that they must have used some of those writings which, even in Luke's time, "many had taken in hand to set forth." So that the quotation of passages of Scripture by the early Christian fathers does not prove the antiquity of the books we now have. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, who lived early in the second century, was another great authority with the Church. In a work of his, quoted by Eusebius, we find a passage to this effect: "Matthew wrote the sayings (τὰ λόγια) in the Hebrew dialect, and every one interpreted the same as he was able. Λόγια properly signifies oracular responses, or maxims, proverbs, dialogues, or discussions; and there is no instance of its being used, at that time, to signify a narrative of facts. Papias, it seems, wrote five books which bore the title, "Explanation of our Lord's Sayings;" and not being satisfied with such works as that of Matthew as authorities, he made it a point to inquire what was said by the other apostles, for, he says, "I do not think that I derived so much benefit from books as from the living voice of those who still survive."

There is, then, every reason to suppose that the Hebrew work of Matthew was a mere collection of the sayings of Jesus, which Papias took in hand to explain, in order to assist those who were endeavouring to interpret it, "each one as he was able." But our present gospel of Matthew is far more than a collection of sayings, or discourses, and so can never be identified with the λόγια referred to by Papias; the former, no doubt contains the latter, and a great deal more besides. The author of our first gospel very frequently gives us vast numbers of "sayings," as if they formed one discourse. In the 13th chapter we find seven parables, all on the same subject—the kingdom of heaven—represented as spoken in immediate succession; a thing not at all probable. The same may be said of "The sermon on the Mount," and the discourses contained in the 23rd, 24th, and 25th chapters. A writer, whose object was to record the sayings of Jesus, and not to write a history, would, of course, give us in a few pages what might have been delivered at intervals of months or years. The Hebrew work of Matthew was, most likely, of this unhistorical character; and the author of our gospel, taking it as the foundation of his historical work, copied whole pages of it into his own book—a proceeding totally incompatible with the supposition that the historian was an eye-witness. And further, if we admit the authenticity of the fourth gospel, it is impossible to believe that the first was written by a companion of our Lord's; the contradictions between the two being so many and palpable. So, said Schleiermacher, you may take your choice. Matthew, or John, as an eye-witness, but you can't have both. It proves nothing that our first gospel in very early times bore the title "The gospel according to Matthew," as we have gospels according to Jude, and one according to the Hebrews. Thus all grounds, external and internal, of the orthodox opinion concerning the genuineness of the first gospel seemed to be swept away; and therewith almost the whole of the evidence for the miraculous circumstances connected with the birth of our Lord. Unquestionably Luke got his accounts second-hand; and most probably made use of those same traditions and writings which were the groundwork of Matthew's gospel; so that popular tradition was, in fact, the only ground for belief in the "miraculous conception." How, then, came the story into circulation? The early Christians were very far from being deceivers or impostors, who got up legends to suit their own purpose. How, then, did it originate?

The early writings of all nations have come down to us filled with myths. A myth is an idea represented as a fact occurring in time and space. Neibuhr and others had applied the mythical hypothesis to the explanation of Roman history, with much success. Why, then, should it not be applied to Scripture history? Jesus was in the habit of calling God his father, and saying that a real Christian must be born of the spirit, not of the will of the flesh, nor of man, and so on; and in after times this idea was taken as a fact. To this the orthodox objected that myths always originated amongst poetic people, which the early Christians most certainly were not. The Rationalists replied, if that explanation will not suffice, the legend must have arisen out of a false interpretation of prophecies, and a superstitious belief that all great men have been miraculously born.

The common objection that "if the accounts of the miraculous birth were false, why were they not contradicted," was met thus: The books that contain those accounts were not in existence until at least seventy or eighty years after the occurrences were said to have taken place, when, most likely, all the persons were dead who could have contradicted the report. Besides, the destruction of Jerusalem, and the succeeding persecutions of the Christians, produced a state of things very unfavourable to an accurate examination of reported facts. So, after putting together all these doubts and difficulties, the verdict inevitably was, "not proven." The same thing happened in the question touching the historical reality of the ascension; the evidence was insufficient. At this time everybody felt that a great convulsion was at hand; the foundations of the old faith shook and heaved as if the wave of an earthquake had been passing over the land. But the ways of God, in working out the drama of the world's history, are usually calm, quiet, and invisible.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1868.

THE FAILURE OF THE CHURCHES.

DR. TEMPLE, head master of Rugby, is reported to have said in a speech the other day: "There is, it appears to me, only one claim which a Church, conscious of the dignity of its own mission from God, can possibly make on any nation whatever, to maintain it as an Established Church, and that is, that it is doing the work which an Established Church ought to do." Good; but what is the work which the Established Church, or any other church, ought to do? We believe that if we could get at the inmost heart and mind of the great bulk of the people who think, in this country, we should find there a deep, ever-growing conviction that the first work of any church—the duty that lies nearest to it—is to make men and women better; that is, nobler, more beautiful in character and life—purer and braver, more temperate and more truthful, kinder, and juster, more tender and reverent; in other words, to subdue in them all the lower elements of their nature, and bring out into fullness and supremacy all that is nobler and diviner. And there is, we feel, more than a suspicion in the public mind that the churches are not doing this work—that the Church of England especially is not doing it. It is this suspicion growing into assurance that lies, we believe, at the root of the ever increasing indifference and aversion of numbers of the most thoughtful minds to all churches. It is this which lies largely at the root of the ever swelling discontent with sermons. It is this which is loosening in the public mind the feeling of the necessity and value at least of an Established Church. The truth is, the conception which churches themselves take of their work and the conception in the general mind seems to be hopelessly divergent. Churches speak and act as if their one chief work was to build up faith, whereas the non-ecclesiastical mind cannot help believing that it should be to build up character. Churches seem to think their function is to shape and compress the intellect of man into certain modes of thinking with regard to mysteries that lie in worlds beyond our ken, whereas there are those who dream it should be to mould the soul to the love and practice of all that is good and noble in the world in which we live. The mass of men have no means of determining the subtle question whether the Divine essence which spoke to man through the soul of Jesus had a personal pre-existence apart from God—and whether it had existed from all eternity or began to exist in time, but they can feel, and do feel, that the life which Jesus lived is everlastingly beautiful, noble, worthy of all reverence, love, and imitation. They can and do feel that, on the whole, in the proportion in which a human being comes up to the image of Jesus, he unfolds his own human nature and attains the true objects of his existence. And they see that whilst the churches seem to have the most painful anxiety to impress on men true opinions regarding the essence of CHRIST, they are not equally in earnest in changing men into his moral likeness.

The mass of men are unable to arrive at any certainty that the doctrines and doubts which the orthodox denounce are dangerous errors, but they are perfectly certain that the sins and sinful habits and dispositions which they behold around them are terrible evils. They have no doubt that the degradation in which they see multitudes of their fellow-creatures lying is degradation—that the greed and fraud and falsehood among the commercial classes—the selfishness and frivolity and sensuality among the wealthy and upper classes are horrible plague spots, nay, wide-spread diseases in our civilization which first and foremost demand attention and healing applications.

It would be utterly absurd and opposed to the fact to which our eyes and ears have borne witness a thousand times to say that the churches do make the healing of these moral diseases their primary work. It is notorious that their primary work is to save men after death. They direct the emphasis of their attention to this end, and although they will tell you that the same means which will save a man after death will save him—that is, will heal him, make him good and noble in this life, still it remains the fact that the healing of the disease of sin, the building up of moral life in society now is not the primary object of churches, but is left to follow as the result of aims directed to a remoter end.

It is the inability of any one to shew any results of the success or otherwise of the means adopted for the attainment or otherwise of this remoter end, that is the source of the long self-delusion of the churches. No one can prove that their methods, as to their remote ends, fail. They are in the position of physicians called in to minister to the diseases of a plague-struck army. It is true they work few cures now, but they profess that the result of their work will appear when the army shall arrive in India or some other distant land. The time and place for proof are so far off, that, if they are only trusted, they may conceal any ignorance—any incapacity now.

But the plea that their work will appear in the future will no longer avail the churches. They must give proof of their healing art by healing now. And here they must fail, if they act as they have acted hitherto. When they apply those nostrums to men's souls, by which they profess to save them hereafter, they will find that they are powerless to heal now, powerless—that is, in themselves, and apart from certain moral influences associated with them—powerless to awaken in the soul the love of moral beauty, the hatred of moral deformity. Why, the very fact that men of all sects are on the whole equally good—and equally wicked, too—shews that the doctrines about which the churches quarrel cannot have much to do in forming moral character. No, the churches must awake to the fact that the world needs and demands from them something very different from the building up of correct faiths or opinions, or they will be the salt that has lost its savour, to be cast out and trodden under foot of men.

THE LONDON ROUGH'S SUNDAY.

IN the following article, the Christian World directs attention to a subject which not merely deserves, but calls for the anxious consideration of all classes and denominations of Christians.

The London rough is rapidly becoming an institution. He and his fellows—in their annually increasing numbers—are making their power and influence everywhere felt in the metropolis. He is the offspring of the ignorance and irreligion which, unfortunately, prevail so largely, not merely in the English capital, but also in the provincial large centres of population, and unless we contrive speedily to bring him effectually within the reach of civilising agencies, his existence among us may prove something more serious in its results than many at present anticipate. He appears to occupy a position somewhere between the professional thief and the regular street trader or labourer. He is generally ignorant, unskilled, and miserably poor, procuring his living by whatever means he can, honest or dishonest, short of becoming a regular criminal. He is to be found in all low metropolitan neighbourhoods. In the Southwark thieves' quarter, in the back slums of Whitechapel, Bethnal-green, and Shoreditch, not to mention the numerous pauper colonies in St. Giles's, Bermondsey, and elsewhere, the roughs form a really considerable portion of the population. At races, prize-fights, pleasure-fairs, and popular gatherings on a large scale, the roughs are invariably found assembling in large numbers, ever ready for disturbance and riot, and constituting a continual source of annoyance and danger. When once, however, the rough has been fairly got hold of by the Christian missionary it is astonishing how complete is the transformation which takes place. He is not naturally worse than others, but is rendered so rather by the force of circumstances, because he has seldom or never been exposed to the influence of elevating and refining agencies. What can be done with the rough class, and how their better qualities may be successfully developed, has been shown over and over again by the results of missionary labour in Golden-lane, the New Cut, Spitalfields, Whitechapel, and other localities.

But these efforts are merely as drops in the ocean, so vast is the field for exertion. Nothing but one grand and united systematic endeavour on the part of the Christian churches will prove of avail with the great mass of roughs. Until this is made, the total of good results, although encouraging and deserving of all praise, will be but small. It is essential that every ameliorative effort should be brought to bear upon the present social and religious condition of these much-feared members of society, for it is to them that we owe the principal amount of Sabbath desecration prevailing so largely in the metropolis. The roughs form the principal customers and frequenters of the Sunday market and Sunday bird-fair. The Sunday markets in Kent-street, Seven-dials, Petticoat-lane, and elsewhere, attract them in hundreds. At the Sunday bird-fair in Bethnal-green they may, towards the middle of the day, be counted in thousands. In the suburbs are they also to be found. Every fine Sunday morning they may be seen journeying, either on foot or in carts drawn by overworked ponies or donkeys, towards the Essex Marshes or Epping Forest, where the air rings with their curses or blasphemous shouts, and the simple beauty of nature is defiled by the unwelcome presence of the Sabbath-breaker. Not a few find their way into the parks. In Battersea and Victoria parks are they especially to be met with, their presence being detected afar off by the barking of the dogs which accompany them, despite park regulations, and the unsavoury odours emitted from the short pipes used by them. Some travel into the pleasant lanes of Kent and Surrey, others roam towards Hampstead-heath, while a few wander along the banks of the Regent's and other canals for the purpose of finding a point where they may bathe in the muddy waters without being disturbed by the interference of the police.

From one p.m. to three p.m., the whole of the rough population appears suddenly to have vanished. A few members, possibly, may be found lingering at street corners or lurking under the arched entrances to dark courts and alleys, but the great mass have become absorbed into the countless tap-rooms, whose sanded floors, newly-scoured and fresh-dusted benches, invite their patronage. Here for two long mortal hours the drinking process goes ceaselessly on. There is no intermission. There is nothing but drink, drink, and drink. In the lower class of public-houses the sound of the noise and quarrelling is sometimes fearful, but it is not for the police or neighbours to interfere. They are used to such things. Then, as the Sabbath bells begin to chime, and the streets are filled with decently-attired people proceeding to their respective places of worship, forth issue the crowds of drinkers, with flushed features and excited tones, to mingle with the human stream which fills the street, and to outrage by their callous and defiant demeanour the sanctity of God's holy day. Down loathsome courts and lanes, up narrow evil-looking streets, into dark, broken-windowed houses, or dilapidated hovels, they gradually stagger their way, there to lurk until the public-house doors shall again be opened unto them. Through all the smiling summer afternoon they can think of nothing better than smoking, gambling, or quarrelling, unless indeed a messenger of religion should find his way into their presence, and speak to them of a purer and happier life. Strangely enough, in nine cases out of ten, they will listen to him. Strong-limbed, harsh-featured, and savagely-disposed as they are, they will not allow a finger to be lifted against him, for when all the world seems but too ready to crush them with the weight of its bitter scorn or stern authority, he alone comes forward to plead on their behalf, and to speak to them of better things.

And here it is that the remedy is to be found. To the increase of Christian effort among the "rough" community must we look for an amelioration of their condition. We must also multiply our endeavours to reclaim the child-Arabs of the streets, as well as to secure the attention of their elder brothers in the thieves' kitchen or the low lodging-house. It is on Sunday evening that the rough breaks out most wildly. But his outbursts are unseen and unheard by the general public. To learn something of them we must follow him into his haunts, into the low, secret places which abound in our great metropolis. There, in the foul, reeking beer-shop, the close and crowded lodging-house, or some other place too vile and infamous to be mentioned, he is to be found, singing, cursing, or shouting over his beer, quarrelling with his mates, lying, gambling, dancing, or fighting, according to the whim of the moment. Is not this deplorable? Is it not a burning shame that this should be the Sunday life, not of hundreds or of thousands, but of tens of thousands? Yet, awful and sad as is the fact, there are grounds for hope. Even in the midst of this chaos of sin and evil the signs of improvement are to be detected. The missionary of the Gospel, whatever may be his particular creed, is no longer regarded with hostility by the rough. He can walk in safety through neighbourhoods where the police dare not venture save in strong force; he is allowed to explore, unmolested, the haunts of vice and crime, and he is listened to with attention when the words of admonition from other lips fall on ears closed to their reception. If the "rough" population are to be subdued, it must be by means of the Gospel. In such a work there ought to be and are plenty of labourers, but more, many more, are required.

CATECHISING AT ST. ALBAN'S, LONDON.

A CORRESPONDENT furnishes the Spectator with an account of a catechising which he was present at in this church on Sunday, September 6, which is worth considering.—About one-third of the church was filled with children; and after a hymn, a young clergyman came forward, and began to talk to them, occasionally asking them a question or two. When he did, nobody answered, all being afraid to speak. Then he blew them up, and they all answered together, after the manner of children. On his teaching, which was taken from the history of the Israelites' wanderings in the desert, I have very little to say, except that it was wonderfully fresh, vivid, and plainly put. He knew what he wanted to say, and said it, so far as I could discern, in such a way that the children took it all in. Very few faces were dull and uninterested, very few impatient heels were drumming the ground. Some two or three, of course, expressed the usual stupidity that is always found, and some the heaviness that spoke of the mid-day pudding; but, as a rule, all were interested. After the history, which was garnished with references to the "Catholic Church," came a little digression explanatory of symbols. "When your priest, children, stands before you sacred altar to celebrate the Holy Eucharist, what does he put into the chalice?" A choir boy answered, "Wine and water." This, he told them, symbolised the blood and water from the side of Christ. The striking of the rock by Moses was also, it appeared, a symbol of the piercing of the side of Christ—the Rock of Ages—the rock on which the "Catholic Church" is built. After this, some good practical teaching on the subject of children's morals was given them. "You boys," said the clergyman, "use bad words, and you tell lies. Sometimes when you have to go to confess to your priest, you have to tell him of half a dozen lies before he gives you absolution." This allusion to confession, not as a disputed point, not even as a voluntary act, but as one of the regular duties of a Christian, struck me very much. Without being uncharitable, I could not help thinking that the way in which he returned again and again to the subject was more than accidental. It may be that his mind was full of the necessity of confession, or it may be that he designedly dwelt on the duty to familiarise the minds of the children with it. Then he said, assuming a tone which betokened great relief, for the teaching was really hard work, so energetic, so careful was he in his words and gestures, "Now, children, I will tell you a story." He did tell them a story. He tells a story to children in simply the most impressive, the most vivid, the most eloquent manner I ever heard. And such a story he told them! It was the story of the conversion of Bruno. Your readers know it,—how the great Raymond died; how he was adjured to speak in the funeral service; how the corpse rose, and with ghastly pallor and sepulchral notes said, "I am summoned before the judgment seat of God." How, on the second day, the Archbishop and all Paris being present, the corpse again rose, and again uttered the dreadful words. How, on the third day, because Raymond had been in the eyes of man a righteous and a good man they adjured him again to speak, and how he, for the last time, in tones more awful, more despairing than ever had fallen on human ears, spoke again, and said, "I am condemned before the judgment seat of God, by a just judgment." How Bruno, thereupon, became a monk. "And a monk, boys, is one who marries Christ, and will not marry the world or anything in it; just as a nun, girls, is one who marries Christ, and will not marry the world or anything in it. And as a monk is the highest earthly type of manhood, so is a nun the highest earthly type of womanhood." At the end of the story, the little frames were quivering with excitement, a low thrill ran down the benches, with a terrified catching of the breath, when the narrator's low distinct tones told how the dead man's jaws had opened to let out those direful words, "I am condemned before the judgment seat of God."

AMERICAN NOTES.

Dr. Osgood states that the National Conference of Unitarians and other Christian Churches will be held in New York on October 6th, and that probably its session will hereafter be held there every two years, as being the most central and available place of meeting. The executive committee have invited the Rev. James Martineau to give the opening sermon in the Church of the Messiah; and if he cannot come, as we imagine will be the case, owing to his College duties here, Dr. Bellows will probably be called to preach upon the lessons of his experience among the churches and people of the Old World.

Either the marriage law of this country does not apply to Canada, or the Rev. Morley Punshon, the well-known Methodist preacher, has determined to set it at defiance, since the other day he was married at Toronto to the sister of his former wife.

The Atlantic Monthly says of alcohol, as a strength-giver:—

"Every man that ever trained for a supreme exertion of strength knows that Tom Sayers spoke the truth when he said, 'I'm no teetotaler; but when I've any business to do, there's nothing like water and the dumb-bells.' Richard Cobden, whose powers were subjected to a far severer trial than a pugilist ever dreamed of, whose labours by night and day, during the corn-law struggle, were excessive and continuous beyond those of any other member of the House of Commons, bears similar testimony.—'The more work I have had to do, the more I have resorted to the pump and the teapot.' On this branch of the subject all the testimony is against alcoholic drinks. Whenever the point has been tested—and it has often been tested—the truth has been confirmed, that he who would do his very best and most, whether in rowing, lifting, running, watching, mowing, climbing, fighting, speaking, or writing, must not admit into his system one drop of alcohol."

The same journal, referring to the evils of drinking, observes:

"What are the romantic woes of a Desdemona, or the brief picturesque sorrows of a Lear, compared with the thirty years' horror and desolation caused by a drunken parent? We laugh when we read Lamb's funny description of his waking up in the morning, and learning in what condition he had come home the night before by seeing all his clothes carefully folded. But his sister Mary did not laugh at it. He was all she had; it was tragedy to her—this self-destruction of her sole stay and consolation. Goethe did not find it a laughing matter to have a drunken wife in his house for fifteen years, nor a jest to have his son brought in drunk from the tavern, and to see him dead in his coffin, the early victim of champagne."

The Methodist Episcopalians are building a splendid church at Washington, which is fast approaching completion. Pews are to be set apart in it for each of the States of the Union.

We mentioned a short time since that Brigham Young had become "slightly a widower," having lost a number of his wives from an epidemic. Recent accounts state that some of these have been replaced, and that the prophet had just "annexed" five ladies newly arrived from Berkshire, whose names are given.

Street-preachers have now and then to put up with a little "chaff" and ridicule here, but, if we may trust the account given by an American magazine, this is carried to much greater lengths on the other side of the Atlantic than with us. An elderly man, who is described as "short and dumpy in stature, wearing old-fashioned, round-glassed spectacles, and a wide-brimmed twenty-cent straw hat, tied with a black tape, terminating with a double bow-knot under his chin," mounts a pile of provision barrels. This reverend gentleman's appearance called out a hoisterous shout of welcome from the crowd; and the uproar was so great, and the speaker's voice so indistinct, that not a word of his discourse could be understood. After a while the congregation, having got tired of the preacher's pantomime and their own noise, quieted down, and gave him a chance to be heard. This turned out to be the worst thing they could have done for the preacher, for the first audible remark was:

"You're a buckin' ag'in Christ. Ain't you ashamed to be a buckin' ag'in Christ? Did Christ ever go a buckin' ag'in you? Then what do you go a buckin' ag'in him for?"

"We aint a buckin' ag'in him," indignantly cried one of the sailors, and you had better tie a fish to your tail, and fancy yourself a mermaid."

This led to a series of "personal remarks," which were addressed to the preacher with vehement uncton.

"How many bounties did you jump, old buffer?" asked one of the worshippers.

"How many panes of glass did you break when you jumped through the window?" yelled another.

"You'd better go and return some of the money you stole on your bounties!" said a third.

"You should not expose your han'some countenance to the burnin' rays of this yer tropperle sun," cried a fourth.

"Keep quiet and let us hear the silver tones of the old dolly-pad," roared a fifth.

"What did ye rob yer wife of her apron strings to tie yer hat with for?" queried a sixth.

"I'd like to buy them two front teeth of yourn for garden spades," said a stalwart Hibernian.

This last was a dead hit, as the speaker had but two front teeth, which were, in fact, tusks of unusual magnitude. Thus the Hibernian's taunt struck home, and the victim's temper giving way, he made no further effort to preach, but raising his hands appealingly to Heaven, he cried: "O Lord, let thy indignation rest upon this rowdy crowd, who come hither to disturb thy meeting, and let fire from heaven come down and consume them, that they may know there is yet a God in Israel!"

Of course such an oburgation only added fuel to the fire. The crowd received it with a tempest of hootings and howlings, and the "religious exercises" were adjourned.

PLAIN-SPOKEN ORTHODOXY.

WE take the following from the Wesleys' "Hymns on the Trinity," 12mo. Bristol, 1767. The italics are ours:

"Different from the Father, then
Is Christ another God?
No. Jehovah dwelt with men
And bought us by his blood.
Christ the true Jehovah was,
And is and shall be evermore;
God expiring on a cross,
Let earth and heaven adore."—p. 10.

"Jehovah did on earth expire
For every soul of man t' atone.
The One Almighty God Supreme,
Jehovah lavish of his blood,
Poured out the inestimable stream,
And reconciled the world to God."—p. 13.

"Arise ye dead and meet your doom.
Arians, behold his glorious face,
His face ye shall behold no more,
For ever chased to your own place,
While saints in ceaseless songs adore."—p. 19.

"There is none good but God alone,
And Jesus is that only one."—p. 19.

"The natures both of God and man
In Jesu's single person meet,
Never to be disjoined again:
So strict the union and complete,
That what of one is said, is true
If spoken of the other too."—p. 35.

"When thy human nature bled,
Then the blood divine was shed;
Blood of Him who was in thee,
God from all eternity."—p. 36.

On Gen. xxxv. 6:

"God *were manifested there,
There revealed to man they were!
Jacob saw the mystic three
One eternal Deity."—p. 60.

We have always considered Trinitarianism a source of confusion of thought, but we never knew before that Unitarianism was the source of the confusion of languages; yet the hymn on Gen. xi. 6, 7, describes the old

"Rebels who the three in one
Dare with learned pride deny,
By a Babel of their own
Confident to reach the sky."—p. 59.

The anthropomorphism of these extracts reminds us of Father Faber's:

"While thou art clasping Mary's neck
In timid, tight embrace,
The boldest seraphs veil themselves
Before thine infant face.

"Yes! thou art what thou seemest to be,
A thing of smiles and tears,
Yet thou art God, and heaven and earth
Adore thee with their fears.

"Yes, dearest babe! those tiny hands
That play with Mary's hair,
The weight of all the mighty world
This very moment bear."

Or his childish

"We have waited so long for thee, Saviour,
Art thou come to us, dearest, at last?
Oh! bless thee, dear joy of thy mother,
This is worth all the wearisome past.

"Thou wilt stay with us, Master and Maker,
Thou wilt stay with us, now evermore,
We will play with thee, beautiful brother,
On eternity's jubilant shore.
All hail! eternal child,
Dear Mary's little flower,
God hardly born an hour,
Sweet babe of Bethlehem!"

Hymn for Christmas Night.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

NATURE'S TEACHING.

MRS. ELLIOTT.

O'er the rich and mellow dyes
Of the foliage fading,
O'er the grey and quiet skies,
Hill and valley shading,

Pensively a spirit broods,
Nature's pulses stilling,
Breaking thro' her solitudes,
Her recesses filling.

Like the faint and quiv'ring smiles
On the cheek of sadness,
Misty lights break out awhile
With uncertain gladness;

Like to eyes of farewell, all
The loved past recalling,
Filled with tears that do not fall,
But are nigh to falling:

Even thus doth Nature gaze
On her children dying;
Not a murmur doth she raise,
Nor a breath of sighing—

Nor one long, low, dirge-like wail,
Thro' the valley swelling,
Sad with memory's farewell tale,
And of parting telling—

With a calm that is not gloom,
Softly meekly tender,
Doth she to the quiet tomb
Her progeny surrender—

Less like mourner o'er the dead,
Bowed in silent weeping,
Than like mother o'er the bed
Of her infant sleeping.

Shall we not a wisdom learn
From her silent preaching:
And with eyes attent discern
What her looks are teaching?

See we not herein how faith
Leaves her loved ones sleeping?
Yielding them, ah! not to death,
But to Heaven's own keeping.

* Italicised in original.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XII.

BANNS FORBIDDEN.

A SHORT time since the doors of an extreme ritualistic episcopal church, in one of our northern towns, had this sentence chalked upon them:—"I proclaim the banns of marriage between this church and the Church of Rome." The next night another anonymous scribbler appended the following protest:—"I forbid the banns, the parties are too near of kin."

GIVE A MAN A CHANCE.

A wide-awake minister, who found his congregation going to sleep one Sunday before he had fairly commenced, suddenly stopped and exclaimed,—"Brethren, this isn't fair; it isn't giving a man half a chance. Wait till I get along a bit, and then if I'm not worth listening to, go to sleep; but don't before I've got properly started; give a man a chance."

A SPIRIT OF FEAR.

The following passage from the Journal of John Rogers, Preacher, a Fifth-Monarchy-Man, gives a lively idea of how he was "roused up" about the tenth year of his age:—"Then hearing Mr. William Fenner full of zeal, stirring about, and thundering, and beating the pulpit, I was amazed and thought he was mad. . . . 'Oh,' says he, 'you knotty! rugged! proud piece of flesh! you stony, rocky, flinty, hard heart! what wilt thou do when thou art roaring in hell among the damned?' This made me at first amazed, which run often in my mind after, and I began now to be troubled, being scared and frightened, and out of fear of hell I fell to duties, hear sermons, read the Scriptures (though I knew not what I read, but only thought the bare reading was enough, morning and evening), and learned to pray, at first out of books, and all the graces, so called, that I could get. And besides family prayers, I was afraid every night lest the devil should carry me away to hell, if I did not first to myself, whilst my brother, my bedfellow, was fast asleep, say my prayers, and my 'Our Father,' and 'I believe in God,' &c., and the Ten Commandments, and my little catechism which I had learned, and this I did every night duly before I durst sleep, and I made as much of them as of a charm to keep me well that night, which else I conceived the devils would tear me in pieces. And yet sometimes, when I was sleepy, to make the more haste I should say some of them at least, to be in a forwardness, in the chimney corner, whilst I was unbuttoning me, or untying my hose, or the like, preparing to go to bed, thinking all was well enough, so 'twas but done, only sometimes though I was unwilling to it, yet out of fear, I remember, of the Devil, or some mischief, being ready to fancy anything to be the Devil, I should say my prayers, or commandments, or catechism, or all, twice over, suspecting I said them not well enough before."

And on one occasion, having thrown out "vain words," and cried "O Lord," his heart was "suddenly smitten upon it," and he thus describes what was the consequence:—"I was suddenly set a running as if I had been possessed by I know not what power or spirit, not having any strength to stay myself, were it upon my life, until I was headlong carried through a little gateway, where as plainly to my thinking and to my appearance as ever I saw anything by the sunshine, there was set a naked sword glistening with a fearful edge, I thought, and which took up the whole space of the gate from one post to another, with a broad blade most keen and cruel; at which sad sight, so fraught with frights, I ghastly screamed, and yet had not the least power to stay or stop my precipitant course, but I was quickly carried quite into it, so as that the edge of the cruel blade meeting with anybody, it seemed to me impossible I should escape death, and I made no other account but to be quite cut off and parted asunder; but afterwards being hurried through with that headlong and furious force, I had strength to stay a little beyond it, and to perpend the perplexible peril which I was in. I stood as one amazed, or rather as one that knew not whether he were alive or dead; I knew not how to believe myself less than a dead man, and afterward at least mortally and deadly wounded, if not desperately and deplorably cut in twain. Oh! how I stood trembling in my thoughts, until the vital blood, which was fled for the heart's defence, began to disperse again and go quietly to their own homes, and then I looked about and turned me to the gateway, but the appearance was passed away, the sword gone and vanished, whilst I was left alone in a labyrinth of fears, without any wound without, but deeply and woefully wounded within."

THE MUSIC OF ST. MARY'S COURT.

THEY who can watch the glories of the sun-set gilding the breaking waves, or cresting with a separate crown of light each mountain-top will not often turn their thoughts to the city streets, and see, in imagination, how the dingy walls and narrow courts can be glorified and gladdened by the glinting of the golden evening beams. It happened that St. Mary's Court in Greenock was thus all alight with sun-set when, one summer evening, some new inhabitants came to take possession of a flat in "No. 4." They were only a country girl and boy, left alone in the world, who came to seek their fortune by hard work in the great smoky town. John Campbell had obtained employment in some ironworks near Greenock, and Janet, who, faithful to her dying mother's wish, refused to let him seek a home there by himself, would earn her share in sewing for the neighbours in the court.

By degrees, as days went on, she learned to know the people among whose haunts her path had led her;—labourers passing out to daily work in the morning, and in to well-earned rest at night; and women working no less hard in all the cares of home, too often soured by want and narrowed by a faithless life of toil. In the next house, a poor old couple lived, partly supported by parish aid; and to "old Jem and Meg," as they were called, Janet became the child of their old age, snatching odd moments from her work to cheer their lonely room. But by neglected children was she most beloved, and little ones, chased by hard words from home, would venture timidly to Janet's room, and listen by the hour to stories she would tell them, as she sat at work, of her own childish life, and the beauties of the country which they never saw.

One crippled boy she watched, always alone and silent, sitting without apparent interest or hope in the same spot outside a neighbouring door. She must have seemed to him as something straight from the heaven of which he heard but little there; for even scolds, and those who seldom gave a glance to any business but their own would stop, and smiling watch the daisy garden she had made, and how she coaxed the smutty sparrows down to him with bits of bread, spending there minutes only of her busy time, but giving hours of pleasure to the boy.

Though always busy and contented in her present home, sometimes fond memories of the sunny days spent in her father's moorland farm would have seemed almost too strong a contrast to the close confinement of the court, when at night the noise and riot of the idle men and boys broke on her ear, had it not been that then she heard, or seemed to hear, the sound of solemn music rising above it all. She supposed this was a fancy at first; but when for many nights and mornings it was still the same, she traced the sound up to St. Mary's Church, an old grey stone building from which the court was named, and listened, awe-struck, at the open door at early-morning prayers, and when the organist, at evening, practised in the empty church. It was her daily task at last to carry in her arms the crippled boy, and, followed by a flock of breathless children treading on tip-toe, to reach the darkest corner of the church, and listen to what seemed to them the music from on high. Let us hope the good old organist knew after, in the better world, the joy his music gave the little ones on earth.

Perhaps to the chief portion of the dwellers in the court, St. Mary's organ music was of no more importance than it had always been, though not entirely unnoticed; but many a night, now their attention had been called to it, a wearied man or woman might be seen to step in at the old church door, and gain at least repose, if nothing higher, in listening to the strains. So, too, when hard times came, and Janet, for a while, had to seek in service for some better means of life, John Campbell and his friends, for Janet's sake, would never let "the little chap" forego his daily treat, and one or other carried crippled Tom to hear the evening psalms. Surely the minds of men are raised by holy tones, and may we not believe that when, without design, the country girl led others to enjoy what she had found, it was but one of many ways in which a higher life visits us all through angels unawares.

The chimney corners of old Jem and Meg are vacant now, and little crippled Tom has long since walked among the hills of God; some of the strong are taken, and the young are old; but still to Janet, and through her to others, there the music of St. Mary's Church lends sweetness, and a heavenly hope in the press and care of life, and she herself is as an acted melody and psalm to God. And thus there is a music running through each human life, spent in however dull a court. Our joys and the dear friendships of our lot, as well as all our griefs, should come to us as the music to St. Mary's Court—from the old grey stone church; a melody breaking in upon and sweetening all our life from the House of God on high.

F. E. C.

INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM FREE CHRISTIAN SOCIETY, LOWER FAZELEY-STREET.—The seventh anniversary services were held on Sunday last, when the sermon in the morning was preached by the Rev. E. Madeley, and that in the evening by Mr. G. R. Twinn. There were large congregations, and the collections with a few contributions from absent friends, amounted to £9. 9s. The tea meeting was held the following evening, when there was a large attendance, including the Revs. Lindsey Taplin (Todmorden), J. Birks, E. Madeley, and B. Wright; Messrs. J. R. Mott, R. N. Clokey (of Bray, co. Wicklow), J. Mr. Rowland Parks presided. The annual report read stated that the school building had been completed by the erection of class-rooms, which were opened in May last; that in the boys' Sunday school the scholars were 249, teachers 25; in the girls' scholars 138, teachers 12; in the boys' week-night school, scholars 48, teachers 4; girls' scholars 78. In regard to the mission work, it was stated the services had been held regularly on Sunday mornings and evenings, and also on Wednesday evenings, and were well attended. The society is carried on entirely by voluntary contributions and gratuitous labour. After the reading of the report, several friends addressed the meeting, and the choir, which has been recently formed, sang several glees in a very creditable manner.

ELLAND.—On Sunday last, the Rev. John Ellis preached two sermons in Christ's Chapel. The congregations were good, and the choir was assisted by the Blackley Choral Society in the performance of several pieces from Handel's works.

HASTINGS AND BATTLE.—The Rev. William Birks has signified his intention of resigning shortly the charge of the Unitarian churches at these places.

PADIHAM.—On Monday evening, the Rev. W. Binns, formerly of Birkenhead, delivered a lecture in the Unitarian Chapel, Padiham, to a large audience, on "Robert Burns." Mr. Binns has been preaching at Padiham for about twelve weeks, and was cordially and unanimously offered the pastorate. He has, however, accepted an invitation from Devonport (not Bridgewater, as formerly stated), and this lecture was intended as his valedictory address. At the close a vote of thanks was tendered to him for his services, and, in responding, he said he had been glad to receive an invitation to become their pastor, although for private reasons he had thought it advisable to decline it. Padiham was one of the first places at which he had preached—now above thirteen years ago—and he was glad he had retained their good opinion for so many years. He had never met with a congregation which had more life, soul, and heart in it than the one at Padiham, and they had imparted to him a portion of their spirit, and he hoped that ere long they would meet with a minister who would suit them in every respect, as he was sure they deserved one. In his own preaching he had doubtless said some things with which they did not agree, but they had accorded to him that religious liberty they claimed for themselves. The terms they had offered him were very liberal—larger in proportion than were usually offered to ministers by Unitarian congregations. They had not found him the heretic he had the credit of being, although he had sometimes departed from the usual course in his preaching amongst them. He wished them, personally, and congregationally, all manner of success.

PRESTON.—The attack on Unitarianism, noticed in our last, was met by a discourse on Sunday evening from the Rev. R. J. Orr. It was shown—first, how completely misrepresented our opinions had been in the short space of the sermon devoted to "exposing" them; secondly, how little the texts on which their opponent seemed to rely, could support his views.

ROCHESTER.—On the 6th inst., the Rev. F. Bishop, of Chesterfield, preached two sermons in Clover-st. Chapel, to large congregations, after which collections were made for the school, amounting to £32. 2s.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of every letter must append his name for publication.

M. C. D.—See rule above.

R. S.—Declined with thanks.

A SUGGESTION.

To the Editors.—I have been exceedingly interested in reading the articles in the Herald upon the Wants in our Worship. They are evidently the production of one who sees things as they really exist. The subject is, to my mind, one of the utmost importance. It is a subject that has troubled my mind for years, but I have always feared to touch it, and should not now have done so, were it not for the fact that discussion is invited, and in the hope that the humble suggestion which I have to offer may be the means of eliciting something which shall help to supply this real want of the age.

Perhaps, after all, it is a confession that we should do well to make, viz., that in our carefulness to avoid a return to Apostolic times, we have gone too far in the opposite direction.

It seems to me that in our day we have a little too much of what is called preaching or sermonizing—too much of the "one man system."

If we have no direct authority for asserting, yet we have some ground for inference, that on those weekly occasions when the primitive disciples and members of the Church met for worship, it was not to grind their worship out with a winch—not always to sermonize; but for reading the Scriptures, for praise and prayer, and breaking of bread.

Now I am not about to add anything, or to suggest any alteration in the broad platform which has been laid down in those articles. There are suggestions from which something healthy may grow, if acted upon, according to the needs of various churches.

What I would recommend for the consideration of your readers who have this subject at heart, is, that where two sermons are now the order of the day, that one—say the morning—be entirely dispensed with, retaining as much of the other part of the service as is found to be desirable.

To supply the place of the sermon, let a chapter, or part of a chapter from the New Testament be read—of which previous notice had been given; and let it be the theme for discussion, by any, or all present, who are capable of giving an opinion upon it.

By this means, if I am not mistaken, an interest would be created, and kept alive, of which we have but little conception.

For, is it not a fact that in every congregation—almost without exception—there are minds admirably qualified to discuss, and in many instances, perhaps, throw increased light upon the text? If they are capable of filling positions such as Sunday-school teachers, superintendents, conductors of Bible classes, and, in some instances, translators, which they unquestionably are, then is there not here a waste of working power that is almost monstrous?

It seems to me almost a violation of the Divine commands: "Quench not the spirit;" "Despise not prophesyings." No matter how illustrious may be a member's gifts; no matter how full his heart may be of love to Christ, and love to souls; in the existing state of things he must be silent.

Surely there can be no reasonable objection urged against such an innovation as this. An hour—if so much could be spared, and I think it ought—spent in this manner would be infinitely more profitable than many of the dry, uninteresting, and lifeless sermons so common, and of which we hear so much complaint nowadays.

If an hour was not felt to be too long, then I would say, let the regulations be for each person not to occupy more than ten minutes, which would give an opportunity for five addresses, and ten minutes for the minister to sum up or conclude. Or, if there were a larger number capable and desirous of giving utterance to their thoughts, the time might be limited to five minutes, which would give ten the privilege of speaking, leaving the minister the same as in the other case. This might be adjusted in every instance according to circumstances.

In order to prevent any flagging, or want of interest, if such should happen to be the case, the minister would be present, and be prepared to deal with the subject.

If this plan should be thought worthy of adoption, it might not be out of place to read by way of lesson on the previous Sunday what is to be the portion for consideration on the next, letting it be distinctly understood that such would be the order of procedure.

In addition to the new interest that I am of opinion would thus be awakened, there would doubtless be another clear gain, viz., the qualifying and bringing out of many, who might be advantageously employed in supplying neglected places.

Fearing that I have trespassed too much on your space; but hoping these few unshaped thoughts will be the means of provoking much abler pens to deal with the matter, I am, yours truly, Billingshurst.

J. F. KENNARD.

CHURCH AND STATE CONTROVERSY.

To the Editors.—I see in the Herald some notice of my remarks on the New Catholic Church. I should be much obliged by your insertion of the following brief embodiment of my views of the Church and its relation to the State, without which any theory of the Church must be imperfect.

Aug. 27.

WM. HUME-ROTHEBY.

Q. What is the Church of God?

A. The Church, which is the same as the temple of God, or the kingdom of God in man, is the soul or mind that has a firm faith in the goodness and wisdom of the divine will, and desires and endeavours to do at all times nothing but what is felt and conscientiously believed to be this wise and righteous will. The Church universal is composed of such souls.

Q. Who ought to decide what is the ever-wise will of the Lord God?

A. Every human being who has the gifts of will and understanding is bound to use these faculties, honestly and thoroughly, to find out what is the supreme will which he ought to obey.

Q. What are the services which the Church should render unto the Lord?

A. They are all the duties which a man is daily called upon to do; the duties of the physician, the duties of the legislator, the duties of the shopkeeper, &c., being all divine services when faithfully discharged as duties to God and mankind.

Q. Who are the ministers of the Lord God and of his Church?

A. All, without any exception, are his ministers and the ministers of his Church, who constantly endeavour to do his holy will.

Q. How does such dutifulness to God minister to his Church?

A. His Church being the human soul that has a deep and undoubted faith in his will, whoever does this will honestly and unflinchingly is thereby the minister and servant of the Church in himself, thus strengthening and enlarging its powers, and, so far as by such dutifulness he may help others to trust in the Lord and serve him, to that extent he is the minister of the Church in them.

Q. Should the Church be united to the State?

A. Undoubtedly.

Q. How could this union be effected?

A. By all State laws and the administration of such laws becoming the embodiment of the living and true principles which constitute the Church in man, and which are the divine will as conscientiously understood and confided in.

Q. Should the Church flow down and embody itself in everything that man has to do upon the earth?

A. It ought.

Q. In such case what would be the result?

A. The Church would thus sweep out of the world whatever is wrong—all knavery in trade, all unprincipled conduct in State governments, all unjust privileges in social arrangements, and every thing else that is contrary to the will of God, and his blessed will would be done on the earth of men's daily lives as it is done in the heavens of regenerated souls.

Q. Are external sects and State ecclesiasticisms the Church?

A. No; they cannot be, for they are extraneous to man. It would be as reasonable to speak of a corporeal soul as of a State Church.

Q. If the Church had full sway, what would happen to all ecclesiastical establishments, and to all other kinds of sectarianism?

A. They would all be mercifully and wisely extinguished. The destiny of man being heaven, it would be wise and merciful to put away from him whatever is opposed to the spirit of heaven, which is the Spirit of the Lord; and that all sectarianism, whether established or voluntary, is un-heavenly, is but too painfully manifest from the fruits of darkness it has long been yielding—pride and domination, greed and hypocrisy, wars and all manner of cruel and immoral acts. It must be unjust for any one sect to absorb revenues belonging to a whole country, and the sooner the injustice is done away with the better for all.

Q. What might in justice be done with our ecclesiastical revenues when our so-called State Churches are disestablished and disendowed, as they must be by the Church of right feelings and enlightened principles in men's souls, as soon as it has acquired sufficient power to remove these gigantic evils from the earth?

A. As these revenues belong to all, even an infidel having a share in them, they might be fairly devoted towards the liquidation of the national debt, which weighs upon all. They would thus equally benefit all concerned.

Q. Who would be the teachers of truth and goodness if the Church were established in men?

A. Those who have been taught themselves, and have a capacity for teaching others. Such capacity would be their call and consecration to this high office.

Q. Would there then be religious societies?

A. Undoubtedly; every society would be a religious society; a society of manufacturers, a company of bankers, or a corporation of any other men discharging important uses, would be a religious society; and men would group themselves together according to their sympathies and necessities for united worship and spiritual edification, no one claiming mastery over another, or in the slightest degree interfering with the free expression of opinion.

Q. What is the duty of those who can appreciate these heaven-sent truths?

A. To live them, to diffuse them for the enlightenment of others, and to advocate universal obedience to their demands.

Q. Can it be reasonably expected that these truths will ever be generally acted upon?

A. Yes; because when the Almighty sends new truths upon the earth, it is clearly with the view of bestowing new benefits upon his children, and one may rest assured that He cannot fail to accomplish his wise and benevolent purpose. Then all blind conservatism and systematic opposition are but as fogs which the rising truth will disperse. These considerations should help to keep one faithful, dutiful, and hopeful, and, above all, deeply thankful to the good Father for the dawn of a new day upon the inhabitants of this world.

THE COMING WEEK.

Dukinfield: OLD CHAPEL SUNDAY SCHOOL.—On Saturday evening (to-morrow), the annual party for parents, teachers, and former scholars.

Evesham: MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.—On Tuesday next, the sixth general meeting. Service at eleven a.m., luncheon at two p.m.

Pepperhill:—Sunday afternoon and evening, the Rev. John Ellis will preach.

Births.

DRUMMOND.—On the 10th inst., at 46, Gilmore Place, Edinburgh, the wife of Robert B. Drummond, of a son.

THOMPSON.—On the 12th inst., at Brickfield Cottage, Mount Pottinger, the wife of the Rev. David Thompson, Moayra, of a son.

Marriage.

ROWLAND-SLATTER.—On the 8th inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, Tenterden, by the Rev. T. Talbot, Henry Turner, eldest son of Mr. H. W. Rowland, of Hursleypoint, to Katherine Mary, third daughter of Mr. Charles Slatter, of Brighton.

Deaths.

ANDERSON.—On the 9th inst., at 60, Princess-street, Dundee, Margaret, only daughter of Alex. Anderson, aged 14 years and eight months; deeply regretted.

GREENE.—On the 26th ult., at Liverpool, Mr. John H. Greene, aged 50 years.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 877, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing offices, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, September 18, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 388.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing.....	316
What is Saying on Church Matters.....	317
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XXIII.	318
Scottish Lights on the Irish Church.....	318
American Notes.....	318
Symbolism.....	318
An Outline of the History of Modern Theology.—Part IV.	319
Dean Milman.....	320
Fire-side Readings: The Child Angel.....	320
St. Jacques.....	320
Earthquakes.....	321
Midland Christian Union.....	321
Intelligence: Heywood, Longton.....	322
Correspondence.....	322

LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL.

The Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU will RESUME the duties at this chapel on Sunday, October 4. Divine service at 11.15.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN will PREACH next Sunday, morning and evening.

UNITARIAN CHURCH, STALY-BRIDGE.—SUNDAY EVENING LECTURES in the PEOPLE'S HALL.

- 1868.
- Oct. 4th.—Rev. FRANCIS REVITT, of Stalybridge; "Why am I a Christian?"
- Oct. 11th.—Rev. M. C. DENBY, of Flowery Field; "The Unitarian doctrine of the Atonement, considered as a practical power."
- Oct. 18th.—Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS, of Dukinfield; "What is true liberty?"
- Oct. 25th.—Rev. H. E. DOWSON, B.A., of Gee Cross; "Salvation, what it is not, and what it is."
- Nov. 1st.—Rev. JAMES BLACK, M.A., of Stockport; "Jesus Christ."
- Nov. 8th.—Rev. FRANCIS REVITT, of Stalybridge; "Why am I a Unitarian?"
- Service to commence at half-past six o'clock.

LONDON UNITARIAN LAY UNION.

WEEK NIGHT SERVICES AND LECTURES.
St. John's Chapel, West-street, Waiworth, Mondays, half-past eight.
Plummer's Place, Clerkenwell, Tuesdays, half-past eight.
Hyde Road, No. 69, Hoxton, Mondays, half-past eight.
Stratford Lecture Hall, Tuesdays, eight o'clock.
Mile End Road, 245, Wednesdays, eight o'clock.
Stamford-street, Wednesdays, eight o'clock.
Dartmouth Road, Forest Hill, Thursdays, eight o'clock.
St. John's Square, Clerkenwell, Fridays, eight o'clock.

STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.

The ANNUAL SERMONS will be preached on Sunday, 11th October: In the morning, by the Rev. H. IERSON, M.A.; in the evening, by the Rev. J. K. APPLEBEE. Service: Morning at eleven; evening, half-past six o'clock. The usual collection will be made after each service, and the amount collected will be taken as an offering to the minister, the Rev. Robert Spears.

THE ANNUAL SOIREE OF THE LOWER MOSLEY-STREET SCHOOLS' NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY will be held on October 10th. Admission, 1s. each; tea at 5.30. H. HYDE, Hon. Sec.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH, POOLE.

The congregation will be grateful for large or small contributions in aid of their Building Fund. The total cost of the new church will be £1,200.

The amount of subscription previously advertised is..... £636 13 6
The Rev. E. Kell (3rd donation)..... 5 0 0
Miss Duncan (2nd donation)..... 5 0 0
James Yates, Esq..... 5 0 0
John Johnston, Esq. (3rd donation)..... 2 0 0
Miss Bartlett..... 2 0 0
Sigismund Schwann, Esq., Stockbridge..... 1 0 0
J. H. Gittin, Esq., Birmingham..... 1 0 0
H. HAMILTON, Secretary.
A. BALSTON, Treasurer.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.

G. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthily-situated establishment boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemen education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS TO TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G. G., 68, Guildford-street, Russell Square, London; or to Mr. A. G. G., 31, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

TO UNITARIANS.—Advertiser seeks EMPLOYMENT in any trustworthy capacity. Good linguist.—F. H., 34, Gloucester-street, Holborn, London.

A Respectable Married Lady, whose husband is engaged during the day, requires an Engagement as HOUSEKEEPER, either in a private or mercantile establishment.—Address, P. J., Herald office.

TO GROCERS.—WANTED, by a respectable Youth, aged 15, a Situation as JUNIOR in a good Business House, country preferred. 34 years' experience in town.—Address for further particulars to C. HARRIS, Upton Road, Bexley Heath.

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE

(in connection with the University of London, and University College, London).
University Hall, Gordon-square, London.

PROFESSORS:
Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A., Principal, and Professor of Biblical and Historical Theology, with the Truths and Evidences of Christianity.

Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, Professor of Mental, Moral, and Religious Philosophy.

RUSSELL MARTINEAU, Esq., M.A., Professor of Hebrew Language and Literature.

THE COLLEGE SESSION COMMENCES on Monday the 5th of October.

STUDENTS and CANDIDATES are required to ATTEND on Friday the 2nd of October, at 11 a.m.

The OPENING ADDRESS will be delivered in the Hall, at four p.m., on Monday the 5th October, by the Rev. JAMES MARTINEAU, and is open to the public.

All or any of the classes may be attended by the public on payment of the regular fees. Particulars may be obtained by letter from the College Librarian, at University Hall, or either of the secretaries. The hours of lectures will be fixed, and may be learnt after the Session has commenced.

R. D. DARRISHIRE, B.A.,
26, George-street, Manchester, } Secs.
CHARLES BEARD, B.A.,
13, South Hill Road, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, S. }

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE

(in connection with the University of London, and University College, London).
University Hall, Gordon Square.

SESSION 1868-9.

Candidates for admission into the College at the commencement of the ensuing Session are requested to FORWARD their APPLICATIONS and TESTIMONIALS, without delay, to either of the Secretaries, from whom all useful information may be obtained.

R. D. DARRISHIRE, B.A.,
26, George-street, Manchester, } Secs.
CHARLES BEARD, B.A.,
13, South Hill Road, Toxteth Park, Liverpool, S. }

MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.

THE AINSWORTH SCHOLARSHIP.

The Committee offer to those of its students who shall obtain a gold medal in the M. A. Examination at London University, a SCHOLARSHIP OF ONE HUNDRED POUNDS. Competitors for this Scholarship must graduate as Students of Manchester New College, either on taking their Bachelor's or Master's Degree. If the former, they must have previously spent not less than two years at Manchester New College; if the latter, not less than one year.

The Ainsworth Scholarship is open to any Lay Student of University College who has previously enrolled himself as a Student of Manchester New College, gone through his Undergraduate course under the direction of the Principal of that College, and attended the classes for religious and ethical instruction which it provides for its Lay students. Subject to these limitations, the Scholarship is open to every Gold Medalist at the Examination for the Master's Degree in any one of the branches of Classics, Science, or Philosophy.

Payment will be made to successful competitors in two yearly payments of Fifty Pounds. The Scholarship will be continued until notice to the contrary is given. Two years' notice will be given previous to its withdrawal.

Further particulars respecting the Scholarship and the plans of study at Manchester New College, may be obtained on application to R. D. DARRISHIRE, Esq., B.A., one of the Secretaries of the College, 26, George-street, Manchester; or to the Rev. J. J. TAYLER, B.A., Principal, at University Hall, Gordon Square, London.

COMFORTABLE APARTMENTS for a

Gentleman in Pendleton.—Apply WILLIAM WORTHINGTON, 6A, Broughton Road, Pendleton.

DR. BEARD'S MANUAL OF CHRIST-

IAN EVIDENCE will be ready by the end of October. Parts XII.—XIV. GOD BEARS WITNESS OF HIMSELF IN THE LITERATURE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, and in the PRINCIPAL PERSONAGE, the LORD JESUS CHRIST. Part I. The Synoptical Gospel; Part 2. The Fourth Gospel: Is the Apostle John its Author?

Subscribers' names should be sent to Mr. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

Price 2s. 6d.

THE THEOLOGICAL REVIEW.

No. XXIII. October 1st, 1868.

1. Ancient Tomb Inscriptions of the Crimean Jews, by Samuel Davidson, D.D., LL.D.
2. The Church of England and who should stop in it, by F. A. Power Cobbe.
3. The Non-conformist at Oxford, by a Junior Fellow.
4. The Greek Testament of Erasmus, by R. B. Drummond, B.A.
5. Pulpit Reform, by Charles Anthony, jun.
6. Travers Madge, by John Wright, B.A.
7. Recent Speculations as to the Age of the World, by H. W. Croaskey, F.R.S.
8. Notices of Books.

Publishers: Messrs. Williams and Norgate, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden, London; 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL PENNY

MAGAZINE for OCTOBER contains:—General Providence and Special Providence.—The Boys' Adventures. Chapter VIII.—Work.—The Proud King. Chapter II.—Aunt Ruth's Almshouses. Chapter III.—Dorcas.

Published by the Manchester District Sunday-School Association, London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson, 18, Market-street. General Agent: Mr. T. P. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

Published this day, price One Shilling.

REASONS FOR BELIEVING IN THE GENUINENESS OF JOHN'S GOSPEL.

With some Notice of the Rev. J. J. Taylor's Recent Publication on the Fourth Gospel.

By THOMAS MADGE,

Late Minister of Essex-street Chapel.

London: E. T. Whitfield, 178, Strand.

NEW EDITIONS

OF THE MEMOIR OF TRAVERS MADGE.

The first edition having been out of print since March last, and many requests having been made for it to be reprinted, A SECOND EDITION, SIMILAR TO THE FIRST;

1 vol., 12mo., cloth, limp, lettered, Price One Shilling and Sixpence, is now in the press, and will be issued at the beginning of December.

A BETTER EDITION will also be issued at the same time, larger in size, better paper, well bound, and with portrait.

Price Five Shillings.

 Of this edition only a very limited number of copies will be prepared, according to the orders actually received for it.

Orders should be sent at once, accompanied with stamps or Post-office order, to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,
Higher Broughton,
Manchester.

By whom the book will be sent post free immediately on publication.

Now ready, price 6s. THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW (NEW SERIES). No. LXVIII. OCTOBER, 1868.

CONTENTS:

1. Landed Tenure in the Highlands.
2. Poems by William Morris.
3. Reform of our Civil Procedure.
4. Spielhagen's Novels.
5. The Property of Married Women.
6. China.
7. The Suppressed Sex.
8. Sea Sickness.
9. Middle Class Schools.

CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE:—1. Theology and Philosophy.—2. Politics, Sociology, and Travels.—3. Science.—4. History and Biography.—5. Belles Lettres.
London: Trübner and Co., 60, Paternoster Row.

BISHOP MAKING—PAST AND PRE-

SENT.—The Nonconformist of Wednesday, September 3d, contains: The Anglican Hierarchy and the Irish Church.—Bishop Making, Past and Present.—The County Elections.—The Spanish Revolution.—Special Election News.—Pastors' Income Aid Fund.—New Nonconformist Grammar School.—Liddon's Hampton Lectures (second notice), &c., &c. Price 5d.; stamped 6d.

ARTHUR MIALI, 18, Bouverie-street, London, E.C.

LIST OF CANDIDATES.—GENERAL

ELECTION.—The Nonconformist of Wednesday, Sept. 23, contains a full and corrected LIST of the CANDIDATES for the United Kingdom up to the present time, and an estimate of the prospects of the general election. Also, articles on the Irish Church Committee Report, Electioneering Morality, the Insurrection in Spain, Liddon's Hampton Lectures; and a resume of opinions on the English and Irish Church Establishment. Price 5d., stamped 6d. Office, 18, Bouverie-street, London, E.C.

ALL friends of free religious thought and the free expression of it should read the Truthseeker. Edited by the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS. Price 3d.

The Truthseeker, published on the first of every month, is a free and unsectarian review of books and events relating to the development of religious life and liberty in the Christian Church. Every number contains original lectures, meditations, and essays, together with reviews of present and permanent interest.

Any bookseller can supply the Truthseeker to order, on being furnished with the name of the London publisher, Mr. C. FOX, Paternoster Row.

"THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH IN IRELAND: WHAT IS IT, AND WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH IT?" By the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS. See the Truthseeker for October, now ready at all the usual places. Price 3d.

The two hundred and fiftieth thousand now ready of

"WHAT DO WE, AS UNITARIAN CHRISTIANS, BELIEVE?" By the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. Two shillings a hundred.

"LIGHT FOR BIBLE READERS."

A Notes on a hundred passages of Scripture. By the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. A new edition (eighth thousand) now ready, on toned paper. Price threepence. May be had of all the usual agents and booksellers.

Will be published in a few weeks, crown 8vo., about 180 pp., well bound, cloth lettered, price 3s.

WORDS FROM A LAYMAN'S MINISTRY:

A MEMORIAL VOLUME of the late

GEORGE BROWN, Barrister-at-Law.

Containing 17 sermons preached by him in the Free Christian Church, Barnard Castle.

Edited by Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLER, B.A., with

Memorial Sketch, by Rev. BROOKE HERFORD.

The friends at Barnard Castle who are putting forth this Memorial Volume will be especially glad to receive orders for it as soon as possible. To all persons sending their names and 3s. worth of postage stamps it will be forwarded, post free, immediately on publication. Any profit accruing from the volume will be added to the fund for carrying out an object for which Mr. Brown had long and earnestly striven, viz., the building of a new chapel.

Subscribers' names to be sent to Mr. JOSEPH LEE, Barnard Castle.

HERFORD'S REFORM CLUB CLARET.

In quarts. 22s.; pints, 11s. 6d. Nett cash.

C. J. HERFORD, Carlton Buildings, Cooper-st., Manchester

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

According to the Siecle, incredible as it may seem, the Pope is a freemason. In the register of a Sicilian lodge the minute of his initiation has been discovered; and the fraternity, in order to revenge itself for the excommunication pronounced against it, publishes the document accompanied by a photograph representing the successor of the Apostles wearing the masonic emblems. His Holiness Pius IX. is no other than Brother Jean Mastai Ferretti. As Pope, he has his eternal safety; but as a mason, he is condemned to the infernal regions. As, however, he holds the keys, we suppose he can let himself out when he pleases.

According to the Allgemeine Zeitung, usually well informed on such matters, the first point fixed upon for discussion at the Œcumenical Council is whether the bishop of every diocese shall have the privilege of proclaiming an Index of his own within it; i. e., whether he shall have the power to decide on what are proper books for the faithful to read. Next, it is proposed that the election of bishops should be taken out of the hands of the lay authorities, since Christian Governments seem to be more and more vanishing, and the concordats are torn to pieces everywhere. Church property is to be used for the subvention of the Conservative press. The care of the poor is to be taken out of the hands of the State and to be handed over to Christian charity, as represented by the Church. In all countries of Christendom there are to be held annual assemblies for promoting charity, Christian art, science, literature, and missions. The care for the wounded in battle and the sick generally belongs to the Church. The brethren without the pale, as long as they are Christians, are not to be repelled, provided they be of a positive mind in Church matters, since the spirit of negation does not declare war to single confessions, but to all religions. The foundation of Western universities, both in Cairo and Constantinople, is to be carried out with all possible speed, and the preliminaries in this matter, due to France, are to be taken as the foundations.

The official journal at Rome publishes a letter from the Pope to the Bishops of the Eastern Rite not in communion with the Apostolic See. His Holiness laments the division, and invites the bishops to the Œcumenical Council, in order to remove the existing differences and effect a union with Rome. This looks as if the Vatican felt the need of new alliances and additional strength.

The Jews in Hungary, of whom there are 330,000, have claimed to be placed in all respects on an equal footing with the Christians, and their claim has been favourably received in the Hungarian Diet, and steps are being taken to give it effect. It is stated that the Hungarian Jews have long given up the dream of a new Jerusalem.

We are often struck with the ignorance, or the disregard, shown by Churchmen of the teachings which they profess to receive. We have a good illustration of this in a speech which Lord Bate-man made at the Hereford county meeting, called for the defence of the Irish Church. He said, "It would be very narrow-minded in any person not to concede to every man full liberty of conscience, provided he acted up to his belief, and he would say that the religious opinions of the Roman Catholic, the Dissenter, the Wesleyan, the Turk, and even the Mahomedan—if he believed what he had been taught—were to be respected, and he had an equal chance of salvation with themselves." In speaking thus charitably, his lordship could hardly have been aware, we should think, that he was bringing himself under the anathema of the Church which he so much admires. Yet this was clearly the case; vide the 18th Article, which runs thus: "They also are to be held accursed that presume to say that every man shall be saved by the law or sect that he professeth, so that he be diligent to frame his life according to that law, and the light of nature."

Some Churchmen are beginning to suspect that Dr. Massingham, though in the pay of the Church Association, must really be a secret agent of the Liberation Society, for wherever he lectures he seems, by his coarse personalities and unreasoning abuse, to damage the cause which he professes to defend. This certainly was the case at Newbury last week; and when, on a subsequent evening, the Rev. C. Williams, of Southampton, replied to his statements, a crowded audience testified their approval in the most marked and decided manner.

As we expected would be the case, Canon Miller's open avowal that he is in favour of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, both vexes and perplexes his Evangelical brethren. Differing with them, of course his judgment cannot be honest, nor his motives pure; and, therefore, they meanly insinuate that he is worldly wise in his generation, and looks for a bishopric from Mr. Gladstone, for whom he has announced that he intends to vote.

The Times makes some disclosures respecting the expenditure of certain charitable and religious societies, that have an ugly look. The Religious Tract Society, for example, has for its object to diffuse as widely as possible literature of a kind calculated to make a religious impression upon those into whose hands it may fall. If it be a difficult matter always to select exactly the right kind of religious literature to diffuse, there cannot be much difficulty in diffusing a given amount, representing so much value, in hard cash at any rate, if not in literary worth. It is startling to find that it costs the Religious Tract Society no less a sum than £14,806 to devote to the religious purposes for which it was instituted, and for which, we presume, it still exists, the sum of £13,467. The salaries alone amount to £6,282. Is there not a positively ludicrous disproportion between the sum paid away in grants of money, or in the diffusion of books, and the sum found necessary for supplying the machinery to pay it? But perhaps the most singular instance is furnished by a Society for the Conversion of the Jews. The report of its proceedings for 1866 showed that while it spent £5,395 on missionaries, and £756 on secretaries, clerks, and messengers, it actually spent only £8. 12s. 5½d. on Bibles and New Testaments. What makes this fact all the more significant is that about the first thing which a missionary does, if he can get within arms' length of a Jew, is to put a Testament into his hand.

Some of the clergy in the neighbourhood of Penrith, where there is a branch of the Church Union, have come into collision with the Bishop of Carlisle relative to a "Burial Guild of the Holy Trinity," which they have just formed. In regard to it, the Bishop writes:—"That the movement is one of much significance is very plain from the printed documents which accompany your letter. The wax candles to be 'kept continually burning day and night' near the body of the departed in the chamber of death; the 'processional' cross, which is to precede the funeral cortège; the 'four tall candlesticks,' from three to four feet high, with candles lighted,' which are to be placed at the head of the coffin in the church; the incense, which is, under the circumstances admitting of it, to be waved over the coffin, after the lesson—to cite no other details, all these are in themselves material changes which should not be irresponsibly introduced into the burial rites of our Church. But they become doubly serious when coupled, as they are in the documents which accompanied your letter, with 'prayers offered for the rest of the departed soul' in the house of mourning; and with the celebration, in the midst of the ordinary burial service of our Church, of the 'Holy Eucharistic sacrifice,' 'on behalf of the members of Christ's body:' for it is evident that they are calculated, under the plea of recurrence to 'Anglo-Saxon' and 'Catholic' usage, to lead back our people to those 'sacrifices of masses, in the which it was commonly said that the priest did offer Christ for the quick and the dead,' and which our Church in the article from which I am quoting (the thirty-first), characterises as blasphemous fables and dangerous deceits. I am perfectly aware that these points do not explicitly appear on the face of the rules of the guild as now submitted to me. But there is nothing in those rules to exclude such development of doctrine and practice." His lordship concludes 'by deprecating the institution of a society which, appealing to the susceptibilities of human affection, seizes upon the opening thus afforded for entering upon a course of which the manifest tendency is the setting up anew in our Church some of the worst superstitions from which we were delivered at the blessed Reformation.'"

It seems that the heresy which has arisen in the body of Friends at Manchester, to which we have more than once referred, is thought so serious that Mr. Braithwaite, of London, and Mr. Harvey, of Leeds, have undertaken a special religious visit to their Manchester brethren, with a view to bring back the erring ones into the orthodox fold. What success has attended their efforts we have not yet heard.

When we first heard that it was proposed to raise a fund as a testimonial to Murphy "the notorious," we took it for a joke, intended to cast ridicule on testimonials in general; but it appears that the thing is started in real earnest, and supported both by the Record and the Rock.

The new Wesleyan College, at Headingley, near Leeds, has just been formally opened. At present it has accommodation for forty students, but it can be so extended as to provide for sixty.

The Church News states that the reason why the Bishopric of Peterborough has not yet been filled up, is that the Prime Minister has been so "pestered" by the evangelicals, that he scarcely knows what course to take. It seems, however, to be generally understood that the vacant see will be conferred on the Rev. W. R. Fremantle, vicar of Claydon, a pronounced Evangelical, whose recommendation, as far as appears, is that he is a clergyman of Bucks.

A Rev. Mr. Bishop, rector of Oake, in Somersetshire, has written to the trustees of a Methodist chapel on his property in Wales, to tell them that, if they support Mr. Sartoris, the Liberal candidate for Carmarthenshire, he shall, on the falling in of the lease, dismantle the chapel walls and remove from the courtyard the memorial tablets and grave-stones of their dead. As if he were a Jew, acting on the principle of "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," instead of a Christian minister, he says: "Behold, I am willing to place the scales of justice into your own hands, and say that whatsoever measure ye shall mete, it shall be measured to you again."

The following advertisement in the Staffordshire Sentinel leads one to surmise that some people go to church for other views than spiritual profit:

"Old Church, Hanley. To be let, or sold, a front pew under the organ gallery. Will seat seven persons, and commands a view of nearly the whole congregation."

Although a large crowd assembled in Lombard-street last Friday, we are glad to say the pippin-pelting was not resumed, and the police were able to convey the erratic "Father Ignatius" away with no worse accompaniment than a little hooting and hissing.

A "Noncon," who heard the "Father" preach from John xv. 13, reports that he heard nothing even from this text of the "cross of Christ," but he saw a profusion of crosses. Close by his side was a lady who had a cross from each ear; one, very large, on her breast; one on each cover of her Prayer-book; three on the ribands which were in her Prayer-book. Eight in all.

We learn from the Report of the Commission on the Irish Church that it consists of—

- "1. Two archbishops and ten bishops.
- "2. Thirty corporations of deans and chapters, and twelve minor corporations connected with cathedrals.
- "3. Thirty-two deans and thirty-three archdeacons.
- "4. 1,509 beneficed incumbents, and more than 500 stipendiary curates. (There are 1,518 benefices, and 309 of them are in lay patronage).
- "5. 693,357 persons, including, we suppose, the clergy.

"The net revenues appropriated to the maintenance of this Church amount to £581,000; of this £364,000 arises from tithe-rent charge, £204,000 from rents of lands.

The Weekly Register states that the two curates of a Ritualistic Church in Soho were received on Sunday last, into the Romish Church, at the Oratory, Brompton. Their conversion has caused a great sensation among the members of the congregation, many of whom, it is supposed, will follow the curates' example.

A writer in the Christian World says, that in at least ten churches of Oxford are the teachings of Newman and Pusey set forth with their most bewitching accessories. Two of these churches are within sight of the "Martyrs' Memorial," erected in perpetuation of the stand made by the "noble three"—Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, and within these churches are taught the very doctrines for which the Reformers yielded up their lives.

The Church Congress was opened in Dublin, on Tuesday, with a sermon by the Dean of Cork. We must reserve our notice of the proceedings till next week, when they will have been brought to a close.

The Times describes Mr. Alderman Lawrence, just elected Lord Mayor of London, as "a man of business, of discriminating judgment, and good sense," and we may add, a true and consistent Unitarian Christian.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Saturday Review wonders who are the persons for whose satisfaction the Irish Commission report is intended. Even if every one of its recommendations were adopted, the Roman Catholic grievance against the Establishment would be neither removed nor modified. The Irish Roman Catholic objects to the Church Establishment either because it is Protestant, or because it is English, or because it is the Church of the minority, or because it is the Church of the rich. Whether these grounds are good or bad, they will be altogether unaffected by any re-arrangement of incumbents' incomes. Again, an Irish Protestant will be a more extraordinary creation than one takes him for, if his zeal for the Establishment is quickened by its becoming the subject of a number of sweeping alterations for which none of its members have ever expressed the faintest wish. The parishes which cannot muster the requisite forty will have no particular cause to love the Commissioners; and though their neighbours in the adjoining parish may derive a momentary pleasure from the thought of seeing their church fuller, their enthusiasm will soon be damped by the discovery that, in the case of a church ten miles off, the enchantment lent by distance is rarely tested by a nearer approach. As to the clergy, the Bishops would have more work and less pay; the incumbents of well-endowed parishes with a Church population under 100 would have more work and less pay; the incumbents of well-endowed parishes with a Church population above 100 would have more work and the same pay. We arrive, then, by a process of exhaustion, at the incumbents of ill-endowed parishes; and here, it may be admitted, we have at last reached bottom. Unless human nature in Ireland is very different from human nature elsewhere, a clergyman with less than £300 a year would derive a solid satisfaction from seeing his income made up to that modest figure by the suppression of some of his brethren and the taxation of others. Whether, if Parliament undertakes to legislate about the Irish Church, it will be worth its while to do so in the interest, not of the Irish people, but of poor Irish incumbents, is a question which the Government will probably answer one way and the House of Commons another.

The Spectator remarks that the Commission have tried to patch up the outworks of the Irish Church by recommending a hasty removal of the most flagrant abuses, and they are so far behind their party as not yet to know that these abuses have been elevated into the glories of the system. When Rip van Winkle came back from his long sleep, he thought to ingratiate himself with the strange people in his village by a profession of loyalty to the King, not knowing that the royal head on the signboard had given place to that of General Washington. The Commissioners have also to learn much on their return from inquiry to active life, and if there be any truth in the rumours of Mr. Disraeli's flank movement, the report itself may be still more behind the age than its one practical recommendation, and its labours will be thrown away upon the Government as well as upon the Opposition.

On the report of the Marquis of Bute's conversion to the Romish Church, afterwards contradicted, the Westminster Gazette says:

"Anglicanism, with its inconsistencies and contradictions, even in its most Catholic development, is unable to satisfy the yearnings of earnest minds after truth; in vain Dr. Pusey strives, by a singular stretch of personal authority, to stem the tide. His 'Eirenicon,' which was written with this intent, has been a signal failure. Ritualism, with its high aspirations and ardent but delusive hopes for corporate reunion with Rome, is only educating men for the Catholic Church. The Church is patient; she waits and watches, and prays, and her reward is to see almost day by day stray sheep, known or unknown, return from strange pastures to the one fold of the one Shepherd."

"H. Marriott, member of the E. C. U.," writes from Leeds to the Guardian to ask, "what authority we have for the title given to the Blessed Virgin in a hymn that was sung recently at All Saints, Lambeth, in which 'the Mother of God was addressed as 'Queen of Earth and Heaven?'" He says:

"Jesus is King of Heaven, being God. But how can the Blessed Virgin have a similar title? It may sound very pretty in poetry. But that title involves more, and requires from us more assent as to the status of the Blessed Virgin (Mother of God though she is), than as Christians and Catholics also, we may give."

The Rev. E. L. Blenkinsopp, likewise M. E. C. U., wants to know "where the Church of England forbids the cultus of the Virgin Mary? For his part, he has carefully looked through the Prayer-book, Canticles, and Homilies, and has failed to find it."

The English Independent says:

"S. G. O.'s assertion that the Church of England is de facto disestablished may be but a paradox, and Dr. Vaughan's prophecy of immediate disestablishment may be premature; but that the days of Establishments in Great Britain are numbered nobody now doubts. No party of the Anglican Church can be found to affirm that the union of Church and State in this country is destined to be of long continuance. The High Church party have ceased to wish for it, the Broad Churchmen desire it for the sake of securing a safe place in which to teach doctrines which the Evangelical party—who also desire it for the lowest of all reasons—heavily detest. How many years ago is it since the State Church seemed the strongest and most securely rooted of all English institutions? Or how many months? It has indeed not been difficult to foretell that if the development of High Church principles were not arrested some great rupture must take place, or the State would be compelled to cast loose a Church which, professing to be Protestant, was really anti-Protestant; and the Pall Mall Gazette is right in ascribing the loss of confidence which the Church has suffered to 'the progressive divergence of the clergy from the laity.' But that is not the whole account of the matter. For the last thirty or forty years the people of England have been gradually receiving into their hearts the great idea of religious equality. They have listened to the complaints and to the teachings of Nonconformists; their sentiment of justice has compelled them to concede the principle of equality in a hundred practical ways, and now they are beginning to perceive that a State Church is by name and nature incompatible with the doctrine whose grandeur is dawning on their minds. Thus it is that the disestablishment of the Irish Church, having been taken in hand as a thing to be done, and done at once, it is universally accepted as the precursor of disestablishment in Scotland, and in England also."

A correspondent of the Daily News gives the following account of a sermon which he heard the other day not 100 miles from Oxford:

"The reverend gentleman took as his text, 'Can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the spirit of God is?' (Gen. xli. 38). The application tacked to this text by the nineteenth century Sacheverell was exceedingly sharp. Though there might now-a-days be those who 'knew not Joseph,' 'the man whose eyes were opened' could see him in 'little Benjamin, our ruler.' In our Premier we had 'a man in whom the spirit of God is,' and it was the duty of the electors of the preacher's parish to vote for Mr. —, as one who would support the man sent to us by Providence, like the patriarch Joseph of old, as a deliverer in a critical time. Whether the discourse fell on dull ears or on empty benches, certain it is that the parish is one of those in which the Liberal candidate, his horses taken from the carriage, has been drawn in proleptic triumph, anticipating the future churning. In short, the parishioners of this sharp Sacheverell are NOT FOR JOSEPH."

Reviewing some letters on Church and State, by Professor Maurice, which it has published, the Daily News says that, so far as it understands, it is to an eventual restoration of unity of belief that he looks for deliverance from all the perplexities which now beset the question of Church and State. In his closing letter he dwells with great earnestness and eloquence on the mischiefs of sectarianism. He points out, truly enough, that "the efforts to redress the evil which are made on the first discovery of it are often rash as well as feeble." He believes that in the creation of a common faith each English sect "is entrusted with a special trust, not apprehended with the same distinctness by others." With the theological aspect of this view of the religious future of England the News is not concerned, but upon its bearing on the question of Church and State it has one word to say. Professor Maurice believes that the position the Church of England enjoys is one "with which it ought not to part"—one "which, used aright, may enable it to denounce its own sectarianism, and to assist all sects in escaping from theirs." As used at present, this position seems chiefly valued because it enables two or three sects to co-exist in the same establishment. But, apart from this, does it not occur to Professor Maurice that the non-established sects may be disposed to ask—"If we are each 'entrusted with a special trust, not apprehended with the same distinctness by others,' why should one of us receive honours and emoluments for exercising this trust which are denied to his co-trustees? They do not put this question now, because, after the English fashion, they acquiesce in an Established Church, as in other established facts, without troubling themselves with perilous defences of that which is strong in old custom and good works."

We had no idea how sad the consequences of "reading" sermons were, till we had our eyes opened by a correspondent of the Methodist Times. He thus writes:

"Dr. Pusey is not the only enemy to the spread of vital godliness; there are Methodist preachers who wield, in a limited sphere, an influence as detrimental to it as his. Reading their sermons is but 'the outward and visible sign' of a want of earnest piety; which want is manifested in other ways. The men who read their sermons cannot be expected to be pastors of the flock, or examples of zealous devotion to the cause by which they live; and they are as certainly promoting a spirit of Laodicean lukewarmness, as the Ritualists one of mere formality and Pharisaic display. The Church is really in danger, not merely 'the Church of England, but the Church as it exists amongst Methodists, if reading sermons becomes 'the order of the day.'"

"An Irish Lay Patron" has published a pamphlet, in which he urges on the Irish clergy and laity an immediate consideration of the question of "reconstruction." It is unwise, he thinks, to continue the struggle. They may dam back the flood, but it will burst upon us with accumulated force. "Now it is in our power, by confessing to ourselves that the flood is inevitable, and allowing it to flow, in a great measure to guide its course, and so save much from ruin." The present is the opportunity for an honourable capitulation. "The present is the moment at which we are more likely than at any other to get good terms. There are many considerations which would now induce Mr. Gladstone and his party to give us very liberal terms, if we agree to take them peaceably." Supposing the Irish Church could be perfectly successful in resisting Mr. Gladstone, and that not he, but Mr. Disraeli, has to decide its future, the prospect appears gloomy in the extreme. "Four more bishoprics to be cut off at once; the income of all the rest, save one, to be largely reduced; other reductions, parings, and clippings!—mere sops to Cerberus, which, having devoured, he will turn again and rend us; a State Church starved by its friends, and none the less hated by its foes." "Let us a thousand times have total disestablishment and disendowment." Among the principles of reconstruction which the "Lay Patron" suggests, one is that "nothing should be accepted from the State as a gift." The onus probandi as to whether any portion of Church funds arises from private benefactions, or is public property, and therefore alienable, "should be in every case thrown upon the spoilers." The sum to be given to the clergy in commutation of their life estate "should be handed in a bulk to the Church," the Church engaging to pay the existing incumbents. The Church should have power to select investments for the money so handed to her; also to commute, with consent of incumbent, any life estate for a bulk sum; further, to elect its own governing body, to maintain glebes at cost of present incumbents, to dispose of glebes or churches, and to convey away advowsons of livings in perpetuity or otherwise. To the Church as a body the writer believes the advantages of such a settlement would be incalculable. It would receive about £8,000,000 as a basis of reconstruction and a nucleus for bequests and systematic voluntary contributions. The lay patrons should, he adds, restore to the Church the compensation they would receive, which they could not convert to their own use, and the rulers of the Church would, in return, "see the justice of returning to them their patronage."

"A Layman" writes to the Times:

"If I mistake not, the people of this country, who, after all, are the lifeblood and strength of the Church, are becoming awake to the inconsistency of the ministers of the Church being divided into High, Low, and Broad Church parties; are daily coming to the conclusion that if the clergy cannot agree among themselves upon the meaning and intent of the Church's Articles, they must take the decision of the matter into their own hands, even if the result of doing so should be the disestablishment of the Church and the curtailment of the privilege of her ministers. I trust that the day when such an event will occur is far distant; but I cannot conceal from myself the fact that, unless the practices and constitution of the Church are brought more in accordance with the teaching of the Bible, and less reliance placed upon the traditions and practices of a bygone and superstitious age, that day is much nearer to our doors than we are inclined to admit."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XXIII.

SUBJECT: God's love and care for the Hebrew nation is made use of by their writers to draw them to virtue.

Read Exodus xix. 1-8. Jehovah is said to have borne the nation upon eagles' wings to carry them out of Egypt and to bring them to Himself. If they obey His voice and keep His covenant, then shall they be a peculiar treasure to Him above other peoples.

Deuteronomy, vii., contains the same thoughts more at length. Jehovah did not set His love upon you, nor choose you because ye were more in number than any other people; but because He loved you and would keep the oath He had sworn to your fathers did He do all this. And the Jews on their part are to keep His commandments, and to abhor and to detest idolatry.

The Prophets, who write from the midst of their national troubles, set forth the love of God with yet greater tenderness, and urge more pressing a return from all evil conduct. Read Jeremiah xxxi. 3-20. "Jehovah appeared from afar to me, saying, 'I have loved thee with an everlasting love.' He addresses the nation under the name of Virgin of Israel—"Thou shalt yet again be adorned with timbrels and dances and the planting of vines." Point out that this passage was written after both halves of the nation had been carried into captivity; the people are to return home both to Samaria and to Zion or Jerusalem. In verse 15, Jehovah calls the nation by the name of Rachel, comforts her for the loss of her children, and tells her to cease from weeping for they shall come back. Again, under the name of Ephraim, the nation is spoken of as repenting after punishment: "He is a valued son, a beloved child. As often as I speak against him, I do earnestly remember him still."

Read Zeph. iii. 14-20, where, after foretelling a better time to the nation, the Prophet breaks forth: "Sing, O daughter of Zion; be glad and rejoice with all thy heart, O daughter of Jerusalem. Jehovah, thy God, in the midst of thee is mighty. He will save, He will rejoice over thee with joy, He will pardon in His love, He will joy over thee with singing."

SCOTTISH LIGHTS ON THE IRISH CHURCH. (From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

WHEN it is possible to interpret an opponent's words either in a way that makes him talk sense or in a way that makes him talk nonsense, it is wisest, in the interests of serious controversy, to take the former course. Mr. Gleig, it seems, is not of this opinion. He thinks it worth while to challenge Mr. Gladstone to prove that "either at this moment or at any former period, Scotland is or has been without her endowed and Established Church." If Mr. Gladstone is unable to prove this—as his challenger is comfortably and correctly convinced he will be—then Mr. Gleig assumes that the whole argument from the example of Scotland falls to the ground. The chaplain-general is probably far too satisfied with his decisive victory over a straw antagonist to listen to our assurance that, for the purposes for which it is invoked by Liberal reasoners, this argument is quite unaffected by his historical platitudes. First of all, it is used negatively. The Scottish nation would not endure a branch of the Anglican Church as the established religion of their country; why should the Irish nation be expected to be more patient of the same experiment? Secondly, it is used by way of answer to the plea that, if the established religion ought to be the religion of the majority, the majority of the three kingdoms is meant, not the majority in any one of them. This theory is at once disposed of by the instance of Scotland. Thirdly, it is used to overthrow the assertion that a union between the kingdoms of Ireland and England implies a union between their Established Churches, since the want of an ecclesiastical union between Scotland and England proves conclusively that a political union may exist in the absence of any such condition. Can Mr. Gleig deny that in these three respects the experience of Scotland does supply very appropriate matter for Liberal speeches? If he cannot deny it, he may perhaps, by a little reflection, find out for himself how it is that Liberal statesmen "undertake to justify their proposed policy in Ireland by referring to what was done in Scotland 200 years ago."

Of course, Mr. Gleig has a perfect right to contend that the true policy in the matter would be to make the parallel between Scotland and Ireland complete by setting aside "the Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland, because the Irish people are impatient of its establishment," and taking "the Church of Rome into alliance with the State, because it is the Church of the people." At least, as he promises to discuss at some future time "how all this is to be brought about consistently with the Protestant constitution of these realms," we suppose he would contend that this is the true policy in the matter. Whether it is so, seems to us almost as unimportant as whether Mr. Gleig thinks so. There are few things more remarkable than the inability of some politicians, as well as Liberals as Conservatives, to take this fact in. No man is bound to attempt impossibilities; and one would have thought that every man, from Lord Grey down to Mr. Gleig, must have seen by this time that the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, in every one of the forms in which it is proposed, is an impossibility. Let us consider for a moment what such a proposal must involve. If it were done in the way which Mr. Gleig seems to contemplate, it would amount to a transfer of the whole endowments of the Anglican Church in Ireland to the Roman Catholic Church. On a given Sunday, Archbishop-Trench would appear for the last time at St. Patrick's, and on the following Sunday, if the requisite ritual changes could be made in the time, Cardinal Cullen would sing high mass there. A similar substitution would take place in every cathedral and parish church in Ireland, and thus the Roman Catholics would be satisfied, while the principle of a State Church would be maintained. We had thought of mentioning a few reasons why this transaction would not be likely to command the assent either of the Parliament or the people of England; but, now that we have described it, there really seems no need to do so. If Mr. Gleig differs from us on this point, we advise him to take counsel with some congenial member of the House of Commons, and by his assistance to introduce a bill to this effect next session.

The milder forms of the same prescription are probably not drastic enough for Mr. Gleig, but as they have their advocates here and there we may as well say a word or two on each. The first is the "levelling up" scheme, which proposes to leave the endowments of the Irish Church in the hands of their present owners, and to endow the Roman Catholic Church from the general funds of the State. With respect to this proposal, the essential thing to observe is that, if such an endowment is to be effectual for the purpose of conciliating Roman Catholic sentiment, and thereby pacifying Ireland, it must be strictly proportionate to the numerical strength of the respective communions. It would be a simple insult to the Roman Catholic clergy to say, We intend to pay you in common with the Anglican clergy, but we shall only give you half, or a quarter, or an eighth of the sum we give them. As, therefore, with a population a little under 700,000, the Anglican Church in Ireland enjoys an income of £581,000, we should have to provide for the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, with a population of about 4,500,000, an income of something like £3,725,000. This would be about equivalent to a permanent additional income tax of 3d. in the pound. Any rational advocate of the scheme must, consequently, be prepared to explain by what means he proposes to make this feature in the annual budget palatable to a Protestant public with a keen regard to economy. The second of the milder forms to which we referred is free from many of the difficulties which beset the two former. To divide the existing ecclesiastical revenues of Ireland proportionately among the several communions to which Irishmen belong would involve no cost to the State, and would be decidedly less irritating to Protestant susceptibilities. We suspect that, even in this diluted state, it would be found far too irritating to have any chance of acceptance; but this consideration need not be insisted on, since there is a special obstacle to the adoption of this proposal which is of itself quite fatal to it. A division of ecclesiastical property is the one kind of endowment to which the Roman Catholic Church is on principle opposed. In Ireland she may have reasons for disliking the other forms also, but this particular form she would reject anywhere. She will endure to be deprived of all that she thinks her own, and to accept pay from the State that has robbed her in return for the services she renders it; but she will not endure to take a part of what she thinks her own, while another part is given to heretics. This may seem to some a meaningless distinction, but it is not so to the Roman Catholic hierarchy. Where the property of the Church has all disappeared, as in France, the clergy have no scruple about accepting a stipend from the State, since to do so does not, in their judgment, commit them to any condonation of the original sacrilege. But where the property of the Church still exists, only in the hands of a rival religious body, to be a consenting party to any proportionate redistribution of it by the State would, they think, imply assent to the principle that what has once belonged to the Church can legitimately be taken from her. The application of this principle would be too inconvenient in Italy for the Roman authorities to allow its recognition in Ireland, whatever local advantages might attend such a course.

AMERICAN NOTES.

Recent statistics give rather a startling view of the progress of Romanism in the States. It is said that in 1800 there were only one bishop, 100 priests, and 50,000 laymen of this faith; whereas now there are three vicariates, 29 colleges, 45 bishops, 2,317 priests, 49 ecclesiastical institutions, 26 hospitals, 3,795 churches, and 5,000,000 people. The influence, too, which the Catholics possess, at least in New York, seems shown by the amount of the grants made to their institutions. In 1866 these received $124,000, while Protestant and Jewish ones had only $4,000. Last August, by the "City Levy Tax Bill," the Catholics had upwards of $70,000; and they have the grant of a lease of land, at a dollar per annum, which is said to be worth two million dollars.

Dr. Andrew P. Peabody, preacher to Harvard University, and Plummer Professor of Christian Morals, has in the press "Reminiscences of European Travel," which we imagine will be interesting on this side the Atlantic as well as on his own.

Dr. Furness, who has made himself so favourably known by his previous works of a similar kind, is about to publish another book on the life of Jesus, the title of which is "The Unconscious Truth of the Four Gospels."

The American Unitarian Association has just issued the ninth edition of the Rev. W. H. Channing's Memoir of his Uncle, which, through his liberality in allowing the use of the plates perfectly free, can be had at so low a price as to bring it within the reach of nearly all.

The Philadelphia Universe, the oldest Roman Catholic paper in America, in giving an account of the baptism of Thaddeus Stevens, just before his death, by Sisters of Charity, makes salvation so easy a matter that one can't see the slightest reason for that "fear and trembling" of which the Apostle speaks. It says:

"The deceased himself gave full consent to this baptism. He died in a few minutes after the sacrament. Had he during his long life any predilections for the Catholic faith? Be that as it may, he died a son of Pius IX., and as baptism expunges all sins which are on the soul before its administration, his salvation is certain. God rest his soul."

The sermon question seems to be exciting interest in America as well as here. In an article on "Our Preachers," the New York Times says:

"The great fault in the preaching of the day is its lack of applicability to the everyday interests of humanity. Christianity is truly the great organ of human progress; but, still how true it is that this progress mainly goes on over the heads of our preachers and, we may add, even in spite of their preaching. The pulpit does not rise to the sublime height of the great argument of Christianity. Sermons are, in the majority of cases, vague and meaningless—mere talk without effect. They, to a great degree, refuse to concern themselves with the vital questions which vex the earthly pilgrimage of mortals, while they indulge in meaningless prating about the conversion of souls, the joys of Heaven, or the terrors of hell. The efforts of clergymen to intensify and perpetuate sectional animosities, instead of preaching universal Christian charity, is the principal obstacle in the way of the union of all Christian organisations in a common brotherhood. This is the rule, though, fortunately, there are noble exceptions. And how few are the clergymen, who, rejecting platitudes, rejecting also mere poetic sentiment, factitious eloquence, and naked theological notions, bring the Gospel of Christ to bear directly upon the real needs of their congregations! The help which should come to the sorely tempted does not come. The instruction which ought to be given to parents as to the training of their children is not given. No influence is brought to bear against the crying evils of society."

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1868.

SYMBOLISM.

THE most striking peculiarity of the Church of England of the present day is the rapid increase of the pomp of its religious services. Compared with the slovenliness which characterised it a quarter of a century since, the change is certainly a pleasing one. Rare is it now to see the dilapidated country church, or the dark and unwholesome city one, in which the service used to be shuffled through as rapidly as possible, and the parson, the clerk, and the people seemed equally anxious to get to the end. That day is gone by, and there is no doubt that such earnestness as can be made known by outward and visible signs is plainly manifest in the vast majority of our churches, whether in town or in the country. Nor is this earnestness confined to the mere ceremonial of worship; the clergymen seem once more to recognise the fact that they have "the cure of souls" delivered unto them, and to manifest the sincerity of their convictions by their good works in their various parishes. This we believe is especially true of those clergymen who have adopted ritualistic practices, and who, by the variety and eccentricity of their performances, are alternately astonishing and scandalising their more sober brethren. Great fun has been made of the so-called "pig's-head festival" at Haydock; but here it seems to us that the Ritualists have much the best of the argument. If a pig-butcher feels grateful for his success, why should he not present his pig's head as well as the gardner his flowers, or the farmer his corn? Æsthetically, it is rather ludicrous, but surely as a religious act it is equally as praiseworthy and acceptable as the more elegant thank-offerings.

The very fact of such a ceremonial as the Haydock festival having taken place in an English Church ought to convince us that the mere day of Church millinery among the ritualists has past. It is with them no longer a matter of good taste as to what shall, and what shall not be done, they are upheld by a sense of duty which makes them ridicule proof. They have a theory to uphold, and whatever is necessary to the full developement of that theory, will be carried out in spite of the sneers of the many and the violence of the few. That which the eye sees, and the ear hears in these ritualistic services, is but one-half, and that the smaller one, of what is meant. They are, heart and soul, devout symbolists, and as such are steadily and perseveringly introducing their symbolism on all possible occasions. Now, symbolism is in itself so natural, so innocent, almost we think so inevitable, that it is at first sight difficult to say where praise should end and censure begin. In the most meagre form of our dissenting worship there is still symbolism at the very root of what ceremonial we have. What is the Lord's Supper but a symbol of the headship of CHRIST and the brotherly union of Christians? This is its most meagre interpretation; without which it would be absolutely unmeaning. Is not the marriage ring a symbol, the christening of the child, the baptism of the adult, the kneeling or standing in public prayer, and the bowing of the head in times of sorrow or repentance? These are but a few of the simplest symbols without which, or something of a similar character, it is difficult to conceive how a religious service could be conducted. There can be little dispute that appropriate symbolism is a very strong aid in arousing, no less than in gratifying, our religious emotions, and we have the authority of our great teacher for its use. He not only instituted the Lord's Supper as an undying memorial of himself, but he commanded his disciples to go forth and baptise all nations, and even submitted to the ceremony himself. On the other hand, he bitterly reproached the Jews with having shut up the door of the Church of God so that no man could enter in; that is, if we understand him aright, they made the practise of religion so difficult by their elaborate symbolism and ceremonial, that men's minds were turned away from the real essence of a religious faith, and led into the practise of forms, to them void of spiritual significance, as truly efficacious for salvation. Herein lies the great and ever present danger of symbolic worship;—the substitution of the sign for the reality; the misplaced confidence in the outward ceremonial, instead of the well-grounded assurance of a real unity of spirit with God and CHRIST.

Not on this account, however, is symbolism to be condemned; the abuse is no argument against the use. But let us turn from the simplicity and directness of the symbolism of the New Testament to that of the Roman ceremonial which the Ritualists are introducing, and we are at once conscious that whilst the one is a healthy and natural expression of piety, the other is the result of a diseased imagination. Compare the simplicity of CHRIST sitting down with his disciples and blessing the bread and wine, and telling them that they were the symbols of the faith which he taught, with the elaborate ceremonial of the Eucharist, in which the wine and the water must be carefully mixed to represent the two natures of CHRIST, and the bread, which must be made only of flour and water and salt, and in the form of a wafer, and stamped with a cross to signify his passion and resurrection. Then mark the solemn benediction by which these simple elements are turned into the very body and blood of CHRIST, and are elevated for the worship of the people. Surely this is symbolism of a very different character from what our SAVIOUR either practised or sanctioned; and when we see that this same fondness of detail is carried into all the offices of religion, so that the very colour of the celebrant's robes, and the shape of the cross which he carries, are none of them without their official significance, it seems that these are much more like the practices which our LORD condemned in the Jews than those which he enjoined on his disciples. They, too, wore gorgeous robes, used elaborate ceremonial, and paid tithe of all that they had, and yet they shut the door of the church against mankind.

Not yet, we freely admit, is this the case with the English Ritualists; they are still in the very fervour of their early discipleship, and are under the influence of a strong reaction against the coldness and meagreness of their earlier habits. Unless, however, the history of all ages shall be falsified by their experience, they will find that their excessive, though romantic, attachment to symbolism will lead them back to the rigid formalism of the Roman Church. Unity of doctrine and of practise will be found essential to the completion of their idea of a symbolic church; this unity necessitates an authority whom all must obey, and irresponsible authority is the death-blow to that spiritual life in which they now glory, for it is chiefly the very defiance of established authority that gives them the vitality they possess. It is sad to behold so much earnestness and piety expended in so hopeless a cause, to see those who are now so earnest in opening the door, preparing at the same time the bolts that are to fasten it up again. Let those who are interested in these matters watch the growth and the significance of English symbolism, let them note how little by little the Eucharistic doctrine and the priestly function are growing in public estimation, and we think they will admit that the disease needs other treatment than sneering articles on pigs' heads, or jocular ones on church millinery. Those who believe that simple, honest, religious faith is the crown of a good man's life, and the safeguard of a nation's honour, must see with sorrow the reintroduction of this ancient priestcraft, and must hope, almost against hope, that the Church of England will yet find some means to counteract the well meant, but most baneful activity of the Ritualistic clergy.

AN OUTLINE OF THE HISTORY OF MODERN THEOLOGY.—PART IV.

NEANDER was the next great champion who picked up the gauntlet flung down by Strauss. But whatever we may think of the intrinsic worth of his "Leben Jesu," as a polemical work it certainly was a failure. In the very first step he "begged the question" by assuming the supernatural birth of Jesus. Now, said he, when a person is thus born in a wonderful manner, totally outside the known course of things, it is but natural to expect that his actions should be attended by wonderful effects, as one miracle necessarily introduces another, because miracles are not to be regarded as merely isolated occurrences, but as members of a great whole—the entrance of higher powers into humanity. This unfortunate "petitio principii" has spoiled the work of one of the holiest and most estimable men in the whole circle of modern divines. However, as if to make up for the unwarranted assumption, Neander concedes almost everything contended for by the old Rationalists. For instance, the wonderful occurrences said to have taken place at the baptism of Jesus, he admitted, had no objective reality, but were merely a vision of the Baptist's. The story of the temptation is true, but not real history; the substance of it is fact, but the form is symbolical. The turning of water into wine at the marriage in Cana was not a real matter of fact—changing of one substance into another, but merely an impartation of the power of wine to the water. In the accounts of raising the dead it is not shown that real death had taken place; perhaps the persons were only in a state of syncope. The possessed of the devils were peoplesuffering from derangement or epilepsy; and though our Lord addressed them as if they really had devils in them, that was merely an accommodation of language to the popular mind. Thus, by the rational, mythical, and supernatural methods of interpreting the sacred history, Neander reduces the amount of miracle to the smallest possible quantity.

Out of the same school came the mild, gentle, elegantly-minded Ullmann, and in the "Sünden und Kritiken," for the year 1836, published the most thorough critique of Strauss's work that has ever appeared. "There can be no question," said Ullmann, "that many things in the Gospel history are mixed up with popular legends, whilst others are of a purely symbolical character; still, it does not follow that the whole thing is a myth—a dilemma in which Strauss would willingly involve us. But the real dilemma is, either Christ produced the church, or the church produced Christ; the latter supposition is contrary to the whole analogy of history, the former, therefore, must be true." "No," replied Strauss, "the one does not exclude the other, both have had their mutual influence; Jesus originated the early church, and the early church robed him with its Messianic ideas." And thus "the transient and permanent," the matter and form, have come down to us so welded together that it is now almost impossible to separate them. Strauss, in the conclusion of his "Leben Jesu," had maintained that the Divine Idea could not be fully realised in an individual, but only in the race. Ullmann, however, reminded him that in every department of spiritual life great geniuses, from time to time, appeared; and that in every science and art there is generally one pre-eminent above the rest—a man who stands alone, towering over all others in the solitary grandeur of his creative powers, such as Homer, Sophocles, Shakspeare, and Handel. And so analogy would lead us to expect that, in the sphere of religion, a great genius should sometime or other appear—a man in whom all the elements of true religion would focitate, whose appearance would make an epoch in history, ending an old age and beginning a new. Strauss confessed his willingness to admit this view of the person of Christ, and to acknowledge him as the founder of the absolute religion—the greatest religious genius the world had ever seen, and beyond whom it was impossible to go.

The vast number of books, pamphlets, and reviews that followed in the wake of Neander and Ullmann are noteworthy, as indicating the extent to which Strauss had troubled the waters. But the most important result of the whole controversy was the critical spirit that it helped to evolve. Every one admitted that the whole thing turned upon the genuineness and authenticity of the Gospels. If the histories were not written by eye-witnesses, or by companions of eye-witnesses, but by men who lived a hundred years after the events recorded, there can be no security against the supposition that legends have been mixed up with historical facts. The three first Gospels had undergone a pretty good sifting in the hands of Schleiermacher and his school; but the fourth remained, comparatively intact. At all events, the proofs of its unguineness were not sufficient to overthrow the internal evidence on which the orthodox opinion mainly rested. Bretschneider had adduced some strong arguments against its genuineness, but it remained for Ferdinand Christian Baur, professor of theology in the University of Tübingen, to re-investigate the whole question, with an acuteness of criticism, a depth of learning, and a philosophic power of thought altogether unequalled in the whole region of biblical science. Schleiermacher had admitted that if the Apostle John wrote the Apocalypse, he could not have written the Gospel. "Now," said Baur, "there is much more proof of the apostolic origin of the Apocalypse than there is of the genuineness of the Gospel; and since it is admitted that we cannot have both, we must hold the former, and reject the latter as a work of the Apostle John." Towards the end of the second century, there arose a very animated controversy between the Eastern and Western Churches touching the celebration of the Passover. The Orientals, whose principal spokesman was Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, kept the feast on the 14th of the month Nisan; and, as authority for this custom, the Bishop referred to the practice of the Apostle John, "who lay on the breast of the Lord;" to Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna; and to many others, all of whom, "following the example of the Lord, kept the 14th day, according to the Gospel." On the other hand, the Occidentals kept their Passover on the day of the resurrection, maintaining, that as Christ had abrogated the Jewish feast by holding his paschal meal on the 13th of the month, they were at liberty to fix on any day they thought fit. It seems strange that if the Asiatic churches had the fourth Gospel in their hands they should instance John and his disciple Polycarp as keeping the feast on the 14th of the month, when the Gospel of John says that Christ kept it on the 13th of the month. Or if the Western Church had had it in their hands, how came they not to quote it against the Orientals, whose case would then have been no longer defensible. Victor, Bishop of Rome, might thus have replied to his opponents, "You say that John and his followers observed the 14th day, following the example of the Lord, and here is John's own Gospel which says that Christ held his Passover on the 13th day; your tradition must, therefore, be wrong." But since the fourth Gospel was not quoted in this controversy, we must suppose that it was not in existence. Besides, the Logos idea, as set forth in the fourth Gospel, seems to have been unknown to all the Christian Fathers before Tatian. It is true that a Logos doctrine appears in the writings of Clements of Rome, and in the Ignatian Epistles, but it is so very different from that of the Gospel, as to render it almost incredible that those Fathers could have been acquainted with that work. Even Justin Martyr, whose writings are replete with allusions to this doctrine, represents the Son as subordinate to the Father—an opinion not in harmony with the idea of the Logos as set forth in the Gospel. Many reasons of this kind render it highly improbable that the Apostle John was the author of the work that now bears his name. Such were some of the arguments of Baur, set forth with that logical subtlety of which he was the incomparable master. Opponents, however, were not wanting. In the first place, it was shown that the proofs of the genuineness of the Apocalypse were not so conclusive as Baur would represent them. Andreas, who wrote a commentary on the Apocalypse, says that, "touching the inspiration of the book, it is not necessary to be very explicit, as Papias, Irenæus, and others had maintained its inspiration." But he does not quote the passage of Papias in which this subject is alluded to, so that it is impossible to tell what opinion Papias might have had about its authorship. Irenæus, in his work on heresies, has a passage to this effect, "If it had been necessary to make known to the present generation the name of Anti-Christ, this would have been done by him who saw the revelation, which he did almost in the present time—towards the end of the reign of Domitian." Now, if Irenæus had considered the Apostle John as the author of the Apocalypse, it is very unlikely that he would have used the roundabout phrase, "him who saw the revelation;" besides, the Apostle's name would have given great weight to the opinion that Anti-Christ need not be named. But, further, Irenæus was a disciple of Polycarp, the companion of St. John, and, consequently, was likely to be well-informed about all John's writings; and the fact of his asserting that the revelation took place towards the end of Domitian's reign is almost conclusive evidence that John could not have been the author, as the work has all the marks of being written by a young and ardent spirit. It is no doubt true that in the Latin translation of Irenæus's work the words Joannes domini discipulus sometimes occur, but in the Greek passages that refer to the subject no such expression is found. Undoubtedly the Latin translator believed St. John to have been the author, and, in his anxiety to be explicit, put his own words into the mouth of Irenæus. Passages, indeed, in Tertullian and Justin Martyr favour the opinion that the Apocalypse is the work of St. John. But Hieronymus—one of the most learned critics of early times—asserts that the book was not recognised by the Grecian Church. It is a remarkable fact, and one which bears strongly on this controversy, that the Apocalypse—by many of the early Fathers who were in the most favourable position for knowing the opinions of St. John—was attributed to Cerinthus, on account of the Chiliasm contained in it. But all church traditions represent Cerinthus as the great opponent of St. John. How, then, could John have written a work in the very spirit of his great adversary? Cajus, of Rome, who was the first to attribute the work to Cerinthus, has undoubtedly gone too far; for, though the differences between the Gospel and the Apocalypse are so great as to render it almost impossible that the same man could have written both, the arguments are of such a nature as to render it highly probable that these works proceeded from men belonging to the same theological school. We learn from Eusebius and others that there were two Johns—the Apostle, and the Presbyter—both of whom are reported to have lived for some years at Ephesus. Supposing, then, that the Presbyter John wrote the Apocalypse, it is quite conceivable that these two men, bearing the same name and living in the same place, should afterwards be confounded; and thus Justin Martyr and others might have been led into the mistake of attributing the book to the Apostle.

Dean Milman.

YESTERDAY week, at Queen's-hill Lodge, Ascot, the Rev. Henry Hart Milman, D.D., Dean of St. Paul's, after a life of faithful labour, at the ripe age of seventy-eight, entered on his rest. Although for some years he was so bent and bowed that we often wondered how the bodily machinery could continue to work on as it did, he seems to have had but little suffering, and to have retained the full use of his faculties up to the moment when he was struck with paralysis, now a month ago.

After a very successful career at Oxford, he took orders in 1817, and the vicarage of Reading was conferred upon him. Though he acquired some reputation as a preacher, he soon became more widely known as a poet. More than half a century ago he made his appearance in this character, as the author of the tragedy of "Fazio," which soon ran through three editions, and in 1818 was acted at Drury-lane. Writing to a friend at this period, Miss Lucy Aikin but gave the general opinion when she said, "Pray read, when you can meet with it, a tragedy called 'Fazio,' by a very clever young Mr. Milman, whom I once saw at Allerton. [Mr. Roscoe's.] The language is the best imitation of our old dramatists that I have seen; it is brilliant with poetry, and contains fine scenes and situations, though the plot is shocking and improbable. If I mistake not, this is a rising star, destined to blaze far and wide."

The tragedy was followed by an heroic poem in twelve books, entitled "Samor, Lord of the Bright City;" this by the tragedy of "Anne Boleyn;" and that by three sacred dramas, "The Martyr of Antioch (in which the solemn Funeral Anthem is introduced, "Brother thou hast gone before us"), "Belshazzar," and "The Fall of Jerusalem."

In 1821 Mr. Milman was appointed Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford, and held the office, we believe, for ten years.

His chief miscellaneous works were an edition of Horace, with a life of the poet; an annotated edition of Gibbon's great work, of which he was evidently a careful student, not to say imitator, and which he has made in several respects more trustworthy and valuable; and a "Life of Keats." He was also a contributor of various literary articles to the Quarterly Review.

It is, however, as an historian, that he is most likely to be remembered. His "History of the Jews" (first published in 1829) excited no little alarm in orthodox quarters, and the author was assailed with charges somewhat similar to those which the Bishop of Natal has had to bear. In the last edition he has inserted notices of what has been done since in the same field by other writers, and prefixed to it an Introduction, in which there are some fine and spirited thoughts bearing upon the theological questions of the day. His "History of Christianity" (which appeared in 1840) treats of the first three centuries of the Church. If the student may sometimes feel disposed to wish that now and then he had gone a little deeper into some of the subjects which arise during this most interesting period, the work is one which, by its style and treatment, can hardly fail to be acceptable to the general reader. But the Dean's best work, undoubtedly, and that on which his reputation will rest, is his "History of Latin Christianity," the first volume of which was published in 1854, and the remainder a few years later. The Pall Mall Gazette, in a notice of the author's death, seems to us to say no more than the truth when it says, "This may really be regarded as one of the most important and powerful books of the present generation. Its great merit is the union which it presents of profound learning with the most vigorous exercise of the imagination. You feel as you read it not only that you are reading a perfectly authentic book, but that you are learning most of what is really worth knowing about men and thoughts which have long since passed away, though their influence still affects every part of our lives." His chief defect as an historian seems to have been some little want of that penetrative insight which would have enabled him to enter more clearly into the characters of men who deviated from the ordinary type, like St. Louis or Hildebrand, and to appreciate by the power of sympathy their peculiarities of mind, and do justice to that overwrought earnestness which led them into what looks at first view like mere extravagance.

We can bear grateful testimony to his ready kindness on more occasions than one; and though we cannot, with the writer of the notice just referred to, say that we were "honoured by his friendship," we have yet been brought into sufficient acquaintance with him to feel the truth of this, that "there was a charm about his society which it was difficult to analyse or describe. There was something very venerable in his age, and his wonderful store of knowledge on all subjects, but this was relieved in the most delightful manner by the fire, the eagerness, the universal interest in whatever was going on which gave a character to his conversation, and these characteristics again were blended in a very touching way with the most affectionate gentleness and beauty of demeanour."

Though he had no turn for martyrdom, he did not shrink, when occasion called for it, to show his sympathy with opinions decried as heresy, as was proved by his subscribing to the fund for the defence of Dr. Colenso. He never made any distinct avowal of his conclusions on the subject, but there can hardly be a doubt that he was no believer in the Athanasian Trinity, and we have reason to think that his views, like those of Archbishop Whately, were not very different from those of the heretical Sabellius, of which, in his "History of Christianity," he says, "according to his system it was the same Deity, under different forms, who existed in the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; a more modest and unoffending Sabellianism might, perhaps, be imagined in accordance with modern philosophy." He is gone now, we may humbly trust, where such things are no longer seen through a glass darkly, and where "all is well with all that well have done."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE CHILD ANGEL.

Little tongues that clatter, clatter—
Little feet that patter, patter
With a ceaseless motion all the day—
Little eyes that softly lighten—
Little cheeks that flush and brighten—
Little voices singing at their play—
In my memory awaken
Thoughts of one who has been taken—
Of a little heart that beats no more—
Of a little voice that's ringing,
'Mid the angels sweetly singing
Songs of gladness on a distant shore

ST. JANUARIUS.

THE following account of the liquefaction of the blood of San Gennaro on the 19th of last month, furnished by the Naples correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, is a good illustration of the kind of childish and unreasoning superstition which the Church of Rome is ready to foster. For the information of some of our younger readers, we may just mention that, according to tradition, the saint and his companions, in the reign of Diocletian, were exposed to be devoured by lions in the amphitheatre of Puteoli, but the animals prostrated themselves before him and became tame. This converted so many to Christianity that the saint was ordered to be decapitated, and at the monastery of the Solfatara the stone is shown on which he was beheaded, A.D. 305. A woman who was present gathered up some of the blood with a sponge, and, in squeezing it out into a bottle, let a bit of straw fall in too, which was visible to the eyes of the Earl of Perth in the year 1696, but which the correspondent of the Pall Mall does not mention. The blood is preserved in two phials, in a tabernacle behind the high altar of the Cathedral at Naples. The saint has two festivals annually, one in May, the other in September, when the theatres and all places of public amusement are closed.

"At daybreak solicitations began to be sent up to Heaven to perform the wonted miracle; at a few minutes before nine o'clock, the hard dry clot of the saint's blood showed signs of life; and at exactly twenty-five minutes past nine it was as liquid as water. About a quarter of an hour afterwards the usual procession of acolytes, priests, and canons was formed, and the bust of the saint in his episcopal robes, and the sacred vessel containing the blood, were borne up the centre aisle of the cathedral to the high altar; and then there was much worshipping and obeisance and prostrations to the earth, and the holy vessel was presented to each of the canons, priests, and acolytes separately, who examined it closely, and then kissed it with extreme reverence. After it had thus been inspected and adored by those whose sacred calling privileged them to stand round the altar, an aged bishop in his canon's robes, accompanied by an acolyte with a candle, bore it round to the assembled multitude.

"Every opportunity was afforded to show the canons that the blood was really liquid. The round glass, something of the shape of the case of an old-fashioned Geneva watch, contained two phials—one large, the other small; and in each a portion of the blood was turned round several times, while a candle was placed on one side so that the liquid could be seen moving easily. The good bishop, with true Italian politeness, seeing that your correspondent was a foreigner, gave him an excellent view of it, holding it close before his eyes, and turning it round several times; and the only tribute your correspondent had to pay for the courtesy was to kiss it after the manner of the faithful.

"That the two bottles in the round glass vessel contained a darkish red fluid which behaved as all fluids do when they are shaken or turned over there can be no possible doubt; but whether the fluid is the same material as was seen in the same bottles, or in bottles very like them, a short time previously, is a question upon which it would be presumptuous to offer an opinion. One fact is certain. The great majority of the Neapolitans believe that the miracle is genuine, and it will take a long course of instruction in philosophy and natural science to shake their belief. There are doubters, and even in the cathedral itself I heard a controversy upon the subject, in which one man profanely attributed the transformation to some chemical process, and another expressed an opinion that the devil had something to do with it; but a third, who said it was the work of the Deity, had the little audience which were within hearing entirely with him. The mass have a faith which asks no questions. They are curious enough to see that the phials do really contain a liquid; but when satisfied upon that point, the cruel doubts which would be sure to occur to a Saxon—that the bottle might have been changed, or that liquid might have been poured into them—never seem to enter their heads. They believe in their priests, and to suspect sleight of hand would be monstrous. Their curiosity to be convinced of the fact of the fluid's existence detracts considerably from reverence of conduct. To judge by the crushing and crowding and pushing, the audience might have been spectators of a conjuror's show instead of devotees in a consecrated building; and neither the presence of the saint's blood nor the performance of a miracle by Heaven were sufficient to calm those evil emotions of the human heart which contending interests generally evoke. Small boys, in what they might perhaps call clothes, but which answered none of the purposes for which clothing is supposed to be intended, clambered up pillars and rails much as if they were in Trafalgar-square, and were inconspicuously pulled down by the legs by officious sacristans. Finely-dressed ladies would stand upon chairs, and respectable old gentlemen behind them endeavouring to pull them down—generally succeeding; but not before many daggers had been drawn in the bright eyes, and loud and long recriminations had obliged the canon to stop in his course and gently upbraid the disputants. Eventually, most people seemed to get what they wanted; and the behaviour of the ladies in grand toilets, and the cripples in rage, and the children almost without rags, and the soldiers and officers in their uniforms, and the young men with their many-coloured ties and collars, was much the same. All inspected curiously at first, then adored and kissed the vessel twice. At eleven o'clock a procession of priests, canons, and some twenty-five bishops, besides a host of other ecclesiastical officials, formed to conduct His Eminence Cardinal Riario Sforza to his throne, and the performance of high mass followed.

After service the day was a simple holiday. The Government of Victor Emmanuel does not come forward, like the paternal Government of the good old days, to assist the church in her festivities. There are no marchings of soldiers, or grand reviews, or large displays of fireworks, or universal illuminations. Here and there a few coloured lamps were set up in the poorest houses in honour of the patron saint of the city, but such instances were comparatively rare. Eager though the inhabitants be to see the blood of St. Januarius, and to kiss the vessel containing it, they do not seem disposed to sacrifice much oil in his honour. It is very doubtful whether the kissing would be so popular if it had to be paid for. As it is, it is gratis; and if all the Church wants is implicit faith in her children, she ought to be satisfied. For the next seven days the blood both here and at Pozzuoli [the ancient Putcoli]—where it liquefies at exactly the same moment as here—will be shown to the faithful, and then it will congeal again till the 16th of December [May?], when the prayers of the faithful will again appeal to Heaven to liquify it."

EARTHQUAKES.

At an agricultural meeting in Hampshire, apropos to the recent calamity in Peru, the Earl of Carnarvon gave some interesting particulars respecting earthquakes generally, from which we take the following:

"We have an idea in England generally that a volcano is a solitary peak standing upon a flat plain, very much like the volcano of Vesuvius; but in Peru, and in all that part of the world, though no doubt there are some volcanoes which stand almost on a higher level than anything else in the world, at the top of gigantic mountains, there are some others much lower, and not assuming the form of peaks. Some of them run in a bell-shaped form, some appear like domes, and some look like mere undulations of the land. From these the lava breaks, sometimes from the side and sometimes from the top. The action of a volcano is very curious. The symptoms of it are very difficult to distinguish. They tell us there is sometimes a disturbance to be traced in the atmosphere, and there is a belief current in these countries that swine, which have the most delicate power of scent of almost any animal, sometimes detect the coming storm, and also that the wells run dry. The reason assigned for the latter circumstance is that there are a great number of vents from the upper to the lower part of the surface of the earth, through which the volcanic action exhibits itself and the gases find an escape, the result being that the wells grow dry. But then comes at last the real action of the volcano itself; and those who have examined most into this question will tell you that, though the volcano of one country differs very materially in its action from that in another, still the rule observed is this: first of all there comes out cloud and vapour, then half molten rock, then a flood of lava, and finally a cloud of ashes, rising to such an enormous height in the air that it has been known to have been carried 1,000 miles. But it is not merely the volcano itself with which man has to contend. The sea suddenly rises, and comes in on the shore in some gigantic wave, sweeping everything and every person before it. That was the case in the famous earthquake of Lisbon, when a wave 60ft. high broke on the shore, sweeping away 3,000 human beings who had collected on the quay, burying them 500ft. or 600ft. in the sea, where never one soul of them was heard of or seen again. After this comes the most terrible phase of all, because then the action of the earthquake itself begins, and philosophers have distinguished that action in various ways. They have divided it into a horizontal motion, which they say is a very terrible one to endure, and an upward motion, by which sometimes the roofs of the houses have been torn up and thrown upwards, and even men have been cast high up in the air; and lastly the motion, which is a combination of the two—a twisting motion, by which the most horrible effects are produced, and which is in all its forms the most dangerous to undergo. Humboldt mentions, in his travels in one of the towns close to where an earthquake had recently occurred, that this twisting motion was carried on to such an extent that the lower storey of one house was shunted, so to speak, into the lower storey of the house of the next neighbour, the furniture of one house was carried into the next, and property was lifted and carried away such enormous distances that troublesome lawsuits occupied the attention of the courts for some time afterwards. A friend of mine travelling in that country was overtaken on the top of one of the mountains by one of these frightful earthquakes; and as he stood on the ridge of the mountain looking down upon the city where he was to find quarters for the night, he saw that very city and every human soul in it engulfed in a pit before his eyes. There is a case known as a matter of history which occurred in this country, rather north of the district in which these volcanic disturbances have recently taken place, which is horrible as well as picturesque in its details. There was a property belonging to a Spanish gentleman—a property on which nature had exhausted all her gifts, through which two noble rivers flowed, spreading fertility, happiness, and comfort on every side. One night the inhabitants went to bed in the perfect belief that this smiling country would appear to them the next morning as they had seen it the last thing that night. They were disturbed by a sudden shock; they fled for their lives to the adjacent hills; and there, through the darkness of the night, lit up by ghastly flames shooting up from the earth on all sides, they saw the earth upheaving itself some 500ft. or 600ft. high, and they saw the whole of that lovely and fertile district absolutely destroyed. The next morning that which had been like a garden of Eden the night before had become an absolute wilderness, and in the centre of it stood a lofty flaming volcano, which from that day to this has borne the name of the owner of the estate, the only thing he could bequeath to his children. These things sober us, and must sober any people, however distant from the scene of such horrors. The wonder is that men can be found to live on in the midst of them, to build cities, and plant vineyards, and feast and rejoice over these hidden fires, which have destroyed their forefathers, and probably in their turn will destroy them and their children. Yet it is so, and to a certain extent nature justifies this seeming recklessness. Nature, profuse and bountiful, festoons with flowers to-morrow the ruins which she has made to-day; and more than that, these very disturbances—this very volcanic action in itself is not the irregular agent which we sometimes suppose it. On the contrary, nature uses these disturbances for the reproduction of the world's crust, and for the general benefit of the globe in which we live, and in which all our comfort and happiness are centred. For just as the rivers and seas and rains are perpetually washing away the surface of this habitable globe—so that, if there were no means of repairing that waste in a comparatively short time, we should see much of it absolutely disappear—the volcanic action, on the other hand, is upheaving great tracts of land, reproducing that which has been destroyed, and repairing that which has been wasted."

MIDLAND CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE sixth general meeting was held at Evesham on Tuesday week. Among those present were Revs. H. E. Dowson, Gee Cross; J. Gordon and J. Colston, Evesham; D. Maginias, Stourbridge; H. McKean, Oldbury; R. H. Cotton, Birmingham; Messrs. H. New, A. Martin, S. Bayliss, A. New, T. New, C. Coles, H. Martin, and W. Smith, Evesham; Messrs. S. B. Whitfield, J. Coppock, J. R. Mott, F. Grew, H. Payton, R. D. Kneebone, W. Clarke, C. Wilks, Birmingham; Messrs. E. F. Johnston, B. Lett, and James Herbert, Worcester.

Public worship commenced at half-past eleven, the Rev. R. H. COTTON conducting the introductory service. The Rev. H. E. Dowson preached from Psalm xlii. 4.

He began by observing that it was not surprising that the influence of the church was not in the nineteenth century such as it had been in the middle ages. The church was then supreme, because it was the only light that shone amid the mediæval gloom. Its superior influence was due to its superior intellectual attainments, as well as to its religious authority. This superiority, however, although an essential condition of the influence of the Roman Catholic Church, was by no means essential to the influence of Protestantism. The growth of universal enlightenment, accordingly, in the nineteenth century could not act prejudicially to the influence of the Protestant Church. Nor could it account for a phenomenon which had suggested the subject of the preacher's discourse, namely, the decreasing influence of the services of religion. For, what was the difference between Catholicism and Protestantism? The Catholic Church made individual Christians; the Protestant Church was made by individual Christians; and the more life they had, the more it had. The cause of the phenomenon accordingly not lying in the condition under which the church existed in the nineteenth century, it must lie in the class either of the clergy or of the laity. Did it lie in the laity? No; for they were not less religious than their predecessors. It must consequently lie at the door of the clergy. The preacher then went on to point out the distinction between the office of the Catholic priest and of the Protestant minister. The one was a mechanical administrator of sacraments, and could not fail; the other was a channel of that spiritual life, which his brethren shared with him, and which it was his to express on their behalf, and could succeed but most imperfectly. Since, however, perfect success would not be expected by his brethren, its absence could not account, so far as it was simply inevitable, for their want of interest in his services. Neither was this want of interest of the laity to be ascribed to the personal unfaithfulness of ministers; for this certainly did not exist in greater degree in the present than in the past. There were two main causes of the phenomenon under consideration. The first was the decline of superstitious regard for religious services. Men no more worshipped so largely for the sake of worshipping, and in the belief that they thus secured salvation. The noblest and most earnest would not enter a church to pray for a holy spirit that never came. But the fact that there was so much attendance at church that ceased with the superstitious regard for the services, showed how much had been merely superstitious, in other words, how little the services in themselves had been congenial. Hence was learned the second and the chief cause of the phenomenon in question, namely, the absence of harmony between the religious system of the church and the religious consciousness and religious requirements of the world. In short, the world held itself aloof from the church, because the church held itself aloof from the world. In the first place, it did so by its unnatural doctrines of a curse not experienced and a salvation not desired. The protest of liberal Christians against these fitted them to gather into their church those whom these had repelled. Such was the calling of the Midland Christian Union. In the next place, most important of all, the church and their own here was equally guilty with other sections of it—held itself aloof from the world by its maintaining the totally false and unreal distinction between things sacred and profane. The preacher concluded by urging, as above all things else needful for the influence of the Christian church, its preaching a religion of every-day life.

At two o'clock about eighty ladies and gentlemen dined together in the schoolroom; HERBERT NEW, Esq., in the chair.—The CHAIRMAN having proposed the health of the Queen, which was duly honoured, proceeded to give "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World over." In proposing this sentiment, he referred to the important recognition which it was likely soon to receive at the hands of the Imperial Legislature, in the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church. The Chairman then delivered an address in his capacity of president of the union. He dwelt upon its principles and objects, and showed that these were in fullest harmony with those of their older congregations; gave, in illustration, an interesting summary of the history of the congregation of Evesham; interpreted the signs of the times as eminently favourable to the progress of their cause; and concluded an eloquent speech by commending the Union and its work to increased support.

The Rev. D. MAGINNIS, one of the secretaries, read the reports of the committee and of the missionary agent for the half year. We have no space for even a summary of these documents. The Union has an efficient agent in the Rev. R. H. Cotton. It has supplied two stations—Spon-lane and Alcester—with preaching, and next month commences Sunday services, afternoon and evening, at Worcester, in the Natural History Room, the finest public room in the city.

The report was adopted on the motion of A. MARTIN, Esq., seconded by Mr. F. GREW.

The Rev. J. GORDON, in a forcible speech, moved: "That the principles of the Midland Christian Union are entitled to the cordial support of all liberal Christians in this district," which was ably seconded by the Rev. H. M'KEAN, and adopted.

The CHAIRMAN proposed "Our Workers and their Work," which was responded to by the Rev. R. H. COTTON, missionary agent; Mr. H. PAYTON, on behalf of the lay preachers; Mr. E. F. JOHNSTON, on behalf of the preaching stations; and by Mr. S. B. WHITFIELD (treasurer), who pleaded for a more liberal support.

The Rev. J. COLSTON proposed "The officiating Ministers," warmly eulogising Mr. Dowson's very able sermon.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON, amidst great applause, arose and acknowledged the compliment.

On the motion of the Rev. D. MAGINNIS, seconded by Mr. HERBERT (Worcester), thanks were voted to the minister and congregation of Evesham for the hearty and hospitable reception they had given to the Union that day.

A cordial vote of thanks to the chairman brought this very interesting and successful meeting to a close.

In the evening, all who had attended the meeting, except a few who had left by an early train, were entertained at tea by Mr. and Mrs. Herbert New, at Green Hill.

INTELLIGENCE.

HEYWOOD: THE LATE MR. GEORGE LEE.—Our friends at Heywood have again sustained a serious loss in the death of one of their members. Soon after the commencement of Unitarian worship in Heywood, the late George Lee was among those who went to hear the principles of Unitarianism expounded, and threw in his lot with the unpopular cause, to which, up to the time of his death, he remained faithful. Possessing considerable musical ability, he was at once appointed choir master by the congregation, which office he held up to the time of his death. He was also one of the first superintendents of the Sunday school. He was deeply imbued with the principles of our faith, felt a lively interest in their success, and had often occasion to defend them from the attacks of those with whom he came in contact in daily life. As a man he was sober, industrious, and upright, a devoted husband and father, and won the respect of all by whom he was known. This respect was shown on the Sunday following his burial, when a large congregation assembled to hear his funeral sermon preached, many of other churches thus testifying their respect for his memory.

LONGTON.—A winter course of special lectures bearing on Unitarian Christianity was begun at this place on the first Sunday in September, when the Rev. B. Glover, of Crewe, preached. And on Sunday last the service was conducted by the Rev. W. Oates, of Derby. The attendance on both occasions was cheering.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

P. G.—Received.

S. LLANDUDNO.—Received.

ERRATUM.—In the article "An Outline, &c., of Modern Theology," in last number, second column, and seventh and eighth lines from the bottom, for "He is the Infinite, Thinking Being, God and Thought must be identical," read "He is the Infinite Thinking, being and thought must be identical."

FEMALE EDUCATION IN INDIA.

We transfer the following letter to our columns from the Manchester Guardian, in the hope that some of our readers may be induced to contribute to the funds which will be required to enable Miss Carpenter to carry out her truly philanthropic work:

"Sir—Will you favour me by the insertion of a brief explanation of my object in going out to India to commence a normal school for the training of female teachers. When I first appealed for aid in establishing such an institution in Bombay, the Indian Government was not prepared to make any grant for the purpose, except on condition of the natives contributing half the expense, which, under existing circumstances, they could not do. Since that time the Indian Government has decided on granting £1,200 per annum, for five years, to each of the three presidency capitals for the purpose. Since however, this very difficult undertaking requires all the experienced help of educated Englishwomen which can be obtained, and the city of Ahmedabad is peculiarly prepared for such an undertaking, and anxious for such an institution, as you will perceive from the enclosed extract from a letter of a native judge of that city, I have resolved to commence the work there, and have arranged to leave Marseilles for India on the 18th of next month. Ahmedabad is too far from Bombay to derive any advantage at present from the normal school to be established there, and yet is peculiarly advanced, as will be evident to the readers of my 'Six Months in India.' The expenses will be very great, as it will be necessary to pay the passage out of those who will work in the school, as well as to maintain the institution. I shall, therefore, be obliged to any friends to the object who will assist me with funds.—I remain, sir, yours sincerely,

"MARY CARPENTER.
"Red Lodge House, Bristol, Sept. 17, 1868."

[ADVERTISEMENT.]

OPENING OF THE NEW UNITARIAN CHURCH AT POOLE.

THE new church is now approaching completion, and the building committee hope to be able to announce the opening day very shortly. Meanwhile the congregation ask the consideration of the Unitarian public to the following facts:—

1st. The congregation are probably less wealthy than any in the South of England, but are by no means the least numerous or zealous.

2nd. They were worshipping in one of the oldest and most historical chapels of the denomination, and it became absolutely necessary either to restore or allow it to disappear from the list of our places of worship. In these circumstances they stated how much they could do themselves, and sought the counsel of the highest authorities in the body as to what steps they should take. The British and Foreign, the Southern Unitarian, and the West of England Societies, alike urged that the cause should not be given up, and voted grants in aid of the building fund, and advised an appeal to the public for support.

The case was also recommended by the following ministers:—The Rev. J. Cropper, M.A., Wareham; Rev. R. B. Aspland, M.A., Hackney; Rev. W. Gaskell, M.A., Manchester; Rev. J. R. Beard, D.D., Manchester; Rev. Charles Beard, B.A., Liverpool; Rev. J. Robberds, B.A., Liverpool; Rev. E. Kell, M.A., Southampton; Rev. R. L. Carpenter, H. Bridport; Rev. W. James, Clifton; Rev. B.A., Green, M.A., Knutsford; Rev. S. Bache, Birmingham; Rev. J. L. Short, Sheffield. Consequently the congregation hoped to have from the whole body of Unitarians such a general support as is commonly given in such cases by the members of other sects where the question (asked with proper sanction)—Who will have the honour of giving the first twenty thousand shillings? has only to be put, and is answered at once by great numbers of small contributions, which quickly make up the aggregate.

The congregation at Poole have received very generous individual donations, which they gratefully acknowledge; but anything like a general contribution from the whole body they have not yet had, and therefore they are now obliged to appeal again, and they hope that those who can afford aid will give it, and not allow the chapel to be opened with a heavy debt, which will preclude the possibility of engaging a minister. They have now been nearly two years without one, and during that time they have worked hard and successfully in keeping up the cause. They have had courses of lectures, which have been well attended, and the congregation and Sunday-school have materially increased, and the musical service is now equal to any in the town; and they have every prospect of getting a good congregation when they are out of debt and have a minister.

ANOTHER VIEW OF MR. MURPHY.

To the Editors.—In your last impression, page 308, foot of the first column, you say, "The 'Father Ignatius' riots threaten to rival those of the firebrand Murphy," &c. Now, though I am a Unitarian and glory in the name; and though coupled with infidelity as much as you please, my opinion of Mr. Murphy is that he is an honest man and a gentleman, and that, as a true messenger of peace to all men, he is most laudably zealous in the glorious work of enlightening the world concerning a system of the most barbarous mythology that has ever disgraced and destroyed mankind; while, upon the other hand, I view those ever innocent and most beloved lambs the monks or priests, Father Ignatius, the Ritualists at large, and even you yourselves and all such editors, as the most dangerous "firebrands," moral incendiaries, and political traitors the whole world can produce.—Very respectfully requesting publicity to this in your next impression, I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

Glasgow, Sept. 28, 1868. ALEXANDER LOUITT.

THE COMING WEEK.

London: CLARENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—On Sunday, morning and evening, the Rev. P. W. Clayden will preach.

London: UNITY CHURCH, ISLINGTON.—On Sunday evening, one of a course of lectures on the Psalms, by the Rev. H. Ierson.

London: LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL.—On Sunday the Rev. James Martineau will resume his duties at this chapel.

London.—Week night services as under:—WALLWORTH, ST. JOHN'S CHAPEL: Monday.—CLERKENWELL, PLUMMER PLACE: Tuesday.—HOXTON: Monday.—STRATFORD LECTURE HALL: Tuesday.—STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL: Wednesday.—MILE END: Wednesday.—FOREST HILL: Thursday.—CLERKENWELL, ST. JOHN'S SQUARE: Friday.

Penmaenmawr: PENDRYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. W. James; service at 11 a.m.

Stalybridge.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. F. Revitt; subject, "Why am I a Christian?"

Births.

MITCHELL.—On the 27th ult., the wife of the Rev. Wm. Mitchell, Leicester, of a daughter.

WRIGHT.—On the 25th ult., at Stockton-on-Tees, the wife of John Robinson Wright, of a daughter.

Marriages.

COOKE—COOKE.—On the 29th ult., at the Unitarian Chapel, Crewe, by the Rev. B. Glover, John Seymour Cooke, of Manchester, to Mary, youngest daughter of the late Mr. Benjamin Cooke, of Nantwich. This being the first marriage in the chapel, the congregation presented a family Bible to Mr. and Mrs. Cooke.

WHITTAKER—SYKES.—On the 24th ult., at the Unitarian Chapel, Dukinfield, by the Rev. J. P. Hopps, Mr. James Whittaker, committee clerk to the Dukinfield Board of Health, to Eliza, only daughter of Mr. John Sykes, of the Commercial Inn.

Deaths.

JENKS.—On the 29th ult., Emma Amelia, the beloved wife of Mr. James Jenks, of Lewis-street, Penn-road, Wolverhampton, in the 24th year of her age. Deeply regretted.

LEE.—On the 13th ult., at Heywood, George Lee, aged 45 years.

GOLLAND.—On the 22nd ult., at Moorfield Cottage, Swinton, aged 54 years, Eliza, wife of Smith Golland, Esq.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.

THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, compiled by JOSEPH LANCASTER.

Containing Tunes to all Martineau's Hymns. London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson, Leeds; Hookingson Brothers, 5 and 6, Commercial-street; and of all music and booksellers. Congregations and choirs supplied at low rates.

MR. J. LANCASTER, PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, LEEDS.—New quarter, October 5.

WILLIAM MOSS,

TAILOR AND OUTFITTER,

FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

"GO TO SPACKMAN, MERCHANT

CLOTHIER, HATTER, & OUTFITTER, BELFAST. "For all you want in CLOTHING. I get all I possibly can from him myself. He has the largest, best, most fashionable, and cheapest stock of READY-MADE CLOTHING in the WORLD."—Extract from a recommendation to an American friend visiting Europe, by Mr. Cook, the Great European and Transatlantic "Excursionist."

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,

FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS, 23, SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE,

8, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER. (Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse.)

J. BALLS, Proprietor.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of

Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8,

Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

WHITFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and

SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS, CASH AND DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITFIELD & SONS, VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDING, SUPERHENSION PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED

AND OTHER NEEDLES. SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS

of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDING, SUPERHENSION PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

TO ENCOURAGE

The growing disposition of the Public to use WINE—AS NATURE INTENDED IT SHOULD BE USED—as a Beverage, we have for some years sold an excellent

VIN ORDINAIRE at 11s. PER DOZEN,

BOTTLES INCLUDED. We can recommend it as a thoroughly pure, clean-flavoured Wine. It is much in request among Medical Men for their own use.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY, WINE MERCHANTS, 26, MARKET-STREET, MANCHESTER;

And at 11, Lord-st., Liverpool.

COALS! COALS!—NOTICE OF

REMOVAL.—JAMES WELLS, Coal and Coke Merchant, Keeper Wharf, Ratcliffe, E. Office: 23, Coburn-street, Bow Road, E.

W. takes this opportunity of informing his numerous customers, friends, and the public generally, that he has REMOVED to the above address, where he hopes, by strict attention to business, to merit a continuance of their favours. He would remind them that Coals are now at the lowest prices for the present season, and would advise them to purchase as soon as possible. A trial is solicited. Quality guaranteed. Best Welshs, 24s. per ton; best Indians, 22s. per ton for cash.—Orders by post punctually attended to.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsey Villa, 87, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing office, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, October 2, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 389.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing.....	324
What is saying on Church Matters.....	324
Church Congress in Dublin.....	326
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XXIV.....	326
Is the Church of England in Danger?.....	326
Still it Moves.....	327
Welcome Soiree to the Rev. J. J. Taylor.....	327
An Outline of the History of Modern Theology.—Part V.....	327
The Religious Ideas of Christ as Described by Strauss in his Second "Life of Jesus".....	328
American Notes.....	328
Fire-side Readings: Sunday.....	329
Witchcraft.—Part I.....	329
A Ritualist Illustration.....	329
Intelligence: London, Aberdeen, Kidderminster, South Wales.....	330
Correspondence.....	330
The Coming Week.....	330

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH CLARENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN will PREACH next Sunday, morning and evening.

SWINTON.—On Sunday, October 11th, the ANNUAL CLOTHING FUND SERMONS will be preached at 10.30 and 3 p.m., by Rev. JOHN SHANNON, of Liverpool.

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, RAWTEN-STALL.—On Sunday, October 11, 1868, TWO SERMONS will be preached in the above Chapel, by the Rev. JOSEPH FRETTON, of Rochdale. Service at half-past two in the afternoon, and in the evening at six. A collection will be made after each sermon in aid of the Chapel Fund.

A WELCOME SOIREE to the Rev. J. J. TAYLOR, on his RETURN from TRANSYLVANIA.—The TRECENTENARY of the UNITARIAN CHURCH of HUNGARY.—The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and of the London District Unitarian Society have resolved to give the Rev. JOHN JAMES TAYLOR, B.A., a public reception on his return from Hungary, where he kindly acted as the representative of the Association, and of other English Unitarians.

The meeting will be held at the Hanover Square Rooms, Regent-street, on the evening of Tuesday, October 13th. Tea at seven o'clock. The chair will be taken at eight o'clock precisely by W. J. LAMPORT, Esq., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Tickets for Tea, price One Shilling each, may be obtained of the Committee, at the Vestries of the several Chapels, and of Mr. Whitfield, 175, Strand.

Admission to the meeting, at eight o'clock, free.

COMMITTEE.

Rev. R. B. ASPLAND. Mr. J. T. HART.

Rev. R. SPEARS. Mr. S. S. TAYLOR.

Mr. FRANK GREEN. Mr. J. WARREN.

ASTLEY.—On Sunday, Oct. 18th, TWO SERMONS will be Preached by the Rev. GEORGE FOX. Collections in aid of the Building Fund. Service: Afternoon at three; evening at six.

LONDON UNITARIAN LAY UNION.

WEEK NIGHT SERVICES AND LECTURES. St. John's Chapel, West-street, Walworth, Mondays, half-past eight.

Plummer's Place, Clerkenwell, Tuesdays, half-past eight.

Hyde Road, No. 69, Hoxton, Mondays, half-past eight.

Stratford Lecture Hall, Tuesdays, eight o'clock.

Mill End Road, 245, Wednesdays, eight o'clock.

Stanford-street, Wednesdays, eight o'clock.

Dartmouth Road, Forest Hill, Thursdays, eight o'clock.

St. John's Square, Clerkenwell, Fridays, eight o'clock.

R. SPEARS.

UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE FOR THE TOTAL SUPPRESSION OF THE LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

The ANNUAL PUBLIC MEETING of the members and friends of the United Kingdom Alliance will be held on Tuesday, October 13th, 1868, in the Large Room of the Free-trade Hall, Manchester.

The following leading friends of the movement are expected to take part:

Sir WALTER C. TREVELYAN, Bart., President.

Sir WILFRID LAWSON, Bart.

Sir ROBERT BRINCOE, Bart., High Sheriff of Cumberland.

Sir JOHN BOWRING.

The Most Rev. Archbishop MANNING.

The Ven. Archdeacon SANDFORD, B.D., Hon. Canon of Worcester.

Dr. MACKENZIE, J.P., Provost of Inverness.

Professor GEORGE ROLLESTON, Oxford.

Professor F. W. NEWMAN, Bristol.

Rev. WILLIAM TAYLOR, D.D., of California.

Rev. John S. WORKMAN, Wesleyan minister, London.

Alderman GEORGE TATHAM, Leeds.

Samuel POPE, Esq., hon. sec. &c.

The chair will be taken by W. ROMAINE CALLENDER, Jun., Esq., J.P., F.A.S.

Admission by ticket: Reserve seats, 1s; gallery and body of the hall, free. To be obtained from the Alliance Offices, and the following places: The Trevelyan Hotel, Corporation-street; Manchester and Salford Temperance Union, Barlow's Court, Market-street; Tubbs and Brook, 11, Market-street; John Boyd, 15, Piccadilly; Temperance Hall, Grosvenor-street, Chorlton-upon-Medney; George Scott, 135, Rochdale Road, 76, Oldham Road; Charles Bent, 165, Chapel-street, Salford; Thomas Ashworth, 114, London Road; Wm. Pennington, 175, Oldham Road; W. H. Silverwood, 6, Oak-street; Henry Winkley, 47, Bradford-street; New Islington; G. A. Chambers, 558, Oldham Road; D. Ariott, 146, Regent Road, Mathew Ridgway, 112, Broughton Road, Salford; William Hayes, 123, City Road, Hulme; James Boreford, 102, Great Jackson-street, Hulme; Working People's Association, Pennington; and at the various temperance halls and hotels. Registered seats may be secured, 1s. 6d. each.

Doors open at six, and chair to be taken at seven o'clock prompt.

The General Council will sit in the Assembly Room from ten to three.

United Kingdom Alliance Offices, 41 John Dalton-street, Manchester.

NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN

& UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The ANNUAL MEETING will be held at Chesterfield, on Monday, October 19th, when Divine Worship will be conducted at 11-30 a.m., by Rev. J. N. DRESSER, and a SERMON be preached by Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, M.A. After the Service, the Business Meeting will be held.

At two p.m., a collation will be provided in the Schoolroom. Tickets, 1s. 6d. each. After which, the General Meeting will be held under the presidency of Rev. F. BISHOP. The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN will address the meeting on "Our position and duties at the present crisis."

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY

BOARD.—LECTURES ON PHYSIOLOGY in relation to the Laws of Health.

On Thursday, 22nd October, at 5-30 (to be continued on succeeding Thursdays, at the same hour), Dr. J. SHEPHERD FLETCHER will commence a Course of eight or ten Lectures to the Students of the Board.

Subscribers and Ladies introduced by them will be admitted free. Non-subscribers 10s. 6d. each the Course.

JAMES DRUMMOND, B.A. } Secretaries.

EDWARD C. HARDING, }

HASTINGS AND BATTLE.

—These TWO PULPITS will be VACANT by the end of October.—Apply to Mr. T. KENWARD, Jun., 1, Bloomfield Terrace, St. Leonards.

WANTED, a situation as young LADY'S

MAID, or to take charge of one or two little girls.—Address T. T., General Post-office, Hastings.

WANTED, an engagement as RESIDENT

GOVERNESS by a lady who has had ten years' experience in tuition. Teaches English; French, acquired in France; German, in Hanover; music and drawing. Salary must be liberal.—Address E. F., at Herald office.

A LADY, especially qualified by education and experience, desires an ENGAGEMENT in October to head a gentleman's establishment, or as secretary to an invalid gentleman. Best references.—Address I. Y., Mr. Joseph S. Stott, West Court, Halifax.

DAILY GOVERNESS.—A LADY

required, of superior qualifications, capable of imparting a thorough English education, Latin, modern languages, and music.—Apply to Mrs. D. MARTINEAU, South Road, Clapham Park, London, S.W.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an

Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-

CEASTICE, WORCESTERSHIRE.—Principal: C. du C. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthily-situated establishment Boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemanly education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G., 68, Guildford-street, Russell Square, London; or to Mr. A. G., 81, Rue de Fleurus, Paris.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.

Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

DEAN ALFORD ON THE CHURCH

OF THE FUTURE.—For articles on this subject—the Disraeli Manifesto, the Spanish Revolution, the Borough Elections, Nonconformity in Yorkshire, and Lightfoot on the Galatians, see the Nonconformist of Wednesday, October 7th. Also, Special Election News—Dublin Letter on the Church Congress, Irish Church Agitation, &c. Price 5d. unstamped.—ARTHUR MIALI, 18, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, E.C.

DR. BEARD'S MANUAL OF CHRIST-

IAN EVIDENCE will be ready by the end of October. Parts XII—XIV. GOD BEARS WITNESS OF HIMSELF IN THE LITERATURE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT, and in its PRINCIPAL PERSONAGE, the LORD JESUS CHRIST. Part I. The Synoptical Gospels; Part 2. The Fourth Gospel: Is the Apostle John its Author?

Subscribers' names should be sent to Mr. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

Price 2s. 6d.

THE THEOLOGICAL REVIEW.

No. XXIII. October 1st, 1868.

1. Ancient Tomb Inscriptions of the Crimean Jews, by Samuel Davidson, D.D., LL.D.

2. The Church of England and who should stop in it, by Frances Power Cobbe.

3. The Non-conformist at Oxford, by a Junior Fellow.

4. The Greek Testament of Erasmus, by R. B. Drummond, B.A.

5. Pulpit Reform, by Charles Anthony, Jun.

6. Travers Madge, by John Wright, B.A.

7. Recent Speculations as to the Age of the World, by H. W. Crosskey, F.G.S.

8. Notices of Books.

Publishers: Messrs. Williams and Norgate, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden, London; 30, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

"THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH IN IRELAND: WHAT IS IT, AND WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH IT?" By the Rev. JOHN PAGE HOPPS. See the Truthseeker for October, now ready at all the usual places. Price 3d.

"LIGHT FOR BIBLE READERS."

Notes on a hundred passages of Scripture. By the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. A new edition (eight thousand) now ready, on toned paper. Price three pence. May be had of all the usual agents and booksellers.

The two hundred and fiftieth thousand now ready of

"WHAT DO WE, AS UNITARIAN CHRISTIANS, BELIEVE?" By the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. Two shillings a hundred.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.

THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, compiled by

JOSEPH LANCASTER.

Containing Tunes to all Martin's Hymns.

London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6, Commercial-street; and of all music and booksellers.

Congregations and choirs supplied at low rates.

NEW EDITIONS

OF THE

MEMOIR OF TRAVERS MADGE.

The first edition having been out of print since March last, and many requests having been made for it to be reprinted,

A SECOND EDITION, SIMILAR TO THE FIRST,

1 vol., 12mo., cloth, limp, lettered.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence, is now in the press, and will be issued at the beginning of December.

A BETTER EDITION

will also be issued at the same time, larger in size, better paper, well bound, and with portrait.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

 Of this edition only a very limited number of copies will be prepared, according to the orders actually received for it.

In order to lesson as much as possible the expense and risk of this re-publication, Mr. Herford would be glad to have as many as possible ordered beforehand from himself, so as to save publishing charges upon a portion of the edition. Orders may therefore be sent at once, accompanied with stamps or Post-office order, to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,

Highor Broughton, Manchester.

By whom the book will be sent post free immediately on publication.

ALL Friends of Free Religious Thought and the Free Expression of it should read the TRUTH-SEEKER. Edited by JOHN PAGE HOPPS. Published monthly; price Three pence. Any bookseller will supply it to order on receiving the name of the London publisher: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.

MR. J. LANCASTER, PROFESSOR OF MUSIC, LEEDS.—New quarter, October 5.

WILLIAM MOSS,

TAILOR AND OUTFITTER,

FIRST CHAMBERS, 48, MARKET-STREET.

HERFORD'S REFORM CLUB CLARET.

In quarts, 22s.; pints, 11s. 6d. Net cash.

C. J. HERFORD, Carlton Buildings, Cooper-st., Manchester

CARLOWITZ,

22a, PER DOZEN.

This excellent HUNGARIAN WINE is now greatly recommended for its nourishing and sustaining properties. As we import it direct from Hungary, without any intermediate agency, and bottle it under our own personal inspection, purchasers can rely upon its genuineness.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,

WINE MERCHANTS,

MANCHESTER.....26, Market-street.

Liverpool.....11, Lord-street.

Birmingham.....28, High street.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of

Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED

AND OTHER NEEDLES.

COALS! COALS!!—NOTICE OF

REMOVAL.—JAMES WELLS, Coal and Coke Merchant, Keepler Wharf, Ratcliffe, E. Office: 23, Coburn-street, Bow Road, E.

J. W. takes this opportunity of informing his numerous customers, friends, and the public generally, that he has REMOVED to the above address, where he hopes, by strict attention to business, to merit a continuance of their favours.

He would remind them that Coals are now at the lowest prices for the present season, and would advise them to purchase as soon as possible. A trial is solicited. Quality guaranteed. Best Wallsend, 24s. per ton; best Inlands, 22s. per ton for cash.—Orders by post punctually attended to.

"GO TO SPACKMAN, MERCHANT

CLOTHIER, HATTER, & OUTFITTER, HELFANT, "For all you want in CLOTHING. I get all I possibly can from him myself. He has the largest, best, most fashionable, and cheapest stock of READY-MADE CLOTHING in the WORLD."—Extract from a recommendation to an American friend visiting Europe, by Mr. Cook, the Great European and Transatlantic "Excursionist."

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,

FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS,

23, SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. T. ANN'S CAFE,

3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER.

(Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse).

J. BALLS, Proprietor.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Prompted, as it would appear, by the labours of the American missionaries in Turkey, a body of reformers has sprung up in the Armenian Church, who take the name of the Lusavorichian Society. They accept only two sacraments, and discard all that they regard as superstitious practices. The Greek Patriarch and high clergy are disposed to take strong measures against them, but the Porte does not seem inclined to support the Patriarch, and the Society have gone so far as to open a church in Constantinople.

An English Romanist, writing to the Westminster Gazette from Naples, gives an account, furnished by a friend there, of the efforts which are being made to destroy "the religious feeling of the people." He says:

"There is a piece going on at one of the theatres—a pantomime—in which bishops are brought on with asses' heads, and cardinals with mules'; a procession of clergy comes in and falls down in adoration before the Chassepôt rifle; and when public disgust has been sufficiently ripened by this scene, a file of monks of grotesque aspect passes across the stage to receive the hisses and execrations of the excited populace. This was but a specimen, however, of the revolting expedients to which, he assures me, the most anti-religious section of the Italianissimi have recourse."

The same correspondent, who was present at the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius, good Catholic as he was, had "to pinch himself to make sure that he was really assisting at an actual scene in a nineteenth century Church." He adds:

"The liquefaction, as I saw it, never seemed to be entire. I mean there was still a nucleus of solid matter left, which floated in the very evident liquid. The matter in the smaller phial did not liquefy at all, which I believe the people consider bodes evil, but it is seldom the liquefaction is accomplished so soon as to-day—namely, in thirty or thirty-five minutes."

The Archbishop of Prague is now in open opposition to the new liberal constitution of Austria. In a pastoral letter addressed to the clergy of Bohemia he declares the law on civil marriage to be null and void, and affirms the State has no right to abolish an ecclesiastical institution; he threatens with excommunication all who should dare to deny the sacramental character of the union of man and wife. In consequence, some of the Bohemian bishops have issued instructions to their clergy, in which the "Catholics living in civil marriage" are called "public sinners;" outcasts to whom no absolution can be vouchsafed, for whom no mass is to be read, and who are in no wise to be admitted as godfathers or godmothers. We imagine, however, that the steps which the Austrian Government are taking will soon bring these contumacious ecclesiastics to their senses.

Notwithstanding Archbishop Manning's declaration to the contrary, Ultramontanism is evidently just now in a bad way. It gains a few weak adherents here and there, but looking out on the world at large, it is evidently losing ground. Austria has made great advances in liberalism; Italy and Mexico are moving in the same direction; and now "Isabella the Catholic,"—favourite and sole crowned daughter of the Papal Church—to whom Pío Nono sent the Golden Rose this year, is obliged to fly from her kingdom discredited and dishonoured.

The rector of Whitby is holding a series of prayer-meetings, to "supplicate the gracious protection of Almighty God" against the "cruel and wicked proposition" to disestablish the Irish Church. The Guardian asks such of the clergy as are acting thus to consider, if there is to be such a majority of Liberals as some suppose in the new Parliament, "the proportion of the population they would unchurch in attempting to make State establishment the very essence of religion."

The practice of permitting a layman to read the lessons has been introduced in the church of St. Barnabas, South Kennington, at the Sunday afternoon services.

At the half-yearly conference of the London district of the Mormon Church, held on Sunday, it was stated the district comprised nine branches, with 1,013 members, inclusive of priests and deacons; there being 91 elders, 45 priests, and 28 deacons. Of the members, 10 had been excommunicated, 2 died, 188 emigrated, and 78 baptised.

In the 75th paragraph of their report on the Irish Church, the Royal Commissioners propose that "the payment of the salaries of parish clerks should be continued only in cases in which it appears to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners that the parishioners are not in a condition to provide for them by their subscriptions." We wonder that the defenders of the Irish Establishment as at present constituted, have not indignantly testified against this sacrilegious proposal to reduce a time-honoured functionary of the Church to a condition no better than that of a Dissenting minister, dependent for support on his congregation.

It is rarely that any one remains so long in the service of the Church as Mr. Charles Bridgeman, who has been organist of All Saints', Hertford, for seventy-seven years. A fortnight ago, on his ninety-third birthday, he played the organ at both services.

Some of the Church clergy are getting intolerably rampant in their intolerance. The other Sunday, for instance, Archdeacon Freeman, in a sermon preached in the Cathedral at Exeter, first compared the Liberal party to five of the most wicked men in the Bible, including Abithopol, who rebelled against his sovereign and hanged himself. Next, he likened the present assault on the Irish Church to the assault by Sennacherib, King of Assyria, on the people of God. He also compared the present movement to the French revolution, and assured his congregation that the English Church—thanks to the Liberals—would be abolished in precisely twenty years from the present time. And further, he stated that the abolition of Church-rates was a robbery of the poor for the sake of the rich.

At a meeting of the Free Church Presbytery of Edinburgh last week, when a motion was carried to memorialize the directors of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway against their proposal to run Sunday morning and evening trains between Glasgow and Paisley, an extraordinary speech was made by Dr. Begg, who seconded the motion. He said the late lamentable accidents "were the natural results of Sabbath profanation," yet almost in the same breath he admitted "there was no portion of the kingdom where the Sabbath was better observed than in Wales." There was, he contended, "some connection between Sabbath observance and the deterioration of railways." The North British, from the board-room of which he had been "bowed out with an absolute refusal, had not prospered very much since;" and another, which "blew up stone bridges on Sunday, and refused to answer a letter sent from the Sabbath Alliance, was not now in a very prosperous condition." This, which looks to us something like an appeal to monetary motives, the Doctor speaks of as taking "higher ground." And then, possessing that knowledge of the Divine procedure which is granted to some of our orthodox brethren, he half modestly says, "Without attempting to trace very closely the dealings of God in such matters, there is no doubt that the profanation of the day of rest, and the trampling under foot of His commandments will bring down God's judgment, especially on such countries as Scotland." If the directors are at all given to punning, they may perhaps say, "this is begging the question."

At a somewhat stormy meeting of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, held on Tuesday, a grant of £2,000 for the use of the "orthodox" Church in Natal was carried by 130 to 94. Notice was, however, at once given of a motion to rescind the vote, and proceedings in Chancery are threatened. The dissentients urge that, whether Dr. Colenso is theologically right or wrong, it cannot be right for a distinctively Church of England Society to aid an essentially schismatical movement.

The Nottingham Express contains a report of extraordinary proceedings, last Sunday, on the part of some fanatical religionists, headed by a Mr. Dupe and "J. Birch, D.D." Mr. Birch was announced as a converted nigger, but the reporter says he was no more like a nigger than a table is like a chair. He played a banjo, however, with which he accompanied the hymns. His performances took such an effect upon the assemblage that many of them could not resist joining in the chorus. At the conclusion Mr. Birch was heartily applauded—in fact, he was encored, when he sang a hymn after the tune of "Ladies, won't you marry," commencing "Adam was the first man." His second performance was attended with great enthusiasm, and as if with an eye to monetary matters (for books were being sold by one of the "disciples" below), he vociferated "chorus," and this was repeated several times at the end of nearly every verse. Mr. Dupe explained that the initials

D.D. affixed to Mr. Birch's name meant "Devil Driver."

Dr. Magee, Dean of Cork, and grandson of the Archbishop of Dublin, known by his work on the Atonement, to which Dr. Carpenter published a reply, is appointed to the bishopric of Peterborough; and Dr. Mansel, the great exponent of what might be termed the Know-nothing system of theology, is to succeed Dr. Milman as Dean of St. Paul's.

In his farewell sermon at St. Lawrence Jewry on Tuesday night, Bishop Gray complained bitterly of the conduct of Government—the Colonial Secretary having two months ago promised him a mandate for the consecration of a new bishop, and having ever since refused him further communication on the subject. What would be the end, he said, God alone could know.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Freeman, noticing Prof. Maurice's letters to the Daily News, on "Church and State," while it admires his candour, thinks it would puzzle any thoughtful man to state definitely what are the conclusions which Mr. Maurice arrives at. It says:

"The difficulty is to fix him. Not because he is a Proteus, but because he is a mist, an ignis fatuus, or a ghost such as Virgil describes in Hades—or something of the kind. He often seems to be about to say something worth remembering, you follow the misty form, you try to be assured as to what it is; at last you think to embrace what it personates, and you find it eludes you—it is a shadow, nothing; if he has a definite thought he has not placed it before you, but carefully carried it from the field, as Homer's Gods did their favourites,—in a cloud. On this account, with all our admiration of the man, we have often thought that in the field of religious discussion he has done (irrespective of what his precise notions, if indeed he allows notions to dwell in his mind, may be) much more harm than good. As the Plymouth brethren arrange to get rid of all appearance of arrangement, and idolise their leaders far more than those whom they charge with 'worshipping man-made parsons,' so Mr. Maurice seems to use effort never to let his sentences and paragraphs express a definite conception; and that even when it is troublesome to him to avoid doing it."

In the last of these letters, in which he discusses Dr. Pusey's recent overture to the Wesleyans, Mr. Maurice thus remarks on that body:

"The Methodist was not the messenger to a class at all. He broke through the distinction of classes. He spoke to men as men. If he did not, like the Dominican, change the character of learned bodies, he exercised nearly as remarkable an influence on nobles and fine ladies as on the Kingswood colliers; he awakened the sense of sin in the inhabitant of Mayfair no less than in the inhabitant of St. Giles'. The bishops would have tried in vain to limit such an agency to the poor or the reprobate. And they would have calculated very ill if they had attributed the Methodist influence over the poorest to any ignorance or vulgarity in the agents. The Wesleyans were certainly more educated men than nineteen out of twenty among the parochial clergy. They were listened to surely as much as any of their local preachers; if any of the latter exercised a moral power, it was because they had learnt their lesson at first hand, had felt it in their blood and along their hearts, and so had a sounder and deeper education than those who repeated common-places which they had got out of books. But their coarseness did not help them. It had not helped the Friars to any good. Francis and Dominic must have been men of more than usual breeding and refinement. They had successors who made the people more brutal by contact with their own brutality. These friars roused the indignant protests of Wycliffe and the reformers of his century, who determined that the people should have wholesome food, not food contrived to pamper their lowest and most grovelling appetites. I know not what dreams Wesley may have dreamed about a race of vulgar teachers when he had himself become vulgarised by the desire of founding a sect and the ambition of ruling. But the days of his real power were over when this craving for fictitious power began. Methodism, as a sect, however well organised, is not the Methodism which made the sect spirit tremble with the news of a higher spirit which had come to torment it, though not as yet to cast it out."

In a sermon at St. Mary's, Moorfields, on Sunday morning, Archbishop Manning told his hearers that the Holy See was progressing, in spite of its malignant enemies; but he did not say whither.

Referring to the articles which we recently published on "Something wanted in our Worship," a correspondent writes:

"Scarcely two will agree in their ideas as to the most approved form of worship to secure to each individual what will either please him or induce in him the frame of mind most to be desired for showing proofs positive as to cause and effect. Suppose some good judge be empowered to pay a visit to each congregation or district in which a chapel is at all pre-eminent, and, in some quiet way, gather these proofs of Sunday services, endeavour to deduce by the daily works and ways of Pastor and People how far any peculiar system can bear the test. Surely the 'tree is known by its fruit.'

The Pall Mall thinks that:

"Whatever complaints ecclesiastics may have against the city of London they can scarcely reproach it with not building and maintaining a sufficient number of churches. In the district around Cheapside and Lombard-street, little more than half a mile in length, and less in breadth, having an area under a quarter of a square mile, there are no less than forty different churches. Their average distance is 120 yards, and four might stand on the site of the Bank of England without being closer together than they are at present. Being thus buddled together in the most thinly inhabited city of Europe, forty-nine is said to be a large average congregation in these places, and as £490 is the average stipend of a city clergyman, it must be confessed that the people who use them—mostly trustworthy persons in charge of warehouses—are, if not the wickedest, certainly the most costly sinners in Christendom. St. Paul's, which we have not included, has besides fifty clerical officials, and must be considered more than sufficient in its revenues and roominess to supply the spiritual wants of twice the population of the whole neighbourhood. Neither the condition of our universities and public schools, nor that of the Irish Church itself, exhibits more clearly the necessity of watching church affairs than such a condition of things as we have described."

It is pleasant to see how many Churchmen are beginning to contemplate the possibility of a separation of Church and State, and to give good advice as to the best preparation for it. In an article on the cessation of compulsory Church-rates, the Guardian has these significant sentences:

"It may be true that the probable duration of the English Establishment is limited to ten years; but in 1833 Dr. Arnold deemed its end much nearer. Doubtless it is well to be prepared betimes for an event which may happen soon or late, and to try to 'educate' Churchmen in giving. There is no congregation so poor that it cannot, if it would, at least repair its own church. It has been often promised in the course of the controversy that with the removal of compulsion to pay rates in parishes a reign of harmony and goodwill between Churchmen and Dissenters would be established, and that all parochial institutions would flourish with unprecedented vigour. The realisation of this prospect would be a substantial compensation for a heavy loss."

In a review, too, of a work by Mr. Bennett, the Ritualist, in which he expresses strongly the disadvantages under which the Church of England labours from its connection with the State, the same paper remarks:

"To strike the balance between these advantages and disadvantages is no easy matter, but it is the duty of all who enter dispassionately on the treatment of what is perhaps the great question of the day, or will be of the coming generation. To solve this successfully there must be great patience, a shaking off of prejudices that are part of the cherished belief of many excellent men, an insight to discover and resolution to embrace the principles which alone can maintain the nationality of Christian Churches. It will task both the courage and the knowledge of the leaders of religious thought to separate the essential from the non-essential, and to make the basis of the Establishment both firm and broad enough to withstand the coming trial. That it may be made so, we fully believe, but not without the exercise of much wisdom as well as energy. The time has gone by when the rulers of nations, or the higher classes, chose the Church of the nation. In this, as in other things, it is choosing for itself, but we know of no reason why it should not choose aright."

The Rev. D. J. Vaughan, vicar of St. Martin's, Leicester, who belongs to the Broad Church School, has just published a pamphlet, entitled "Thoughts on the Irish Church Question," which seems to us the ablest that has yet appeared. He writes sensibly about the disposal of the revenues to be reserved for the use of the Church, and propounds a scheme for its reorganisation. He would make the congregation "the unit of organisation," thus providing the Church "with that democratic element which the primitive Church had, and which, in the presence of democracy, every Church that does not rest on sacerdotalism must have, or languish towards destruction." "The Church must be a free church." "Its new trust-deed should contain only one stipulation on the part of the State; namely, that in point of doctrine the Church shall continue in union with the Church of England." And then he expects that "the present jealousy between the Church and Protestant Dissenters might reasonably be expected to pass into active co-operation; while the strife with Rome, though possibly more ardent than ever, would at least lose the bitterness which is inherent in the present system of religious inequality."

The Rock is very wrath at the remarks on the Irish Church question in the address issued by the Society of Friends, and treats them to some of its choicest vituperation. It attributes the address mainly to Mr. Bright's pen, though it is known to have been written by Mr. J. B. Braithwaite, stigmatises it as composed of "falsehoods," and quotes the sneering remark of Cobbett that the Friends were "The buttonless unbaptised Society of friends to themselves."

The same paper compares the profession of Protestantism by the Liberal party to "the kiss on the lying lips of Judas;" says, "the followers of Mr. Gladstone are worthy of their leader, and the infamous cause he has in hand;" and classifies Dr. Miller with Bradlaugh, Finlen and Cardinal Cullen. This may be Evangelical, but seems to us hardly evangelical. The Dr., however, writing to complain that he has been consigned to the "political, social, and religious outcasts," thanks the editors that they have not, "as one Christian brother has done, 'informed him that he has jeopardised his eternal interests,' 'compromised his conscience,' and 'sold his soul to the devil,' 'so that he can never again have peace of mind,' 'never die happy or safe.'"

Mr. Lyne, the father of Father Ignatius, who has no sympathy, but the reverse, with his erratic son, makes a piteous appeal to the Bishop of London to put him under some sort of ecclesiastical restraint. He says:

"My first great pain as respected my son was, when I discovered that the Bishop of Norwich had no power to control the Rev. George Drury, of Claydon, and no power to say to my son with effect, 'Go thou and tarry at Jerusalem till thy beard be grown.' My son has met with no real friend since he entered the Church. The men who have 'taken up my son' are themselves speculators, well read up in the fable of 'the monkey, the cat, and the chestnut,' and these men have never left my son since they discovered the brand on his forehead, 'Zeal, without judgment, for the glory of God.'"

In the Contemporary Review, Dean Alford discusses the future of the Church of England. He shows that "the reformation of the Church by the State is a mere chimera," which might stave off for a while the separation of the Church from the State, but could not prevent it. For this "history has, for ages, been preparing the way," and he protests against those who are labouring to prepare the Church for it being set down as its enemies. Having "the privilege of knowing several of the leaders of the 'Liberation' movement," he can testify that "they evidently wish for the Church of England power to do her work in the population entrusted to her, and believe that the issue of the present system is to withhold that power." He meets the fallacy, That if the State is separated from the Church, we shall "cease to be a Christian nation," and says, "Whatever be the Christianity of the nation, it is measured, not by any legal enactment or fiction, but by the presence and working of the Christian conscience in the aggregate of its constituents. Christianity is not matter for human law, but for the free spirit of man." As little weight does he attach to the objections of those who contend that the connection with the State is the only safeguard for freedom of thought. And he is content to leave the whole question of property and legal status to the decision of the Legislature, believing that the clergy will not lose but benefit by such changes as it is likely to make.

While the Times thinks that the Pope's invitation to the Bishops of the English Church and other Protestant communions to attend the General Council next year speaks well, under present circumstances, for his benignity; it cannot see what they will gain by accepting the invitation. All the strength and prosperity of Europe are in the hands of Protestantism; all its weakness and decay in the possession of Roman Catholicism. France is strong, but its life and activity are derived from the Revolution, not from Ultramontanism; and if Italy is rising, it is because Rome is falling. In the Council, too, there will be only one voice that will speak. The Pope will but hear his own voice multiplied, and record the echo of his own conclusions. There seems only one part of the Pope's kindness we can return. He asks us to abandon our ways; suppose we ask him to abandon his? We invite him on our part not to hold the Ecumenical Council, not to anathematize all the rest of the world, not to set himself against the whole course of modern progress. In a word, we invite him to become a good Protestant, to learn decent language, and first and foremost to set his own house in order.

In the Edinburgh Review, for September, 1831, there was a clever article "On the State of Protestantism in Germany," which alluded to the late Dean Milman's "History of the Jews" in these words: "Woe unto the young divine who, like the accomplished author of the 'History of the Jews,' dares to reason, however unpretendingly and sensibly, upon matters of religious concernment! On him will the theological Reviews, monthly and quarterly, pour the vials of their wrath, and on him the golden gates of preferment will, as sure as he lives, be shut!" A few weeks after this article appeared (says the Athenæum) Milman, Moore, and Mr. Murray were together in the publisher's parlour, where the divine learned, to his profound amazement, that Moore was the author of the article in question. He could not reconcile the author of the "Fudge Family" and "Lalla Rookh" with a writer on German theology.

In a sermon at St. Paul's last Sunday afternoon, the Bishop of London paid a fitting tribute to the memory of Dean Milman. He said:—

"He has, in my judgment, left for the generation that is coming a storehouse of accumulated thought, from which many will soon draw their armour in hours of impending danger. We have spoken of his public character and example, and the lessons of his outward life; but every member of the body, of which he was the head, knows his private Christian kindness. Connected with him intimately since, twelve years ago, he was commissioned to place me here in my official character, I have learned every year more and more to love him privately, while I more and more admired the vast powers of his intellect. And now the grave has closed over his venerable form, for a long time shall the gentle partner of his many interests, whose desolation it grieves us this day to think of, but who, we feel sure, is sustained and comforted by Christ, still deeply mourn him. His friends at many a social and useful meeting will greatly regret his loss; and his Church and his country will greatly appreciate his labours. One outward mark of our respect, I trust, will follow from our feelings towards him—that we shall seriously undertake to prosecute that great work for the completion of this cathedral in which he was so deeply interested. Never at any time since London was, has St. Paul's been so filled with worshippers as during his wise administration. Let us use all efforts that the good work thus begun may abound more and more."

The bigotry of the Record is of too hard a nature for even death to soften, and we did not expect that it would suffer the Dean to pass away without a parting kick. After speaking of him with ridicule, as leaving the stage amidst loud applause, like "a well-graced actor," and declaring that it cannot "survey with comfort his history," and wishing that "he had not attained to a bad eminence as a divine," it says "his career savours of those who love the world, who are of the world, and whom the world hears," and ends with a half-veiled intimation that he is gone where he will find that his has been "a sorry portion," and that "God is not mocked." It may seem a little presumptuous in such heretics as we are, but we would seriously advise our contemporary to ponder a little the beginning of the seventh chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel.

We take the following from the Manchester Guardian:—

"At a meeting held in Blackburn on Saturday night, one of the speakers said that Mr. Gladstone was one of the devil's generals, and that the devil was the first Radical. A local clergyman, the Rev. H. Wescoe, seems to have felt himself in a position to declare that 'the two statements were painfully and awfully true.' We cannot say that we are sufficiently familiar with the military arrangements of what, with all due respect for both Houses of Parliament, we may be permitted to call 'another place,' to determine the precise value of the 'painfully and awfully true' intelligence for which Mr. Wescoe vouches. But—leaving out of sight altogether, the code of rules left by the Founder of the Church for the general guidance of those who call themselves by His name—ordinary people, with no special information respecting the devil and his angels, have a prejudice in favour of decency, and will not be slow to form their own judgment upon this example of clerical Toryism. Mr. Wescoe's history is of a piece with his charity. He tells us that three times there has been an attempt to separate Church and State, and 'in every case the agitators have come to ruin.' The struggle described in 'Paradise Lost' was the first; the sin of Adam and Eve, the second; and some incident related in the Pentateuch, the third. All came to grief, and no one will be at a loss to read the moral of the reverend gentleman's 'sad and terrible parallelism between the enemy of all men and the leader of the Radicals, now the enemy of the Church.'

CHURCH CONGRESS IN DUBLIN.

THE Congress was opened on Tuesday last week, in the Cathedral of St. Patrick, with a sermon by Dr. Magee, the Dean of Cork, in which, of course, he dwelt on the present state of the Establishment, lamented that a national recognition of the Divine Being and a proper provision for His worship were not now considered as first duties of the State, and called upon all members of the Anglican communion to repudiate the idea, which seemed to be an axiom of modern statesmen, that nations had no God, and that the Church was nothing but a corporation. There were 2,000 persons present to listen to the discourse, a large portion of which strikes us as nothing more than "words, words, words."

There was a very large infusion of religious Toryism in the Congress, and Mr. Gladstone and his Irish Church policy came in for a good deal of severe criticism and some little abuse. Indeed, before the meetings began, a southern incumbent complained that Mr. Gladstone's name appeared among the vice-presidents; but the committee, after considering the complaint, resolved to take no action upon it. The report, too, of the Irish Commission did not by any means give satisfaction; and the Bishop of Derry, so far from agreeing to its recommendations, declared that, instead of fewer, they wanted more bishops and clergymen to do the Church's work in Ireland, and "the man who would withdraw one pastor from a mountain parish seemed to him more guilty than he who, upon a stormy night, would withdraw the beacon light from some dark and fatal rock." The Bishop of Oxford was somewhat more guarded in his language; but still "he could not believe it possible" that such a body as the Irish Church "could really be approaching any great destruction to her usefulness, or any lasting diminution of her fame." Dr. McNeile, too, spoke in a similar strain, but maintained that she was surrounded with special dangers, inasmuch as she was exposed to "political conspiracies, directed against the political liberties of mankind," referring, doubtless, to that secret understanding which he and his party are well assured exists between Mr. Gladstone and the Pope. On Wednesday evening, when there was a conversazione, one of the gas-light devices contained the words, "Quis separabit?"

On Thursday, Dean Howson, in a sensible paper, urged the necessity of lay help in Church work. He believed that much of the work now done by the clergy could be performed better by laymen or women. He thought that the Act of Uniformity had a stiffening effect; and that the connection of the State with the Church had benumbed its energies and checked its freedom of action. He declared that Convocation was not a true representation of the Church, for it contained no laymen at all. The feeling of the Congress seems to have been against the formation of sisterhoods and brotherhoods, though the Bishop of Oxford gave a qualified support to the former. Earl Nelson maintained that only through an organisation of lay agency could a supply of men for the higher ministry of the Church be kept up. Dr. Churchill, who gave an address on the Canadian Churches, said that a bishop there, being asked whether he did not find the laymen of his Synod fond of change, replied, "The laymen are the Conservatives, the innovators are the clergy."

Mr. Beresford Hope, whom Mr. Disraeli complimented in the House on his "Batavian graces," in discussing the question how the services of the Church might be rendered more efficient, insisted that nothing was wanted but closer conformity to the Prayer-book, which was clearly an embodiment of the mind of Christ on the subject. In the ideal Church of England, Communion in every parish upon every Sunday would be found; and "frequent communion," he said, "is written on the fore-front of the Prayer-book." Mr. Hope was for doing away with the parish clerk, and putting forward picked men to do what he had failed to do as regarded the responses; and approved of the admission of laymen to a more prominent position in the conduct of public worship, as, for instance, reading the lessons and collecting the alms at the offertory.

In the discussion which followed a paper, by the Rev. F. W. Farrar, on the best means of attaching the younger members of the Church, Dr. Dickenson, to illustrate the effect of "excessive religious training" on the young, told the following anecdote. During the Social Science Congress, a gentleman staying at the house of one of Dr. Dickenson's parishioners, was asked to go to church on Sunday, but declined, saying, "You see, sare, I had a mother who was one very pious woman. She made me go to church one, two, three times a day, and I have made a calculation that I have gone to church once every Sunday until I be eighty years of age; so when I am eighty years old I will begin to go to church again." Dr. Hannay said he could not get the children of working men to attend the Church service; it was too long for them, and as regarded their understanding of it was best described by the Prayer-book definition of matrimony, "from beginning to end an excellent mystery."

At the closing meeting, Archdeacon Denison expressed regret that the great question of the day had not been distinctly debated before the Congress as it ought to have been. He, however, gave a lecture to the Irish Church Society upon it, in which he said that Mr. Gladstone's religious equality meant no National Church, no national recognition of the truth of the Reformation by the British people; "the State was invited to make a desolation and a famine of all religion." Mr. Walpole said that English Churchmen were resolved to stand by the Irish Church in this crisis to the utmost of their power. The Bishop of Derry did not seem, however, to expect much help from the press, as far as his order was concerned. He said, "It seemed to him that the High Church and Low Church papers treated the bishops in very much the same way as the ancient Egyptians treated the very respectable persons whom they called in for the purpose of discharging the sacred function of embalming the dead. For, after those persons had fulfilled their office, immediately they left the house, they began to follow them, uttering the most hideous execrations, and throwing stones at them. Wherever blows were given the bishops had their share of them."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XXIV.

SUBJECT: "The continual warfare of the Hebrews against idolatry."

Read 1 Kings xviii. 17—40. Elijah says to the people, "How long halt ye between two opinions? If Jehovah be God, follow Him, but if Baal, then follow him." In the sight of all the people Elijah and the prophets of Baal then try in rivalry to procure a miracle from their God in support of their religions. Elijah's miracle succeeds, the people fall on their faces and acknowledge that Jehovah is God. The priests of Baal are put to death.

Read 2 Kings x. 15—31. No sooner has the lawless Jehu seized upon the cities of Jezreel and Samaria, and made his sovereignty secure by the most wholesale slaughter of his rivals, than he makes war upon the worship of Baal, the idol of this northern part of the country. On his way he meets Jehonadab, the son of Rechab, one of the military officers of his newly-gained kingdom, and carries him with him in his chariot to help him. "Come with me and see my zeal for Jehovah." By a piece of treachery they gather in all the priests of Baal to a great solemnity. When the burnt-offering and the sacrifices are ended the soldiery is sent in among them and they are put to the sword. The image of Baal and the house of Baal are broken down. Thus says the historian, Jehu destroyed Baal out of Israel. And according to the imperfect notions of the time, Jehovah is made to praise Jehu for his conduct, notwithstanding his other sins and idolatries. This passage, as well as the last, forms part of the history of Elijah and Elisha, a religious history that comes into the midst of the Books of Kings, and seems especially written to uphold the worship of Jehovah. The ninth chapter, with this tenth we have [been reading, describes in a most picturesque way the madcap course of Jehu, the usurper of Israel.

Read also Isaiah xlv. 5—25. A powerful piece of poetry on the greatness of Jehovah. "I am Jehovah and there is none else; there is no God beside Me." The inhabitants of Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba, who were in trade with the Jews, shall own "There is no other God." This chapter, as the first verse tells us, belongs to the reign of Cyrus, 300 years after the time of Jehu. It shows us the religious thoughts of a time when idolatry was no longer a formidable enemy, or supported by a popular body of priests, as in those days, but it was yet always in their thoughts. The earlier writer laboured to prove the superiority of Jehovah to all other gods. The present writer seeks to spread the knowledge of His sole power.

IS THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN DANGER?

AFTER referring to the correspondence on Church subjects with which the papers have lately been filled, and for which space would not have been found at any other season of the year, the Pall Mall Gazette says:

"It is pretty clear that the public at large are at last coming to be aroused, though in an incomplete manner, to the fact that a crisis in the religious belief of the country, involving a necessity for some modification in its ecclesiastical arrangements, is approaching. We use the word 'incomplete' because the various disputants to whom we have referred seem either to be unaware of the vital importance of the issues to which their discussions directly lead, or else to be disposed, for whatever reason, to pass over facts which ought, one would think, to be familiar to every moderately well-informed man. Lord Ebury, for example, seems to us to be perfectly right in regarding the spirit of sacerdotalism as the most serious enemy of the Church of England; but can he suppose that that spirit can be finally exorcised from the Church of England without a discussion which will involve infinitely wider questions than any which relate to dresses or ceremonies? In order to exterminate priestcraft effectually from the Church of England it would be necessary to revise the ordination service, and the services for the administration of baptism and the communion, and the service for the visitation of the sick at least; and it would also be necessary to add one or two additional articles to the existing thirty-nine, condemning the doctrines of the real presence and of apostolical succession in good set terms, made comprehensive and plainspoken enough to leave no room for doubt that the Church of England is a Protestant body in the most unequivocal sense of the word. If this could be done, if the Church of England were made once for all to renounce the notion that there is anything supernatural in a clergyman, it would stand on an intelligible basis, and might communicate freely with other Protestant bodies. It would, indeed, be open to the objections which are made against all Christianity—whatever they may be worth—and it would probably have to put up with a secession to Rome on the one hand, which would involve, on the other hand, concessions to Protestant Dissenters very unwelcome to the social and theological prepossessions of many of its members. When, however, this was effected it would stand upon a reasonable, intelligible basis. It would have the benefit of great endowments, much social influence, and a thousand associations which, well used, might fortify and do much to perpetuate it. These results would be eminently desirable, but it is impossible for any one to disguise from himself the all but insuperable difficulties with which their attainment would be beset. It is difficult to imagine the bitterness of the contest which would be necessary before such a measure could even be brought under discussion in Parliament, or the vehemence of the opposition which it would meet with from all kinds of quarters; nor is it to be denied that, if carried, it would involve the secession from the Church of a good many of the clergy, and of a considerable and very influential section of the laity. Whoever, therefore, is prepared to make a thorough-going attack upon Ritualism, to cut up the root as well as to prune the branches, must be prepared also to meet such questions as we have indicated. We do not say that it could not be done—that the Church of England might not be made a thoroughly Protestant body, expressing what is substantially the religious belief of the vast majority of English people; but we do say that such a measure would occasion fiercer contests than any which have been seen in this country for nearly two centuries.

If this thorough-going and consistent course be not taken, there will still be a choice between two more. The one is standing still and administering palliatives, the other is the full establishment of the voluntary system; and it appears to us that the best mode of estimating the dangers and the prospects of the Church of England in the present day is that of comparing these three courses. The second—standing still and administering palliatives—will, of course, be taken till something or other rouses the public into making its choice between the other two. It is difficult, and it would be of very little use, to speculate upon their comparative advantages, for such questions are determined much more by passion than by calculation. Our own feelings, if they were of any importance, would be in favour of the first course, but we should waver that the third would be taken if the question were raised neatly and clearly in the course of the next few years. We do not see, however, why it need be raised. The present compromise has lasted for 300 years, and has withstood a great many shocks. The social advantages of the existing state of things are so great and so peculiar that there would be an extreme reluctance in almost all quarters to give them up. Whatever may be its faults, practical or theoretical, the present system interferes with nobody, and it sets down in every parish throughout the country a man who is generally a gentleman, always resident, and as a rule exceedingly charitable and useful in a hundred ways; and this it does without taking a shilling out of any one's pocket. When the clergy take to worshipping with pigs' heads, and otherwise make themselves and religion ridiculous, they try the strength of such an institution, surrounded as it is by all sorts of associations of kindness and charity; but it is a very tough old tree, and few of those who have lived under its shade can fail to resent the idiocy of men who will insist on making the whole institution absurd in the eyes of sensible people. If the clergy would but give up playing at priests, and be content with the position of sensible Christian gentlemen charged with more definite, religious, moral, and social duties than the other members of their class, the Church might stand indefinitely; but our ancestors renounced priestcraft and all its works three centuries ago, and to let it come back is altogether out of the question, whatever its suppression may cost."

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1868.

STILL IT MOVES.

THE long interval between the dissolution of the last Parliament and the actual election for the next, however vexatious may be the suspense it occasions, and the interference with the ordinary business of the country, is at any rate beneficial in one important respect—it is awakening an interest in the great questions of national policy involved, such as no direct propagandism could have aroused. There are other parties that want educating besides the great Conservative party which Mr. DISRAELI last session so effectually instructed in the elements of practical reform. A good deal of the Liberalism which ranks itself on Mr. GLADSTONE's side is very weak in the legs, and nothing but the thorough attention which the controversies of this interval are drawing to the whole subject of religious equality would suffice to brace them up to march forward with him when the tug of war actually comes. The progress of opinion on the subject of the Irish Church has been so great, and the larger question of church establishments has in consequence been so thoroughly sifted that we almost hold our breath in amazement as we contrast the state of public feeling a few years since, with that which is now everywhere manifesting itself. Even a year ago, all the long and arduous labours of those who would have all churches absolutely upon the same level, seemed to have produced no material results. The state church seemed, as the Independent says, the “strongest and most securely rooted of all English institutions.” Average churchmen of all sections were still looking down upon dissent, and especially upon what they were pleased to call the political dissent of the Liberation school, with the old dignified superciliousness. The broad church leaders were scheming how, gradually, their own position in it might be made more secure, and its “nonconforming members” be included in that large and happy church of the future, which they loved to picture; while “reluctant Nonconformists” among ourselves were still chanting the praise of the Church's “venerable and beautiful liturgy,” and dreaming their day-dreams of a future time when her doors should be so widened as to admit all but the obstinate schismatics who should still prefer their small sectarian institutions. One touch of real movement—one threatening to do the simple duty which lay upon the very threshold of all true reform to the National Church, and all this security and scheming and dreaming have been scattered to the winds. The fabric has not indeed been overthrown, but the utter hollowness of the foundation on which it rests has been demonstrated; and men of all parties, in the church and out of it, are now discussing, in various tones of deprecation or hope, a state of things for advocating which the Liberationists have been denounced as at once sacrilegious and visionary. They may shriek against it, like that reverend politician who has just announced himself “in a position to declare that Mr. GLADSTONE is a general of the first Radical—the devil”—or they may face it with apprehension and regret, like Dr. VAUGHAN, but still they do face it. All parties no longer disguise from themselves that to maintain the ascendancy of the Anglican Church can not be much longer possible. Week by week one and another of its cherished supports is giving way, and those who a year or two ago were regarded as its staunchest defenders, if they are not going over to the enemy, are at least admitting that the hour of capitulation is inevitably approaching. Now Mr. MAURICE and now Dr. TEMPLE give forth utterances of no doubtful sound. Up to a fortnight ago there was no man in England of whom the Record and its readers were more proud as a representative Evangelical than Dr. MILLER, formerly of Birmingham and now of Greenwich. But he has declared himself unable to advocate the maintenance of the Irish Establishment, and his quondam admirers can only hint that he is on the look out for a Whig Bishopric. Yet, even as they utter such an innuendo, they must be half-conscious that it carries its absurdity upon the face of it. And now we have the Dean of Canterbury, Dr. ALFORD, coming out still more strongly, and openly proclaiming that it will be a good day for the Church of England when she stands simply upon a level with all other churches. Utterances like these cannot fail to have a strong effect upon the general mind of the country, while if anything more be wanted for the conversion of those who think more deeply on the subject, surely it is supplied by the report of the Irish Church Commission. That report has fallen curiously dead upon the public mind. No one cares about it; but it may be welcomed as at once a sign of and an agent in the educating process. It does at once too little and too much. It does too little, for it will not touch one of the grievances which the Irish people feel in respect to the dominant Church. Yet it does too much, for it quietly cuts away the whole ground on which the Protestant champions have long triumphantly disported themselves. They have been talking of the Church of England as a Missionary Church, and lo! the comment of their own party is a proposal that all livings which have less than forty Protestants in them shall be abolished. They had been inveighing against the sacrilege of meddling with private Church property, and behold, the tithes of one parish, in which the Church is abolished, are to be given to other churches at a distance. No doubt, the old cries will still be raised, but we may hear them without alarm, while opinion thus keeps moving, and the very men who have charge of the breaks are with placid unconsciousness oiling the wheels.

WELCOME SOIRÉE TO THE REV. J. J. TAYLER.

ON Tuesday evening next, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association have determined to give a welcome soiree to the Rev. J. J. TAYLER on his return from the Tercentenary of the Unitarian Church of Hungary, at which he appeared as the representative of English Unitarians. As will be seen from our advertising columns the soiree is to be held in the Hanover Square Rooms, Regent-street, when the chair will be taken by W. J. Lamport, Esq., president of the Association. The occasion, we are sure, will be an interesting one—and the object, such as ought to secure a large attendance. We would, therefore, ask all our friends in the neighbourhood of London to make an effort to be present as an evidence of their good-will not only to Mr. TAYLER, but to our Hungarian friends.

AN OUTLINE OF THE HISTORY OF MODERN THEOLOGY.—PART V.

The controversy concerning the Easter Festival, which arose about the year 160, affords, no doubt, many points of prima facie evidence in favour of Baur's view. If the question was concerning the day of the month on which our Lord held his last supper, it is quite impossible to conceive how the Western Church should have omitted to quote John's Gospel had they been acquainted with it. But, in point of fact, the dispute at first had no reference whatever to the last supper, or to the day of the month on which it was held; but related solely to the expediency of observing Easter in the Jewish manner of the Eastern Church, or in the Gentile manner of the Western Church; and on this subject the Gospel could throw no light. It is quite conceivable that St. John—though knowing that our Lord kept the feast on the 13th day—should have celebrated the Christian passover on the 14th, especially as he regarded Christ as the very paschal lamb of the Christian church. And so, when Pelycrates instances the custom of the Apostle John in keeping the 14th of the month, it in no way proves that the Apostle could not have recorded the 13th as that on which Jesus ate his last meal with his disciples. Further, that the crucifixion took place on the 14th of Nisan, is more in accordance with the circumstances of the time than the synoptic account which represents it as taking place on the 15th day. The Jews were bound by their law to observe the great feasts in the same manner as they did their Sabbaths. But it would have been contrary to all Sabbatical laws to crucify a man on the Sabbath-day, on the eve of which, as appears by the “transactions of the Jewish Sanhedrim,” the judges were not allowed to pass the extreme sentence of the law, as the execution could not take place until after the Sabbath. Should it be replied that the offence of which Jesus was accused, being of a religious character, the feast-day, when a large concourse of people were present, was the most suitable time for putting him to death, it must be remembered that there were two thieves crucified with him, for which violation of the festal law there would be no justification; or, should it be said that the whole thing was a Roman affair, and was done without any regard to the law of the Jews, it must be borne in mind that a decree of Augustus forbade the Romans to offend the Jewish prejudices in these ceremonial matters, which crucifying thieves on the feast-day certainly would have done. From all these circumstances there arises a presumption in favour of the authenticity of the narrative of the fourth Gospel in opposition to that of the Synoptics. The arguments of Baur, based on the difference between the Logos doctrine of Justin Martyr and that of the Gospel, are not of much weight. Different minds take different views of the same recorded facts. Who, for instance, could suppose that the Christology of Schleiermacher and that of Mr. Spurgeon were drawn from the same source? In this matter, after eighteen hundred years, there is hardly one feature in common between the German and the English expositor, though each of them believes himself to be the only truthful interpreter of St. John.

Thus have the criticisms of the Tübingen School been answered; and every impartial mind must admit that a love of theory—the greatest ignis fatuus of theology—has seduced Baur and his followers into regions out of which no critical ingenuity can ever extricate them. An hypothesis is absolutely necessary at the commencement of every investigation, but how difficult it is to lay it aside when it militates with facts the Tübingen School is a remarkable example. “That's a very beautiful theory,” exclaimed a gentleman to whom a philosopher had been explaining a very ingenious hypothesis, “but unfortunately it is inconsistent with facts.” “What are those facts?” said the man of science; “produce them, and I will explain them by my system.” In this spirit have the Tübingen critics gone to work, and hence has arisen a prejudice against them, which has had the unfortunate effect of blinding the eyes of their adversaries to the great service they have rendered to the science of biblical criticism.

But the orthodox party, touching the question of the authorship of the fourth Gospel, have done much more than refute the objections of Baur. They have pointed out that the great authority which the Gospel possessed, both amongst heretics and believers, about the middle of the second century, is incompatible with the supposition of its having first appeared at that time. And further, they have shown that there is such a great similarity between the first Epistle of John and the fourth Gospel, that we are forced to admit that the same man must have written both. The genuineness, however, of the first Epistle was never doubted in the early church. Polycarp, a disciple of St. John, in an Epistle to the Philipians, thus writes: “Every one who confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is anti-Christ.” As this passage is not found, word for word, in the Epistle, we may suppose that Polycarp had it from the mouth of his master; and when we find the very same ideas, and almost the very same words, occurring in an epistle ascribed to that master, there is strong prima facie evidence of its genuineness. The next witness is Papias, who, according to Eusebius, used the first Epistle of John, expressly mentioning it as a work of the Apostle. If, then, these ancient testimonies may be trusted, there is a strong case in favour of the universal tradition that John wrote the first Epistle. But the man that wrote the Epistle in all probability wrote the Gospel. By these and such-like arguments, the orthodox party have made out a case which the majority of judges have pronounced to be valid.

The foregoing "outline" was written many years ago, without any view to publication, and is merely notes of the studies which then occupied me. The other day, in looking over some old papers, I found the manuscript, and it was suggested to me that it might be interesting to those who were not much acquainted with the theology of Germany. At another time, I may continue the subject by giving a history of the Messianic idea until the time of Christ. A. M. CREEBY.

THE RELIGIOUS IDEAS OF CHRIST AS DESCRIBED BY STRAUSS IN HIS SECOND "LIFE OF JESUS."

"It is to the first three Gospels we must turn if we would enter into and read the mind of Jesus touching the work he had to perform. The Sermon on the Mount has, and with good reason, ever been regarded as the quintessence of his teachings. At the very beginning of it the fresh Christian thought distils like fertilising dew in spring. In what is called the eight beatitudes, you behold the Christian paradoxes which throw into contrast the new religion with that of the Jews no less than that of the Gentiles. The blessed are not the rich, the full, the joyous; but the poor, the afflicted, the hungry, the thirsty. The way to man's real good and his true happiness is not power, nor conflict, nor rigorous exaction of your right, but the spirit of gentleness, endurance, and peace. The new world is compared with the old, the world turned upside down. Externalities are as nothing, what is internal is everything. A man's soul is supreme. Peace of heart sinks and effaces all outer misery, and flourishes in connection with it, rather than in union with pomp and pride. Jesus had seen the wants of the soul stifled among the rich by material enjoyments, while among the poor they were satisfied and composed by suffering. Well might he promise blessedness to the poor Galileans in recompense for an indigence auspicious to the sentiments he wished to awaken. Revolutions are always the same, and Christianity was a very great revolution; they find their first foothold not among the opulent and the successful, but among the needy and the heavy-laden. However, since physical need is not the sole reason why Jesus proclaims the famished blessed, Matthew in giving a spiritual import to the words did not disfigure his thought, but represented it more correctly than did the Ebionites at a later day, with their ascetic exaggerations and their condemnation of all external substances.

"It is to a future world, it is to heaven, that Jesus refers the accomplishment of the promises that he makes to the poor and the oppressed. Internal good, inseparable from holy thoughts and moral progress, assumes the form of a future reward. And, in truth, that reward is not an illusion; the contradiction there is between the outer and the inner cannot last for ever, and the new spirit awakened in humanity will in the end fashion the external world after its own image. This is the natural and, though slow, certain work of history; it is the progress which is accomplished even in this state, and which the religious sentiment takes pleasure in contemplating, as completed in a world to come.

"From the conversion of the external into the internal, which marks the exordium of the Sermon on the Mount, flow all the interpretations of the law which fill up its first portion. Beyond the act at which the virtue of the Pharisees stopped, Jesus proceeds directly to the intention of the soul. Murder he forbids, in forbidding anger and hate; adultery, in forbidding lust; perjury, in forbidding oaths as profaning veracity. By contrast with what was said to the ancients—that is, to those who were under the Mosaic law—Jesus presents himself as the lawgiver of the soul, while Moses was the lawgiver of the deed; or rather, he places himself above Moses, as accomplishing the legislation of the letter in the spirit. Over against the truly Hebrew, and in general ancient precepts of evil for evil, of love for your own people, and of hate towards your enemies, Jesus sets the spirit of forgiveness and beneficence, offering as the actuating motive, 'that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven, for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and the unjust.' If there is in the New Testament one authentic utterance of Jesus, this certainly is his, for in the interval which elapsed, before the final completion of our Evangelists in their present form, men's minds were too narrowed and too heated by fanaticism and conflict to be able to conceive a thought so lofty, bright, and comprehensive. Here, then, we put our finger on one of the grand features of the piety of Jesus; alike for his head and his heart, the Heavenly Father was that Infinite Goodness which makes no arbitrary difference in his love, and this idea of God shows us precisely why he took pleasure in calling him Father.

"Not in the Old Testament could Jesus acquire this fundamental conception. The idea of God as the father of all men is not found there. It is Jesus' own idea; and if he makes it the basis of his religion, the reason is that indiscriminate goodness lay at the centre of his own nature, and was the sentiment in virtue of which he found himself in full harmony with God. Not to suffer yourself to be troubled by human wickedness more than God; not to overcome evil except by good; not to punish an enemy except by beneficent service—this principle flowed forth from the deep fount of his own heart. When he exhorts his hearers to show themselves true sons of the Heavenly Father by acting as he acted; when he invited them to be perfect as he was perfect, his words say to us that he conceived God's moral perfection as being such as he himself felt in the loftiest moments of his religious life, while that sentiment grew purer, richer, higher by the contemplation of his ideal in God. His loftiest religious faculty, the ripe fruit of his soul was that universal love which will conquer evil only by good; and this sentiment he ascribes to God as the fundamental quality of the divine essence.

"If men are God's children, they are brothers; each in regard to each, they are, too, all equals. We ought, then, to treat our neighbour as ourselves, and not to be severe toward him, while indulgent toward ourselves; to be to him what we should wish him to be to us. This has always, and justly so, been accounted the true moral principle of the Christian religion. It contains the germ of human civilisation, namely, the subordination of the individual to the general good of the race, which lives in us and claims acknowledgment and honour from each in others.

"By the tenderness, by the activity, by the flame of this universal love, Jesus rose above all the restraints and all the limits of life; and he felt himself one with his Heavenly Father, and overflowed with an inmost blessedness, in the presence of which external joys and sufferings lost all their signification. Thence that serene unconcern which is disquieted neither about food, nor clothing, but looks to God who clothes the lilies and feeds the sparrows; that content of heart during a wandering life, in which often the Son of Man had not where to lay his head; that disregard of earthly glory and shame, under the assurance of bearing to man the divine light and love. Thence, too, that predilection for children whose guileless and unperverted heart as yet knows neither hate nor pride, and who are what is most loveable because they know only how to love. Thence, too, that new law of offering the left cheek to him who strikes the right; to travel two miles with a person who may require one, and to forgive a brother's transgressions, not merely seven times, but seventy times seven.

"In developing in himself to the utmost this serenity of soul, one with God and one with man, Jesus had realised the prophetic ideal of a new covenant, and of a law written in the heart (Jer. xxxi. 31). To employ the poet's words:—'He had made the will of God his own will. In return, God came down into his heart from the throne where He governs all worlds; the gulf was filled up, all threatening phantoms had vanished; in him the man had passed out of vassalage into freedom. This tranquility, this serenity, this career, the natural outflow of a joyous and lovely disposition, we may call the Hellenic element in Jesus. But a Greek could have raised himself to this moral and spiritual altitude, and to that pure conception of God which it involves, only with the aid of philosophy; in Jesus this transcendent spirituality was the result of his education under the Mosaic law, and the expansion and refinement he drew from the writings of the prophets.

"It may be asked through what phases Jesus made his way to this composure and harmony of soul. The accounts that we possess of his life never speak of severe struggles and perilous combats, out of which peace emerged in the midst of difficulty. It is true that apart from concise notices of his childhood, those narratives cover only the short period of his public life, and place him on a pedestal where he is above all human weakness. We may, then, presume that this period of light and peace was preceded by a period of obscurity, conflict, perhaps errors. But, unless all analogies are deceptive, traces of such, had they existed, must have been left behind. All the characters purified by struggle and violent crises—Paul, Augustin, Luther—have borne indelible scars, and their figure retains something hard, dark, severe. Nothing of the kind in Jesus. A trace of some conflict of the kind has been seen in the account of the temptation, but only in consequence of a false interpretation. The agony of the garden is but an effort to persevere in a state of mind fortified by long habit, and not an endeavour to reach its loftiness. Jesus, from the first, appears as a beautiful nature which had only to follow its own law, to know itself and strengthen itself in its own consciousness, without ever having need of change or renewal. This did not naturally exclude hesitations or ephemeral faults any more than the necessity of a serious and sustained effort to conquer itself, and to attain to complete self-renunciation, as Jesus himself acknowledged when he disclaimed the title "good." In fine, the character of Jesus was formed without any violent crises, and by voluntary and rigorous self-discipline. Such is the true sense, the only intelligible sense of the doctrine of his impeccability. In this particular the great Apostle to the Gentiles was inferior to his Master, and the two great restorers of Christianity in the Roman and in the modern world, Augustin and Luther, are nearer Paul than Christ."—Dr. Beard's "Manual of Christian Evidence."

AMERICAN NOTES.

Elihu Burritt has written home from England urging his countrymen to contribute to the repair of Wickliffe's Church, at Lutterworth. He says:

"It is now just five hundred years since John Wickliffe sent forth the first copies of his English Gospels from Lutterworth. Nothing could be more graceful and appropriate than for those who reverence his memory to mark the anniversary with some useful and lasting token of their gratitude for his life. And no such token would be more appropriate and appreciated than the restoration of the church in which he preached and died. It is now sadly dilapidated. From the pulpit one may see fragments of wall and cornice lying at the broken feet of the pillars. The villagers are making a strenuous effort to raise the means for the renovation of the edifice. The people of our own American Boston felt moved by a kind of proud as well as filial affection to contribute to the restoration of the grand old mother church of England's Boston. I fully believe that thousands, from Maine to California, would contribute as gladly and as gratefully to the restoration of Wickliffe's Church in Lutterworth, if they knew its state and need, and the pleasure with which their gifts would be received by those now about to put their hands to the work. Lutterworth is a small, secluded market town, with no large sources of manufacturing or commercial wealth. Consequently, a large share of the requisite sum must come from abroad. I earnestly hope that many American hands will join in the work of rebuilding the broken walls of this village church, consecrated by so many precious memories."

A correspondent of the Methodist Times attributes the conversion of John Allen, "the wickedest man in New York," to an article with this title, furnished by a young writer to a magazine published in that city, in which he gave a graphic description of Allen's dance-house and its vile goings-on. "This article caused a sensation through the entire country. The Methodists of New York got hold of the sunny side of Allen's heart, and on Monday last he was hopefully converted to God. The place is now a scene of a daily prayer-meeting. The house will not accommodate one-tenth of the curiosity seekers. The religious fire has extended through that low neighbourhood, and two 'rat-pit' proprietors have offered to close their establishments, if the Methodists would only say they were doing wrong, and would come there and hold a prayer-meeting." The reporters for the American papers, however, say, that at the prayer-meetings referred to Allen appears constantly fuddled, which his religious patrons do not deny, but plead that drunkenness is now his only vice, and that it is unreasonable to expect such a sinner to become thoroughly virtuous all at once.

It appears that the Episcopal Church has its troubles on the other side of the water as well as on this. Ritualism is causing excitement there no less than here, and several clergymen have been asserting principles and acting on them which are held to be subversive of the doctrine and discipline of the Church. As we mentioned some little time ago, the Rev. Mr. Tyng gave great offence, and was called to account for preaching in a Baptist pulpit; and now, even worse, the Rev. Mr. Hubbard, of Rhode Island, has actually allowed a Dissenting minister to officiate in his church, and pronounce the absolution! What the consequence will be remains to be seen. These matters are to be brought under the consideration of the General Convocation of the Church, which was to meet in New York on Wednesday last, and would probably continue in session for two or three weeks. The importance which is attached to the decisions of this, the supreme legislative body in the American Episcopal Church, by some of the clergy here, is shown in the request, made through the Guardian by one of them, that those who read his note "will remember the Convocation in their prayers during the time of its session, and that those who are priests will offer the Holy Sacrifice that God the Holy Ghost may lead its members into all truth." It will be interesting to compare the authority which the American bishops, free from State trammels, are able to exert, with that of their English brethren, and whether they are disposed or not to check Ritualism with a stronger hand.

From an account given in the Nation, N.Y., Oct.

the French Canadians, they would seem to be generally in a blessed state of ignorance of the troubles which free inquiry brings. The writer says of a gentleman whom he had an opportunity of studying:

"Having never been in France, and evidently regarding French society with a slight touch of horror, he seemed scarcely aware of the depth of the changes which it had undergone. The impiety and immorality of the Revolution were what evidently most impressed him, one of the many evidences one meets with in Lower Canada of the large share the clergy have had in modelling the new society. This gentleman told us, with a slight glow of enthusiasm, that to this day he did not believe there was a single French family in the whole of the thickly-settled parish in which he lived in which man or woman omitted to 'faire ses Pâques' every year, or to attend mass with tolerable regularity. He said he hardly ever met with a French peasant who had 'lost the faith,' unless he had been in the United States. Those who went there even for a short period, he said, came back irreligious men; not Protestants, but indifferents."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

SUNDAY.

FATHER FABER.

THERE is a Sabbath won for us,
A Sabbath stored above,
A service of eternal calm,
An altar-rite of love.

There shall transfigured souls be filled
With Christ's eternal name,
Dipped like bright censers in the sea
Of molten glass and flame.

Yet set not in thy thoughts too far
Our heaven and earth apart,
Lest thou should'st wrong the heaven begun
Already in thy heart.

And surely Sundays bright and calm—
So calm, so bright as this—
Are tastes imparted from above
Of higher Sabbath bliss.

We own no gloomy ordinance,
No weary Jewish day,
But weekly Easters, ever bright
With pure domestic ray.

A feast of thought, a feast of sight,
A feast of joyous sound,
A feast of thankful hearts, at rest,
From labour's wheel unbound.

A day of such homekeeping bliss
As on the poor may wait,
With all such lower joys as best
Befit his human state.

He sees among the hornbeam boughs
The little sparkling flood;
The mill wheel rests, a quiet thing
Of black and mossy wood.

He sees the fields lie in the sun,
He hears the plover crying;
The plough and harrow, both upturned,
Are in the furrow lying.

And should he ask, the happy man!
If heaven be aught like this;—
'Tis heaven within him, breeding there
The love of quiet bliss.

Oh, leave the man, my fretful friend,
To follow nature's way,
Nor breathe to him that Christian feasts
Are no true holidays.

Is earth to be as nothing here,
When we are sons of earth?
May not the body and the heart
Share in the spirit's mirth?

When thou hast cut each earthly hold
Whereto his soul may cling,
Will the poor creature left behind
Be more a heavenly thing?

Heaven fades away before our eyes,
Heaven fades within our heart,
Because in thought our heaven and earth
Are cast too far apart.

WITCHCRAFT.—PART I.

THE North American Review has a long article on Witchcraft, by a writer well "up" in the subject, a free abridgment of which, so as to bring it within our limits, may be interesting to some of our readers.

Credulity manifests itself in different ways, according as it is the daughter of fancy or of terror. The one lies warm about the heart as Folk-lore, fills moonlit dells with dancing fairies, sets out a meal for the Brownie, hears the tinkle of airy bridle-bells, changes Pluto and Proserpine into Oberon and Titania, and makes friends with unseen powers as Good Folk; the other is a bird of night, whose shadow sends a chill through the roots of the hair: it sucks with the vampire, gorges with the ghoul, is choked by the night-hag, and pines away under the witch's charm, giving up the fair realm of innocent belief to a murky throng, the progeny of morbid imagination. Both have vanished from among educated people, and such superstition as comes to the surface now-a-days is only the little harmless sentiment of fiction, all the more pleasing because there is no reality behind it to impose a duty or demand a sacrifice. It nails a horse-shoe over the door, but keeps a rattle by its bedside to summon a more substantial watchman; it hangs a crape on the beehives to get a taste of ideal sweetness, but follows the teaching of the latest bee-book for obtaining the best honey.

Whatever may have been its origin, a belief in spirits seems to have been common to all the nations of the ancient world. Even the ghost in chains, which one would naturally take to be a fashion peculiar to convicts escaped from purgatory, is older than the belief in that reforming penitentiary, as is shown by the following story which the younger Pliny tells:—

"There was a large and spacious house which lay under the disrepute of being haunted. In the dead of the night, a noise resembling the clashing of iron was frequently heard, which if you listened more attentively, sounded like the rattling of chains; at first it seemed at a distance, but approached nearer by degrees; immediately afterwards a spectre appeared, in the form of an old man, extremely meagre and ghastly, with a long beard and dishevelled hair, rattling the chains on his feet and hands. In consequence, the house was at last deserted, being judged by everybody to be absolutely uninhabitable; so that now it was entirely abandoned to the ghost. However, in hopes that some tenant might be found who was ignorant of this great calamity that attended it, a bill was put up giving notice that it was either to be let or sold. It happened that the philosopher Athenodorus came at this time to Athens, and reading the bill, inquired the price. The extraordinary cheapness raised his suspicions; nevertheless when he heard the whole story, he was so far from being discouraged that he was the more strongly inclined to hire it, and, in short, did so. When it grew towards evening, he ordered a couch to be prepared for him in the front part of the house, and, after calling for a light, with his pen and tablets, he directed all his people to retire. That his mind might not, for want of employment, be open to vain terrors of imaginary noises and spirits, he applied himself to writing with the utmost attention. The first part of the night passed with usual silence, when at length the chains began to rattle; he, however, neither lifted up his eyes nor laid down his pen, but diverted his observation by pursuing his studies with greater earnestness. The noise increased and advanced nearer, till it seemed at the door, and at last in the chamber. He looked up and saw the ghost exactly in the manner it had been described to him; it stood before him, beckoning with the finger. Athenodorus made a sign with his hand that it should wait a little, and threw his eyes again upon his papers; but the ghost still rattling his chains in his ears, he looked up and saw him beckoning as before. Upon this he immediately arose, and with the light in his hand followed it. The ghost slowly stalked along, as if encumbered with his chains, and turning into the area of the house, suddenly vanished. Athenodorus, being thus deserted, made a mark with some grass and leaves where the spirit left him. The next day he gave information of this to the magistrates, and advised them to order that spot to be dug up. This was accordingly done, and the skeleton of a man in chains was there found; for the body, having been a considerable time in the ground, was putrefied and mouldered away from the fetters. The bones, being collected together, were publicly buried, and thus, after the ghost was appeased by proper ceremonies, the house was haunted no more."

This story has a very modern air, but the demeanour of Athenodorus has the grand air of the classical period—of one who feels the superiority of a living philosopher to a dead Philistine. How far above all modern ornament is his prophylactic against his insubstantial fellow-lodger! Now-a-days men take pistols into haunted houses. Sterne discovered that gunpowder made all men equally tall, but Athenodorus had found out that pen and ink establish a superiority in spiritual stature. As men of this world, we feel our dignity exalted by his keeping an ambassador from the other waiting till he had finished his paragraph. Never surely did authorship appear to greater advantage.

It might not be difficult to account for the belief in ghosts by the tendency of the mind, under certain conditions, to confound the objective with the subjective, or rather to mistake the one for the other, if the appearance of the first ghost were once satisfactorily explained. If it was originally believed that only the spirits of those who had died violent deaths were permitted to wander, the conscience of a remorseful murderer may have been haunted with the memory of his victim, till the imagination, infected in its turn, gave outward reality to the image on the inward eye. After putting to death Bœtius and Symmachus, it is said that Theodoric saw in the head of a fish served at his dinner the face of Symmachus, grinning horribly and with flaming eyes, whereupon he took to his bed and died soon after in great agony of mind. It is not safe, perhaps, to believe all that is reported of an Arian; but, supposing the story to be true, there is but a short step from such a delusion of the senses to the complete ghost of popular legend.

But, in some of the most trustworthy stories of apparitions, they have shown themselves not only to persons who had done them no wrong in the flesh, but also to such as had never even known them. The eidolon of James Haddock appeared to a man named Taverner, that he might interest himself in recovering a piece of land unjustly kept from the dead man's infant son. According to Defoe, Bishop Jeremy Taylor twice examined Taverner, and was convinced of the truth of his story. In this case, Taverner had formerly known Haddock; but the apparition of an old gentleman that entered the learned Dr. Scott's study, and directed him where to find a missing deed, needful in settling what had lately been the ghost's estate in the West of England, chose for its attorney in the business an entire stranger, who had never even seen its original in the flesh.

A RITUALIST ILLUSTRATION.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Times declares that he heard Mr. Purchas, the ritualist incumbent of St. James's Chapel, Brighton, tell the following anecdote, in these words, from the pulpit steps: "I am reminded of the story of a gentleman who was walking in his garden, as he was wont to do of an afternoon, when he saw his son picking the snails from off the fruit trees and throwing them into his neighbour's garden. Of course, he reproved him for so reprehensible a proceeding. 'But,' said the son, 'our neighbour is a very bad man.' 'Can't help that; property and vested interests must be respected.' 'But, then, he is a cruel husband, and it is written, 'Husbands, love your wives.' 'Can't help that; property and vested interests must be respected.' 'And then, urged the son, 'he is a harsh father, his children even run away from him.' 'Can't help that; property and vested interests must be respected.' 'But, then, he's a Papist.' 'Oh, that alters the case entirely; throw as many snails as you like, my son, and may God's blessing be upon you!'"

INTELLIGENCE.

LONDON: STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.—We are requested to call the attention of our London friends to the services in this chapel next Sunday. The Rev. H. Ierson will preach in the morning, and the Rev. J. K. Applebee in the evening. The collections of the day are, we understand, to be given to the Rev. Robert Spears as a free-will offering, and we willingly commend to our friends this opportunity of showing their respect to one who richly deserves it.

ABERDARE.—On Thursday, the 1st instant, the English congregation of Unitarians held their annual tea meeting. More than three hundred sat down to tea. The chapel was beautifully decorated for the occasion and illuminated with gas. In the evening the company was entertained with an excellent concert of vocal and instrumental music.

BOLTON DISTRICT UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The half-yearly meeting of the Bolton District Unitarian Association was held at Walmsley, on the 1st inst. The attendance from Bolton and other neighbouring places was good. An afternoon service was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. John Fox, of Heywood, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. George Ride, of Chorley, from the text:—"Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." (1 Corinthians, iii., 11.) Tea was provided in the school room; after which David Shaw, Esq., of Park lane, near Wigan, presided over an evening meeting. Speeches were delivered by the Revs. J. S. Gilbert, G. Fox, G. Ride, J. Fox, Wm. Probert, M. C. Frankland, J. Worthington, J. Freeston, and J. Entwistle; and by Mr. Alderman R. Heywood and Mr. Frank Taylor. In the course of the proceedings the meeting adopted the following series of resolutions:

"That the members of this association, assembled at their half-yearly meeting, desire to place on record an expression of their firm adherence to the principle of civil and religious liberty all the world over, as maintained by their non-conforming forefathers.

"That, rejoicing in the measure of civil freedom already secured in their own land, they hail every fresh development of the noble principle that is founded in justice and with regard to the commonweal, both at home and abroad.

"That, while asserting their own right, and deeming it amongst their first duties, to propagate those views of Christianity which (as Unitarians) they hold dear, they at the same time refuse to bind their descendants to any written creed, or to consent to any measures calculated, whether directly or indirectly, to interfere with the entire exercise of religious freedom on the part of all sections of the Christian Church."

LONDON.—On September the 29th, the first cheap entertainment for the people was given at the Unitarian Mission-room. The attendance was large, and the people highly gratified.

COSELBY.—Haydn's oratorio, the "Creation," was performed in the schoolroom belonging to the Old Meeting-house, on Monday evening, September 28. There was a respectable audience, and the performance gave general satisfaction. The proceeds are to be applied towards paying off the debt incurred in building the new school.

ELLAND.—On Sunday morning last, the Rev. John Ellis commenced a series of discourses n

Christ's chapel, "On the Unitarian position relative to the Bible and the Christian religion." In the evening he preached a funeral sermon for Mr. Joe Burley, the oldest Unitarian in Elland, from 1 Cor. xv. 55-57.

KIDDERMINSTER.—On Sunday last, a discourse "In memory of the late George Talbot," formerly of Honeybrook, was delivered by the Rev. Edward Parry to a large and attentive congregation, at the new Meeting House. The text was Proverbs chap. x. v. 7, "The memory of the just is blessed." Amongst the congregation were a large number of Mr. Talbot's old Sunday scholars, who had been unwilling that the rare ardour and earnestness with which, years ago, he devoted himself to the Sunday School at the New Meeting should be forgotten.

SOUTH WALES.—The quarterly meeting of the Unitarian ministers of South Wales was held last week, commencing on Wednesday evening at Nottage, where discourses were delivered by the Revs. John Evans, Gellynion, and W. Thomas, M.A., Llandysul. Other services were held at Bridgend on Thursday, when the attendance of ministers was unusually large, there being present, Professor Hunter (Carmarthen), Revs. E. Higginson (Swansea), T. Lloyd (Nottage), E. W. Lloyd (Cwmbach), J. B. Lloyd (Wareham), T. Thomas (Pantylfeid), W. Thomas (Llwyn), Isaac T. Williams (Cefn), J. William (Blaengarach), J. Evans (Gellynion), R. Jones (Bridgend), R. J. Jones (Aberdare), Professor Evans (Carmarthen). The devotional services were conducted by J. T. Williams and J. Davies; and sermons were preached in the morning by Professor Hunter in English, and T. Thomas in Welsh; in the afternoon by J. Davies and W. Thomas, both in Welsh. The attendances both at Nottage and Bridgend were large, and the services such as to give general satisfaction. The next quarterly meeting will be held in Christmas week at Onnen Fawr, Llandilo. Subject of conference: "Forgiveness of Sins."

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

TROWBRIDGE.—Next week.

A. L.—Received.

SOMETHING WANTED IN OUR WORSHIP.

To the Editors.—It is said that eminent statesman—the late Richard Cobden—once asserted that on any political question he would sooner trust to the opinion of a majority of the people than to that of ten of our brightest statesmen. Although such a statement would be regarded by many as being quite incongruous, yet if all the principal legislatures in the world be not almost beside themselves, and individual and national prosperity comes in spite of the retrogression and shortcomings of these assemblies, they are seemingly proving that it was a wise and prophetic saying; and if such is the case in politics, it may also be so in theology. If, however, it was to-morrow put to the country to say whether Unitarianism was a Scriptural doctrine, few will venture to predict that the vote would not be vastly against us; and I believe for the very reason that it has been kept in such comparative obscurity: most of what thousands have heard about it is, that it is some strange heathenish incomprehensible doctrine which is never likely to be embraced but by a few of the most contrary and eccentric.

On a fine Sunday afternoon, in a village in the Peak of Derbyshire, where there are two chapels—a Methodist and a Unitarian—two persons once watched the inhabitants as they repaired to their respective places of worship. They perceived that only about one in six entered the latter named. One of these spectators (a Methodist local minister) asked his friend (a son of a gentleman of the other persuasion, but himself a mere boy) how he accounted for such a decided preference of the villagers? Quoth the youth, after scratching his head for a moment, "Very wise folks were always thinly scattered." Perhaps some such idea as this consoles many of our brethren when they view the small progress we make in point of numbers; but I think it must be admitted that, unless a church reaches the masses, either in the doctrine or its teachers, there is something wanting.

I have long been in favour of some modification of our general form of worship, so as to make it more attractive to the young, and more in harmony with the spirit of the age in which we live; but, differing from the opinion of the talented author of the articles on this subject which have lately appeared in the Herald, I think the ministers are the most responsible party. Lord Chesterfield said that ministers were neither better nor worse than other folks. If this be true, it is a sad state of things. If they are not more largely possessed of those properties which have characterised all great and eminent men—forbearance, toleration, and a knowledge of their own fallibility, which enable them when in debate, or in whatever useful work they may be engaged, to meet with grace those thousand little annoyances with which every earnest and philanthropic man is sure to come in contact; if they have not more winning manners—more tact, whether in or outside their special duties, of averting and calming down all party feelings and contention than their fellows, who have to battle with the storms of trade and the snares of traders—then they surely have yet to learn the most essential part of their calling. Far be it from being understood that I am aiming this as a reflection upon either Unitarian or any other body of ministers. I think, however, our own ministers generally lack spirit and energy, and a closer discernment of people's habits and tastes, and also the best means of drawing their attention, and provoking their thought. They cling too much to the policy of what ought to be done—providing everyone was thoughtful and intelligent—instead of turning their attention to what is best to be done in the present state of affairs. We have ministers with next to no congregations, who prepare sermons fit to be classed with the finest productions of the day, and after being read over on the Sunday to their few hearers, they are consigned to oblivion; and outside this small circle, the minister and his talents are to the world all but unknown. There is, perhaps, nothing in either our own or any other form of worship that has such a depressing influence on the congregation as a host of empty pews. I cannot think this would be the case in any of our chapels if the rational, consistent, and ennobling truths of our doctrine were made known, and the learning and eloquence of its ministers exercised as they ought. When any of their sermons get published, they not uncommonly are sold at a price which just keeps them out of the reach of those who most need them—a course that is alike unfortunate to the publisher as well as the public. If our ministers, instead of making their sermons exclusively epistles to the literati, would intersperse them with more lively illustrations, which would be likely to awaken the admiration of the less learned and young; and instead of delivering them in what is sometimes thought to be a distant, formal, clerk of arraigns tone and manner, they would adopt the earnest, familiar, conversation style which is peculiar to extempore preachers, they would, I think, find themselves much more appreciated, and would infuse a health and stimulus into the worship greatly refreshing.

I shall be very sorry to hear such phrases as "Give peace in our time, O Lord, because there is none other who fighteth for us but only thou, O God." If it has any meaning at all, it appears to me to be rather a blasphemous one. I must confess that each time I hear it chanted, or the following, "O Lord, make haste to help us. O God, make speed to save us." I feel more or less abashed.

No one, however, will be more willing to recognise any change that may be generally believed will prove useful and interesting. PAUL GILL.
Sheffield, September 30, 1868.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editors.—Permit me to call your attention to an important mistake in your leader of October 2nd, in which you speak of Christ as "blessing the bread and wine." In no part of the Bible is he said to have blessed bread and wine, or made holy bread and holy wine as the Romanists make "holy water." The word "it," in the account of the last supper, is not in the original, and should not have been supplied. In Luke ix. 16, the "the," original of the word "them," was not in the Syriac, as appears from Hopton Haynes. Christ blessed or gave thanks to God, agreeably to a pious custom of the Jews. I should not trouble you on the subject, but I see that the same mistake has been made by other Unitarian friends.—Yours faithfully,

WM. HUNTER.

County Cork, Bandon, Oct. 4, 1868.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—The Midland Company's MAIN LINE TRAINS now run to and from the NEW ST. PANCRAS STATION, LONDON.

A New and Improved Service of EXPRESS and FAST TRAINS has been established between MANCHESTER and LONDON, BRISTOL, BIRMINGHAM, LEICESTER, NOTTINGHAM, and DERBY, &c., &c.—The following tables show the TRAIN SERVICE for October:—

BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND LONDON.										SUNDAYS.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	9.45	9.50	12.45	3.30	3.55	6.20	6.30	6.45	p.m.	p.m.
LONDON (St. Pancras) arr.	12.0	2.45	4.0	6.30	8.20	10.45				10.0
LONDON (St. Pancras) dep.	6.15	9.0	10.0	11.30	3.0	4.40				2.50
MANCHESTER.....arr.	12.15	2.50	3.0	5.0	8.5	9.40				8.0
Through carriages run between London and Manchester by all trains.
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND LEICESTER.										SUNDAYS.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	9.10	9.45	9.50	12.30	3.55	6.20	6.30	6.45	p.m.	p.m.
LEICESTER.....arr.	9.30	11.53	12.20	1.27	4.0	6.5	7.50	10.55	12.50	7.20
LEICESTER.....dep.	6.20	9.0	11.24	12.23	2.12	4.10	5.35	7.3	1.55	5.25
MANCHESTER.....arr.	10.5	12.15	2.50	3.0	5.0	8.5	8.5	9.40	5.45	8.0
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND NOTTINGHAM.										SUNDAYS.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	9.10	9.45	9.50	12.35	3.55	6.20	6.30	6.45	p.m.	p.m.
NOTTINGHAM.....arr.	9.25	10.50	12.10	1.0	3.10	5.55	7.35	10.20	12.20	7.10	9.45
NOTTINGHAM.....dep.	7.10	9.50	11.25	12.35	2.35	5.50	7.15	9.40	11.20	5.45	8.0
MANCHESTER.....arr.	10.5	11.45	12.15	2.50	3.0	5.0	8.5	9.40	11.20	5.45	8.0
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND DERBY.										SUNDAYS.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	9.10	9.45	9.50	12.35	3.55	6.20	6.30	6.45	p.m.	p.m.
DERBY.....arr.	8.31	10.5	11.20	12.15	2.15	5.40	7.10	9.10	11.20	6.20	9.0
DERBY.....dep.	8.0	8.50	10.15	12.25	1.25	3.30	6.35	8.45	8.25	6.25	7.0
MANCHESTER.....arr.	10.5	11.45	12.15	2.50	3.0	5.0	8.5	9.35	11.20	5.45	8.0
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND BIRMINGHAM.										SUNDAYS.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	9.10	9.50	12.45	3.30	3.55	6.20	6.30	6.45	p.m.	p.m.
BIRMINGHAM.....arr.	10.5	12.40	3.20	4.55	7.25	9.30	11.30			9.45	11.20
BIRMINGHAM.....dep.	7.45	9.25	11.10	1.20	3.25	5.30	7.35	9.40	11.20	5.45	8.0
MANCHESTER.....arr.	12.15	2.50	3.0	5.0	8.5	9.40				5.45	8.0
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND BRISTOL.										SUNDAYS.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	9.50	12.45	3.30	3.55	6.20				p.m.	p.m.
BRISTOL.....arr.	2.25	5.35	7.50	12.20						4.45	6.5
BRISTOL.....dep.	8.0	8.45	11.50	3.20	3.55	6.20				4.45	6.5
MANCHESTER.....arr.	3.0	5.0	8.5	9.40						5.45	8.0
Through carriages run between Manchester and Bristol by 6.55 a.m. and 12.45 p.m. Trains from Manchester, and 8.0 a.m. and 8.20 p.m. from Bristol.
Derby, October 1868.

Printed for the Proprietors by WILLIAM EVANS, at the "Herald" Press, 14, Market-street, Manchester, at his printing-works, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, October 9, 1868.

THE COMING WEEK.

Bristol.—A congregational meeting on Monday, to present Miss Carpenter with an address before leaving for India.

London: STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.—Annual sermon on Sunday. Preacher: Morning, Rev. H. Terson; evening, Rev. J. K. Applebee. Collections as an offering to the minister.

London.—Week night services as under:—WALLWORTH, ST. JOHN'S CHAPEL: Monday.—CLERKENWELL, PLUMMER PLACE: Tuesday.—HOXTON: Monday.—STAMFORD LECTURE HALL: Tuesday.—STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL: Wednesday.—MILE END: Wednesday.—FOREST HILL: Thursday.—CLERKENWELL, ST. JOHN'S SQUARE: Friday.

London: KENTISH TOWN FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. The Rev. P. W. Clayden will preach on Sunday, morning and evening.

Manchester: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY.—Annual soiree on Saturday evening.

Manchester: STRANGEWAYS FREE CHURCH.—On Sunday next: Morning, Rev. James Black, of Stockport evening, Rev. Brooke Herford.

Penmaenmawr: PENDYFFERYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. W. B. Hughes; service at 11 a.m.

Rawtenstall.—On Sunday afternoon and evening, sermons by the Rev. Joseph Freeston, in aid of the chapel fund.

Swinton.—On Sunday morning and afternoon, sermons for the clothing fund, by the Rev. John Shannon.

Stalybridge.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. R. C. Dendy. Subject, "The Unitarian doctrine of the Atonement considered as a practical power."

Births.

ROBINSON.—On the 6th inst., at Boston, the wife of the Rev. W. W. Robinson, of a daughter.

STEINTHAL.—On the 3rd inst., at Hollywood, Fallowfield, the wife of H. M. Steintal, Esq., of a son.

Marriages.

BARBER—HARLAND.—On the 7th inst., at the Strangers Unitarian Free Church, by the Rev. Brooke Herford, Edmund Barber, of Manchester, to Bertha, second daughter of the late John Harland, Esq., F.S.A., of Cneetham-hill, near Manchester. No cards.

PESEL—BLYTH.—On the 6th inst., at Edinburgh, by the Rev. Robert B. Drummond, B.A., George Henry Pesel, Esq., of Dundee, to Barbara Alice, only surviving daughter of Howard Blyth, Esq., of Edinburgh.

Deaths.

BRIGGS.—On the 4th inst., at the house of his son, H. Currer Briggs, Esq., Fernbrae, Dundee, Henry Briggs, Esq., of Outwood Hall, near Wakefield.

ELLIOTT.—On the 1st inst., at Barnard Castle, Ann Elliott, relict of the late Archibald Elliott, of Barnard Castle, aged 80 years.

ROBERTS.—On the 28th ult., at the house of his son-in-law, Wm. Hollins, Esq., Pleasley-vale, near Mansfield, John Roberts, Esq., of Collin House, county Antrim, in his 73rd year.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITEFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS of BEDDING and WEAVING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8' Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

WHITEFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS, CASH AND DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application. WHITEFIELD & SONS, VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

PRICE 1D.

INDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—
Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmalow.

Mr. Herford will be glad to forward, on application, a complete list of the "Home Page" Tracts and Covers.

WHITFIELD & SONS,
VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET,
EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE,
BIRMINGHAM.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

A curious question has arisen in India owing to the High Court of Madras having decided that an apostate from Christianity who has married a Christian wife, on his return to Hindooism, may marry as many wives as are allowed by Hindoo law without being guilty of bigamy. The question which arises is, what relief is to be given by the Legislature to the injured Christian wife? Surely, the most intolerant Hindoo must acknowledge that she is entitled to relief. Some legal authorities believe that there is no ground for the position that a Hindoo Christian convert can be re-admitted to caste. But it is a curious proof of the way in which Hindooism, in spite of its pretended immobility, does accommodate itself to circumstances, that the Southern Brahmins have invented their doctrine of reconversion, the ceremonial of re-admission consisting, it is said, in branding with a hot iron the tongue which has confessed Christ.

According to the Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall, Queen Isabella has accepted the hospitality offered her by the Pope, and is daily expected at Rome. While her fall has greatly afflicted the Holy Father, the Roman people hail it with satisfaction, which would have been greater but for a rumour that her ex-Majesty will bring no money with her. There is a story, told on good authority, that when the Pope heard that this was likely to be the case, he said to Antonelli, "What think you? Shall I give her back the magnificent tiara she sent me?" The Cardinal, who is never liberal, in any sense of the word, replied, "Most Holy Father, the tiara has been presented to the Apostolic Palace, of which I am prefect, and I must oppose its restitution nor has your Holiness any power over it."

The Bishop of Capetown is on his way to South Africa, and we hope is having smoother sailing on the ocean than he had here. Mr. Macrorie, whom he has had in leading-strings so long, will, it is said, follow him in December, and be consecrated Bishop of Natal, somewhere, at the beginning of the year, but without the royal mandate. Before leaving, Dr. Gray informed his friends that he had lodged an appeal against the late judgments in favour of his heretical brother, Colenso; about January, therefore, we may look for the sluices to be opened of ecclesiastical strife.

The revolution in Spain has given another heavy blow to Ultramontanism. Crowds one evening paraded the streets of Madrid carrying about a transparency inscribed, "Down with the Concordat!" "Down with the tyrants of Rome!" "Long live Rome liberated!" And a day or two since the concordat was burnt by a large gathering of people in front of the Papal nuncio's residence. The new Minister of Justice, too, has issued a decree suppressing the Society of Jesuits throughout Spain, closing their schools, and declaring all the Society's property to belong to the State. When the most Catholic people in the world take to manifestations like these, the Pope must begin to feel that matters are getting serious.

Ecclesiastical changes seem to be taking place in Russia, as well as elsewhere. The Petersburg papers report the general abolition of the "hereditary clergy." It appears that up to within a recent period every clergyman was forced to send his sons to clerical schools and seminaries—to educate him, in fact, for the Church, whether he liked it or not.

The meeting of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, to which we referred last week, seems to have been a most uproarious one, and by no means creditable to the bishops and other dignitaries present. The Guardian says, "the cries of 'Divide!' 'Spoke!' 'Sit down!' 'Chair!' were very vociferous at times, and converted the boardroom of a respectable Church society into something like a clerical 'bear garden.'" It sometimes strikes us it might not be amiss if a society were established for promoting Christian Practice.

Her Majesty's Board of Works has just completed the re-causwaying of the Parliament Square, Edinburgh; and a stone, brazed "I. K., 1572," within an orle, has been set to mark the burial place of the renowned "Scots worthy," John Knox, over whose grave the Regent Morton pronounced the eulogium—"There lies one who never feared the face of man."

The rector of Oake, in Somersetshire, our readers may remember, lately threatened the trustees and members of a Methodist congregation in Wales, that if they did not support the Tory candidate, he should turn them out of their chapel, supposing that their lease was only for 99 years, and that the greater part of it had expired. We are glad to state that the lease turns out to be for 999 years, so there is not much likelihood that the rector will be put to the painful necessity of carrying his threat into execution.

A couple of advowsons are offered for sale in the Times. The particulars given in the advertisements relate almost entirely to the comforts of the parsonage. In one case it is of "Elizabethan style of architecture, in thorough repair, contains study, dining, drawing, ten bedrooms, and servants' hall; three-stall stable, loose box, coach-house with man's room over, large lawn, flower and kitchen gardens." Among other attractive features, the population is under 300. In the other case, "the rectory-house and offices have only been built within the last few years, in the Tudor style, at a cost of several thousands. The grounds attached to the house are in excellent order, and the stable, coach-house (double), walled gardens, cider press, barn, &c., are substantially and artistically built." "The whole," it is added, "is admirably suited for a gentleman of family," the society being "of the highest class," the church close to the rectory, and the population only 320.

From a work just published on the "Rites and Customs of the Greco-Russian Church," our Anglican Ritualists might get some hints as to what fasting means when carried out in earnest. Madame Romanoff tells us:

"For the eight weeks of Lent no Russian will use any article of food that can be traced to an animal, except fish, which is, however, considered a luxury, and not eaten by the religious during the whole period. Many old ladies (who are always the most rigorous fasters) will not use sugar, because it is purified with bullock's blood. Tea and coffee is taken without cream. There is a distinct set of kitchen utensils for fast cookery. The very iron ladies are changed. A knife that has buttered one slice of bread cannot be used to cut a second dry slice for a faster, and the slice is cut from the other side of the loaf."

The autumnal meetings of the Congregational Union were opened at Leeds, on Tuesday, by an address from Dr. Raleigh, the president, which dealt mainly with the present position of Church matters, and pointed out clearly and strongly some of the advantages which would result from the disestablishment, not only of the Irish, but the English Church also. In a discussion, raised by the Rev. A. Clark, of Stockport, on the practice of submitting "something like a creed" to candidates for Church membership, we are glad to say that the feeling of some of the leaders in the Union seemed to be decidedly against it. The Rev. Samuel Martin, of Westminster, said, and this was received with applause, that he had never kept any body away from the Lord's table who came to him, and said, "I know and trust and love our Saviour, and I should wish to commemorate his death in that institution."

After all, the majority of the Edinburgh Town Council have not succeeded in preventing the appointment of Mr. Wallace, suspected of holding latitudinarian principles, to be the successor to Dr. Lee in the church and parish of Old Greyfriars, the Established Church Presbytery of Edinburgh having agreed that he should be presented to the vacancy.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

Seeing that the Czar is head of the Russian Church, to all intents and purposes, as if he claimed personally to ordain her clergy and consecrate her bishops, the Pall Mall says:—

"Naturally, the invitation of the Pope to the Eastern bishops will be strongly opposed by the Russian Government. That no subject of Russia, of the 'Orthodox' Church, will be allowed to attend at the coming council, we may rest well assured. For a Russian orthodox prelate even to discuss the possibility of a union with Rome is to discuss the possibility of a curtailment of the rights and privileges of the Russian monarchy. Whatever countries and creeds may, therefore, be represented in next year's gathering, no Greek bishop, on whom Russia can impose her authority will appear. But who is to prevent the Greek bishops living under the Sultan from joining in the discussion of devices for their union with the Pope? If we may trust universal rumour, the Greek clergy of Turkey have got over their sensibilities about Easter and the 'Filioque,' and are many of them seriously contemplating attendance at Rome. And if the Turkish Government were wise in its generation, it would by every possible means foster these newly-born coquettings with the Roman See. What harm can the Pope do to the Sultan which he does not do already? None. On the other hand, the Sultan would gain by whatever anti-Russian feeling would be generated or encouraged amongst his Christian subjects by devotion to the spiritual enemy of Russia."

Our contemporary thinks that superstitious and retrograde as may be the inner life of the Roman communion, that of Eastern Christianity is worse; and adds:

"It may answer the purpose of a few Anglican enthusiasts to invent dreams about the practical identity of the Greek and Anglican creeds and the feasibility of a union between the Greek and the Anglican clergy, but beyond this little knot of visionaries there is a unanimity of conviction that the identity of creed and practice is not between Greek and Anglican Christian, but between Greek and Roman. The Greek, indeed, is more entirely uninfluenced by the modern scientific, philosophical, and social changes which are steadily leavening the Roman communion. The intense conservatism of the 'unchanging East' has preserved the Christian habits and ideas of a thousand years ago as a protest against the novelties of the volatile West, so that Rome has at times been stigmatised by Eastern divines as a 'rationalist' Church. Roman 'rationalism' could, therefore, scarcely fail to penetrate into the pulpits, the seminaries, and the monasteries of the East, the moment the hand of Muscovite jealousy was withdrawn; and so far the general Christian world would be the gainer."

The same paper uses a very heretical tone, in speaking of the great schism which for so many hundred years has divided the Eastern and Western sections of Christendom. It says:

"The trivialities which originally brought about that disruption have long ceased to be a matter of much interest to controversialists on either side. To ordinary persons it seems almost incredible that the Christian world should have been thrown into convulsions by differences as to the right day for celebrating the Easter festival, or the omission of the famous 'Filioque' from the Athanasian creed. The political effects to be expected from the reunion of East and West are something very different from a rearrangement of the Oriental calendar, or the adoption of a phrase which has absolutely no meaning at all to any but neo-Platonic speculators."

So that, according to our contemporary, the great body of Christians are doomed "without doubt to perish everlastingly" for not "thinking" rightly of that "which has absolutely no meaning at all," except, perhaps, to one in a hundred thousand."

The Romish Church is evidently being prepared for the authoritative declaration of the Pope's sole infallibility by the Council of next year. The Civiltà Cattolica, which receives its inspirations "from the Vatican alone," declares that it is already a "fixed doctrine of the Catholic Church," and adds:

"If not a Bishop can be found who teaches the contrary, we can find, with ease and without research, five hundred, and to whose opinion all the other Bishops scattered throughout the universe have adhered, who both profess and 'teach' the Pontifical infallibility. And if we are asked who they are, we have only to reply that they are the Patriarchs, Archbishops, and Bishops who signed the address presented to the Sovereign Pontiff on the celebration of the Centenary of St. Peter. The doctrine of the infallibility of the Pope is there both expressed and professed in the clearest terms. The most solemn, the most significant, the most appropriate terms are there condensed in order to express the plenitude and infallibility of the divine magisteria of the Pope."

The Monde publishes "by Papal authority" a highly significant commentary to the supposed general invitation of Protestants to the great Council. His Holiness has invited by apostolical letters the schismatic archbishops and bishops of the East. These letters are not intended for, as they have not been addressed to, Protestant bishops. In the greater number of the Eastern churches the Episcopal dignity has been preserved and regularly transmitted. Her bishops are, in the eyes of the Catholic churches, invested with a sacred character, and are, therefore, entitled to take part in the Council. This is not the case with the "pastors" of the different Protestant communities. They are no longer connected with the Catholic hierarchy by the bonds of a proper and binding ordination. The Pope, however, animated by the desire to bring them back to unity by all the means in his power, and touched by the sentiments which a great number of them manifest, addresses special letters to them, calling upon them to return into the bosom of the Catholic Church, and expresses the hope that from their reunion the salvation of the world may be brought to pass.

The Times confesses its astonishment at hearing, on Mr. Macrorie's authority, that Dr. Gray has been playing the part of a Paul in our domestic difficulties. All that we have heard of Dr. Gray is that he very nearly made the bishops quarrel at Lambeth, and that they refused to entertain the question he brought before them; that he has written very angry letters, that he has provoked grave archbishops and bishops to protest publicly against his acts, and that with the exception of the Ritualists—unless, indeed, he may be identified with them—he has done more than any one to provoke dissension within the Church of England. If this be a St. Paul, the day for such apostolic characters is past, and the more they are confined to South Africa the better. But our St. Paul spoke for himself in the evening, and fully accepted the magnificent office which his Silas claimed for him in the morning. Some of his utterances, indeed, were by no means in keeping. When he declared that "no church could long live disendowed," he must have forgotten that he was sustaining the character of a man who planted the Church in Europe unaided, and who in the midst of his labours worked night and day lest he should be chargeable to those he instructed. The great wants of the Church, according to Dr. Gray, are more bishops and more money. These are the great spiritual weapons of the nineteenth-century St. Paul. This is the true colonial idea of evangelisation. Our oldest missionary society has become simply an association for propagating bishops in foreign parts, and one of the chief occupations of these bishops seems to be that of collecting money in England. But this is rather a breakdown after the Council at Jerusalem and St. Paul's missionary journeys.

We mentioned a few weeks ago that Dr. Newman had written a letter, in which, as a Roman Catholic, he denied, of course, the validity of "Anglican orders." The Rev. F. W. Mossman, vicar of West Torrington, Yorkshire, is greatly shocked at this, declaring that "the whole question involved is one of life and death to us poor Anglicans," and ends a letter to Dr. Newman thus:

"I feel sure you will not misunderstand my motive in thus writing to you. I think I know something of the troubles of this distracted English Church; and it is because I feel so strongly that those terrible distractions are to be healed, not by Anglican priests coming to a belief that they are only laymen—even if it be unbaptised laymen—but by their believing in their priesthood, and acting upon it. And then, when they do this, I feel sure that, in God's own good time, it will come to pass that Anglicans will also see that it is God's will that they should submit to the Holy Apostolic See, and that it is their duty as well as their privilege to be in communion with that Bishop who alone is the true successor of Peter, and, by Divine Providence, the Primate of the Catholic Church. The lurid, murky flame of Protestantism, enkindled in the sixteenth century, is rapidly becoming quenched, and the true light of the Gospel, which twice before came to England from Rome, is once more beginning to beam upon us from the Eternal City, where the Prince of the Apostles and the Doctor of the Gentiles shed their blood."

It does not seem to occur to Mr. Mossman that he might relieve himself at once from all his difficulties by following Dr. Newman's example, and escaping from the "lurid, murky flame of Protestantism" to the shelter of the "Holy Apostolic See."

The Pall Mall, in mentioning Dr. Mansel's appointment to the Deanery of St. Paul's, says:

"Though his doctrines seem to carry sterility and death with them, to raise theology to its foundations, and to sow the field of speculation with salt, still they are animated with a thoroughly orthodox intention. But it is as the centre of the Tory propaganda at Oxford, and as an active member of Mr. Gathorne Hardy's committee, that he has earned his elevation. Dr. Mansel's elevation to the deanery of St. Paul's happily vacates the Regius Professorship of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford. The proper filling of this chair is more important than that of many more dignified and elevated offices. It is much to be regretted that the necessity which existed of promptly rewarding Dr. Mansel's services shortly after Mr. Gathorne Hardy's election, should have raised him to a post for which he might easily indeed have acquired the requisite learning, but for which, without a mental revolution, he could never have gained the right order of mind. The skill in logical fence which disarms an adversary, and the qualities which enable a man to exhibit and interpret the course of Christian history, are very different."

In an address to the electors of Carlisle, Dean Close tells them that a "nation without a State

Church is a godless people." This is rather hard on all the religious bodies of America, the Dean's included. He likewise calls Mr. Gladstone's proposal to disestablish the Irish Church "an unprincipled robbery of a faithful and unoffending Church;" which seems to us a little uncharitable. Although we have a State Church, it seems not to have taught the nation its duty as it ought to have done, for the Dean looks, not to it, but the House of Lords, to prevent this "unprincipled robbery."

Archdeacon Redmond, parish priest of Arklow, who proclaims the Magna Charta of Ireland to be "A free church, a free soil, and a free education," says:

"Let the Catholic jar, the Established Church jar, the Presbyterian jar, and the Wesleyan jar, be flung into the river by equal laws and public opinion, and let the weakest bear the consequence of the collision. As the Established clergy seem to think theirs to be the brazen vessel, they should have no fears for the issue, and ought to be proud of proving the quality of its material."

Dr. Watts, Theological Professor in the Presbyterian College, in a lecture at Belfast, replied to the arguments, if such they could be called, of the Dean of Cork and others at the Church Congress. He would ask any man who told them that the country would lose her Christianity after the Church was disestablished what he meant. The American nation had no Established Church, and it sent Christianity to India, to the Sandwich Islands, to China, and to South America. The text of Dr. Magee's sermon was the "Breaking of the net." It was a curious exercise in homiletics. What was breaking the net? They had drawn in such a multitude of Irishmen that the net would not hold them! They stood crying to those on the other side of St. George's Channel, "Come over and help us; the net is breaking, we are oppressed with the load of fishes we have caught." Such an extraordinary attempt to apply a passage of Scripture he (Dr. Watts) had never heard before. "It was a serious matter with Protestants to say to the civilised world that Protestantism could not stand up and have a fair fight with the Papacy except it had the liberty of taxing Papists."

With regard to Mr. Disraeli's dilemma—the Established Church or the Pope—the Times observes it has always been hard to treat it seriously. Whether the Established Church of England and Ireland be that "Church alone which has hitherto been able to cope" with Rome Mr. Disraeli may discuss with the Scotch Kirk. If he like to go to history he might have found his answer in England under the Commonwealth.

In noticing a work on Milton, by M. Edmond de Guerle, who tries to shew that he was not a Unitarian, the Westminster Review observes that,

"Though not a Socinian, Milton was an Arian, and so can be claimed by Channing and his school as anti-Trinitarian, and though Milton maintained firmly the pre-existence of Christ, yet if he believed, as he is understood to have believed, that the divine essence would have been as perfect if the Son had never been begotten, though anti-Socinian he was yet, in a very true sense, Unitarian."

Like Lord Macaulay, even before the publication of the "Treatise on Christian Doctrine," we always wondered how any person could have read the "Paradise Lost" without suspecting the author of Arianism, there are so many passages of a kind which no sound Trinitarian could have written.

The Rev. W. Perceval Ward, who never wrote "with a greater sense of responsibility," feels himself placed in a great difficulty by the hymn sung in honour of the Virgin, in the recent grand procession at All Saint's, Lambeth. He says, in the Guardian:

"On the one hand I have before me the great practical sin (as I believe it) of what is popularly called 'Mariolatry'; that sin of the Roman communion which will eventually, perhaps, more hinder the reunion of Christendom than aught else,—scarcely excepting the extravagant modern claims of the Papacy. On the other hand, we see among all classes, from the highest to the lowest, a cold semi-Socinianism, unconsciously accepted by the majority we may quite hope, but consciously held by a large number we cannot but fear—an absence of any adequate realisation of the great fact of the Incarnation, which eats out the life of our religion; and this semi-Socinianism, I am more and more convinced, arises from the neglect among Protestants of that due honour which all Christians ought to pay to the ever-blessed Mother of God Incarnate. So far from due honour having been paid to her, the reaction against 'Mariolatry' has caused her to be often spoken of in a half contemptuous tone, her angelically-declared title refused her, and her wondrous place in the Divine economy ignored. I will not speak of worse things than these, though such are only too often said and written of her among those who call themselves 'Evangelical Christians.'

A writer in the Freeman, who thinks all the efforts of wit or of precise minds could not define the creed of some men, takes Father Ignatius as an instance, and asks,

"What is he? A Ritualist? Well, he preaches salvation by Jesus Christ, apart from human merit, free will, unsolicited and unhelped by man—conversion by the Holy Spirit alone. Is he a broad Churchman? Well, he unsparingly denounces all heterodoxy—all Colensoism and Broad Church theology. Is he a Low Churchman? Yes, one minute, as low as an illiterate Ranter; but the next, displaying his learning of St. Agnes, St. Ursula, and St. Dorothy, and the other saints in the Roman Catholic calendar. In one part of his discourse you might take him to be a Plymouth B.; at another a revivalistic Methodist preacher; the next minute he is painfully, though somewhat amusingly, Popish. The only certain thing that may be declared of his teaching is that it is inconsistent with itself; that it is vulgar and incoherent—full of slang words and savage phrases—a jumble at the best, harmless at the worst. At least, he must be exceeding simple who could be seduced by the trash which we have heard from 'Father Ignatius.' His manner is snappishly offensive and rude, his matter is weak and silly, and his exhibition of the truths of the gospel tends to disgrace them in the minds of his hearers."

The English Independent says:

"The Scotch bishops think they must make themselves heard amidst the prevailing hurly-burly, though it would seem their better policy neither to peep nor to mutter, but to keep as still as mice, for every word they say reminds the English people that the two neighbouring countries of England and Scotland have two incompatible 'religious Establishments,' and that this is fatal to the plea of obligation upon a State to endow the true religion. However, Bishop Wordsworth, of St. Andrews, is so angry with the leaders of the Scotch Kirk for declining to coalesce with him that he denounces them altogether, and threatens them with disestablishment. He has discovered the reason why Presbyterian ministers do not fraternise with the Episcopalians. All their ministers and elders have to take a vow never to modify their system in regard to matters either doctrinal or practical, and this 'unhappy pledge' fetters their consciences and restrains their secret yearnings after Episcopacy! Bishop Wordsworth vouches for it as a matter of personal knowledge. Too long has he suffered this 'anti-national and anti-Christian pledge' to remain unexposed, and too long have he and his brethren 'looked on without remonstrance, while the use of all ecclesiastical property has been engrossed by a section of the community, whose title to its possession was never constitutionally valid, and may now be questioned on other grounds.' The Bishop not only arraigns the Scotch Establishment on the ground of error, reasonably considering that 'it would be better to have no Establishment at all than one which is indissolubly wedded to false ecclesiastical principles,' but he declares that 'it fails to fulfil the functions of an Establishment in any wide or general sense,' and so he disposes of the utilitarian reason for its existence. Bishop Wordsworth, in a word, means to do for Scotland what Cardinal Cullen does in Ireland and Mr. Miall in England—he will lead the attack on the Establishment, protesting against its injustice, unreason, and impiety. This gives to the present ecclesiastical and political struggle quite a beautiful symmetry and completeness. When each party in turn denounces the Establishment of the other as mischievous and ungodly, it is time that Establishments should be given up by mutual agreement."

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XXV.

SUBJECT: "The Hebrew belief that God will reward men's actions."

Read Psalm xxxvii. Fret not thyself because of evil-doers, for yet a little while and the wicked shall not be. I have been young, the Psalmist goes on to say, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken and his seed begging bread. When the wicked man is spreading himself like a green bay tree, we are directed to look forward and to mark that his posterity will be cut off. Such is the explanation given in many parts of the Bible of the retribution of human conduct. But as life is full of difficulties that we do not understand, and this general rule does not always hold good, we find several of the Hebrew writers attempting a further answer.

Read Psalm xciv. O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, shew thyself. O Jehovah, how long shall the wicked triumph? Quickly comes the rebuke, He that formed the eye, can He not see? He that chastiseth the nations, can He not correct? Our thoughts and our short-sightedness, we are reminded, are vanity in the sight of God. Jehovah chasteneth man and teacheth him so that He may give him rest from the days of adversity. Has the throne of iniquity, the Psalmist indignantly asks, a fellowship with God? We are called upon to look to God as our defence, and to trust that He shall cut the wicked off.

For a fuller and more elaborate treatise on the uses of misfortune, see the book of Job. Job, in a set of speeches, at great length questions the wisdom of the Almighty in allowing evil to flourish upon the earth. His three friends repeatedly endeavour to silence him, bidding him to see and be satisfied that the wicked and good both meet with their reward, while Job still holds to his opinion that there remain unexplained inequalities in life. Elihu, the fourth friend, then makes a speech, of which we may here read two short passages: Chap. xxxiii. 8—30. Elihu blames Job for asserting his innocence; this of itself is a fault. God is greater than man, and giveth not an account of any of His doings. He bids Job see that God chasteneth man with pain on his bed till he can no longer eat his meat, and his life draweth near to the grave. But he tells him that prayers offered for the sick man shall cause God to be gracious and to look upon man, and if He find him humble and penitent He will deliver his life. Again, chap. xxxiv. 10—37. Elihu says that God will not do wickedly; He will not lay upon man more than is right. Surely it is meet to say unto God, I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more, that which I see not teach Thou me; and he adds the wish that Job may be disciplined yet further, since he has added rebellion to his sins.

AMERICAN NOTES.

We learn from the Liberal Christian that Dr. Bellows, who has left such pleasant memories behind him in this country, preached for the first time after his return to his own on Sunday September 20th. Special pains were taken that no notice of it should appear in the New York papers, lest the church should be crowded with strangers who might come out of mere curiosity, and interfere with the spirit of a meeting which was of too personal and domestic a character to be shared with any but the regular congregation and friends. Still the church was filled full. As Dr. Bellows entered the pulpit, the congregation rose and sung, as with one voice and one soul, the following hymn of welcome, written for the occasion:

From ancient realms, from many a seat
Of art and power beyond the sea;
From fields o'er which the blessed feet
Of Jesus walked in Galilee;
From snow-capped peak and glorious vale,
That listen to the cataract's voice,
Led by the hand of God, we hail,
Once more, the pastor of our choice.
The reaper takes his place again,
Where the white harvest skirts the way,
With sinews strengthened to sustain
The heat and burden of the day.
And while our hearts, with one accord,
Welcome him to his cherished home,
As Thou hast blest his wanderings, Lord,
Oh, bless his labours yet to come!

Dr. Bellows took for his text the words, "And when they were come, and had gathered the Church together, they rehearsed all that God had done with them, and how he had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles." He spoke first, with great suppressed emotion, of the ties that bound him to his congregation, and which pulled so hard at his heart-strings during his absence; of how he had carried them all with him in memory, affection and prayerful solicitude; how he had mourned with those who had been bereaved, and how, at last, after an absence of sixteen months, and a travel of 25,000 miles, he rejoiced to meet them again face to face, and renew the old and familiar relations of an office which had always been more personal than official. The discourse which followed was peculiarly rich, both in intellectual wealth and religious feeling, and could not fail to leave a deep impression on all who heard it.

With regard to the case of Allen, "the wickedest man in New York," which we mentioned last week, the Nation remarks:—

"The final touch of horror and repulsiveness has been given to the whole affair by the appearance of the poor wretch Allen himself—who passes most of his time in a state of drunkenness, with a small charge for admission. He is said to have presented himself to the very small audience which his agents were able to collect at Stamford in a state of stupid intoxication. We do not deny that men like Allen may be suddenly reformed, but we can hardly think of a graver outrage, both on religion and morality, than the sanction, by clergymen or members of churches, of the theory that a life-long ruffian, reeking from a stew kept by himself, can be qualified by a week's repentance—even supposing it to have been sincere—to go out and preach, to anybody, the way of salvation."

An interesting collection of old Puritan books has just been deposited with the Boston Public Library. It belonged originally to the Rev. Thomas Prince, who was ordained pastor of the Old South church in that city in 1718, and by him left at his death (1758) to the society, who put the books into their steeple during the revolutionary war. The collection consists of 1,519 books and manuscripts. Among the titles of the former are some additions to those whose quaintness has often been referred to as characteristic of the early Puritans, both in England and America; e.g. "Riddles Unriddled; or, Christian Paradoxes broke open, smelling like a Sweet spice taken out of Boxes;" "A Choice Drop of Honey from the Rock, Christ;" "The Case of Satan's Fiery Darts in Blasphemous Suggestions and Hellish Annoyances;" "Early Piety Encouraged—a discourse occasioned by the death of a young woman of Malden of the throat distemper."

From the latest report it appears that the New York Inebriate Asylum, at Binghamton, in that State, contains ninety inmates, including ministers, lawyers, literary men, merchants, and others, who, when sufficiently disciplined, go preaching or lecturing in neighbouring places.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1868.

LORD CARNARVON ON RELIGIOUS TEACHING.

IN Lord CARNARVON's address to the Social Science Association he says: "Any system which fails to conciliate a distinct and sufficient religious teaching—by which I mean a teaching founded upon definite doctrines, and not upon an impalpable and shadowy religionism, calculated to embrace all creeds and give offence to none—will not do justice to children or to teachers."

Lord CARNARVON has here enunciated an opinion, or rather a prejudice, which is no doubt most widely held at the present time—that you cannot give a moral and religious education to children without inculcating a distinctive creed with its definite theological doctrines.

Now it is most important to inquire to what extent the notion is true, because at a time when the education of the people is becoming every day a subject of greater national consideration it is of the first importance that we should settle in our minds what is the education that is to be given. It is clear that when we long for education for the people—when we think of it and speak of it as the remedy for the evils that we grieve over in society around us—we are not thinking of an education which will simply develop the intellect and train up a race of children to be merely sharp and knowing. We are thinking of an education that shall have an influence on their moral nature, and train them to be truthful and honourable, pure minded and temperate, full of sympathy and brotherly kindness, of humility and reverence. Leaving out consideration of the hereafter, we say, that mere consideration of the needs of the present life requires an education that shall train children to those virtues which make a human being lovelier and nobler, the source of happiness and good influence to all around him. And thus the question must be faced and answered at last, however we may try to dodge it for a time: "What is the kind of education by which children are to be moulded to nobleness of character?" Lord CARNARVON, and those who think with him say, "by teaching founded on definite religious doctrines." Well, what does this mean? It means, with many no doubt, "teaching founded on the definite religious doctrines which we hold," that is on some form of the orthodox creed. Now do facts support this notion? Let any man who makes such an assertion look round upon society. He sees, perhaps every day meets, persons brought up, some in his own, others in very widely different creeds. Can he say honestly that he finds that those who have been trained in his own dogmas are the only good people, the only trustworthy, loveable, and noble? Can he discover that any one form of theological creed has given its own sect a monopoly of the best characters? Notoriously it is not so. Taking the strata in society where persons have received the same general education, and been under similar social influences, you find people much the same, no matter what the religious sect may be to which they belong. There is scarcely any one who is not so situated as to have highly valued and trusted friends separated from him by a wide gulf of religious belief. We may take as a proof of the general consciousness of the independence of goodness on distinctive theological creed our conduct in business matters. When we want to know if we may trust a man, we do not ask what his creed is, or in what church he has been brought up, but whether he has shown himself in his conduct to be honourable and trustworthy. No doubt if a man finds that of two persons equally trustworthy, one belongs to his own sect, he will generally prefer to deal with him; but few would choose a cashier, a lawyer, or executor, on account of his theological opinions, trusting that the needful virtue, yet unproved, would be found to accompany them.

What cant or nonsense it is then, in face of these facts, for a man to affirm that education in his peculiar dogmas is necessary to make virtuous men.

Some one, however—we think it was the Bishop of OXFORD—lately asserted that though it was not possible to bring all children up in the same creed, it was of the utmost importance that they should be brought up in some definite set of doctrines.

So then, according to this view, it does not much matter which of the various forms of dogma is planted in the mind in early life, so that one of them is there. All the various forms of religious education seem to produce pretty much the same result. But this admission, if pressed to its conclusion, will cut to the very root of this distinctive and definite theological teaching. For, surely, if so many widely differing and often diametrically opposing systems of dogma taken into the mind produce the same result, it must be by virtue of that which is common to them all; it cannot be by virtue of those elements in which they differ and even contradict one another. This would be absurd. It would be supposing that the religious nature is a mere hollow, like those near which we see a board indicating that rubbish may be shot here, and that it does not matter what the rubbish shot is, provided the hole is filled. If then it is by what is common, and not by what is distinctive, in the different systems that they help to bring about the same result, we are brought to what we fear Lord CARNARVON would stigmatise as an "impalpable religionism" as the one thing needful in a religious education. If we want to mould the next generation to a higher and nobler goodness than the present exhibits, we must bring out into greater prominence, and apply in larger strength and quantity, the common element in the various religious systems that has most tended to make men good, and surely that is the simple belief that goodness is good and sin evil—that goodness is the wish of a good God—that we have the image of that goodness and that good God in JESUS CHRIST, and that this goodness will be rewarded and consummated, and sin punished, in a world beyond the present—simple doctrines which indeed form the very essence of our Unitarian faith. Ultimately the friends of education will discover that the hope of the future of society lies in broadening and deepening these simple principles, and so presenting them as to make them instrumental in implanting in the mind the horror and scorn of sin, the love of goodness and of God.

THE POPE'S INVITATION.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

THERE is a sort of simplicity about the letter which, if we were not obliged to regard it as simply the official style of the writer, would be more or less touching, and there may be those to whom the total absence of anything like argument may be attractive. The assertion that "no one can deny or doubt" the supremacy of Peter, or the fact that the Pope is his successor, is only less astonishing than the assertion of Bossuet that this was one of "four or five authentic facts" which no rational person could deny in good faith, and which collectively made the truth of his religion as clear as the sun. The historical explanation of the powers exercised by the Popes is full of interest, and is one of the most striking passages in human history; but the only logical justifications of it are theories so encumbered with every sort of objection that it is idle even to refute them. It may, perhaps, however, interest such of our readers as have dismissed the subject from their minds to see in a few words what is the argument of one of the greatest of Roman Catholic theologians on the subject. It is a curious monument of the changes of human thought. The supremacy of the Pope is thus proved by Bellarmine. The controversy consists of two parts. First, that which relates to the institution of the ecclesiastical monarchy. Secondly, that which relates to the power and office of the Supreme Pontiff. The first part contains six questions:—1. Whether monarchy is the best form of government? 2. Whether the form of government of the Church ought to be monarchical? 3. Whether St. Peter was the first spiritual monarch of the Catholic Church? 4. Whether Peter came to Rome and there established a see which was to remain for ever? 5. Whether the Popes succeeded Peter? 6. Whether the Pope ever changed from being the Vicar of Christ to being Antichrist? The answers to these six questions present a mass of political, historical, and theological speculation so intricate, and open to so much observation at every point, that the impression which the whole treatise leaves on the mind is not so much that no one can doubt what Bellarmine and the Pope affirm as that no rational man can get anything but doubt out of such arguments and such a method as they follow. It is one of the many peculiarities of theological controversy that its points and bearings fall into oblivion as time goes on. Few people in these days have the least notion of the grounds upon which the supremacy of the Pope and the attributes of the Church are maintained by Roman Catholic theologians. Such claims rest in fact upon their own weight, upon the persistency with which they are asserted by those who are interested in making them, and upon their moral attractions for minds of a certain cast. The arguments themselves are curiosities known only to those who have some special taste or reason for looking into them.

Passing, however, from this side of the question to the practical view which the Pope takes of the subject, it is well worth the while of us all to consider what amount of truth there is in the assertion that religious differences, which are summed up in the word Protestantism, have really led to those social schisms which the Pope deplures, or that the relations of religion and society are such that dissensions as to religion must necessarily lead to social disturbance. The coarse and broad answer which is supplied by the past and present state of Europe is conclusive enough in one sense. Looking at the facts, there can be no doubt at all that the most Catholic countries are precisely those in which the most vehement "social schisms" have taken place, and the reason is obvious. It is hardly necessary even to mention the relation between such events as are happening and have happened in France, Italy, Spain, Austria, and the Roman Catholic system, or to show why it is that Protestantism is much more favourable to quiet continuous changes in the political world. But not to insist on commonplaces, let us try to look a little further. Is society founded upon religion? Is social schism an evil absolutely and universally? The connection between society and religion, whether it is regarded historically or theoretically, is not a matter which can be compressed into a single sentence. We should be inclined to say that the relation between the two was neither uniform nor constant, but that it varied from place to place and time to time. Religion has an enormously powerful influence upon most societies, and especially upon those particular forms of society with which our own experience has made us most familiar; but it is both false and idle to assert that society never has existed and never could exist without religion. Confucianism is not a religion in the Pope's sense of the word, and the small superstitions into which Buddhism has dwindled with the bulk of the Chinese has very little to do with the maintenance of the social order in that vast country. Yet no social system ever was more powerful, more durable, or more extensive than that which has influenced so deeply the largest and the oldest of all the nations of the world. If we look at Europe there is no doubt that Christian ideas are more or less mixed up with and exercise a greater or less influence upon all our habits and thoughts; but surely it is an exaggeration to say that European society is founded upon religion. It is at most one of its foundations, but it has many others. Take away all religion, and you would, we firmly believe, greatly debase and impoverish human life in a variety of ways, but you would not overthrow, though no doubt you would considerably change and modify, the existing state of society. This fact, however, does not of itself condemn all religious changes, unless any one is inclined to assert that the existing state of society is the best which it is possible to conceive or hope for. Religious schisms and social schisms are no doubt related, but can any one say that upon the whole religious and social schisms are bad things? It appears to us that the Roman Catholics ought to be the last people in the world to say so if they looked at facts, instead of tying themselves up in the meshes of a system which in reality is incoherent and bewildering, and which looks consistent only because people take it down in the lump instead of studying its parts. We are always hearing, and with much justice, of the great improvements which have been made since the Reformation and since the Revolution in the morals and practice of the Roman Catholic world. Can any one doubt that this is due, in a great degree, to the reaction against antagonisms? It is a commonplace amongst Roman Catholic writers in England that the true Reformation was contained in the decrees "De Reformatione" of the Council of Trent. Did the Council of Trent owe nothing to the Reformation commonly so called? Without schisms, political and religious, you will have no life. There is no possibility of complete uniformity except in death? And who, after all, can assure us that the notion of an ideally perfect state in which everybody should be agreed upon all important principles of belief and conduct is not a mere dream as idle as any Utopia ever invented? Why are we to be so very anxious to be all of one mind on religion when on any other conceivable subject we agree to differ? Why not own the truth that probability is the highest result which we can attain on such subjects, and that different minds will always set a different estimate on the probability of the same facts? The Pope's answer to this is, why, if that is true, I and my Church are an absurdity; to which the reply from our point of view is, So you are; all the facts of life are opposed to your theories, and instead of giving up the theories you groan over the facts.

The late Henry Briggs, Esq., of Outwood.

ONE by one, the strong and faithful men who have been the life and power of our churches in the older generation are passing away from them. Of these, there have been few who better deserved the tribute of affectionate remembrance than Henry Briggs. Taken from us in a ripe old age—he was in his 72nd year,—one, also, of whom it might be said, to the last, that "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated," we feel it would be unworthy of the genuine and happy faith which glowed in his heart to write of such an ending to such a life in any spirit of sadness; but yet we cannot help sorrowing that we shall see his face no more.

Mr. Briggs was born at Ward-end, Halifax, on the 10th of August, 1797, and resided at or in the neighbourhood of that town till he was twenty-nine years old. He was during this time a member of the Unitarian congregation, meeting in Northgate-end Chapel. At the age of 27, he married, and two years afterwards, removed to Overton, near Wakefield, becoming a regular attendant at the Westgate Chapel. With the exception of a brief interval, during which he felt unable to attend there and had service in a room adjoining his own house, where some others of the congregation met with him, he continued a member of the Wakefield Chapel, his removal to Outwood Hall, in 1851, only drawing his connection with it closer till his death, on the 4th inst.

It is in his business relations, as one of the largest and most enterprising of the West Riding coal-owners, and as the pioneer in the movement in favour of industrial partnerships, that Mr. Briggs is most widely known. The colliers of the West Riding coal districts are a sturdy and independent race, and there are few branches of industry in which the disputes between masters and men have raged more frequently or fiercely. In these disputes Mr. Briggs, as one of the largest employers, had frequently to take a leading part, and while he was respected as a thoroughly just man, and one who, with his family, was always kind in caring for his workpeople, he was regarded as one unusually difficult to force from his position when once he had convinced himself that it was right. These repeated contests were, however, a source of great pain and anxiety to him, and a few years ago he and his sons came to the determination to try the experiment of making their workpeople actual partners in the business, with a view to make them interested in its successful conduct and to substitute a spirit of co-operation for the old traditional antagonism. The law of limited liability, which had recently been passed enabled this to be done, and early in 1865 the change was carried out. Not only were shares in the new company allotted to all the colliers, who were able and willing to take them up, and peculiar facilities offered to them to pay by weekly subscriptions, but it was arranged that the surplus gains above a fixed working profit, should be divided, partly as a bonus on labour, to be shared in by everyone actually employed at the collieries, in proportion to the wages earned, entirely irrespective of their holding shares. At first the whole project was viewed with some jealousy and suspicion, not only by the masters of the district but by many of Messrs. Briggs' own men. A year to two's experience of it, however, showing them that all was perfectly open and aboveboard, the actual division of a bonus or two, and the frank explanations of the Messrs. Briggs as to how the extra profit thus divisible was to be attained by all concerned co-operating in doing the working as efficiently and as economically as possible, gradually did away with every hostile feeling, and the colliers became in large numbers shareholders in the concern. Of the practical benefits which have followed it is difficult to speak too highly. There have been several attempts from without to stir up strife and discontent, but they have been ludicrous failures. It was to our friend one of the purest sources of satisfaction during his last few years, to feel that not only had he found the way to carry on his own business in peace and goodwill between master and man, but that he had also contributed in some measure to the solution of the latterly much-debated problem presented by the relations of labour and capital.

In his private life Mr. Briggs was a man of great benevolence and deep religious feeling. A sincere Unitarian, he was regarded as a kind friend and helper by the members of every religious body in his neighbourhood. A year or two ago, when he was desirous for a service to be held at his Whitwood collieries by one of the ministers of his own body, the Methodists of the village gladly offered him the use of their chapel. This, however, was stopped by the superintendent minister of the circuit, on the ground that by the trust-deed it was illegal for a Unitarian to preach there; whereupon the congregation showed their feeling by closing their chapel for the afternoon, and coming in a body, with their scholars for a choir, to the schoolroom. The writer, who was present, will not soon forget either that service or the general feeling of mutual confidence and goodwill which seemed to breathe in all the intercourse of the people with Mr. Briggs and his family.

When the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund was formed, chiefly at the instance of Mr. Christ.

Rawdon, Mr. Briggs was one of the contributors and trustees, and was chosen by his fellow-trustees to preside over their meetings, at which his kind and genial spirit has always been a welcome and helpful presence. Nor was it only in such works of interest in the secular welfare of our Church that he was known. Until the last few months of his long life he was a Sunday-school teacher, and throughout has helped in the missionary work of the West Riding by occasionally preaching at the different stations. Those who ever heard him thus leading a religious service will not soon forget the simple-hearted piety which breathed through all he said.

During the last year or two his health has been failing, and age was visibly telling on him. He was well enough, however, to pursue his usual occupations almost to the last, and a few weeks ago went for a visit to his elder son, Mr. Henry Currer Briggs, at Dundee. There, however, a rapid change took place, and, after a few days' illness, he peaceably passed to his rest.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

TO MY FATHER.

BY "STONEWALL" JACKSON.

As die the embers on the hearth,
And o'er the floor the shadows fall,
And creeps the chirping cricket forth,
And ticks the death-watch on the wall,
I see a form in yonder chair,
That grows beneath the waning light;
There are the wan, sad features—there
The pallid brow, and locks of white.

My father! when they laid thee down,
And heaped the clay upon thy breast,
And left thee sleeping all alone,
Upon thy narrow couch of rest,
I know not why I could not weep—
The soothing drops refused to roll,
And oh! that grief is wild and deep
Which settles tearless on the soul.

But when I saw thy vacant chair,
Thine idle hat upon the wall,
The book—the pencilled passage—there
Thine eye had rested last of all;
The tree beneath whose friendly shade
The trembling feet had wandered forth,
The very prints those feet had made
When last they feebly trod the earth;—

I thought while countless ages fled
Thy vacant chair would vacant stand,
Unworn thy hat, thy book unread,
Effaced thy footsteps from the sand;
And widowed in this cheerless world
The heart that gave its love to thee;
Torn like the vine whose tendrils curled
More closely round the falling tree.

Oh, father! then for her and thee
Gushed madly forth the scalding tears,
And oft, and long, and bitterly,
Those tears have gushed in later years,
For as the world grows cold around,
And things assume their real hue,
'Tis sad to find that love is found
Alone above the stars with you.

WITCHCRAFT.—II.

A SUPERSTITION, as its name imports, is something that has been left to "stand over," like unfinished business, from one session of the world's Witenagemot to the next. The vulgar receive it implicitly, on the principle of whatever is unknown being possible, and even the enlightened are apt to consider it, if not proved, at least rendered probable by the hearsay evidence of popular experience. Particular superstitions are sometimes the embodiment of ideas that were at first mere poetic fictions, but more commonly the degraded and distorted relics of religious beliefs. Dethroned gods haunted the borders of their old dominions, lurking in forests and mountains, and venturing to show themselves only after nightfall. To make the Pagan divinities hateful, they were stigmatised as evil demons, and as the mind finds a pleasure in analogy and system, an infernal hierarchy gradually shaped itself as the counterpoise of the celestial one; and Satan, as Prince of Darkness, or of the Powers of the Air, became at last a sovereign, with his great feudatories and countless vassals, capable of maintaining a not unequal contest with the King of Heaven. He was supposed to have a certain power of bestowing earthly prosperity, but he was really, after all, nothing better than a James II. at St. Germain's, who could make Dukes of Perth and confer titular fiefs and garters as much as he liked, without the unpleasant necessity of providing any substance behind his shadows. That there should have been so much loyalty to him, under these disheartening circumstances, seems on the whole creditable to poor human nature.

Most of the practices of witchcraft, such as the power to raise storms, destroy cattle, assume the shape of beasts by the use of certain ointments, to induce deadly maladies in men by waxen images, or love by charms and philters—were inheritances from paganism. But the theory of a transference of allegiance from God to Satan, sometimes by a written compact, sometimes with the ceremony by which homage was done to a feudal superior, was the result, no doubt, of the efforts of the clergy to inspire a horror of any lapse into heathenish rites, by making devils of all the old gods. Christianity represented the soul as an individual entity to be saved or lost, and grosser minds were led to conceive of it as a piece of property that could be transferred by deed of gift or sale. The earliest legend of the kind is that of Theophilus, chancellor of the church of Adana, in Cilicia, some time during the sixth century. It is said to have been first written by a pupil of his, who tells the story partly as an eye-witness, partly from the narration of his master. The nun Hroswitha treated it dramatically in the latter part of the tenth century, and, some four hundred years later, Rutebeuf made it the subject of a French miracle-play. Theophilus has been deprived by his bishop of a lucrative office. In his despair he meets with Saladin, who was on such terms with the Devil that he could speak to him as he pleased. Saladin tempts him to deny God and devote himself to the Devil, who, in return, will give him back all his old property, and more. He at last consents, signs and seals the contract required, and is restored to his old place by the bishop. But now remorse and terror come upon him; he calls on the Virgin, who, after some demur, compels Satan to bring back his deed from the infernal muniment-chest (which must have been fire-proof beyond the skill of our modern safe-makers), and the bishop having read it aloud to the awe-stricken congregation, Theophilus becomes his own man again.

In proportion as a belief in the possibility of this merchandizing with hell became general, accusations of it grew more numerous. Among others, the memory of Pope Sylvester II. was blackened with the charge of having thus bargained away his soul. All learning fell under suspicion, till at length the very grammar itself (the last volume in the world, one would say, to conjure with) gave to the English gramary (enchantment), and in the French became a book of magic, under the alias of Grimoire. It is not unlikely that, in an age when the boundary between actual and possible was not very well defined, there were scholars who made experiments in this direction, and signed contracts, though they never had a chance to complete their bargain by an actual delivery. Such a document does not seem ever to have been produced in court as evidence against the accused, though in the case of Grandier one was ascribed to him. It appears that he had been shrewd enough to take a bond to secure the fulfilment of the contract on the other side; for we have the document in fac-simile, signed and sealed by Lucifer, Beelzebub, Satan, Elimi, Leviathan, and Astoroth, duly witnessed by Baalberith, Secretary of the Grand Council of Demons. (Fancy the competition such a State paper as this would excite at a sale of autographs!) Commonly no security seems to have been given by the other party to these arrangements, but the bare word of the Devil, which was considered, no doubt, every whit as good as his bond. In most cases, indeed, he was the loser, and shewed a want of capacity for affairs equal to that of an average giant of romance. In popular legend he is made the victim of some equivocation, so gross that any court of equity would have ruled in his favour. On the other hand, the Virgin appears in person at the right moment, and compels him to give up the property he had honestly paid for. One is tempted to ask, Were there no attorneys, then, in the place he came from, of whom he might have taken advice beforehand? On the whole, he had rather hard measure, and it is a wonder he did not throw up the business in disgust. Sometimes, however, he was more lucky, as with the unhappy Dr. Faust; and even so lately as 1695, he came in the shape of a "tall fellow with black beard and periwig, respectable-looking, and well dressed," about two o'clock in the afternoon, to fly away with the Maréchal de Luxembourg, which, on the stroke of five, he punctually did as per contract, taking with him the window and its stone framing into the bargain. The clothes and wig of the involuntary aeronaut were, in the handsomest manner, left upon the bed, as not included in the bill of sale. In this case we have a copy of the articles of agreement, twenty-eight in number, by the last of which the Maréchal renounces God, and devotes himself to the Enemy. This clause, sometimes the only one, always the most important in such compacts, seems to show that they first took shape in the imagination while the struggle between Paganism and Christianity was still going on. As the converted heathen was made to renounce his false gods, so the renegade Christian must forswear the true Deity.

TRUE HEROISM.

MR. CARLYLE is in the habit of saying that "heroism" is one of the things that no longer are. We should be sorry to think so; and instances now and then come to light which show that it is not so. We have one in an episode, furnished by the Madrid correspondent of the Times, of the recent battle of Alcolea:—

Among the English engineers in the employment of the Andalusian Railway Company there is a man who first came out in the capacity of an engine-driver, but who, owing to his intelligence and good conduct, was subsequently promoted to the head management and superintendence of the locomotive department. His name is John Routledge, and he comes, I am told, from Yorkshire. He is two or three inches above six feet in height, athletic in frame, and with a proportionately great soul within him—a gentle, unassuming, hard-working man, with a well-established character for a genial and cordial disposition among the large colony of practical scientific labourers scattered all over the Peninsula, busy with the direction of its railway, canal, and mining enterprise. Routledge, who was stationed at Cordova, could not resist an Englishman's curiosity to look on the scene of strife and death about to be performed so near him, under the impulse of political passions to which, in his capacity of an alien, he was a perfect stranger. He presently, however, became weary of his inactive position as a spectator. Prompted by his humane instincts, he no sooner saw men dropping here and there in the foremost ranks, and writhing on the ground between life and death, than he rushed forward from his safe shelter, and, plunging into the thickest of the mêlée, began his work as an ambulance man, lifting up the wounded in his stalwart arms, and conveying them, with the ease of a nurse carrying an infant, to the stretchers that were waiting to receive them in the rear. Again and again, with an activity to which charity seemed to lend wings, and with as great an intrepidity as if faith had given him a charmed life,—again and again did the tall Englishman, unarmed and in plain clothes, plunge into the fight, calm and collected in the midst of all the fury and anguish about him, yet warming up in his task, and redoubling his efforts as success attended them, with the utmost impartiality, bestowing his attention alike upon friend and foe, and by his example firing the zeal and steadying the nerve of the ambulance corps, of which he voluntarily constituted himself the forlorn hope. He was thus under fire during the whole action; and when the day was won Marshal Serrano, who was also lavish of his person, and often met the Englishman as this latter went back and forward on his generous errand—Marshal Serrano, himself a brave man, and of lofty, chivalrous impulses, went up to him, and, embracing him, decorated him with the order of Isabella the Catholic. Routledge's task was, however, only beginning. Throughout the night, in the midst of the confusion unavoidable in an army more or less disorganised at the close of a general engagement, he was at his place at the head of the locomotive department, and fitted out and hurried on train after train, till all the wounded who could bear the journey were safely housed in the hospitals of Cordova. Routledge was a plain man, fired with no warlike ambition, under none of that "obligation" which "nobility" is said to involve. He was on the spot, in discharge of a duty assigned to him as a station-master at Alcolea. He went "a little out of his way for a stroke of good work—that is all." His business was to convey the wounded to the rear. He just sallied out to "pick them up here and there where they lay—that is all." Such is the account he himself gives of the transaction. That is all, so far as he is concerned. Were it not for some of his brother engineers who are among my most valued friends in Madrid, the noble deeds performed by Routledge on the 28th of September might, perhaps, never have come to the knowledge of his countrymen. It is certainly not the hero himself that would have blown his own trumpet. He simply pocketed the "bauble" which the Commander-in-Chief bestowed upon him, and if he thought a little better of himself for having displayed both warm charity and cool courage on the occasion, he at all events did not tell.

ORGAN PLAYING BY ELECTRICITY.

ORGAN players are perhaps the very last class of persons who have expected to have their enjoyments doubled through the agency of electricity. Until now the one great drawback to the pleasure of organ playing has been the necessity of sitting close to the organ itself, a position most unfavourable for the hearing of the sounds given forth by the multitude of pipes immediately in front and above the head of the player. Not only are the endless delicacies of the quality of the various stops in the instrument thus obscured, but that magnificent roll and volume of tone in which the organ is unrivalled is scarcely to be felt. In the few cathedrals where the pipes have been placed in the triforium of the choir, while the player sits below in the stalls, the evil is but slightly remedied, the sounds being still completely above the musician's head; while on the rare occasions when the keys have been temporarily brought forward to a distance of some yards from the organ, the necessary mechanism has seriously interfered with the action of the keyboard. Now, at last, all difficulties have been overcome, and by the action of a cable of insulated wires the player is enabled to perform upon a keyboard placed at any distance from the body of the organ with as much ease as if he were seated within a foot of the pipes. The gain to organ players is immense, and there is reason to hope that a material improvement in organ playing will by-and-bye be the result, and that organists will learn to recognise the unfitness of their instrument for an imitation of all the gambols of an orchestra.—Full Mall Gazette.

Lines to Miss Carpenter on her Leaving for India.

FAREWELL, dear friend! Heaven bless thy holy zeal,
Thy self-denying work for Indian woman's weal!
Thou go'st to labour in thy Master's field
In torrid climes, perchance to make it yield
Some sheaves of corn for His Great Harvest-time,
Tho' dank the soil as in its ancient prime;
Tho' ages long have swept o'er India's face,
They scarce have made it radiant with one grace
Of Christian excellence; whilst one foul blot
Eclipses all that's fair—'tis woman's lot!
Bereft of knowledge, bound by slavish chains
Of grossest superstition, she remains;
Denied the right of reason, love, and power,
What blacker cloud could o'er a nation lower?
O Britain! wake from centuries of sleep!
For though the stain on India's brow be deep,
Thy hands are not unstained. Her future sin
Must be thine own. But yesterday thy sword did win
Another lease of rule; O use it well,
To break the dark and fatal heathen spell!
Such mighty trust, before nonation heired
Of heaven! Past breaches yet may be repaired;
And Christian faithfulness at length atone
For all the blood we've spilt to make this land our own. W. S. P.

WELCOME TO THE REV. J. J. TAYLER ON HIS RETURN FROM TRANSYLVANIA.

London, 13th October, 1868.

UNDER the auspices of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the London District Unitarian Society, a most successful meeting was this evening held in Hanover Square Rooms, to welcome the Rev. J. J. Tayler on his return from his mission of good-will to the Unitarian Churches of Hungary. The room was well filled, there being between 400 and 500 persons present. The chair was taken by W. J. Lamport, Esq., the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; and among those present I noticed the Revs. Dr. Sadler, R. B. Aspland, M.A., H. Ierson, M.A., W. H. Channing, T. Madge, James Martineau, Spears, Squire, Marshall, Lewis: Messrs. L. M. Aspland, LL.D., T. C. Clarke, Dr. Davidson, J. T. Hart, D. Martineau, P. Martineau, E. Nettleton, W. Sharpe, Troup, W. C. Venning; Miss Carpenter, and Miss F. P. Cobbe. Apologies for non-attendance were sent by the Lord Mayor elect, Sir J. Bowring, Messrs. A. Lawrence, M. D. Conway, George Buckton (Leeds), and the Rev. Goodwin Barnby.

The Chairman began his remarks by saying that he once heard a good sermon—a statement which caused considerable laughter, but which he qualified by saying that it was one of many good sermons—on the text, "Why art thou here?" He had been at some loss to understand why he occupied the position he did to-night, but supposed it was owing to the kindness which some of their metropolitan friends showed to those in the provinces. He had been somewhat alarmed by an intimation from Mr. Aspland that he was expected to give a short sketch of the history of the Transylvanian Church; but by dint of a little prompting and an hour spent at Dr. Williams's library, he had been enabled to gather a few facts which he would put before them. He then traced the history from the introduction of Unitarian opinions during the reign of Don Sigismund, some 305 years ago, who being afflicted with a disease which had been pronounced incurable, sent for an eminent Italian practitioner who was able to do what his own physicians were unable to effect, and who was induced to stay in the country, as he had converted Don Sigismund to his mode of thought, which was Unitarian, and found that freedom was given to promulgate his views. Don Sigismund's successor was a Roman Catholic, and then troubles began; it was, however, due to him to record a saying of his that "to interfere with men's consciences was to interfere with God's prerogative." The history of the Unitarian Church in Transylvania is a history of mutual persecution, and since the country has been under the Austrian rule, every difficulty has been thrown in its way. Mr. Lamport then gave various details showing the progressive nature of the faith of our Transylvanian brethren, and after referring to the mission of Mr. Tayler, and expressing the pleasure with which his return was welcomed, called upon him to address the meeting.

The Rev. J. J. Taylor, who was received with loud and prolonged cheering, began by saying that there was a tale told by one of our old dramatists, called "A woman killed by kindness:" now, he was somewhat in the same condition; his Hungarian friends had nearly killed him with their kindness, but it was left for his English friends to give him the coup de grâce. It is impossible in the short space that I have at my disposal to give anything like a full report of Mr. Tayler's interesting address. He himself said that the account he could give must necessarily be somewhat superficial, but that he hoped ere long to give in a written form a more detailed account of his visit. In going to Hungary he disclaimed all heroism in the matter, although some of his friends pulled long faces on hearing of it, and seemed to dread it as much as if he had been going with Dr. Carpenter on a dredging expedition to the North Pole, or on a visit to the Patagonians. He found the travelling very good. The Hungarians were an energetic people and already railways were made in different parts of the country, and a main line was about to be constructed through the whole country, the contract for which had been taken by an Englishman and a Unitarian. He gave an interesting account of the introduction of Unitarianism among the Magyar race, who were until lately the ruling tribe. It had been supposed by some that George of Cappadocia was the original of our St. George, but from what he was able to learn there was no ground for this. George was an Arian and a saint, although he could not understand his claim to the latter title. The treatment of the Unitarians had been very hard; the Jesuits tried the same game as they had done in Poland; they endeavoured to rouse the hostility of the other sects, but they were not successful to so great an extent as in Poland. The house of Hapsburg had also persecuted the Unitarians; their churches and colleges were closed, and their endowments taken from them. Although the Unitarian Church is acknowledged by law, yet it is in an inferior position to the Lutheran and Calvinistic Churches, which are greatly favoured. The Unitarians have three gymnasias, which are something similar to our grammar schools, at which are 600 pupils and 36 divinity students. There are 106 Unitarian congregations in Transylvania, and in the schools connected with them 5,000 children are taught, the education being denominational. The celebration at which he was present was the tercentenary of the first declaration of religious freedom, not of Unitarianism. To this meeting he carried a cordial expression of sympathy; but he reserved a full description of the celebration to some future time. Suffice it to say that he was elected an honorary member of the consistory, and that he was present at most of the subsequent meetings. He described the impressions he received at the celebration of the Lord's Supper, at which, although he could not understand a word, the simple symbols used at the ceremony seemed to make him feel as one of those who held one and the same faith in a common God and Father. On the next day an ordination of 13 young men to the ministry was held, at which a most motley group assembled. There were Greek priests in their robes, Roman Catholic priests, Lutherans, Calvinists, and several of the aristocracy of the country. Everywhere he found a great regard for England; and Hungarian gentlemen who have been educated here are greatly esteemed there. Mr. Tayler closed a most interesting address by expressing a hope that we should not be discouraged by the smallness of our numbers—that principles are to be esteemed before persons; that the hope of the future lay in the friends of truth and freedom being united; that we should tolerate one another upon matters of intellectual belief, which ought not to cut us up into partisanship, but ought to draw us together in brave truthfulness. Mr. Tayler was warmly applauded at the close of his address.

A resolution, thanking Mr. Tayler for his valuable services, was moved by the Rev. R. B. Aspland, as representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; and seconded by Mr. John Warren, LL.B., as representing the London District Unitarian Society; and supported by the Rev. W. H. Channing, as representing the American Churches. I regret that I have not space enough to give Mr. Aspland's admirable speech, which was warmly applauded.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr. J. T. Preston, and seconded by Mr. S. S. Tayler, was carried with acclamation.

I must not forget to mention that the choir of the church at St. Paul's Road, Camden Town, under the able leadership of Mr. Charles Hill, enlivened the proceedings by singing several well-selected glees and part-songs. The meeting was a decided success in every point, and I cannot help recording the satisfaction expressed by many of those present that at last a more agreeable place of meeting has been found than is usually provided for our London gatherings.

INTELLIGENCE.

BELFAST: CONFERENCE OF NONSUBSCRIBING MINISTERS AND LAITY.—A meeting of this recently-formed conference was held on Wednesday, 7th inst., in the Vestry of the Second Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, Belfast. The Rev. S. C. Nelson, Downpatrick, presided. Rev. Professor Orr, Comber, read a paper on "Schemes of Church Comprehension, legitimate and illegitimate." Remarks were made on the paper by Revs. Leonard Hüniges, R. A. Armstrong, and D. Thompson. The general opinion seemed to be that no scheme of church comprehension hitherto propounded would work satisfactorily in all respects; that sect life is not without its compensation, and that, regarding the growing desire for union on the part of liberal Christians of different denominations as hopeful and encouraging, it is our bounden duty, in the midst of doctrinal differences, to teach and enforce the importance of a living, practical religion.

BRISTOL: LEWIN'S MEAD.—On Monday afternoon upwards of a hundred ladies and gentlemen of this congregation, assembled in the lecture hall, under the presidency of the Rev. Wm. James, to present Miss Carpenter with an address before leaving England for India. The chairman made the presentation, and spoke of Miss Carpenter's unwearied philanthropy and Christian benevolence, and particularly of her mission to India, and her proposal to form a normal training school at Ahmedabad. The address was beautifully illuminated and engrossed on vellum, and enclosed in a Morocco folding-case. On behalf of the ladies of the Working and Visiting Society, Mr. James also presented her with a purse of gold, a Bible, and a Hymn-book. Miss Carpenter replied at considerable length, and said that the views she had imbibed from her beloved father, and from reading Dr. Channing's and Dr. Ware's works, had made her feel the most intense and inextinguishable desire to help those whom circumstances had ground down, so that their own glorious nature might have free scope for development. Mr. Worsley, the treasurer of the chapel, and Mr. C. J. Thomas also made a few observations, and after a hymn had been sung and an appropriate prayer offered by the Rev. W. James, the meeting broke up, Miss Carpenter taking a warm farewell of the company, individually, as they left the room. On Tuesday, Miss Carpenter left for Marseilles to pay her second visit to our Eastern empire. She was accompanied by a young lady whom she has adopted as a daughter, and will be followed, by another route, by some English ladies who are to assist her in the conduct of her school, and in other of her philanthropic works. We are sure that she will be followed on her way to the distant scene of labours by the best wishes and prayers of all our readers.

DEVONPORT.—On Sunday week, the Rev. William Binns, from Birkenhead, entered upon his duties as minister of Christ Church, in the room of the Rev. J. K. Applebee. In the morning the subject of the sermon was "Ministerial and Congregational Relationships." In the evening Mr. Binns preached to a large congregation on "The Religion of a Free Church," from the text "For we know in part and prophesy in part."

LONDON: MANCHESTER NEW COLLEGE.—The introductory lecture at the opening of the Session 1868-69 was delivered by Professor James Martineau, at University Hall, on Monday last, in the presence of Rev. J. J. Tayler, B.A., principal; Professor Russell Martineau, M.A.; the Revs. J. H. Thom (one of the visitors), Thomas Madge, R. B. Aspland, M.A., and Dr. Sadler, R. D. Darbishire, Esq., B.A., one of the secretaries, and a large number of ladies and gentlemen. Mr. Martineau began with an interesting historical reference to the old Nonconformist colleges as contrasted with the great National Universities. The question was suggested whether they were not provisional institutions, and whether with the removal of ecclesiastical restrictions all separate theological schools should not be merged in the higher culture of the old universities. Are we prepared to dissolve our theological faculty and hand our students over to Oxford and Cambridge? Certainly not, said Mr. Martineau, and that for a reason purely academic. Oxford and Cambridge are not yet like Tübingen and Göttingen; they do not teach theology in a free scientific spirit, but educate their students within certain prescribed theological limits. He then proceeded in a masterly manner to discuss the question, "Is there such a thing as a scientific theology?" and entered upon an elaborate defence of natural theology, especially in reference to the recent address of Dr. Hooker, President of the British Association. He contended that the occupation of the theologian was not gone nor affected by scientific research. The philosophy of the plan of study adopted in Manchester New College was then explained; and the lecture concluded with the annual list of honours gained by the students in University College and London University. We hope the lecture will be published. We feel sure it would be read with interest by many beyond our own denomination.

MANCHESTER: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET NATURAL HISTORY SOCIETY.—The seventh annual meeting of the members of this society was held on Saturday evening. The exhibition of specimens was large and interesting. The ferneries and aquariums, under the management of Messrs. Barnes and Wilcott, were in excellent condition, and contained a variety of exotic ferns, fishes, beetles, &c. In the geological department, superintended by Messrs. Wrigley and Robinson, a numerous collection of specimens was shown, most of which had been added during the year. In the botanical section, Messrs. Barrow and Hyde exhibited a collection of wild fruits. Dr. Alcock exhibited several specimens of cotton in its various stages of growth and manufacture, some of which were grown by himself. There was an interesting collection of moths and butterflies, and what added considerably to the interest of the department was the exhibition of the instruments and necessary appliances for catching and mounting specimens. To the ornithological section several birds have been added recently. The report, which was read by Mr. H. Hyde, the honorary secretary, stated that the general condition of the society was very satisfactory. At the last annual meeting the members numbered only 22, but since then there had been an increase of 10, making at the present time 32. Thirty-two lectures had been given and papers read during the year. Several books had been added to the library, while a number of valuable papers had been received from Mr. J. Macdonald, formerly secretary to the society, on the habits and customs of the natives of Queensland. The average attendance of members was 15. During the year a microscopic section had been organised, which numbered 13 members and owned a number of good microscopes, a report concerning which was read by Mr. Wilcott, the secretary. The reports were adopted, and Dr. Alcock, the president, addressed the members on the progress and objects of the society.

MONEYRA.—On Tuesday, the 6th instant, an entertainment was given to the Sunday school teachers and children. There were about eighty present. During the evening there was an excellent exhibition of dissolving views, comprising scenes in the life of Christ, notable places at home and abroad, and many amusing pictures. The young people were delighted. The Rev. D. Thompson spoke encouragingly of Sunday school work, and conveyed the thanks of the meeting to those who provided and carried out the entertainment.

PADIHAM.—On Monday evening last, the Rev. George Fox, of Park Lane, gave a lecture in the Unitarian Chapel, Padiham, under the auspices of the Unitarian Temperance Society. His subject being "An Appeal in behalf of the Permissive Bill."

RAWENSTALL.—On Sunday last, the Rev. J. Freeston preached two sermons in aid of the Chapel Fund, when collections and donations amounted to £36. 12s.

STRANGEWAYS UNITARIAN FREE CHURCH.—The half-yearly festival of the Band of Hope and Temperance Society, in connection with this place, was held on Monday evening last. The attendance was exceedingly good. The Rev. S. A. Steintal presided, and a choir of children under the leadership of Mr. F. Ashton sang a number of temperance melodies.

TROWBRIDGE: CONIGRE CHAPEL.—The forty-first anniversary of the Rev. S. Martin's pastorate over the religious society assembling at this place of worship, was celebrated on Monday week. On the preceding evening Mr. Martin addressed his congregation from Phil. i. 7, "I have you in my heart." In the course of the sermon he took a review of his long pastorate, pointing out to his hearers their duties and encouragements, and concluding with a fervent expression of his heartfelt desires for their temporal and spiritual prosperity. The tea meeting on Monday was held in the large new school-room, and was well attended, upwards of 300 being present. The meeting after tea was held in the chapel, which was tastefully decorated with vases of flowers, and the numbers were considerably increased by persons from other religious bodies in the town. Mr. Martin delivered a lecture on "Useful Men and Women," which was listened to with the deepest interest and attention. At its close, Mr. J. Hawkins, senior deacon, addressed the people with reference to the lecture, and the anniversary of the settlement of their beloved pastor, at the same time pointing out various means by which the prosperity of the congregation and the schools might be further advanced. After singing the evening hymn, a prayer and the benediction brought the meeting to a close.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICE TO CORRESPONDENT.

MILE END.—Next week.

SOMETHING AGAINST DISESTABLISHMENT.

To the Editors.—In an article in your last issue, headed "Still it Moves," you give expression to a feeling that must now be very general among men of all parties. "The progress of opinion," you say, "on the subject of the Irish Church has been so great, and the larger question of Church Establishments has in consequence been so thoroughly sifted, that we almost hold our breath in amazement as we contrast the state of public feeling a few years since, with that which is now everywhere manifesting itself." The movement, indeed, is spreading everywhere, among Churchmen as well as among Dissenters "for the liberation," as it is called, "of religion from State control;" and not the least momentous sign of the times is that eminent divines of the National Church have now declared themselves in favour of partial or of total disestablishment.

That you and others who have always advocated this principle in its entirety should find in these symptoms of the times a cause for great satisfaction and thankfulness, is no more than what might naturally be expected. But, as I conceive the cause of liberal theology to be a still more cardinal principle with the Unitarian Herald, and as I, for my part, consider this cause to be in no little danger from the very facts and circumstances which you regard with such agreeable surprise, I hope you will allow me, as a solitary Unitarian, to enter my individual protest against the policy which is now so popular among the Liberal party, and especially among the Nonconformists.

If I may trust an abstract given by the Daily News of Dean Alford's article in the Contemporary, this accomplished and really liberal Churchman thinks his co-religionists would do well to welcome disestablishment, lest their Church be reformed by the Dissenters. I have no doubt he is right from his own point of view. If the Church of England be a sect for the promotion of certain opinions—if its main object be not simply the promotion of religion, but the preservation of certain forms of belief long after the life has gone entirely out of them—then it is a great wrong and injury that those who dissent from its doctrines should have, even by remote possibility, the slightest power to affect its constitution. And no one can say that the possibility is remote, for in these days has it not been practically shown that if heretics do not make laws for the Church, they may at least expound the existing ones? In no community whatsoever has the venerable fabric of orthodoxy received such heavy blows of late as within the Church of England; no sect has shown itself more entirely powerless to resist the influx of new ideas. And all because the ultimate appeal on Church questions must rest with a set of lawyers, half of whom, perhaps, would be excommunicated themselves if the majority of Churchmen had their way.

But if orthodox Churchmen are wise in their generation in seeking to protect the Church from the influence of Dissenters, I think we are clearly wrong, from one point of view, in endeavouring to help them. The national Church, whatever be its faults, exists surely for the nation at large. It is under the control of the nation at large, and if the nation be true to itself it will speak the nation's mind. Nor is there a point of doctrine, discipline, or constitution, which the nation at large may not alter or modify if it please. We Dissenters have quite as much a right to endeavour to get our opinions enforced with relation to the Church as with relation to the Post-office, the Custom House, or any other national institution. The Church exists for us as much as for anybody else, and if it do not meet our wants in all points we have a right to remonstrate as we think proper, and should do so till we have gained our end. For when I say we have a right, I imply that we have a duty. The Church of England seems to me a great engine for good or evil, the government of which is in the nation's hands; nor do I see how we can absolve ourselves of the responsibility of doing the best we can with it. If, indeed, it were a hopelessly bad institution I could understand an agitation, not to separate its government from the State, but to put it down and suppress it altogether. But to say that we shall simply wash our hands of it and leave it to itself when we have some power to influence it, however feebly, as every one of us in conscience thinks best, is to my mind like saying we mean to renounce a duty of a peculiarly sacred kind. A disestablished Church will be necessarily a community governed by its own laws entirely, free to excommunicate whom it pleases, and to hand down a lifeless, unintellectual dogmatism to the remotest age.

Therefore, gentlemen, I am opposed to disestablishment. I believe it will be bad for England, and even worse for Ireland; and I hold that we have no right in either case to abandon a trust which is now confided to us. The question of endowments I do not enter upon, though I think that, too, has been clogged with sophistries; for I know not that Roman Catholic pockets are burdened in any appreciable way with the support of a Protestant clergy. But let tithes be abolished if you will, and let the national clergy depend upon a grant from the Consolidated Fund (which we ought, certainly, not to grudge, if "justice to Ireland" require the other to be done away with); but do not let the nation abandon an institution which is certainly not felt by most Irishmen to be a grievance, and which Irishmen, as well as Englishmen, may freely influence and endeavour to reform.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

JAMES GAIRDNER.

78, Delancey-street, London, Oct. 11, 1868.

THE COMING WEEK.

Astley.—On Sunday, sermons by the Rev. George Fox; afternoon and evening.

Chesterfield: NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—On Monday, annual meeting.

Hull.—On Sunday evening, one of a course of lectures, by Rev. J. M. Dixon. Subject, "Theodore Parker."

Manchester: MEMORIAL HALL.—On Thursday, Dr. Fletcher's first lecture on "Physiology in relation to health."

Rochdale: BLACKWATER-STREET CHAPEL.—On Sunday, school sermons, by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A.

Stalybridge.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. John Page Hopps. Subject, "What is true liberty?"

Births.

BURGESS.—On the 3rd inst., at Hastings, the wife of Mr. S. C. Burgess, of a son.

BURGESS.—On the 9th inst., at Brighton, the wife of Mr. Rowland Burgess, of a son.

Deaths.

CORNER.—On the 14th inst., at 3, St. Thomas's-square, Hackney, Sarah, the eldest daughter of W. E. Corner, aged 25 years.

SMITH.—On the 13th inst., at Doncaster, Emma, the wife of the Rev. W. S. Smith, aged 35 years.

TARR.—On the 13th inst., at 3, Dudley-street, Hulme, the infant son of Mr. Launcelot Tarr, aged eight months.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—The Midland Company's MAIN LINE TRAINS now run to and from the NEW ST. PANCRAS STATION, LONDON.

A New and Improved Service of EXPRESS and FAST TRAINS has been established between MANCHESTER and LONDON, BRISTOL, BIRMINGHAM, LEICESTER, NOTTINGHAM, and DERBY, &c., &c.—The following tables show the TRAIN SERVICE for October—

BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND LONDON.										SUNDAYS.
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	9.45	9.50	12.45	3.30	3.55	6.20	8.30	8.55	4.45	6.50
LONDON (St. Pancras) arr.	12.0	2.45	4.0	6.30	8.40	10.45				10.0
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
LONDON (St. Pancras) dep.	6.15	9.0	10.0	11.30	3.0	4.40				3.50	6.40
MANCHESTER.....arr.	12.15	2.50	4.0	5.0	8.5	9.40				8.0
Through carriages run between London and Manchester by all trains.
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND LEICESTER.										SUNDAYS.
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	7.10	9.45	9.50	12.45	3.30	3.55	6.20	8.30	4.45	6.50
LEICESTER.....arr.	9.50	11.35	12.20	1.27	4.0	5.5	7.50	10.45	12.50	7.20
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
LEICESTER.....dep.	6.20	9.0	11.24	12.23	2.12	4.10	5.36	7.8	1.55	5.26
MANCHESTER.....arr.	10.5	12.15	2.50	4.0	5.0	8.5	9.40		5.45	8.0
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND NOTTINGHAM.										SUNDAYS.
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	7.10	9.45	9.50	12.45	3.30	3.55	6.20	8.30	4.45	6.50
NOTTINGHAM.....arr.	9.25	10.50	12.10	1.0	3.10	3.50	5.55	7.35	12.20	7.10	9.45
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
NOTTINGHAM.....dep.	7.10	7.50	9.25	11.35	12.35	2.35	5.50	7.15	7.0	2.35	5.40
MANCHESTER.....arr.	10.5	11.45	12.15	2.50	4.0	5.0	8.5	9.40	11.30	5.45	8.0
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND DERBY.										SUNDAYS.
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	7.10	9.45	9.50	12.45	3.30	3.55	6.20	8.30	4.45	6.50
DERBY.....arr.	8.30	10.5	11.20	12.15	2.15	2.40	5.5	6.56	9.10	11.25	6.20
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
DERBY.....dep.	8.0	8.50	10.15	12.25	1.25	3.25	3.30	6.35	6.45	8.5	8.25
MANCHESTER.....arr.	10.5	11.45	12.15	2.50	4.0	5.0	8.5	9.40	11.30	5.45	8.0
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND BIRMINGHAM.										SUNDAYS.
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	7.10	9.50	12.45	3.30	3.55	6.20	8.30	8.45	4.45	6.5
BIRMINGHAM.....arr.	10.5	12.40	2.20	4.55	7.25	9.20	11.30			9.45	11.30
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
BIRMINGHAM.....dep.	7.45	9.25	11.10	1.30	4.55	6.25				1.40
MANCHESTER.....arr.	12.15	2.50	4.0	5.0	8.5	9.40				5.45
BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND BRISTOL.										SUNDAYS.
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
MANCHESTER.....dep.	6.55	9.50	12.45	3.30	6.20
BRISTOL.....arr.	2.25	5.35	7.50	12.20
	a.m.	a.m.	a.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	p.m.	a.m.	p.m.
BRISTOL.....dep.	8.0	8.45	11.10	3.20
MANCHESTER.....arr.	8.0	8.0	8.5	9.40
Through carriages run between Manchester and Bristol by 6.55 a.m. and 12.45 p.m. Trains from Manchester, and 8.0 a.m. and 3.20 p.m. Trains from Bristol.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheam Hill, at his printing-office, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, October 16, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 391.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing	340
What is Saying on Church Matters	340
Song by an Eldest Son	342
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XXVI.	342
Review: "British Quarterly Review," October, 1868	343
Disestablishment—and then?	343
A Ladies' Conference	343
How to Kill a Church	343
Christian Thought in Painted Windows	344
The Sunday Fair in Shoreditch	344
American Notes	344
Fire-side Readings: Thine	345
Witchcraft.—III.	345
Church Curiosities.—VIII.	346
Intelligence: Bury, Carter Lane, Mile End, North Mid- land Association, Portsmouth, Rochdale, Tavistock	346
The Coming Week	346

sending Stamps for orders for short advertisements, parties must reckon five words for the first line, and eight words for each succeeding line. In cases where the amount sent is insufficient, we leave out unnecessary words to reduce the advertisement.

CHARGE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ten lines and under	6d. a line.
For the first ten lines	5d. a line.
For 6 consecutive insertions, a reduction of 25 per cent. ..
Half column	£1. 6s. 6d.
A whole column	£2. 10s. 6d.
A whole page	£5. 5s. 6d.

LOWER MOSLEY-STREET DAY AND SUNDAY SCHOOLS.—THE ANNUAL SERMON in support of these schools will be preached in Cross-street Chapel, on Sunday morning, October 23, 1868, by the Rev. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A. In the evening the same minister will deliver, in that chapel, an ADDRESS to the children and their parents. Morning service to commence at half-past ten; evening, half-past six. A collection will be made after each service.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN will PREACH on Sunday next, morning and evening.

STOKE NEWINGTON GREEN CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—Next Sunday morning, the Rev. J. K. APPLEBY will commence a series of DISCOURSES on "Conversations of Christ."

STOKE NEWINGTON GREEN CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—Next Monday evening, at eight o'clock, the Rev. J. K. APPLEBY will commence a course of four LECTURES on "Ritualism."

WESTERN UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN UNION.—THE AUTUMNAL MEETING of this Society will be held at Colyton, on Wednesday morning, October 28th, 1868, when Divine Service will be conducted at half-past eleven o'clock. A SERMON preached by the Rev. T. R. DOBSON, of Sidmouth. There will be a COLLECTION at the Dolphin Hotel at two o'clock, and at five a TEA MEETING will be held in the same place, after which the report of the Society will be read, and Addresses delivered suitable to the occasion. Sir JOHN BOWRING will take the chair at the evening meeting.

WANTED, a SCHOOLMASTER to establish a Day-school in connection with the Unitarian Sunday School, Clover-street, Rochdale.—Address, Rev. JOSEPH FREESTON, Rochdale.

A LADY of Unitarian principles, who has had great experience in the education of girls, wishes to OPEN a SCHOOL at Brighton after Christmas, for a small number of pupils, not exceeding ten. For terms and other particulars, address, Miss DAVIES, 9, Dorset Square, London, N.W.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.—Principal: C. du C. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthy-situated establishment Boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemanly education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

HOME EDUCATION AT PARIS, especially for Unitarians.—A Gentleman receives a few Unitarian YOUTHS to TEACH them FRENCH and other branches of instruction.—For further particulars and references apply to Mr. A. G., 68, Guildford-street, Russell Square, London; or to Mr. A. G., 81, Rue de Fleuries, Paris.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

M. R. GLADSTONE ON THE IRISH CHURCH COMMISSION REPORT.—See the NON-CONFORMIST for Oct. 20, which contains also "The Alternative—Electoral Education—Reviews of Dyer, McCall, and French on the Irish Church—Reports of Baptist and Congregational Unions, &c., &c." Price 5d. unstamped. ARTHUR MIAL, 18, Boulevard-street, London, E.C.

"THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH IN IRELAND: WHAT IS IT, AND WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH IT?" By the Rev. JOHN PAGG HOPPS. See the Truthseeker for October, now ready at all the usual places. Price 3d.

D. K. BEARD'S MANUAL OF CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE.—Orders for Subscription Copies should be sent at once to Mr. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

CORRECTIONS, SUGGESTIONS, the Date when the several Chapels were Built, and ADVERTISEMENTS for the "UNITARIAN POCKET ALMANAC" for 1869, are desired, without delay, by J. PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester.

NEW EDITIONS OF THE MEMOIR OF TRAVERS MADGE.

The first edition having been out of print since March last, and many requests having been made for it to be reprinted, A SECOND EDITION, SIMILAR TO THE FIRST, 1 vol., 12mo., cloth, limp, lettered, Price One Shilling and Sixpence, is now in the press, and will be issued at the beginning of December.

A BETTER EDITION will also be issued at the same time, larger in size, better paper, well bound, and with portrait.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

 Of this edition only a very limited number of copies will be prepared, according to the orders actually received for it.

In order to lessen as much as possible the expense and risk of this re-publication, Mr. Herford would be glad to have as many as possible ordered beforehand from himself, so as to save publishing charges upon a portion of the edition. Orders may therefore be sent at once, accompanied with stamps or Post-office order, to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,

Higher Broughton, Manchester.

By whom the book will be sent post free immediately on publication.

"JESUS CHRIST THE SON OF GOD,"

NOT GOD THE SON? A Lecture by the Rev. J. PAGE HOPPS. A new edition, just ready, price 2d. May be had of all the usual agents and booksellers.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.

THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, compiled by

JOSEPH LANCASTER,

Containing Tunes to All Martin's Hymns.

London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester:

Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6,

Commercial-street; and of all music and booksellers.

Congregations and choirs supplied at low rates.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 3s.

PALINGENESIA; or the Modern

Apostate. (Rise and Progress of Heterodoxy in a Contemporary Soul.) A Poem. By A. T. TETTER.

Williams and Norgate, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden,

London; and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

COALS! COALS!—NOTICE OF

REMOVAL.—JAMES WELLS, Coal and Coke Merchant, Keeper Wharf, Ratcliffe, E. Office: 23, Coborn-street, Bow Road, E.

J. W. takes this opportunity of informing his numerous customers, friends, and the public generally, that he has

REMOVED to the above address, where he hopes, by strict attention to business, to merit a continuance of their favours.

He would remind them that Coals are now at the lowest prices for the present season, and would advise them to purchase as soon as possible. A trial is solicited. Quality guaranteed. Best Wallends, 25s. per ton; best Inlands, 23s.

per ton for cash.—Orders by post punctually attended to.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.—The Midland Company's MAIN LINE TRAINS now run to and from the NEW ST. PANCRAZ STATION, LONDON.

A New and Improved Service of EXPRESS and FAST TRAINS has been established between MANCHESTER and

LONDON, BRISTOL, BIRMINGHAM, LEICESTER, NOTTINGHAM, and DERBY, &c., &c.—The following tables show the TRAIN SERVICE for October:—

BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND LONDON.

MANCHESTER.....dep. 6.55 .. 9.45 .. 9.50 .. 12.45 .. 3.30 .. 8.55

LONDON (St. Pancras) arr. 12.0 .. 2.45 .. 4.0 .. 6.30 .. 8.30 .. 10.45

LONDON (St. Pancras) dep. 6.15 .. 9.0 .. 10.0 .. 11.30 .. 3.0 .. 4.40

MANCHESTER.....arr. 12.15 .. 2.50 .. 3.0 .. 5.0 .. 8.5 .. 9.40

Through carriages run between London and Manchester by all trains.

BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND LEICESTER.

MANCHESTER.....dep. 6.55 .. 7.10 .. 9.45 .. 9.50 .. 12.45 .. 3.30 .. 8.55

LEICESTER.....arr. 9.30 .. 11.3 .. 12.20 .. 1.27 .. 4.0 .. 6.5 .. 7.50 .. 10.55

LEICESTER.....dep. 6.20 .. 9.0 .. 11.24 .. 12.23 .. 2.12 .. 4.10 .. 5.38 .. 7.3

MANCHESTER.....arr. 10.5 .. 12.15 .. 2.50 .. 3.0 .. 5.0 .. 8.5 .. 9.40

BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND NOTTINGHAM.

MANCHESTER.....dep. 6.55 .. 7.10 .. 9.45 .. 9.50 .. 11.25 .. 12.45 .. 3.30 .. 8.55

NOTTINGHAM.....arr. 9.25 .. 10.59 .. 12.10 .. 1.0 .. 3.10 .. 5.55 .. 7.35 .. 10.20

NOTTINGHAM.....dep. 7.10 .. 7.50 .. 9.25 .. 11.35 .. 12.35 .. 2.35 .. 5.50 .. 7.15

MANCHESTER.....arr. 10.5 .. 11.45 .. 12.15 .. 2.50 .. 3.0 .. 5.0 .. 8.5 .. 9.40

BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND DERBY.

MANCHESTER.....dep. 6.55 .. 7.10 .. 9.45 .. 9.50 .. 11.25 .. 12.45 .. 3.30 .. 8.55

DERBY.....arr. 8.30 .. 10.5 .. 11.20 .. 12.15 .. 2.15 .. 4.0 .. 5.5 .. 6.38 .. 9.10

DERBY.....dep. 8.0 .. 8.50 .. 10.15 .. 12.25 .. 1.25 .. 3.25 .. 5.30 .. 8.35 .. 9.45

MANCHESTER.....arr. 10.5 .. 11.45 .. 12.15 .. 2.50 .. 3.0 .. 5.0 .. 8.5 .. 9.40

BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND BIRMINGHAM.

MANCHESTER.....dep. 6.55 .. 7.10 .. 9.45 .. 9.50 .. 11.25 .. 12.45 .. 3.30 .. 8.55

BIRMINGHAM.....arr. 10.5 .. 12.40 .. 2.30 .. 4.55 .. 7.25 .. 9.30 .. 11.30

BIRMINGHAM.....dep. 1.45 .. 9.25 .. 11.10 .. 1.20 .. 4.55 .. 6.25 .. 8.55

MANCHESTER.....arr. 12.15 .. 2.50 .. 3.0 .. 5.0 .. 8.5 .. 9.40

BETWEEN MANCHESTER AND BRISTOL.

MANCHESTER.....dep. 6.55 .. 7.10 .. 9.45 .. 9.50 .. 11.25 .. 12.45 .. 3.30

BRISTOL.....arr. 2.25 .. 5.35 .. 7.50 .. 7.59 .. 12.30

BRISTOL.....dep. 8.0 .. 8.45 .. 11.10 .. 1.10 .. 3.20

MANCHESTER.....arr. 8.0 .. 5.0 .. 8.5 .. 9.40

Through carriages run between Manchester and Bristol by 6.55 a.m. and 12.45 p.m. Trains from Manchester, and 8.0 a.m. and 3.20 p.m. Trains from Bristol.

Derby, October, 1868.

HERFORD'S REFORM CLUB CLARET.

In quarts, 22s.; pints, 11s. 6d. Nett cash.

C. J. HERFORD, Carlton Buildings, Cooper-st., Manchester

CARLOWITZ,

22s. PER DOZEN.

This excellent HUNGARIAN WINE is now greatly recommended for its nourishing and sustaining properties. As we import it direct from Hungary, without any intermediate agency, and bottle it under our own personal inspection, purchasers can rely upon its genuineness.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,

WINE MERCHANTS,

MANCHESTER.....25, Market-street.

Liverpool11, Lord-street.

Birmingham23, High street.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of

Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant,

STOCKPORT.

A BEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED

AND OTHER NEEDLES.

"GO TO SPACKMAN, MERCHANT

CLOTHIER, HATTER, & OUTFITTER, BELFAST,

"For all you want in CLOTHING. I get all I possibly can from him myself. He has the largest, best, most fashionable, and cheapest Stock of READY-MADE CLOTHING in the WORLD."—Extract from a recommendation to an American friend visiting Europe, by Mr. Cook, the Great European and Transatlantic "Excursionist."

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,

FURNISHING IRONMONGERS AND CUTLERS,

23, SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

COMFORT WITH ECONOMY.

S. ANN'S CAFE,

3, RED LION-ST., ST. ANN'S SQUARE, MANCHESTER.

(Under Mr. Henry's Music Warehouse.)

J. BALLS, Proprietor.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITEFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS

OF BEDDING AND WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical

Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital.

Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET.

EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE

BIRMINGHAM.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8,

Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck

was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower

Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted

to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

WHITEFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and

SAVES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS,

CASH and DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c.,

&c. Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITEFIELD & SONS,

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET.

EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE,

BIRMINGHAM.

SUNDAYS.

MANCHESTER.....p.m. 8.30 .. 4.45 .. 6.5

LONDON (St. Pancras) arr. 12.30 .. 7.20

LONDON (St. Pancras) dep. 1.55 .. 5.28

MANCHESTER.....arr. 5.45 .. 8.0

SUNDAYS.

MANCHESTER.....p.m. 8.30 .. 4.45 .. 6.5

LEICESTER.....arr. 12.30 .. 7.20

LEICESTER.....dep. 1.55 .. 5.28

MANCHESTER.....arr. 5.45 .. 8.0

SUNDAYS.

MANCHESTER.....p.m. 8.30 .. 4.45 .. 6.5

NOTTINGHAM.....arr. 12.30 .. 7.20

NOTTINGHAM.....dep. 1.55 .. 5.28

MANCHESTER.....arr. 5.45 .. 8.0

SUNDAYS.

MANCHESTER.....p.m. 8.30 .. 4.45 .. 6.5

DERBY.....arr. 12.30 .. 7.20

DERBY.....dep. 1.55 .. 5.28

MANCHESTER.....arr. 5.45 .. 8.0

SUNDAYS.

MANCHESTER.....p.m. 8.30 .. 4.45 .. 6.5

BIRMINGHAM.....arr. 12.30 .. 7.20

BIRMINGHAM.....dep. 1.55 .. 5.28

MANCHESTER.....arr. 5.45 .. 8.0

SUNDAYS.

MANCHESTER.....p.m. 8.30 .. 4.45 .. 6.5

BRISTOL.....arr. 12.30 .. 7.20

BRISTOL.....dep. 1.55 .. 5.28

MANCHESTER.....arr. 5.45 .. 8.0

SUNDAYS.

MANCHESTER.....p.m. 8.30 .. 4.45 .. 6.5

MANCHESTER.....arr. 12.30 .. 7.20

MANCHESTER.....dep. 1.55 .. 5.28

MANCHESTER.....arr. 5.45 .. 8.0

SUNDAYS.

MANCHESTER.....p.m. 8.30 .. 4.45 .. 6.5

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The latest accounts from China and Japan show the prospects of the Christian missionaries to be anything but encouraging in those countries. At Yangchow, Mr. Taylor, the head of the Protestant mission, and his party have narrowly escaped death at the hands of a mob of infuriated Chinese, some thousands strong, who attacked and burnt the mission house; and a decree laying the Christian religion under a formal interdict has been posted up at Homura and the gates of Yokohama. The placards describe Christians as "the devilish sect." The British and American consuls have actively interfered on behalf of the injured missionaries.

According to the Roman correspondent of the Pall Mall, the Vatican, as we suspected would be the case, has changed its tone about the Queen of Spain, and is drawing back, the whole of the Court, from Cardinal Antonelli downwards, being disappointed to find she has no money. Even the Pope has been brought to see that his invitation was precipitate, and Antonelli has written to Monsignor Chigi to throw every impediment in the way of her coming, as her presence at Rome could not fail to be embarrassing.

The Established Church of Prussia is not disposed to put up with the Pope's insolence to Protestants, and to be classed with his erring children; and, by order of the Central Consistory, a declaration was to be read from the pulpit on Sunday in all churches and chapels of the country, declining his Holiness' invitation, and repelling the arrogance with which it is accompanied.

It is interesting to learn that at Bhowanipore, in India, a Congregational Church has been established, and a place of worship built, under the care of a native pastor, Rev. Surjo Cumar Ghose, which is composed entirely of native converts, and supports itself and carries on its work, just as an Independent Church here would do.

The valuable jewels which decorated the altar and images at the church of Atocha, Madrid, have, by order of the authorities, been deposited in the Bank of Spain. It seems that Our Lady of Atocha is the Lucina of Spanish mythology to whom the Queen was accustomed to pay vows and make offerings at frequently recurring crises of her domestic life. The Daily News tells us:

"Our Lady was rich before Queen Isabella began to pay her tribute; but her wealth has augmented rapidly since she became the object of her Majesty's special veneration. It is said that upon one memorable occasion, when the Queen's life was saved, as she believed, by Our Lady, her Majesty devoted to her a crown of diamonds and topazes, with other jewels, worth in all £160,000. The emeralds, sapphires, and rubies, her silver coral studs, four hundred robes, and other effects lately in the sacristy of Atocha, are said to be worth a million sterling."

The Provisional Government of Spain has ordered the immediate suppression of all monasteries, convents, colleges, and other religious establishments founded since July 29, 1837. It confiscates all their property, and dismisses all the monks and nuns without any pension. Half the convents existing at the date given (that of some act of the Liberal party then on the point of expelling the Carlists) are to be closed, and the remaining half forbidden to receive novices. They are only spared as a temporary refuge for such of the monks and nuns as may not choose to return to secular life.

Taking advantage of the change which has occurred in Spain, the British and Foreign Bible Society is urging forward its operations there in a manner which has hitherto been impossible. Large supplies of the Bible in Spanish have already been sent out, and depôts for the sale and distribution of them are to be established in all the principal towns. The society announces that it will spare neither labour nor money in carrying out this work, and it appeals to the public to support its efforts by special contributions.

The Post correspondent at Florence gives some interesting particulars of a new play by Gaetano Gattinelli, founded on the married life of Milton, the success of which was complete on the first night, and is likely to have a long run. The hero was played by Salvini, dressed from Fairthorne's portrait of the poet. The sentiments on a free press, the ends and aims of all good government, on the real worth and dignity of letters, on domestic purity, on filial love, were not less carefully reproduced, under the natural conditions of dramatic effect, from Milton's writings; and as to the "Paradise Lost," there were entire passages dexterously interwoven with the play.

A silly curate lately refused to marry two of his parishioners because the female had not been baptised. She was willing to be so, but he at first required three months' tuition of her, preparatory to performing the rite; the three months he subsequently reduced to two weeks, finding her, we suppose, an apt scholar. The Independent minister of the place, instead of enlightening the girl, wrote to the bishop describing her case, who only gave him the cold shoulder, and declined to interfere. They seem to manage these matters better in Austria. At Toeplitz, in Bohemia, the priest refused to celebrate a marriage between a Catholic lady and a Protestant, unless they agreed to bring up the children in the Catholic religion. They refused to agree to this. The governor hearing of it, and of the popular excitement, performed the civil ceremony, which now in Austria, as here, constitutes a valid marriage, in full uniform, and addressed thousands of people who assembled, amidst enthusiastic cheers, congratulating them on the liberty the constitution had just conferred on the country.

We are glad to learn that Dr. Raleigh's address to the Congregational Union is to be published in a cheap form, as it is well fitted to correct some misapprehensions regarding the motives of Non-conformists in seeking a separation of Church and State, and to impress them with the importance of the duties which, in the present position of ecclesiastical affairs, they have to perform.

The expedition to survey the Peninsula of Sinai is to start on the 24th inst., since, though sufficient funds have not yet been raised to defray all the expenses of the expedition, some gentlemen have come forward and guaranteed the sum wanting.

At a meeting of his friends before leaving this country, the Bishop of Capetown said he never entertained any feelings of personal animosity towards Dr. Colenso, and only prayed that he might be brought to a better state of mind. In answer to a question from the Rev. Mr. Bennett, he said he could not say what the title of the new bishop (Mr. Macrorie) would be, but it would, he thought, be wrong under any circumstances to call him Bishop of Natal, the Queen having conferred that title upon Dr. Colenso. It is now rumoured that Mr. Macrorie is to be consecrated by the Archbishop of Canterbury on All Saints' Day, with the new bishops of Peterborough, Bombay, and Grafton.

The Rev. Reginald Stubbs, Fellow of Oriel, and Regius Professor of Modern History, is reported to have received the appointment of Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford, to which a Canonry is attached, in the room of Dean Mansel. Mr. Stubbs was for some time Librarian at Lambeth, and is known as well versed in certain departments of historical research.

Mr. Purchas, of Brighton, has resolved to defy the Bishop of Chichester's inhibition, and still continue his exhibition at St. James's. On Sunday there were the usual altar decorations, lights, flowers, incense, acolytes in scarlet cassocks, tinkling bell, and grand procession of cross and banner bearers, singing the "St. James's Processional Hymn," as they slowly paraded round the church. Mr. Purchas has thrown down his glove to the bishop, and it now remains to be seen whether his lordship will pick it up.

Though the abuses of the Irish Church are now coming to be admitted by nearly all parties, it is still well that such striking illustrations should be kept in view as that which Mr. Gladstone cited, on Saturday last, from some statements of Dr. Brady, a clergyman of that church. He gives the case of fourteen benefices, in each of which, besides the incumbent, there is a curate receiving on the average 100 guineas a year, and the population of these fourteen benefices belonging to the Establishment is 1,332 souls. But over and above the 100 guineas paid to the curates, the income of the incumbents is £8,192. On which Dr. Brady observes that, considering that the fourteen curates are sufficient to look after such a small number of souls, 8,000 and odd pounds is received for doing no work at all.

Mr. Thompson, M.P., who was elected last year by the Churchmen of Bradford, in opposition to Mr. Miall, has been making a speech at the stone-laying of a new church near Idle (when he was chairman), that a good deal scandalised the Churchmen present, the Bishop of Ripon among them. While deprecating the separation of Church and State, Mr. Thompson urged that the Church was not altogether managed as it should be, and suggested that Dissenters ought to be buried by their own ministers in the churchyard; and, further, that when the clergyman did not preach in the church his pulpit might be occupied by a minister of any other denomination. These remarks, the reporters say, were received with strong disapprobation.

We seldom meet with a more "lame and impotent conclusion" than that which we find in the Bishop of Carlisle's address to his clergy. After inveighing in the strongest manner against the sacramentalists among them, he solemnly said, "I must, therefore, now say, in words as explicit as it is possible for me to use, that if you, or any other clergyman in the diocese over which it has pleased God to make me overseer, persist in the course of innovation upon which you have now entered"—the consequence will be, what does the reader suppose?—"you do so in spite of the most solemn paternal remonstrance and episcopal admonition!" Is the bishop so simple as to imagine that the ritualists will care anything for either "admonition" or "remonstrance," unless it is backed up by the law? Mr. Purchas would teach him differently.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

With regard to the religious condition and prospects of Spain, the special correspondent of the Times says:—

"The Spaniard's creed may be destroyed, but not changed. It is a perfect mystery to me how conscientious English Roman Catholics can visit these southern countries, and still own any connection with the grovelling superstition which here goes by the name of religion. Those who look in at the Sanctuary at Atocha, or who visit the Chapel of the Virgin at Toledo, must be at a loss to find even the faintest trace of Christianity among the paraphernalia of the worse than Pagan idolatry which everywhere meets their eyes. Such as it is, however, that is the Spaniard's religion, the beginning and end of all his creed and worship. Remove that mere scaffolding which priestly cunning has reared, and the edifice is nowhere. Nothing is easier than to turn a Spaniard into a thorough infidel; but to stop him at some halfway of rational belief is an utter impossibility—unless the cure proceeds from the very sources from which the evil has sprung. What the priest has done, the priest alone can undo. Should anything like a good understanding grow up between the emancipated laity and the clergy now deprived of the Sovereign's support, it is not impossible that the sounder part of the priesthood might aspire to place their religion on a different footing—on a footing less at variance with the ideas of modern progress. Were the temporal power to come to an end, and the Church to be driven to her own resources, it is not impossible that both in Italy and in Spain reform of the most shocking abuses might arise from the Church herself, and for her own sake. Without the guidance of his priest, for good or for evil, the Roman Catholic will attempt nothing. It is well to guard against illusions. Society in these southern countries cannot for a long time—cannot, perhaps, for ever—be emancipated from the clergy."

The Freeman is anything but complimentary in its remarks on the Pope's letter, inviting the bishops of the Greek and Eastern Churches to counsel, but Protestant "Pastors" only to repentance. It says (and we agree with it):—

"His letter is not worth reprinting, or even quoting, being the merest ecclesiastical twaddle we remember ever to have read, even from the present Pope. We should think that those who desire reunion with Rome must be ashamed of such an infallible simpleton for their Chief Bishop; though we do not forget that twaddle seems to be the natural dialect of Episcopacy, that is, when not enraged, since Pío Nono hardly surpasses in this respect the Pan-Anglican bishops who recently emitted an Apostolic letter from Lambeth. With what object such a ludicrously silly document as the Pope's could have been issued, it is not easy to conceive. Perhaps it was only meant for the perusal of the faithful everywhere, and of the feminine of both sexes in England, who are pining with love for the venerable old gentleman, to whom they long to act the part of an Abishag, the Shunamite. As to the Eastern bishops, we expect they will be disposed to treat the invitation with supreme contempt. Though little less superstitious than the Church of Rome, and much like her in the profound ignorance of the mass of its members, the Greek Church is as proud of its orthodoxy as its Western neighbour, and would not give up its filioque, or give way by subjection—no, not for an hour."

The High Church Guardian, which evidently feels a little sore that the Pope "confounds and lumps together, with impartial indifference to all distinctions, the Church of England, with the disciples of Socinus and with the obscurest sect of Ranters and Shakers," observes on the same letter:

"Its tone—of course it would be—is that of lofty, unapproachable supremacy. It is the language of the infallible master of all religious truth to a wretched, pitiable, blind, mixed multitude, knowing nothing whatever of the things on which he speaks, groping helplessly in the misery and corruption out of which he condescends to offer them his charitable hand to extricate them. Of explanation, of concession, of admission that there may be questions and differences to be adjusted, of anything pointing in the vaguest way to anything like discussion even between supreme authority and rebellious inferiors, there is not the faintest hint, as there is obviously in the Pope's mind not the remotest thought. It is the old story, though there has been an innovation in the form of repeating it. The most hopeful and resolute believer in the possibilities of reunion could not here find the smallest shred of encouragement on which to build any expectation of changed policy at Rome."

There is generally some "very pretty quarrel" going on in the pages of the paper which has the foregoing. One at present relates to the scheme proposed by the Rev. Mr. Fraser, for the comprehension of Wesleyans, of which the Rev. J. W. Burgon falls foul, and wishes to know whether Mr. F. is prepared to adopt all, or some, or any of the following courses which he "hints" at:

"1. He says—'If a system of very minute tests is adopted as her terms of communion'—(he is speaking of the Thirty-nine Articles)—'the Church that adopts such a system cannot move a step forward in the direction in which I desire the Church of England to move.' Does Mr. Fraser then desire that the Church would give up the Thirty-nine Articles in order to 'move a step forward,' and first of all, to win back the Wesleyans?"

"2. 'I have always felt,' he says, 'that it was an evil hour when the Church thought herself obliged by the necessities of her position,—in order to fortify the ground against the assaults of heresy,—to add to, or develop, the simple articles of the Apostles' Creed.' Am I to infer from this that Mr. Fraser thinks we might reasonably consent to surrender the Creed called after the name of Athanasius?"

"3. 'It was with much delight,' he says, 'that I observed . . . a proposal that Churchmen and orthodox Dissenters should unite on the common platform of acknowledgment of the Nicene Creed.' Is this, then, the platform which Mr. Fraser recommends for the Church of England? Does he propose that she should make the Nicene Creed, pure and simple, 'her terms of communion,'—in the sense in which hitherto she has made the Thirty-nine Articles?"

"4. Mr. Fraser states 'We live in an age that recognises the supremacy of conscience in matters of faith. The day is gone by for imposing dogmas by mere authority.' May I modestly inquire whether the meaning of this is, that there is no longer any need of our having any authoritative standard of faith at all? This would, of course simplify matters exceedingly. But is it Mr. Fraser's programme or not? I cannot for a moment do him so great a wrong as to suppose it, until I have the assurance under his own hand."

Our readers may remember that the Rev. Mr. Mossman, a clergyman of the Establishment, who exults in the prospect of its speedy submission to the "Holy Apostolic See," was lately thrown into a state of the utmost alarm by a doubt which Dr. Newman threw on the validity of English "orders." On this subject the Pall Mall remarks:

"The question whether the orders of the Church of England are, technically or historically, valid or not, is one which has been agitated over and over again since the Reformation. It is usually discussed on the mere antiquarian issue—that is, whether there is reasonable evidence that certain bishops in the reign of Elizabeth were duly consecrated by persons themselves duly consecrated, ordained, and baptised, and whose predecessors were so likewise, according to the laws of the Church. A controversy primâ facie so monstrous and irrational, in the eyes of all except a few ultra-logical fanatics, was probably never started. That a member of the Church of England, however pure in life and orthodox in doctrine, is in the same position as regards his eternal interests as heathens and Mahometans, unless certain words were duly said over one Matthew Parker three hundred years ago, by persons having authority to say them, is a proposition so contrary to all else which religion teaches us that we may be pretty sure no human being really believes it, however he may be induced by partisanship to make a cardinal doctrine of it. But it is precisely this proposition which is involved in the question, or nothing at all is involved in it. Unless the validity of Matthew Parker's consecration affects the position of each of us as a Christian, to ascertain its circumstances is a matter of no more consequence to us than to ascertain what Matthew Parker had for dinner at the Nag's Head on the occasion of the celebrated meeting there. No middle-course supposition, such as timid and puzzled minds delight in, no hazy conjecture that the validity of Elizabethan orders may place us in a safer position, though we cannot tell how, can really be sustained in this matter. To any intellect endowed with even a moderate amount of preciseness, the point must be either all-important, or it must be a mere matter of antiquarian curiosity. And no doubt that, for all practical purposes, it has long been placed fairly within the latter category."

The Rev. W. F. Wilkinson, vicar of St. Werburgh's, Derby, has issued an address to his parishioners, in which he argues the Irish Church question at considerable length, and with great closeness and fairness. He concludes by saying:

"I feel bound to advocate the disestablishment of the Irish Church as a British citizen, a Churchman, a Protestant, and a Christian; for it promises to put an end for ever to a state of things which has too long been an anomaly in our Constitution, an encumbrance to the Church of England, an embarrassment and hindrance to the spread of the gospel in Ireland, and a scandal and reproach to Protestantism all over the world."

A correspondent of the Independent is aggrieved that Mr. George Macdonald should have been charged in its columns with Universalism. He says:

"I am not quite sure what either you or your correspondent mean when the term 'Universalism' is employed. I cannot therefore say whether it is worse or better than the Arianism or Unitarianism of a past age. I know what Mr. Macdonald teaches in his sermons and novels. I should not have thought that his mild optimism could be called, properly speaking, 'Universalism.' I should certainly not have thought it as bad as the evils with which your correspondent contrasts it."

The Guardian has the following on the recent S. P. C. K. debate:

"The Christian Knowledge Society has hitherto been fortunate enough to preserve a platform on which men of all schools within the Church could take their places without risk of unseemly strife. Imputations, it is true, have been made by censors on either side; and the vice of moderation may with some justice be charged against it. Yet it was surely a matter of congratulation that one great society at least could, without forfeiture of anything essential to its proper character as a Church institution, be regarded as neutral ground. Partisans of various factions are already rejoicing in the prospect of destroying this neutrality. The intolerant disciples of Exeter Hall, ready to surrender any truth, if they can only inflict a wound by its surrender on their opponents, are glorying in the disturbance. They will make common cause with the depravers of the Prayer-book, and with the adversaries of inspiration, if so be that they can give an apparent triumph to their own party, and deal a blow at the High Church objects of their persistent hate. Extreme men of the opposite school will as gladly claim a victory for their own sentiments, and will use the majority which supports the cause of truth in South Africa for the furtherance of their own self-willed developments of religion at home. In all this we see a gloomy prospect of disunion, an opportunity for the conflict of passions and prejudices which might well have been kept aloof from the society's sphere of work."

In an Introduction to a volume of Essays, by Henry T. Tuckerman, of America, Dr. Doran thus writes:

"Mr. Tuckerman regrets that his country does not take rest and rejoice on some common national holiday at least once a year. Now, all Christian nations have one that they may celebrate once a week. But some among us are doing their conscientious best to turn a joyous festival into a gloomy fast. God granted the day, but some among us misinterpret the meaning of the grant, obstruct rest and enjoyment, and only change one sort of labour for another. Let all the nation go up and praise the Lord; but, for

'Other things mild Heaven a time ordains,
And disapproves that care, though wise in show,
That with superfluous burden loads the day,
And, when God sends a cheerful hour, refrains.'"

The following extract from Mr. Tuckerman's essay is an appropriate illustration of Dr. Doran's meaning:

"In a recent farce, that had a run at Paris, and caricatures English life, the curtain rises on a deserted street, hushed and gloomy, through which two figures at last slowly walk on tiptoe; as they approach, one begins to address the other; the latter, raising his fingers to his lips, whispers 'C'est Sunday' and both disappear; the comedy ends, however, with a prodigious dinner of beef and beer."

The Pall Mall says:

"Angrim Jonas, the Icelfander, discussing travellers' stories of his time—300 years ago—which he gravely dismisses as incredible, mentions the following: 'That there is an island off the coast of Hibernia, half of which is occupied by devils; in the other half the devils have no property; by reason of a church which is built there, although no service is performed in it, nor is there any clergyman, nor indeed any human inhabitants at all.' Had Angrim lived in later days he would have recognised in this legend a Hibernian myth gracefully prefiguring the state of the Protestant Church of Ireland. Wherever that Church is legally planted, though without a congregation or a resident pastor, heresy and superstition are kept at a distance through the occult virtue which proceeds from it: so, at least, its partisans allege."

In a meeting at Penrith a few days since, the Dean of Maritzburg maintained that the Church in Natal is stronger than ever it was before. They had carried out the sentence of the Church against Dr. Colenso; they had separated themselves from him, and now they had nothing to do with him. If Dr. Colenso chose to reside in Natal he could do so, and while there he resided upon Church property. He (the Dean) had not yet thought fit to appeal against the decision; if he did, he had no doubt the Privy Council would reverse it. Still, if they were to get that judgment reversed, although they would get restored to their churches, they would not get rid of Dr. Colenso. They considered, therefore, that for a time it was better to let Dr. Colenso have the property and get churches of their own. He had no doubt that within the next twenty years they would get their own back.

Among his various characters, the elder Matthews used to introduce an old gentleman travelling in a stage coach, who, on looking out of the window and seeing that a 'turnpike which he had long known was gone, gave a deep sigh and said, 'Ah! yes, we're losing all our enjoyments!' Mr. James Grant, editor of the Advertiser and prophet of the publicans, has just published a work, entitled "Religious Tendencies of the Times," which shows that he feels the same in regard to some of the old bars which are about to be removed on the well-travelled orthodox road. What specially afflicts him is that "the doctrine of the Eternity of Misery in the world to come," in which his soul seems to have found rest and comfort, is going fast. There are various other "deadly errors and dangerous delusions of the day" over which he moans, but none grieves him like that, preached by the Maurices, the Stanleys, the Colensos, and other "Christian infidels," of the final restoration of all men to goodness and happiness. According to him this frightful heresy is rapidly gaining ground even in Evangelical quarters, affecting both preachers, and tutors, and students. Not altogether sympathising with President Edwards, who tells us that "the sight of hell-torments will exalt the happiness of the saints for ever," but feeling on the contrary that it would rather tend to lessen ours, we cannot pretend to share in Mr. Grant's regret that more merciful views of the Great Father's dealings are beginning to prevail; we can only rejoice that so many of the best minds of our day are entering into them, and showing them to be true.

Apropos, we presume, to the appointment of Dr. Mansel, the Guardian has the following on "St. Paul's and Westminster":

"We may something gain, I ween, from the words of either Dean,

In our efforts to elucidate life's mystery;
They will preach within their walls,—metaphysics at St. Paul's,

At St. Peter's, lively sketches of man's history."

A correspondent sends us the following passage, which the Dundee Advertiser quotes from a sermon of Dr. Anderson, of Glasgow, on "Reunion of Christian Friends in Heaven," and terms "one of the doctor's golden drops of fancy":

"Many a mother will not find her son there, and yet the Saviour will make her happy. There can be no grief in the paradise of God—no, not even for a perished son. She could not now endure him; and Christ will bring her some other woman's child, who has been seeking for his mother in vain, and He will say, 'Woman, behold thy son,' and to him, 'Behold thy mother,' and the wounds of the hearts of both shall be healed."

Our correspondent's comment on this is:

"I have always believed that a great change would take place in our nature upon entering into a higher state, but if such a change is to be made that my dear mother could not endure my company, or that I could be happy in the adoption of some other woman for my mother, believing her to be endlessly miserable, then from such a heaven I say, good Lord, deliver me!"

PADIHAM.—The first of a series of literary and musical entertainments took place in the Unitarian school-room, Padigham, on Saturday evening last. The room was crowded. The programme was a very varied one, and the selections were from the best authors.

SONG BY AN ELDEST SON.
(From Punch.)

A LITTLE, in December last,
Put out of joint I had my nose,
When Pius, after what had passed,
Another sent the Golden Rose.

The wonders by my Chassepots done
Upon the Holy Father's foes,
I reckoned, had his eldest son
Entitled to the Golden Rose.

It therefore did my feelings pain,
As you may readily suppose,
When Isabella, queen of Spain
That then was, got the Golden Rose.

What had she done? I, who had fought
By proxy, backed my words with blows,
I, for Mentana's service, thought
That I deserved the Golden Rose.

And now that Queen has lost her crown,
A circumstance which clearly shows
No blessing visibly brought down
By means of Pope's Golden Rose.

'Tis said with blessing ever blight
That he, with best intention, throws;
Whereof as one more proof some cite
What last came of the Golden Rose.

There's destiny, and there's a star;
It may be some ill influence flows
From persons, and can strike afar,
Transmitted by the Golden Rose.

Coincidences do look queer,
The common mind is struck with those;
I hope His Holiness this year
Will not send me the Golden Rose.

Had I not best recall from Rome
My soldiers, ere December close,
And crown the edifice at home,
Lest I, too, get the Golden Rose?

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XXVI.

SUBJECT: "The Hebrew writers represent God as persuading and earnestly pleading with those who have done wrong."

Read two or three detached passages of Hosea, where among quaint expressions may be found much beautiful tenderness. To begin with, chap. vii. 1-7, in the last preceding verses, Jehovah has declared that He will wait until His people own themselves guilty, and seek His face; in their affliction they will seek Me right early. The present chapter opens with their words of repentance. Come and let us return to Jehovah, for He hath torn and He will heal us. Then Jehovah gently expostulates with them: "O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? O Judah, what shall I do unto thee? for your goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it passeth away." Chap. x. 12; xi. 11. Jehovah calls to His people to sow righteousness and reap kindness; to break up their fallow ground, and He will rain down righteousness upon them. Then, with a beautiful change of metaphor: "When Israel was a child I loved him; I taught Ephraim also to walk, taking them by their arms. How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? Shall I deliver thee up, Israel? My heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together; I am God and not man; the Holy One in the midst of thee, and I will not come in anger." For a third passage, read chap. xiv. 1-9: "O Israel, return to Jehovah thy God; take with you words and return to Him." "I will heal their backsliding," says Jehovah. "I will love them of my free-will, for Mine anger is turned away from him."

Read also Isaiah xlii. 22; xlv. 4: "Thou hast not called upon Me, O Jacob; thou hast been wearied of Me, O Israel; yet," declares Jehovah, "I, even I, am He that blot out thy transgressions for Mine own sake, and I will not remember thy sins. Put Me in remembrance; let us plead together, that thou may be justified." And again: "Fear not, O Jacob, my servant, and thou Jeshurun whom I have chosen, I will pour water on the thirsty land, and my blessing upon thine offspring."

REVIEW.

British Quarterly Review. October, 1868.

THIS REVIEW contains three interesting biographical articles on Neander, Chrysostom, and Bunsen. An article on "Parish Law" treats of the parish as a civil rather than as an ecclesiastical division; and one on "Education in the United States" points to the munificent school arrangements, and the general diffusion of intelligence and education there concurrently with a good deal of absenteeism and truancy on the part of the children.

The article on "Dr. August Neander" traces him from his Jewish birth, through his school and college days, his conversion to Christianity, his exchange of law for theology, his position as "candidate," or unbeneficed preacher, at Hamburg, his professorial career at Heidelberg up to his appointment in 1813 to the chair of Church History and New Testament Exegesis at Berlin, to which he subsequently added ethics, symbolics, systematic theology, &c., where he was constantly occupied till his death, on July 14th, 1850.

He early studied Plato, and at the suggestion of a friend compared him with St. John's Gospel; but it was a passage in Plutarch's "Pædagogus" which led to his conversion to Christianity. In his early life he was also much influenced by Schleiermacher, whose exegetical lectures on the New Testament he praises. They were inaugurated with the important principle that "It is the duty of the exegete to guard against importing into the Scriptures either the ideas of theology or ideas of his own; to seek to understand them out of themselves; and above all to form his estimate of each part and of the whole from a survey of the whole." p. 315.

An interesting account of his mode of life and daily habits, and of his death-bed, winds up with the words: "Thus passed away this second John—the son of thunder and the son of love—the youngest of the fathers of the Church, as he has been truly called; the man to whom the theology, and particularly the Church history both of Germany and of entire Christendom, owe more than to any other teacher for many centuries, and who was the spiritual father of hundreds of pastors now occupying spheres of usefulness in the Church of their Fatherland. Blessed be his memory!" p. 331.

His books are enumerated, and a brief examination made of his principal works: his "General Church History," "Life of Jesus," and "Planting and Training of the Church by the Apostles." A few extracts will show the reviewer's liberal appreciation of a liberal man.

"In point of learning few have equalled, still fewer surpassed him. Even as a student he devoted his time to reading the ancient ecclesiastical writers in their original languages, and continued to do so to the end of his life. He scarcely ever relied on second-hand information, but felt it to be his duty to look at things with his own eyes. . . . With profound learning he combined also a spirit of sound and healthy criticism. He was by no means ready to take anything for granted, but weighed and counter-weighed, and nicely balanced evidence, before setting forth any statement as true or false. . . . The strictest impartiality was also a predominant feature of Neander as an historian—not that so-called impartiality which may degenerate into indifference, but the impartiality of one whose eye is always open to facts, and who seeks nothing but the truth. . . . He exhibits everywhere a profound insight into character—the characters alike of men, of institutions, and of events. Few writers have understood men better than he. . . . His accounts of men and things are all bathed in a truly philosophical spirit. . . . In thus writing, he was carrying out the aim of his life, which was, as he himself said, 'to set forth the history of the Church as an evidence of the Divine power of Christianity, as a sum of Christian experience, and as a voice of edification, instruction, and warning, sounding aloud through all the centuries.'" pp. 332-4.

"The course of lectures on 'Catholicism and Protestantism,' is said to have been one of his best. If ever a man were opposed with his entire being to every form of sacerdotalism, Neander was that man, and yet his loving and righteous spirit compelled him to be fair, even where the temptation to the contrary was most powerful. The distinctive principle of Protestantism, as opposed to Catholicism, Neander defined as consisting 'in the exclusive reference of the religious consciousness to Christ, which has two aspects:—Firstly, Christ the sole source of salvation (justification by faith); Secondly, Christ the sole source of the knowledge of salvation (the authority of the Scriptures);' from which principles alone, says he, all the other differences can be deduced." p. 340.

While recognising his freedom of thought and treatment, the reviewer says: "There is all the difference in the world, however, between the critical doubts of a man who lives in Christianity, and seeks to judge by its standard, and those of one who submits everything to the decision of natural, unregenerated reason. The latter one might describe as Rationalismus vulgaris; the former as Rationalismus Evangelicus" (p. 346). Neander is quoted (p. 349), as stating that:—"According to both Paul and John, Christian theism consists in worshipping God as the Father, through the Son, in the divine fellowship of life founded by Him, or in the fellowship of the Holy Spirit. The doctrine of the Trinity has an essentially practical and historical significance and basis; it is the doctrine of the God revealed in humanity—a doctrine which teaches us to see in God the primal source both of existence, salvation, and sanctification. Starting with this Trinity of Revelation, the contemplating mind, following the analogy of its own nature, may seek to rise to the idea of an archetypal Trias in God, although a somewhat indefinite Apostelgeschichte." pp. 701, 2.

After quoting a statement of Neander's that Christ bore "the sufferings which the divine holiness, viewed in its antagonism to sin as primitive justice, had suspended over human nature," &c. the reviewer adds that "as he elsewhere denies that the sufferings of Christ had any effect on God in time, his above statements, and true as they are in themselves, do not seem to us to go quite far enough. They do not seem to exhaust the teaching of God in Scripture. The difficulty felt by Neander and by many others, of allowing that the death of Christ effected a real change in God Himself, arises chiefly from a defective and unbiblical view of the divine nature and attributes, specially of the Divine unchangeableness;" p. 349. Our readers will mostly agree with Neander, and wonder how the reviewer would explain this last remarkable statement.

This long and interesting article is especially valuable, as no biography of Neander has appeared.

The account of "Chrysostom" is also very interesting, but must be briefly noticed. Early attracted to an ascetic life, his widowed mother besought him not to leave her unaided by her only son. At a later period, however, he entered on an eremitic life, from whose self-denial, study, and meditation, he returned, after six years, to electrify the population of Antioch (where he was born, A.D. 347) by his earnest and attractive eloquence. After twelve years' ministry at Antioch, he was appointed Bishop of Constantinople, which yielded, like Antioch, to his eloquence. Brought into occasional and bitter conflicts, he was at last exiled from Constantinople, but returned for a brief period to win new triumphs; to be again banished, and subjected to such cruel treatment that he died from exhaustion at Comara in Pontus, A.D. 406. To these facts, the article adds an interesting account of his eloquence, with some specimens of his terse style, direct address, and thrilling earnestness.

We cannot pass over the notice of the "Memoirs of Baron Bunsen" without remarking upon the genial and charitable appreciation of the labours of a man, from some of whose conclusions, e.g., his disbelief in a real resurrection of Christ,* the reviewer differs so decidedly. With immense learning and industry, Bunsen was too enthusiastic and rapid to complete his labour. He goes over the same ground in several publications, working up his materials anew, and leaving at last a storehouse of matter for future students, rather than an accomplished work.

After pointing out that Bunsen's view "that God's thought and purpose are developing themselves through finite minds in the whole course of the ages, and over all the world," though true in a partial and general sense, is in the strict sense in which Bunsen meant it, an egregious fallacy, the reviewer says that "In spite of this pervading fallacy"—as we venture to think it—"God in history" is "a storehouse of rare and invaluable materials. Its spirit is beautiful, and it teaches with irresistible impressiveness a lesson which many Christians seem to have woefully forgotten, namely this: that God is in the world as truly as He is in the Church, though through another medium; that He has not abandoned the unnumbered myriads of His children to whom the name of Jesus has never been made known; that there is a living Holy Ghost, where no Christ has ever been proclaimed; and that over all the earth and in all times, as in the ages before the flood, the Spirit of God has ever striven, and is striving now, with men for their illumination and redemption." (p. 492.)

We close our notice of this review with the following touching description of religion and virtue realized in a man of business and a diplomatist. "Think of this man of the world, as he would seem to many to be, and to be nothing more. Follow

* According to Bunsen's account, Jesus was taken down from the cross in a swoon, and was carried away by the disciples into privacy, and there revived. After a time he went secretly into Phœnicia, and there died a natural death. (p. 494.)

him in Rome, in Berlin, and in England, this habitude of courts and cabinets, this intimate of kings and princes, this diplomatist dealing with conflicting interests, and with subtle partizans. Is it not beautiful beyond expression, and instructive and impressive to find him again and again in secret, asking counsel and guidance and help from his God, perhaps in some question of politics, some point which he has to discuss with king or prince, or some matter in dispute between two countries, or between opposing parties in the State? This was the kind and the character of his religion, of his personal, inner, spiritual life. His habit was to lay everything before his God and his Saviour. Humbly as a child, he felt and acknowledged his absolute dependence, and sought only to know his Father's will that he might yield to it unreservedly. The evident and profound desire of his mind was to know what was true and to do what was right, always and at all hazards." p. 497.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1868.

DISESTABLISHMENT—AND THEN ?

SOME of our friends are very anxious in regard to the result of disestablishment. They agree with us as to the startling progress which the main principle of the Liberation Society has made within the last year or two, and they do not appear to dispute that this principle is in the abstract right. But they are apprehensive that the actual result, in the case of the Church of England, might be to place the many elements of freedom which at present exist in that Church under the unrestrained power of a narrow ecclesiasticism. In a letter printed in our last impression, this view of the question is argued thoughtfully and ably, and we know that the writer's apprehensions are shared by many others, even though they would not go to his length of opposing the movement. For ourselves, however, we have not the least fear on the subject.

That the condition of the Established Church has of late years, as a matter of fact, admitted of considerable progress in the direction of more liberal theology, no one will be disposed to deny. When, however, our correspondent puts the question as a choice between a continuance of this progress and the attainment of disestablishment, we must join issue with him. He supposes the cause of liberal theology to be a still more cardinal principle with us than disestablishment. We are not, however, disposed to allow such unqualified preponderance of value to liberal theology. Theological honesty we conceive to be of far more importance than theological correctness; and the state of the Church of England has been unfavourable to the former in still greater degree than it has been favourable to the latter. The liberalism of the Church of England is of the most slippery and unreliable kind. It writes Unitarian tracts to-day, and reads the Athanasian Creed to-morrow. It likes to dabble in heresy on the sly, but has about it little of the ring of genuine freedom. We do not blame the liberal clergy for this; it is the misfortune of their position. That position is a radically false one. They have been so accustomed to the prestige of being clergy of an Established Church that they are blinded to the cost at which they retain their posts. We believe that, for the most part, they are personally honest; but we are afraid that they, unconsciously, do far more to throw the whole subject of fidelity to conviction into confusion, than they do to advance liberal theology.

Now, we believe the disestablishment of the Church would leave just as much scope as ever for progressive thought, while doing away with the peculiar conditions by which its healthy life is at present cramped and injured. The whole fear that some of our friends express goes upon the supposition that disestablishment must mean the handing over of the whole property of the Church, including its laws and constitution, to be dealt with by the hard orthodoxy that has always desired to enforce more rigid ecclesiastical discipline. Mr. GAIRDNER says "a disestablished church will be necessarily a community governed by its own laws, entirely free to excommunicate whom it please, and to hand down a lifeless, intellectual dogmatism to the remotest age." But why in the world should anything of this kind be involved in disestablishment? The control of property, religious or otherwise, by the State does not necessarily imply that peculiar State privileges shall be given to the users of that property. The State is the ultimate trustee, at the back of all other trusteeship, of all property left for permanent impersonal uses. The funds of our Nonconformist churches have more than once been the subject of national legislation, and their appropriation is constantly subject to the possibility of revision by the law. One of the commonest employments of the Court of Chancery is the framing of schemes for the administration of religious trusts, the original constitution of which has in some way become obsolete or insufficient. Now, after watching attentively the whole course of such legislative settlements for many years, we dare to affirm that a case can hardly be found in which such a trust, whether large or small, has been thus settled upon a narrower, or more dogmatic, or more sacerdotal basis than before. Invariably such trusts are a little enlarged and widened in the process, and we feel not the least alarm as to the basis on which the property and constitution of the now Church of England will be settled when the question of its disestablishment comes practically before either Parliament or the courts of law. Of two things we feel certain; first, that the Church will not be settled upon any narrower basis than it occupies at present; and secondly, that the State will not retain less power of revising any settlement it may make than it already possesses in regard to every scheme for the administration of charitable and religious trusts throughout the kingdom.

In view of this general principle, let it be remembered what is the actual condition of the Church of England. If there is one striking feature about it, it is that while nominally one great ecclesiastical system, its congregations are really singularly independent of one another, and of the whole. The clergyman of one parish is perfectly independent of the clergy of the neighbouring parishes. When his church is once consecrated he is almost as independent of the bishop. The clergy profess a very high reverence for episcopacy in the abstract, but you very seldom find a clergyman who cares a rush for the wishes or commands of any bishop in particular. Now, can anyone suppose either that the legislature would impose, or that the clergy and their congregations would submit to any change in the direction of reducing all these virtually independent congregations into a state of rigid ecclesiastical dependence? To us this appears out of the question. All the liberty which actually exists will continue to exist, while some of the most mischievous restrictions by which that liberty is at present cramped would be taken away. To mention only one of these, we believe it is impossible to calculate the amount of good, both to laity and clergy, in the way of promoting greater openness and freedom of mind, that would result from removing the restrictions which at present absolutely bar all exchange of religious service between Nonconformists and the members of the Church. These restrictions are continued purely owing to the exceptional position of the Establishment. Let them be done away, and gradually the thought and life of the present Church congregations would be leavened by the freer and robuster life of Nonconformity, far more effectually than it is ever likely to be by the exceptional utterances of a few of its own more liberal men.

A LADIES' CONFERENCE.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

On the 17th of this month, the German ladies were to hold a conference at Stuttgart, but neither for the purpose of discussing the best means of obtaining votes (like their sisters in this country), nor for any other "emancipation movement." On the contrary, the points they intended to discuss have been brought together in the following programme:

1. To find out the best ways and means to teach young mothers how best to regulate the physical education of their children.
2. The establishment of small museums of literature, art, and industry. These museums would not merely contain the best works of literature and art especially adapted for women, but they would be a kind of schools or academies; places for meetings, lectures, and the like, in which topics as to the education of children, and matters of domestic interest should be treated by competent women, and men, if these can be prevailed on to assist in the movement, &c.
3. The commencement of a reform in dress, chiefly directed against the vagaries of fashion, and the best ways and means to carry out the reform effectually. As a basis of this reform, the following points have been accepted:
 - a. That nothing be declared "old fashioned" which has been found useful, appropriate, and becoming.
 - b. That nothing new be adopted, unless it is found to be both to the purpose, and answering the demands of good taste.
 - c. That all garments and objects of toilet that are hurtful to health be put away.
 - d. To inquire whether a large saving might not be effected in dress, so that the expenses might be more appropriate to the income.
4. The transformation of benevolent female institutions into "self-supporting and earning female institutions."

All this sounds so sensible, that we cannot but wish the conference success.

HOW TO KILL A CHURCH.

The Liberal Christian, which has taken some pains to ascertain how the thing is to be done, gives the following prescription for keeping a congregation small and unprosperous:—

"Disparage your minister whenever it is possible to do so, but be careful always to say that you are his friend. If you have no facts to depreciate him insinuate that all is not right; a suspicion is often more damaging than an accusation, and an ominous shake of the head and significant look are more fatal to a reputation than any words. Never praise the preaching in your church; that might lead people to wish to hear for themselves. If you cannot say anything against the preaching, say nothing. Attend your own church irregularly, and always go in late. If you can go to other churches half the time do so, and always express yourself as perfectly delighted with the services, music, and everything else. Be sure never to enter your own church until after the services have commenced; it would show interest if you did so, and might lead others to follow your example. When in church appear as listless as possible. Sleep if you can; if you cannot, gaze about the building, note the empty seats so that you can speak of them. When you go away appear to be dissatisfied with everything. Above all, never ask a stranger to church with you, and never take any one into your pew; you cannot kill a church with hospitality. Make all the trouble you can about the music. About all music in church is good for is for its discords, and the man or woman who cannot make a sea of trouble out of the singing, to say nothing of the organ, don't amount to much. See to it that your church is always dirty, out of repair, and unattractive as possible. If the society is not already divided into parties and factions be sure to create a schism. If there is one, see to it that it is not healed, no matter what the trouble is. So long as it alienates those who should be friends and creates disaffection there is no danger of the society's growing. Never pay your subscription until you are obliged to, and then always with a growl; it adds to the effectiveness of the latter to insinuate that it is the last money you will pay until there is a change. Be careful never to visit any members of your congregation without they are already disaffected or you can make them so; it is hard to break down a society whose members are truly social. Be sure never to attend any meetings of the society during the week; such things are always fanatical and often vulgar, and nothing hinders a church from dying so much as social gatherings during the week, and that fanaticism misnamed 'interest in religion.' When among strangers, be sure to inform them that your society is just gasping for breath, and will soon give up the ghost; people always shun a sinking ship. If you have no minister, tell every candidate that comes how divided, quarrelsome, hard, mean, and death-stricken your society is, and be sure that no one receives a majority of votes if you can prevent it. It is next to impossible to kill a church that has a good settled minister. If you have a minister and things seem to be prosperous, just you ask him to tell the people every Sunday that the Church is of no sort of account; that a man can be just as good a Christian without attending public religious services as he can by attending them; that people must be dreadful careful or they will be priest-ridden; that it is particularly dangerous for children to attend Sunday-school, as they will surely get prejudiced against sin and in favour of virtue there; that religion is an indigenous, wild plant, which comes without sowing, like Canada thistles, and that when people undertake to cultivate the ground they are sure to root it out; that religion will never flourish until churches, ministers, and Sunday schools, and religious papers are got rid of. Faithfully follow this prescription, and if your congregation does not dwindle and your church decline and the parish collapse, it will not be through any want of effort on your part. This receipt has never yet been known to fail."

CHRISTIAN THOUGHT IN PAINTED WINDOWS.

ST. PAUL'S for this month contains a very interesting article on Christian Thought Embodied in Christian Art, understood to be by Mr. John Dendy. Considering the successive developments of the Christian Church as the strata of a kind of ecclesiastical geology, he finds in the art relics of each the fossil remains in which may be distinguished the life and thought that was in them. One of the most interesting passages is the following:—

Our first and most striking example is in the painted windows of our cathedrals and some of our older churches, though, alas! too few of these are left in their original condition for us to form an adequate idea of what was the intention and effect when painted windows were not so much mere ornaments, but were veritable methods of instruction. They were the pictures illustrating the great book of the Church, and, as narrated in Goethe's pretty story of St. Joseph the second, the light that passed through them illuminated many a mind that must otherwise have remained in darkness. Entering even now into those sacred aisles, where no light shines that is not tinged with some holy thought—as, for instance, in the great Dome of Cologne—we can partially understand what must have been the effect on the popular mind in those remote days, when all learning was confined to the clergy, and when even the simple arts of reading and writing were looked upon as something so mysterious and wonderful as to endow their possessor with special privileges. We can fancy the yet half-barbarous peasantry flocking in from their remote homes, their memories still full of pagan legends, and their faith sadly overclouded by those vague fears which ignorance so readily evokes, their conception of the spiritual world being something akin to that of an intelligent child of the present day who has been gazing over the collections of Dasent and Grimm, and Thorpe's northern mythology. They enter, then, within the sacred precincts, and find themselves in an entirely new world. There in the great east window hangs the Son of God upon the Cross—there the crown of thorns, the nails, and the dropping blood, through which human salvation was wrought—there, too, the careless Roman guard, and there the scoffing Jews—there, also, at his feet was the Virgin Mother, happiest and gentlest among women, whose more merciful spirit might be approached by those whose fears deterred them from offering their petitions at the altar of Christ. Passing round the lofty aisles, the visitors would see in succession the Evangelists and the Apostles, and then the various scenes of our Lord's life and ministry; especially would they find fully delineated the life and the miraculous works of that saint to whom the Church was specially dedicated. To the worshippers of those days the Church was full of mystic lore; it was the ever-open book in times when the Bible was sealed. And its value as an educational instrument can be measured only by the genius, the labour, and the wealth which were spent on it. A pious man who would now publish a cheap edition of some good book, or contribute to the establishment of a village school, would then just as naturally have given a painted window to his parish church, that he might help to complete some series of Scripture histories, or have paid for the execution of an inferno on the walls, whose horrors should frighten the evil-disposed into good behaviour,—such a picture as not very long since we saw preserved in one of the arches over the chancel of Gloucester Cathedral.

If, as we have thus supposed them to be, the painted windows and mural pictures were originally designed for the purposes of instruction, it is not surprising that among those peoples who have been only imperfectly brought under the influence of Roman civilisation, they should be found to take a very literal and prosaic view of both Scripture narratives and the early legends of the Church, and to be of a very different character to those which are to be found in Italy. They were not intended to give wings to a faith already aspiring to the skies; but to supplant German marches and English fairy stories by the first elements of Christian history. As other methods of instruction have become more attainable, they have gradually dropped their purely instructive character, and assumed that of decorative art, till, at last, they are reduced almost to the level of ecclesiastical upholstery, whose chief beauty it is to look like something old, and with slavish fidelity to imitate the quaint and grotesque fancies of simpler times. The influence of national tastes and habits is most strikingly apparent in the artist's conception of what the historic religious picture ought to be. The Dutchman, phlegmatic as his own canals, depicts the flight into Egypt under the disguise of a fat boor calling, with his vrow and kind, at a wayside inn, with, for accessories, a number of peasants playing cards. As another example of this style of art, we may take Van Leyden's picture of the head of John the Baptist, in which the extreme Dutchness of the scene is enhanced by the oriental turban of the king being brought into close contiguity with the Marie Stuart-like bonnet of Herodias; whilst a closely-shaven French poodle growls at a cup-bearer in slashed hose, who is pouring wine out from a china jug, that would be a gem in a collection of those brittle treasures. These are but specimens of that realistic school of painting, which, however valuable as illustrative of the gradual progress of art, are not of great interest for our present purpose. They contribute but little to our knowledge of the more ancient periods of Christian history, for the thought and ideal which they contain are pre-eminently those of their own day presented under scriptural forms. Such pictures as these illustrate not the progress, but the fidelity of Christian thought. It is true, however, that in those paintings which proceed from the Italian schools, we find a more worthy method of treatment, and a more persistent attempt to illustrate their subjects with something approaching to historical accuracy; not, indeed, in actual detail, as with the pre-Raphaelites of the present day, but as to general effects. Next to this historical class of pictures are those that may be characterised as the theological:—as the Holy Trinity; the word proceeding out of the mouth of the Almighty to perform its creative office; the blood flowing from the side of the Lamb which was to wash away the sins of the world. Another very favourite series, is that of the last judgment—of the devil and his angels, and the sufferings of the wicked in hell-fire—produced, doubtless, by the immense popularity of Dante's "Divina Commedia," which appears to have had a similar influence in popularising Roman Catholic conceptions on these subjects to that which Milton, in his "Paradise Lost," exercised on the theology of the Reformation.

THE SUNDAY FAIR IN SHOREDITCH.

A FORTNIGHT ago, we published an article in which reference was made to this Fair, which is held within five minutes' walk of the Shoreditch terminus of the Great Eastern Railway, and extends over five streets, forming an irregular quadrilateral. The Times furnishes us with the following particular description of it:

We have called the Exchange a bird fair, simply from the reason that ornithology is more extensively cultivated within its limits than any other branch of natural history, but we must add that there is scarcely an article for domestic use, or, as far as Eastern tastes go, of æsthetic recreation, which is not abundantly supplied. At about half-past ten o'clock small groups of people assemble opposite the bird-fanciers' shops. Their variety of attire is considerable, and some of the toilettes are worth the costumier's study. But, whether they sport corduroy, "Petticoat-lane velvet," or "shoddy," that has been tortured times out of mind by that omnipotent instrument known in Whitechapel as "the Devil," few of them ever neglect the mother-of-pearl buttons so dear to Dr. Marigold, and no one is so false to the traditions of his race as to despise "a handkerchief loose," and easy round his neck. There you have 'em again, as large as life." Those who have nothing to sell and want nothing to buy are generally the first in the fair. In a few minutes a boy drives up a goat and takes up his position on the line, and he is immediately succeeded by two or three of the "fancy," who carry cages under their arms, carefully covered. They shut out the light from the birds, it is said, so that when they make "a singing match" their representatives may sing louder and longer than they otherwise would. The practice of running hot needles into the eyes of singing birds has not, we are afraid, been yet altogether abandoned. After eleven o'clock, accessions are made every minute to the numbers. The fair is now in full swing. In Brick-lane all the shops are open, with a few exceptions. In that thoroughfare one can buy all the more material creature comforts which his exchequer can command, while in the hours during which the worship of Bacchus is prohibited on Sunday, he can refresh himself with sherbet or gingerbeer, at a halfpenny a glass. In Bacon-street whole regiments of white mice, quite innocent of petty larceny, work treadmills which, like the Laureate's brook, "go on for ever." On the long line stretching from Anchor-street to St. Matthias' Church the gathering presents a kaleidoscopic variety. A "knowin' un," who shows off the paces of an anatomical pony is followed by a boy rolling the amputated wheels of a disabled perambulator, which he offers for sale, and the rear of the incongruous trio is brought up by an attenuated old man leading a yelping mangy Newfoundland. At the corner of a by-street a preacher, who announces himself as "Black Jimmy, the cutler," preaches a panegyric on himself which is heard with a certain attention by the listeners, albeit traditional appreciation is accorded to wrinkles and walnuts. Old keys, old locks, old hardware generally, invite large crowds of spectators, and a small boiler which lies in the footway is admired as a triumph of mechanical skill. The sound of the church organ is drowned by the Babel outside, and the cry of "Pies, all 'ot, all 'ot," rising high above the indistinct hubbub which is heard on every side. Little boys toss for pies, and the policeman moves them on; but when the constituted authority is about about ten yards off, the watchful vendor of "the mysteries" makes a sotto voce demand for another appeal to fortune. Club-row is the head quarter for birds. In a shop a glaring advertisement informs the intended buyer that "the finches sold are warranted cocks." The reason for this will be understood when we say that in many cases the hen birds, which are cheaper, are painted or supplied with an unlimited quantity of hempeed, which, being a very strong stimulant, makes them look brisk and bold, as if newly caught. The tricks practised by the bird duffers, as they are called, are in many cases ingenious. Sometimes they fasten a topknot on a linnet's head with glue, and then sell it for some foreign bird which has just arrived from the Fiji islands or the Mountains of the Moon. When canaries are not of a good colour, they are re-dyed with what is known as the Queen's yellow. Black-birds are dyed of a deeper black by the grit taken off a fryingpan. The mutes, too, are not entirely ignored. Here an admiring group speculate on the excellence of a concertina, and there a fiddle is offered "for a song." The pluck and endurance of a bulldog is discussed at another point by a circle of low betting men, whose head-dresses, their distinctive article of apparel in the east, may be divided into two classes—brown caps, with a conspicuous button on the top, or a modified pork-pie hat, with the turned-up leaf in high relief. But it is vain to specify details, the phases of the motley crowd are so many and so changing. Women lounge outside their doors, or watch the moving throng beneath from the rooms of the miserable tottering old houses, the size of which only reveals the approach of their destruction. A moment, and one hears words of ejaculation or disappointment as the result of a pigeon match which has been just decided is known, but the expressions are intensified by the most terrible blasphemy. Of particular incidents of obscenity, which cannot fail to meet the eye on a visit to the fair, we cannot, for obvious reasons, speak. If a cheering consideration can be suggested by the associations of the gathering, it is that but very few women take part in the proceedings of the Exchange. Elaborate and ingenious devices are adopted for the purpose of obtaining liquor during the course of the time the sales are being carried on. There are in the parish of St. Matthias, with 6,000 inhabitants, thirteen public-houses and seven beershops, and in the Holy Trinity Mission District a similar number. It is against the beershop-keepers principally that the police have to contend in their efforts to prevent the illegal trade on Sunday mornings. Arrangements are made with the people of neighbouring houses, so that the beer is passed out through the latter to those who demand it, and in some cases a beerhouse situate in one street has a means of communication through its backyard with another house in a different thoroughfare. When summoned, the offenders are fined, but they are seldom deterred by that from a repetition of the offence.

Surely, while scenes like these can exist amongst us, Christian men and women must feel how much remains for them to do in diffusing around them the practical influences of the Gospel.

AMERICAN NOTES.

THE Philadelphia correspondent of the Methodist Times says that Catholicism is hardly holding its own in the States, and that its greatest enemy is Methodism. Its honoured man in New England is Isaac Rich, who "gives his hundreds of thousands to establish colleges for the Church, and theological institutions for the young men in the ministry. He was a poor boy; once he kept an oyster-stand, cleaned fish in the Boston (Mass.) market, and at three o'clock in the morning served them to the various hotels in the city. Industry, economy, and godliness, have given him wealth untold, and he gives it to God through the Methodist Church—the Church of his boyhood. How I have heard him speak of the future of Methodism, its power for good in this country; and then wish that he might live again his life, so that he might work for his God, humbly as a Methodist preacher. Then come to New York: there is Daniel Drew, once a poor boy, driving cattle, driving anything, everything, to earn a piece of bread; strictly moral in his habits, the Church took care of him then, and now, when his riches are almost boundless, he takes care of the Church. He establishes a college for the education of young men for the ministry, and endows it liberally. I could enlarge upon other names, which Methodism has reared, a blessing to their country, and an everlasting honour for her gratitude."

In a letter from Paris to the Monthly Journal of the American Unitarian Association, Dr. Hedge writes:—

"I attended a meeting this morning at the American chapel, and heard there a sermon which made me very earnestly desire that liberal Christianity might be represented by some competent preacher in this vast city, the resort of so many thousands of our countrymen, a fair proportion of them, no doubt, of the liberal faith or liberally inclined. The sermon I heard was a doctrinal one, presenting the dreariest Orthodoxy, or rather Calvinism. Total depravity was insisted on with vehement emphasis. I grieved as I looked around, to think that a congregation of some four or five hundred, whom devout instinct or devout habit had drawn to this chapel, should have their good sense and good feeling so abused, their religious faith so imperilled. Dr. Chapin, of New York, who was with me, agreed that our two denominations might, by united effort, support a liberal preacher here for a part of the year, if not for the whole. It is certainly missionary ground. Perhaps the Unitarians of England would unite. I submit the matter for your consideration."

We think the matter is one well deserving of consideration, and shall be glad if the British and Foreign Unitarian Association sees its way to co-operate with the American one in carrying out Dr. Hedge's suggestion.

The Hicksite section of the Society of Friends, who separated from the orthodox portion of that body in 1827, have addressed, through their representative, Mr. S. M. Janey, the following remarks on the present position of the English Friends towards his brethren:

"Although we honour the English Friends for their noble charities and their disinterested labours in the elevation of the poor and the elevation of the degraded, yet as a body they have not manifested towards us that sense of justice and fairness which is characteristic of Englishmen. At the time of the separation, in 1827, they rejected our epistles, written in a spirit of brotherly love, and have ever since shown a disposition to judge us by the reports of our adversaries rather than by our own explanation of our principles. A few of our members have expressed unsound views which are not approved or held by the body, but which, for peace sake, we have tolerated for a time. These they have seized upon as evidences of general defection, and no asseverations or explanations have sufficed to remove them. The leading members of the English Friends, having renounced some of the views of the early Friends, and adopted others, ought not to blame us for adhering to the ancient doctrines of Fox, Penn, and Barclay." Mr. Janey then pleads for a more brotherly intercourse between the sections of the society.

The Sailors' Library and Reading Room, established at Tisbury, Mass., through the efforts of Rev. D. W. Stevens, pastor of the Unitarian Society there, and missionary of the Amer. Unit. Ass., to the sailors in the harbour of Holmes' Hole, was dedicated on August 27, when Dr. Gannett, Rev. C. Lowe, the Hon. Mr. Spaulding, and other leading members of our denomination took part in the proceedings. The Vineyard Sound is a great highway of commerce, as may be judged from the fact that the keeper of the lighthouse counted in a single year 27,000 vessels passing through, and probably as many more went by in the night. These vessels, when caught by adverse winds, seek shelter in the harbour of Holmes' Hole, and at least 10,000 enter every year. Sometimes they are kept there, two or three hundred at a time, for days or even weeks. The sailors being at a loose end, are open to various evil influences, and to counteract these this Reading Room, which is to be well supplied with books and papers, has been established. Though the enterprise is wholly Unitarian in its origin, and so far in its support, it is based on a thoroughly liberal plan, the design being simply to afford to as many sailors as possible some intellectual and moral, and, incidentally, some religious benefit.

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THINE.

LITTLE to me it matters
Whither my feet are led,
If in the burning desert
Or the pastures green I'm fed,—
Whether the storm or sunshine;
Be in the path I take;
For my hand is in Thine, my Father;
Thou wilt not Thy child forsake.
And it shall not cause me sorrow,
Though the path be steep and rough;
I am Thine, Thine own for ever,
And that shall be joy enough.
Thine is the care, my Father—
The work of providing Thine;
Only the trust, and pleasure,
And the calm content, are mine.
Neither shall I be anxious
For the dear ones whom I love;
From Thee they are never absent—
Thou reachest them from above;
And, Lord, I know they are dearer
To Thee than they are to me,
So I only ask Thee to take them,
And do as it pleases Thee.
But others are only strangers,
And know not the perfect peace
Of those who beneath Thy banner
Are finding their sorrows cease.
They are away in the darkness,
In the gloomy and silent night;
Oh, Father, receive them also,
And welcome them into the light.
So, then, it will not matter,
Whatever the future be;
Gladly we take our journey,
Leaving the rest to Thee;
And in darkness, or gloom, or tempest,
Still shall the best light shine,
And the joy shall come to our spirits;
For, Father, we all are Thine.

Christian World.

WITCHCRAFT.—III.

THE notion of a personal and private treaty with the Evil One has something of dignity about it; but as we come down to the vulgar parody of it in the confessions of wretched old women on the rack, our pity and indignation are mingled with disgust. One of the most particular of these confessions is that of Abel-de-la-Rue, convicted in 1584. He was a novice in the Franciscan convent at Meaux. Having been punished by the master of the novices for stealing some apples and nuts in the convent gardens the Devil appeared to him in the shape of a black dog, promising him his protection, and advising him to leave the convent. Not long after, going into the sacristy, he saw a large volume fastened by a chain, and further secured by bars of iron. The name of this book was Grimoire. Thrusting his hands through the bars, he contrived to open it, and having read a sentence, there suddenly appeared to him a man of middle stature, with a pale and very frightful countenance, clad in a long black robe, and with faces of men like his own on his breast and knees. As for his feet they were like those of cows. This man told him not to be afraid, to take off his habit, put faith in him, and he would give him whatever he asked. Then laying hold of him below the arms, he transported him under the gallows of Meaux, and then said to him with a broken and trembling voice, and having a visage as pale as that of a man who had been hanged, and a very stinking breath, that he should fear nothing, but place entire confidence in him, that he should never want for anything, that his own name was Maitre Rigoux, and that he would like to be his master; to which De la Rue made answer that he would do whatever he commanded, and that he wished to be gone from the Franciscans. Thereupon Rigoux disappeared, but returning between seven and eight in the evening, took him round the waist and carried him back to the sacristy, promising to come again for him the next day. This he did, and told De la Rue to take off his habit, and quit the convent, and meet him near a great tree on the high-road to Courtois. He found Rigoux there, who took him to a certain Maitre Pierre, who, after exchanging a few words in an undertone with Rigoux, sent De la Rue to the stable, after his return from which he saw no more of Rigoux. Thereupon Pierre and his wife made him good cheer, telling him that for the love of Maitre Rigoux they would treat him well, and that he must obey him, which he promised to do. About two months later, Maitre Pierre, who commonly took him to the fields to watch cattle, said that they must go to the Assembly, because he was out of powders, to which De la Rue replied that he was willing. Three days after, about Christmas eve, 1575, Pierre having sent his wife to sleep out of the house, set a long branch of broom in the chimney-corner, and bade De la Rue go to bed, but not to sleep. About eleven they heard a great noise, as of an impetuous wind and thunder, in the chimney; which hearing, Maitre Pierre told him to dress himself, for it was time to be gone. Then Pierre took some grease from a little box and anointed himself under the armpits, and De la Rue on the palms of his hands, which at once felt as if on fire, and the said grease stank like a cat three weeks or a month dead. Then, Pierre and he bestriding the branch, Maitre Rigoux took it by the end and drew it up the chimney, as if the wind had lifted them. And, the night being dark, he saw suddenly a torch before them lighting them, and Maitre Rigoux was gone, unless he had changed himself into this torch. Arrived at a grassy spot, some five leagues from Courtois, they found a company [of about sixty people of all ages, none of whom he knew, except one Pierre of Dampmartin and an old woman who had been executed five years before for sorcery. Then suddenly he noticed that all, except Rigoux, were dressed in lichen, though they had not changed their clothes. Then, at the command of the oldest among them, who seemed about eighty, with a white beard and almost bald, each swept the place in front of himself with a broom. Thereupon Rigoux changed into a great he-goat, black and sticking, round whom they all danced backward with their faces outward and their backs to the goat. They danced about half-an-hour, and then his master told him they must adore the goat who was the Devil. This they did; and he let fall certain grains about the size of a pin's head, which turned to a frightfully smelling powder. As these dropped on cloths, the oldest, and so the rest in order, went forward on their knees and gathered them up, first doing homage in the most degrading manner that can be conceived. Then they went home to the Devil on their broom, lighted also as before. De la Rue confessed also that he was at another Assembly on the eve of St. John Baptist. With the powders which they brought away they could cause the death of men against whom they had a spite, or their cattle. Rigoux before long began to tempt him to drown himself, and, though he lay down, managed to roll him some distance towards the river. It is plain that the poor fellow was mad, or half-witted, or both. And yet Bodin, the author of the De Republica, reckoned one of the ablest books of that age, believed all this nonsense, and prefixed it to his Demonomanie, as proof conclusive of the existence of sorcerers.

This was in 1587. Just a century later, Glanvil, one of the most eminent men of his day, and Henry More, the well-known Platonist, were perfectly satisfied with evidence like that of which we give a few samples. Elizabeth Styles, in 1664, confessed "that the Devil about ten years since appeared to her in the shape of a handsome Man, and after that of a black Dog. That he promised her money, and that she should live gallantly, and have the pleasure of the world for twelve years, if she would with her blood sign his paper, which was to give her soul to him, and observe his laws, and that he might suck her blood. This, after four solicitations, the examinant promised him to do, upon which he pricked the fourth finger of her right hand, between the middle and upper joint (where the sign at the examination remained), and with a drop or two of her blood, she signed the paper with an O. Upon this the Devil gave her sixpence, and vanished with the paper. That since he hath appeared to her in the shape of a Man, and did so on Wednesday seven-night past, but more usually he appears in the likeness of a Dog, and Cat, and a Fly like a Millar, in which last he usually sucks in the poll about four o'clock in the morning, and did so on Jan. 27, and that it is pain to her to be so sucked. That when she hath a desire to do harm, she calls the Spirit by the name of Robin, to whom, when he appeareth, she useth these words, 'O Satan, give me my purpose.' She then tells him what she would have done. And that he should so appear to her was part of the contract with him." The Devil in this case appeared as a dark man "in black clothes, with a little band." "Before they are carried to their meetings they anoint their foreheads and hand-wrists with an oil the spirit brings them (which smells raw), and then they are carried in a very short time, using these words as they pass, 'Thout, tout-a-tout, throughout and about.' And when they go off from their meetings they say, 'Rentum, Tormentum.' That at every meeting before the spirit vanisheth away, he appoints the next meeting-place and time, and at his departure there is a foul smell. At their meeting they have usually wine or good beer, cakes, meat, or the like. They eat and drink really when they meet, in their bodies, dance also, and have some music. The Man in black sits at the higher end, and Anne Bishop usually next him. He useth some words before meat, and some after; his voice is audible, but very low. The Man in black sometimes plays on a pipe or cittern, and the company dance. At last the Devil vanisheth, and all are carried to their several homes in a short space. At their parting they say, 'A boy! merry meet, merry part.'—Alice Duke confessed that "Anne Bishop persuaded her to go with her into the church-yard in the night-time, and being come thither, to go backward round the church, which they did three times. In their first round they met a Man in black clothes, who went round the second time with them; and then they met a thing in the shape of a great black Toad, which leapt up against the examinant's apron. In their third round they met somewhat in the shape of a Rat, which vanished away." She also received sixpence from the Devil, and "her Familiar did commonly suck her right breast about seven at night in the shape of a little Cat of a dunish colour."—Poor Christian Green got only fourpence-halfpenny for her soul, but her bargain was made some years later than that of the others, and quotations, as the stockbrokers would say, ranged lower. Her Familiar took the shape of a Hedgehog.—Janet Douglas, a girl who pretended to be dumb, and by whose contrivance five persons had been burned at Paisley, in 1677, for causing the sickness of Sir George Maxwell by means of waxen images, having recovered her speech shortly after, declared that she had heard the witches repeat the Lord's Prayer in the presence of the Devil, and that, at his desire, they added to the word "art" the letter "w," which made it run, "Our Father which wart in heaven," by which means the Devil made an application of the prayer to himself.

In 1670, near seventy of both sexes, among them fifteen children, were executed for witchcraft at the village of Mohra in Sweden; and thirty-six children, between the ages of nine and sixteen, were sentenced to be beaten with rods on the palm of their hands, once a week for a year. The evidence in this case against the accused seems to have been mostly that of children, who all declared that at times they had been carried away by the Devil, and begged to be freed from their intolerable slavery.

In such confessions as these, we see the gradual degradation of the once superb Lucifer to the vulgar scarecrow with horns and tail. "The Prince of Darkness was a gentleman." From him who "had not lost all his original brightness," to the dirty fellow who leaves a stench, sometimes of brimstone, behind him, the descent is a long one. For the foul odour usually attending his departure, Henry More offers this explanation: "It seems to imply the reality of the business, those adscititious particles he held together in his visible vehicle being loosened at his vanishing and so offending the nostrils by their floating and diffusing themselves in the open air." Whether the explanation is satisfactory or not, we leave our readers to judge for themselves.

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XIII.

ADAM AND EVE.

AMALRIC, a heresiarch, who was condemned in the 13th century, held that at the end of the world both sexes were to be united in one person. So St. Augustine combats certain heretics who believed that women, at the resurrection, will become men. Aristophanes, in Plato's "Symposium," says that men and women originally were one person, and were split in two for plotting to attack the gods, and that Jupiter said, he would, if they again rebelled, again divide them, and so reduce them to hopping. It was held by Faber Stapulensis that if Adam had remained innocent, the world would have been peopled without Eve; and Paracelsus goes further, and denies that the distinction of sex existed before the Fall. With regard to Adam's stature, the Talmud says that it extended from one end of the world to the other, but that on his Fall he was reduced to a hundred ells. Barcephala (De Paradiso) mentions those who say that, when driven out of Paradise, he crossed the sea on foot to reach our world, and found it fordable, his stature being so great. Manconis (Travels) says the Arabs hold that the knees of Eve were two musket-shots apart. In Ceylon they still show the prints of Adam's feet. Other legends tell of his sepulchre and the tree that grew thereon. And yet, after all this, some men, like the Abbot Rupertus and the Tatianists, could doubt of Adam's salvation!

BILLY HIBBARD.

We some time since gave an anecdote or two of this singular American preacher, who joined the ranks of the Methodists in 1798, and who is still remembered for his humour and his devoted life. Of the former we may give two instances. When, as is usual, his character was being examined before the Conference, it was objected to him that "he practised medicine."

"Are you a physician, Brother Hibbard?" inquired the bishop.

"I am not," he replied; "I simply give advice in critical cases."

"What do you mean by that?" asked the bishop.

"In critical cases," said Hibbard, "I always advise them to send for a physician."

His humour seemed not to interfere with, but to enhance his usefulness. It attracted hearers which perhaps nothing else would have brought within his influence. His meetings were usually thronged. A tenacious quaker hung about him, charmed with his conversation, but not attending his preaching, objecting that the custom of "Friends" required him to wear his hat in the congregation. Hibbard sent him a hearty invitation to come, and wear his hat, or two of them if he liked, offering to lend him his own for the purpose if the good man wished it! He could resist the charm no longer, went, and became a zealous Methodist, and a useful class-leader.

A SLIGHT BLUNDER.

In his amusing collection of anecdotes about "Saints and Sinners," Dr. Doran tells the following. The Presbyterians of Crawford in Scotland were in the 17th century remarkable for irreligion and stinginess. It is stated that "At a kirk collection all that was found in the plate after prayer, sermon, and christening, were two bad shillings and a baby." Now this is founded on an entry in the Presbytery record, that a certain collection in 1693 included "two bad shillings and a babe"—no doubt the copper coin known as a "bawbee."

A HELP IN PREACHING.

The following comes to us from America. A minister borrowed five dollars of one of his hearers one Saturday evening which he returned on Monday morning. This he did a few times, borrowing and punctually repaying, until the gentleman, who had been somewhat surprised at the singular financial operation, ventured to ask an explanation. "You borrow the very same sum of money every Saturday, and return it on Monday morning. Please tell me why you do it?" "Well," replied the minister, with a twinkle in his eye, "I find I can always preach better with a little money in my pocket." The next Saturday he was not under the necessity of borrowing his five dollars.

INTELLIGENCE.

BURY DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.—On Sunday, October 18th, 1868, about seventy members of this Union met at Heap Bridge; after tea, Mr. Wm. Freeston, of Heap Bridge, took the chair. Mr. Thomas Holt read the report of the visitors to the schools in Union during the last six months, which were passed as read, together with a vote of thanks for their services. It was agreed that Stand schools provide visitors for next six months. It was arranged that no more meetings be held this year, and that the next one take place at Heywood in spring, 1869. Mr. Darbyshire, of Stand, read a paper on "Lessons from Nature and the best Authors;" and the following took part in the discussion: Messrs. Thos. Lord, James Pixton, Thos. Holt, J. K. Wright, Thos. Charles, Richard Kay, and David Wormald (Bury), Richd. Hough (Stand), Jno. Spencer (Ainsworth), Mr. Dewhurst (Heywood), Sam. Birch and John Gibson (Heap Bridge), and the chairman.

LONDON: CARTER-LANE MISSION.—On Monday evening, a meeting was held in these rooms to celebrate the fifth anniversary of the reading-room. About 160 sat down to tea. The Rev. R. Spears presided during the early part of the proceedings, and he and the Rev. J. Taylor made a few remarks expressive of the good feeling and kind wishes of the Sunday-school teachers and members of the reading-room towards a young lady teacher, who is about to follow Miss Carpenter to India, to assist in the establishment of Normal schools for women. The reports of the secretary and treasurer stated the reading-room and library to be in a healthy condition, there being 92 members on the register. During the year, 1,630 books have been circulated. Mr. G. C. Clarke, Dr. Davison, Mr. I. M. Wade, and Mr. Classon Preston delivered short and appropriate addresses. All passed off well.

LONDON: MILE END-ROAD.—Two special services were held at this church on Sunday, the 11th inst. The Rev. J. Cooper preached in the morning, and in the evening the room was crowded, the preacher being the Rev. Robert Spears, who gave a most heart-stirring discourse upon the text "All souls are mine." The collections for the day, which were made special in order to cover, if possible, a deficit in the year's accounts, amounted to between £8 and £7, which was considered to be very satisfactory.

NORTH MIDLAND PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.—The annual meeting of this association was held at Chesterfield on Monday last. There was a religious service in the Elder Yard Chapel in the morning, when a full congregation assembled in that venerable and primitive edifice. The Scriptures were read and prayer was offered up by Rev. J. N. Dresser, of Newark, and a deeply interesting and eloquent sermon was preached by Rev. R. Brook Aspland, M.A., in which the great truth that Christ is the light of the world was illustrated and enforced with much beauty and power. At the close of the service, the business meeting of the association was held under the presidency of Rev. Francis Bishop. The annual report, a long and interesting record of the society's operations in the villages of The Peak, and at Ilkstone, Newark, and other places, was read by Rev. A. W. Worthington, B.A., the secretary. Among the resolutions passed was one expressive of satisfaction at the proposal to di-establish and disendow the so-called National Church in Ireland. In the afternoon, the members and friends, to the number of about 120, dined together in the schoolroom. After dinner, the public business meeting of the association was resumed, when various resolutions were framed, and many gentlemen addressed the assembly. It had been announced that, in the course of the afternoon, Rev. P. W. Clayden would give an address on "Our duties at the present crisis." This he did in an exceedingly interesting and suggestive manner. An animated discussion followed. Among the gentlemen who addressed the meetings, in addition to those above named, were the Revs. J. Ferrar, M.A., J. B. Gardner, C. C. Coe, H. W. Ellis, W. Blazey, B.A., and Hon. Mr. Abbott, of Sheffield; Frederick Swanswick, Esq., Chesterfield; Mr. Gill, Nottingham; Mr. Woollen and Mr. Ridge, Sheffield; Mr. Kempson and Mr. Franklin Cooper, of Leicester. All the meetings were well attended, and it was generally felt that the proceedings of the day were of a pleasant and profitable character. We understand that W. Hollins, Esq., of Pleasley Vale, Mansfield, has sent a generous donation of £50 towards supplying the deficiency in the association's funds.

PORTSMOUTH.—A united special service of the High-street and St. Thomas's Sunday schools was held in St. Thomas's-street Church, on Sunday afternoon, October 11th, 1868. The body of the church was filled with the children and their teachers, and the remaining parts were closely occupied by the parents of the children and the friends of each congregation. An appropriate address was delivered by the Rev. E. R. Grant, and the singing of the children was greatly admired. As we are shut out from such aggregate meetings in connection with orthodox schools, we think in large towns, where there are two or more schools in connection with our chapels, such meetings greatly tend to promote a united, friendly feeling, and might often serve as starting points for renewed energy.

ROCHDALE.—On Sunday last, the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A., preached two sermons in Blackwater-street Chapel, on behalf of the Sunday school, which has recently been formed, but already has on the books about 90 scholars. The collections amounted to £38. 6s.

TAVISTOCK.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held in the Abbey Chapel, Tavistock, on Monday, October 12th, W. C. Northey, Esq., in the chair. The secretary having read the minutes of the several meetings during the past year, the treasurer then produced his accounts, which, having been audited, were read and passed, and officers were elected for the ensuing year. A vote of thanks was accorded to the Rev. T. Parris for his valuable services as minister during the past year, and one to the chairman terminated the meeting.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

T. J. R.—Received.

W. C. D.—Your letter is too long. Half a column is our rule of limit; and though we are unfortunately not always able to keep to it, we only disregard it where there is some special claim upon our space.

THE COMING WEEK.

Oolyton: UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN UNION.—On Wednesday, the autumnal meeting.

Knutsford.—On Sunday afternoon, school sermon, by the Rev. A. Payne.

London: STOKES NEWINGTON.—On Sunday morning, a discourse by the Rev. J. K. Applebee, on "Conversations of Christ." On Monday evening, a lecture on "Ritualism."

London: KENTISH TOWN FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. The Rev. P. W. Clayden will preach on Sunday, morning and evening.

Manchester: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET SCHOOLS.—On Sunday morning, the annual sermon, by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A. In the evening, an address by Mr. Gaskell to children and parents.

Stalybridge.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A. Subject, "Salvation: What it is, and what it is not."

Births.

SPACKMAN.—On the 11th inst., at Abbotsford-place, Belfast, the wife of Mr. W. Spackman, jun., of a son.

WRIGLEY.—On the 19th inst., at Broadoaks, Bury, the wife of Edwin G. Wrigley, Esq., of a daughter.

Marriages.

DAKIN—WESTON.—On the 17th inst., at the Parish Church, Reareby, by the Rev. T. Hassall, Thomas Dakin, of London, to Maria, youngest daughter of the late W. Weston, of Leicester. No cards.

ERMEN—SCHWABE.—On the 21st inst., at Strangeways Unitarian Free Church, by the Rev. Brooke Herford, Henry E. Ermen, Esq., of Pendlebury, to Frederica Sarah, eldest daughter of Stephan Schwabe, Esq., Broughton, Manchester. No cards.

HANDS—WALTON.—On Wednesday the 21st inst., at the Unitarian Chapel, St. Saviourgate, York, by the Rev. G. Vance Smith, B.A., Mr. William John Hands, of York, to Mrs. Eliza Jane Walton, of Heslington. No cards.

HARROP—TAYLOR.—On the 17th inst., at Strangeways Unitarian Free Church, by the Rev. Brooke Herford, Mr. James John Harrop to Ann Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. William Taylor, both of Manchester.

Deaths.

ANDERSON.—On the 10th inst., at Whitby, aged 48 years, Jane, youngest daughter of the late Mr. Joseph Anderson.

CLAY.—On the 19th inst., aged 54 years, Mary Ann, wife of Thomas Clay, Esq., of Audenshaw.—No cards.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing-office, No. 8, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, October 23, 1868.

REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

PRICE 1D.

PAGE

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing	348
What is Saying on Church Matters	348
Old Testament Quarters for the Sunday Schools.—XXVII.	348
Review: 'The Quarters Review,' October, 1868	349
American Notes	350
The Consequences of Disestablishment	350
Robert H. Wood, Esq.	351
The Bishops'	351
A Theatre Service.	352
An Election Squabble in 1734.	352
Fire-side Readings: Too Late	353
Lohrhaart.—IV.	353
Making the House of God	353
Flowers from Persian Gardens.—No. XI.	353
A Reason for Drinking	354
Intelligence: Birmingham, Derby, Kentish Town, Manchester, Nottingham, Paisley, Rotherham	354
Correspondence	354
The Coming Week	354

CHARGE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ten lines and under.....	6d. a line.
After the first ten lines	5d. a line.
For 6 consecutive insertions, a reduction of 25 per cent.
" " " "	50 per cent.
Half column.....	$1. 6s. 0d.
A whole column.....	$2. 10s. 0d.
A whole page.....	$5. 5s. 0d.

improvement of her pupils. References kindly permitted to the Rev. Brooke Werford, Manchester, Rev. J. Lettis Short, Sheffield, and to others, as may be desired—Address, E. J., care of Mr. John Phillips, Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Fleet-street, Manchester.

	Single Tracts.	Per dozen.	Per 100.
4 pp. Tracts....	1d.	4d.	2s.
8 pp. ".....	1d.	8d.	4s.
12 pp. ".....	1½d.	1s.	6s.

The whole series, well bound, in 4 volumes, for 10s., or free by post 11s.

This excellent HUNGARIAN WINE is now greatly recommended for its nourishing and sustaining properties. As we import it direct from Hungary, without any intermediate agency, and bottle it under our own personal inspection, purchasers can rely upon its genuineness.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,
WINE MERCHANTS.

HESTER.....	26, Market-street.
Col	11, Lord-street.
gham	28, High street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

The St. Petersburg Journal announces that the Minister of the Interior has addressed a circular to the governors of all the provinces of the Russian empire, asking their advice as to the best means of checking the progress of drunkenness among the people. It was certainly high time that some steps should be taken for this purpose, since while in 1862 there were only 460 public-houses in St. Petersburg, there are now 2,500; and while there was then but one for every 1,080 inhabitants, there is at present one for every 200. It is proposed to close 2,162 public-houses in the capital, and a similar proportion in other towns.

In West Prussia, a new sect has been formed, chiefly recruited from the neighbourhood of Saatzig, where a few years ago a young woman prophesied with great success, till the Government decided she would be better engaged in the work-house. Like a body of religionists which once existed in Wales, and perhaps may do still, the new sect make "jumping" a part of their worship. At their "marriage with the Heavenly Bridegroom," as they call it, they fall into ecstasies which express themselves in this lively manner; and at a certain part of the service the whole congregation joins in the exercise, in order to imitate David's dancing before the Ark.

From the Spanish Ecclesiastical Directory it appears that Spain has—or, we suppose we must now say had—800 convents and monasteries, with about 15,000 nuns and monks. There are in Spain 55 diocesan bishops, about 2,500 canons and abbots, about 1,800 regular clergy, and about 24,000 vicars, answering to our curates and unbeneficed clergy. The annual cost of the Church in Spain, comprising about 16,000,000 souls, has been twice as great as in France, which numbers some 37,000,000 Roman Catholics.

The Liberal papers in Spain are already beginning to hint at the expediency of discontinuing the tribute of 30,000,000 reals (£300,000), which found its way to Rome under a variety of pretexts; such, for instance, as the assignment of 9,000 duros (£1,800), which the Spanish Government paid to the Nuncio—the only instance in the civilised world of an Ambassador receiving his salary from the court to which he is accredited.

The Edinburgh Spanish Evangelisation Society state that General Prim has declared to Senor Cabrera, one of their agents, and two other exiles, that they may now enter Spain with their Bibles under their arms, and freely preach its doctrines.

The able paper, read by Mr. Carvell Williams, the indefatigable Secretary of the Liberation Society, at the recent meeting of the Congregational Union, on "Dissenters and the General Election," is to be published in a cheap form, and our readers will do well to procure it for circulation among those of their friends who feel any doubts what their duty is in regard to the important political contest which is now so soon to be decided.

"The Evangelical Union" have been promoting a series of prayer meetings at Exeter Hall, which seem, from the descriptions given of them, to have been of a singular character. At one of them, Dr. Fry, a clergyman, stated that among the letters received asking for special supplications, was one from an undergraduate of Cambridge, who was tortured with doubts on the subject of religion. He was anxious that his faith should be confirmed, and that he might be enabled to evince that faith boldly before his fellow students in the university. This, said Dr. Fry, was a most important matter at the present time, when men of immense energy and ability, most of them clergymen of the Established Church, were directing all their powers to force their erroneous opinions on the public schools and the universities of the country. The five or six prayers which followed all bore upon the state of this unhappy young man. In the prayers the forthcoming elections were not forgotten, and one person asked the prayers of the meeting for an individual, on the ground that his landlord had seized his goods for rent!

At the consecration last week of the English Church at Constantinople in memory of the British soldiers and sailors who died in the Crimean war, the Greek Patriarch paid the unprecedented compliment of sending his vicar and a bishop to be present.

According to the Liverpool Mercury, the Rev.

Henry John Pye, rector of Clifton Campville, Staffordshire, and Prebendary of Hansacre, in Lichfield Cathedral, has, along with his wife, gone over to the Roman Catholic Church. He married, in 1851, Emily Charlotte, the only daughter of the Bishop of Oxford. Mr. Pye has held his appointment at Clifton since 1851, and it is of the yearly value of £950.

The Church News states that the Archbishop of York, instigated thereto by the Bishop and Dean of Ripon, is about to institute proceedings against the Rev. Charles Voysey, author of the "Sling and the Stone," and other heretical publications; but it appears that no intimation of such a prosecution has yet reached the authorities of the ecclesiastical courts.

The Baptist Union has been holding its autumnal session at Bristol, when a larger number of ministers and delegates assembled than on any previous occasion. The proceedings appear to have been of an interesting character, and showed increasing life in the denomination represented, which may justly claim to have been among the earliest asserters of true religious freedom. At one of the meetings, the Rev. J. Mursell advocated a plan which, it has often seemed to us, might be carried out with advantage in our own body more frequently than it is. He mentioned that this plan had been recommended also by the Rev. Samuel Martin, of Westminster, a man greatly revered in his own denomination, who once said to him:

"I do wish very much that we could get some system by which a minister in full work could have associated with him, for a year or so, a young man preparing for the ministry, that he might work with that minister, and preach for him sometimes, and be led by him into the methods of pastoral work."

At his induction into the professorship of Theology and Church History at the College of the Presbyterian Church in England, the Rev. Dr. W. Chalmers, in reply to questions put to him, avowed his belief in the Old and New Testament as the word of God, and of the Westminster confession of faith; his disbelief of Popish, Arian, Socinian, Arminian, and other doctrines; his conviction that the Presbyterian form in worship was most in accordance with sacred writ; and that he had not sought the new appointment from worldly motives. We can only say that Dr. Chalmers must have a wonderful theological digestion if he can really swallow and assimilate all that he thus professed his ability to do. An ostrich's power of digesting nails is nothing to it.

Dr. Cumming must look to his prophetic laurels. A most formidable rival has appeared in Australia, and has published a book containing fearful prophecies, supported, like the doctor's, by incontrovertible proofs from Scripture. He tells us that, contrary to common belief, the earth, instead of being orange-shaped, has the shape of a pine apple, and is elongated instead of being flattened at the poles; that this elongation has got to such a pitch that the earth is about to change its centre of gravity. Rome is to be suddenly overwhelmed, and seen no more for ever; and the whole northern hemisphere will share more or less in the tremendous disturbance. The dwellers on the north side of the equator are informed, however, that emigrating immediately to Australia, they may escape the threatened cataclysm, and, after it is over, return to enjoy the new earth, which is to be so pervaded with currents of magnetism and electricity, that the soil will be fruitful beyond the power of the liveliest imagination to conceive, and man is to live as long as the oak of the forest. The author intends to come out next year with a fuller development of his prophetic teachings; from which we derive the comforting assurance that the northern hemisphere is not in immediate danger.

As our readers will have learned from the daily papers, Dr. Longley, archbishop of Canterbury, died on Tuesday night, at the age of 74. He was not a man of great power or extraordinary attainments, and his episcopate, extending over a period of thirty-two years, has left no marked traces behind; but he was one who always shewed himself anxious to discharge faithfully the duties confided to him, and who answered well to the description which Miss Brontë gave of him, when he held the see of Ripon, "he is certainly a most charming Bishop; the most benignant gentleman that ever put on lawn sleeves; yet stately too, and quite competent to check encroachments." We may just recal to the recollection of our readers that it was the conversion of the Archbishop's sister, Mrs. Devonport, of Bath, to the Unitarian faith, which led to the correspondence between her husband and him that was afterwards published under the title of the "Brothers' Controversy," and which, though it produced no change in the views of the writers, was the means of making them understand each other better, and drawing them more closely in affection together.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Rev. F. Meyrick, one of the leaders of the Anglo-Continental Society, says in regard to Spain:

"The first thing that we must expect is a widespread manifestation of the infidelity which has hitherto been concealed under the veil of uniformity, and possibly some violent excesses directed against priestly rule. The people would have burnt the Jesuits' house at Port St. Mary to the ground, and massacred the inmates, if they had not been prevented by Prim. On the other hand, there is a vast amount of very gross superstition; and Spain's religious danger is lest the struggle should come to be between infidelity and superstition, with no tertium quid."

The Gaulois reports the following: Two gentlemen were speaking in one of the streets of Madrid of the departure of the Jesuit fathers. "Have you observed," said one, "that they never chanted the mass?" It appears that such was the rule of the order. "I am not surprised," replied the other; "birds of prey do not sing."

Looking merely at some outward signs of progress which Romanism shews in this country, there are those who seem to fear that its shadow is again about to darken the land; but Mr. John Morley, in an article in the Fortnightly, points out sufficient reasons for regarding any such fear as altogether groundless:

"Catholicism may long remain a vital creed to millions of men, a deep source of spiritual consolation and refreshment, and a bright lamp in perplexities of conduct and morals; but resting on dogmas which cannot, by any amount of compromise, be incorporated with the daily increasing mass of knowledge, assuming as the condition of its existence forms of the theological hypothesis which all the preponderating influences of contemporary thought concur directly or indirectly in discrediting, upheld by an organisation which its history for the last five centuries has exposed to the distrust and hatred of men, as the sworn enemy of mental freedom and growth—the pretensions of Catholicism to renovate society are among the most pitiable and impotent that ever devout, high-minded, and benevolent persons deluded themselves into maintaining or accepting. Over the modern invader it is as powerless as Paganism was over the invaders of old. The barbarians of industrialism, grasping chiefs and murderous men, give no ear to priest or pontiff, who speak only dead words, who confront modern issues with blind eyes, and who stretch out but a palsied hand to help. 'Christianity,' according to a well-known saying, 'has been tried, and failed; the religion of Christ remains to be tried.' One would prefer to qualify the first clause, by admitting how much Christianity has done for Europe even with its old organisation, and to restrict the charge of failure within the limits of the modern time."

At a meeting of Belfast Presbyterians with reference to the approaching election, the Rev. David Hunter said he was convinced it would be for the welfare of the Protestant churches of Ireland to be dissevered from the State. The Regium Donum he described as a miserable pittance—"a bone cast to the Puritan dog to keep him from growling." He wished for nothing but to see all Protestant churches breathing the pure air of spiritual freedom. The Presbyterian Church would not heap distinctions on those who scorned its simple service, and "prayed by act of Parliament."

In a pamphlet just published, the Rev. Malcolm MacColl, a clergyman of the Establishment, thus strongly, but truly, speaks of the position which the Church of England has too generally assumed, and which has done so much to weaken its strength:

"The clergy have ever been ready to fight the battle of one party in the State, and have unfortunately opposed nearly every measure of beneficence and justice which the mass of the people regard with gratitude. What has been the consequence? Let the serried ranks of Dissent answer. I have some experience of the working classes, and I know that the opposition of our clergy to reform generally, the fact that their influence is always cast in the scale of the Tory party, has done more than anything to alienate the affections and the confidence of the working classes. At the same time it has been a matter of life and death with the Liberal party to weaken the Church, because the Church has always been their most formidable opponent."

At an archidiaconal conference of the diocese of Ely, to which laymen were admitted, the Rev. A. H. Wratlaw read a paper in which he gave it as his opinion that it was all "vanity and vexation of spirit" to speak of the comprehension of Dissenters in the Church till there was a thorough internal reform of it. One reason why they would not rejoin it was that they felt that a large number of the clergy were forsaking the principles of the Reformation. Secondly, he did not believe Dissenters would ever be largely attracted to the Church so long as the traffic in benefices continued to exist, as at present; the sale of "next presentations" must therefore be abolished. A third reason which prevented Dissenters from reuniting with the Church was that they had been accustomed to a considerable amount of control over their ministers, which they would not like to give up. They would also want to know whether the clergy were empowered to administer vows to the sons and daughters of members of their congregations; and whether there was any power of punishing the clergy who indulged in such practices. Another thing essential before the co-operation of Dissenters could be expected was a revision of the Prayer-book, especially with regard to baptismal regeneration, and the teaching of the doctrine of absolution in the office for the visitation of the sick. Sixthly, the Church must show herself in a favourable light to Dissenters by undertaking and executing some great work for the benefit of both; and, lastly, it was necessary to have a "Directorium Anglicanum," but not by its present editor, for Dissenters would never join the Church unless they were certain as to what would meet their eyes and ears when they went into it.

Writing of the same conference, the Independent, which thinks it a pity that bishops and their friends do not "comprehend" Dissenters better, says:

"Archdeacon Rose strongly condemned clergymen 'who broke the unity of the Church by going to the Baptist meeting-house in their own parish, forgetful of their ordination vow to drive away all strange doctrines,' and carried away by his excitement far into the moonlit realms of fancy, he exclaimed, 'That Church of Christ in these realms whose succession is unbroken, whose orders cannot be challenged, whose doctrine is pure, whose discipline is apostolical, whose ministers have stemmed the tide of Romanism and infidelity—a Church like this cannot be expected to become a suppliant at the gates of a hundred sects which have left her communion!' Is it not wonderful the power of imagination and belief that resides in an Archdeacon! This was not a hopeful beginning, but there was improvement as the debate went on. One layman amid many 'Ohs' and 'Noes' declared that the missionary work of Dissenters shamed the Church, and he rebuked the superciliousness of the clergy; another layman wound up the conversation by 'appealing to his clerical friends to come down one step. The Dissenters came amongst Church congregations, and why should not the clergy come and hear the Dissenters? That was what he called brotherly love.' These mixed conferences will bring a much-needed supply of common sense to the councils of the Church."

In regard to the dispute which has been going on in the columns of the Guardian respecting the terms of communion, one of its correspondents asks:

"When did the Church of England make the Thirty-nine Articles her terms of communion in any sense whatever? A layman might go from his cradle to his grave, live a long life, be in full communion with our Church all his life, and never come across the Thirty-nine Articles in any way. Nobody would ever require him to recite them, or subscribe to them. 'How, then, can they possibly be our terms of communion?' . . . I venture to submit that our terms of communion are simply and solely the two great Creeds [the Apostles' and the Nicene]. Surely, no particular or national Church has any right to add to or diminish from the terms of communion as they have been delivered down from the beginning, or settled by Ecumenical Councils. Is not this our great quarrel with the Church of Rome, that she has added to the old Catholic terms of communion novel terms and conditions of her own devising? If the Church of England has indeed imposed the Thirty-nine Articles on all her members as terms of communion, why, then let us confess that she has committed a most unwarrantable act of the same kind precisely as that of the Roman Church when she tacked on to the Nicene Creed that of Pope Pius IV."

In a letter to the same paper, dated from "The Benedictine Mission-house," "† Ignatius, O.S.B. Superior," solicits help for a continental Jewish Rabbi (£2 a week is what is required), who, having been ordained to the ministry among the Episcopal Methodists of America, chanced to look into St. Edmund's Church, Lombard-street, and was so impressed that he was ready to become a member of the English Church, and join the "Father" in his work, if he could only be provided with the necessities of life. "Ignatius," however, "dare not incur this fresh responsibility," for, he says, "my profession of the monastic life is not a lucrative or a popular one, and the struggle to support my work is a hard one."

The Rev. E. Clay, the first Brighton clergyman who has openly pronounced in favour of disestablishment, in a sermon the other Sunday, said the Church of God—as defined in the 19th Article—never could be disestablished. The Church of Canada and the Episcopal Church of Scotland had been disestablished, and that had increased their spiritual strength and prosperity. In his opinion secular honour and wealth have proved, and do prove, a hindrance rather than a help to the spread of the truth. Without intending a reproach to any party whatsoever, he warned his hearers that religion and the welfare of the Church had been made, and might be made again, a stalking-horse for political purposes, by men who, when they had obtained their wishes, would make an end of their profession of religion. He did not think that if the Church of England were disestablished God's truth would be gone from us. The religious mind of the public was evidently fast drifting to disestablishment. But they need not therefore despair. If her doctrines remain pure and Scriptural, and her discipline were made so, the English would become a more vigorous branch of Christ's Church. If she were emancipated to-morrow from the earthly elements of 'promotion, patronage, &c., she would be more likely to exhibit the simple holy life of the primitive Christian Church.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XXVII.

SUBJECT: "The Hebrew feelings towards death and a future life."

Read 2 Samuel xii. 15–23. David's child was struck with sickness, and was on the point of death. And David prayed to God for his child, and kept his fast, and lay all night upon the ground in his sorrow. After some days the child died, and David learned that the child was dead; then he rose up from the ground and washed and anointed himself, and changed his apparel and went into the House of Jehovah and worshipped. And he came back to his own house and did eat. Then his servants asked him why he did thus. And he said, "While the child was yet alive, I fasted and wept, for I said, Who knoweth whether Jehovah will be gracious to me, that the child may live? But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he will not return to me."

Read also 2 Samuel xviii. 6–33. After the battle, Absalom is caught in a tree, and Joab kills him. Joab's son asks leave to run and tell David. But Joab is afraid lest, after the custom of the times, the bearer of ill news should be put to death, and he sends a poor Cushite, or negro, to tell David of the victory won and of his son's death. And the King was much moved with grief, and he went up to the chamber over the city gate and wept. And as he went, he said, "O my son, Absalom! my son, my son Absalom! O that I had died for thee! O Absalom, my son, my son!"

The Hebrews believed that death came from the hand of a wise and good God, and everywhere in the Bible we see the devout and beautiful spirit in which they looked upon it. Precious in the eyes of Jehovah is the death of his saints; and "When I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I shall fear no evil, for thou wilt be with me," write the Psalmists.

Very slight are the allusions to a future life among the Hebrew writers. They lived surrounded by a dark and gloomy mythology of a future world below ground, which they carefully avoided, and chose silence rather than that superstition. So often, however, as they draw near the subject, it is in a devout and happy spirit (Ps. ciii. 8.) "If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell [or the grave], behold thou art there. In the very late days when Daniel, chap. xii. 2, was written, the doctrine of a resurrection was become common.

LONDON.—On Sunday week, the Rev. William Oates delivered a lecture in the Court-house, on the Fatherhood of God. The attendance was good, and many strangers were present.

A BISHOP SET RIGHT.

LAST July the Bishop of Oxford assured the House of Lords that "Dr. Colenso had received private remonstrances, brotherly counsel, the tenderest and kindest counsel, from his seniors at home, and such counsel had led him only to some new outbreak of violence." The Bishop of Natal had read this, he says, with amazement. In disproof, he refers to his published reply in 1863, to the circular letter of the bishops calling upon him to resign his see. In that reply he wrote:—"I share very deeply your Grace's expression of regret that your first act of intercourse with me should have been of this character, and I am painfully sensible of the fact that, ever since my landing in this country—with the exception of one letter from the Bishop of Oxford more than six months ago, and a message from the Bishop of Capetown to the effect that the Bishop of St. Asaph had expressed a readiness to discuss my views (upon the Romans) with me, if I chose to visit him for that purpose—not a single expression of sympathy or brotherly kindness has reached me from any one of my episcopal brethren in England or Ireland, though it was well known I was suffering under great mental trial and perplexity." The Archbishop of Canterbury seems to have told the Bishop of Capetown that he was willing to hold an amicable conference with Dr. Colenso, and His Grace understood that this was declined. But it appears that the Bishop did not in any way convey the message. Dr. Colenso wrote to him to say that he should be most glad to meet singly and privately "with any bishop who, either from a sense of duty to the Church and to what he believed to be the truth, or from a feeling of charity towards a brother whom he wished to recover, would be willing to meet and discuss with me any of the questions raised in my 'Commentary.' " To the Archbishop Dr. Colenso wrote in a second letter:—"I cannot doubt that I might have profited much by friendly counsel from some, at least, of my episcopal brethren, if any such had been offered. And on this account alone I must especially regret the complete state of isolation in which I have been left by them, upon returning to my native land after some years of labour in the missionary field." From that time to this, writes the Bishop of Natal from his diocese, "not a single word of sympathy, brotherly counsel, or 'private remonstrance' of any kind has reached me from anyone of my 'seniors at home.' I am not now complaining of this—I only state the fact; and I am very sensible of the love of justice and fair play which some of the bishops have manifested in their public utterances. But I am utterly at a loss to account for Bishop Wilberforce's making the above assertion." The remark of the Pall Mall on the conduct of the Bishops is, "We can only say that it is little like that of men of the world. But what can be said of the Bishop of Oxford's assertion? Nothing, except that though the Bishop of Natal calls it 'amazing,' it will not amaze us in England very much."

REVIEW.

The Quarterly Review. October, 1868.

An article on "The Archbishops of Canterbury of the Reformation" passes a very high encomium on the two new volumes of Dr. Hook's work, whose interest centres in the accounts of the two archbishops (William Warham and Thomas Cranmer), Henry VIII., Cromwell, and Cardinal Wolsey. Cromwell, so spelt by way of distinction, is described as a bad, bold, hypocritical, unscrupulous, and venal man. The last scenes in the life of Cranmer, so well known to all, are rehearsed in a tender and forgiving spirit. A brief account of this reviewer's positions on some questions of Church and State will be more interesting to our readers than a dry resumé of the whole article.

A National Church.—"If England and Ireland be one united kingdom, with one Established Church, and not two separate monarchies loosely allied by the overshadowing of two Crowns Imperial resting for the time upon one brow, this destruction of the Church's nationality in one island must logically imply its destruction as a national Church in both, although it may still survive as an anomaly in one. To build this up, which it is now so lightly proposed to pull down, was, in fact, the master aim of the great Reformation statesmen." p. 387. Has this reviewer forgotten Scotland? or does he, like Mr. Snowdon Henry, one of the candidates for the South Eastern division of Lancashire, maintain the Established Church in England, Scotland, and Ireland?

The Church always under State Control.—"In truth, before the Reformation, as well as since the Reformation, the Church of England was, on one side, an act of Parliament Church. It was a branch of the one Holy Apostolical Church, settled within this realm, welcomed by the realm, honoured, endowed, established; and so exercising, upon certain honourable conditions, its spiritual functions in the land. What the Crown, the Parliament, and the people claimed was not to have created the spiritual body with its creeds, doctrines, ministry, and sacramental life; but to have created, and so to have the right to enforce, and if need were to modify, the conditions under which that life and ministry were exercised, [at the Reformation.] The Church, which had been the subject of old Acts of Parliament, became the subject of new acts, which aimed at restoring the old compact between the spirituality and the temporality to their original conditions, and guarding for the future against the evils of the past." (p. 390.)

"The assertion of the supremacy of the crown was no new pretension, first urged at the era of the Reformation, but had been from time immemorial the claim of the English crown, enforced or suffered to sleep according to the strength of the monarch on the throne; but always re-asserted and perpetually re-enforced by statutory enactments. Forgotten as this is by numbers, no fact in history is more certain." (p. 394.) In this sense of subjection to the King rather than to the Pope, the action of the English Church has been uniform. "For one leading object of the Dean has evidently been to show the unbrokenness of this Church of England from the beginning until now, to exhibit it one and the same body from the mission of Augustin to the present hour; to show it protesting against the rising aggressions of Rome under the Plantagenets, and enforcing the protests with the brave hearts and strong hands of the Tudor kings." (p. 388.)

The Suppression of the Monasteries.—The Dean "shows that it had at all times belonged to the King of right to visit all collegiate and monastic institutions; that eighty-one alien priories, that is, priories in England affiliated to religious houses abroad, had been sequestered by King John; that thirty more had been sequestered by Edward III., restored in the first year of Henry IV., but again suspended in his sixth year; that Henry V. had by act of Parliament suppressed the alien priories and vested their estates in the Crown; and that throughout the middle ages, and before the Reformation was thought of, the creators of colleges—such as Walter de Merton and William of Wykeham—had found the means of endowing their great foundations from similar sources; that the distinction, moreover, between Church property and monastic property was most marked [How?], and that no notion of peculiar sacredness then attached to the holdings of the monasteries; that they were institutions to be judged of simply by their results, and that they had long ceased to effect in any real degree the useful purposes for which they had at first been founded. They no longer sustained either religion or learning. The Dean has therefore no professional censures for the resumption by the State of property of which it might justly regard itself as the trustee, providing only that the mode of resumption was fitting, and the uses to which the resumed property was put, were of the nature of a cy pres redistribution." But that was not done, and the reviewer, pushed for an argument against the implied analogy with the present movement to disendow the Irish Church, resorts to a mild threat. "It is well that at the present time the warning which this appropriation of the confiscated estates of the religious houses suggests should be with all distinctness repeated. All experience teaches us that whether or no other curses attend upon such confiscation, the curse of misappropriation has attached itself with unvarying fixedness to all such acts." (pp. 403-4.) Were, then, the colleges created out of monastic property by Merton and Wykeham vitiated by this curse of misappropriation?

The following extract from a very interesting article on Lake Dwellings, shows that educated orthodoxy is prepared to surrender the Biblical chronology, and that, too, somewhat easily. "A very few years ago, in fact, since the discovery of the Swiss lake dwellings, evidence was prominently brought forward in England to prove that the antiquity of man on the earth far transcended the common estimate of 6,000 or 7,000 years, seeing that tribes of men making and using very rude stone implements were already living in the time of the extinct quaternary animals. Since then, the enquiry has been taken up with great vigour, and the search in gravel beds and limestone caverns has at any rate placed it beyond doubt that savage tribes of men inhabited Europe while the mammoth, the tichorine rhinoceros, the cave-bear, and the cave-hyæna were still surviving in the land. These investigations, however, gained a special attention from being looked upon as hostile to Christianity by a large public, who accordingly either feared them, or sometimes triumphed in them. But those theologians who most thoroughly understand the bearings of the case, see at once the uncharitableness and the injustice of bringing against such enquiries the imputation of heresy. Dates arrived at by the process of adding up generations and years and days, in such computations as that printed in the margins of our Bibles, can scarcely be regarded as limiting the ages of the savages of Brixham and St. Acheal, when they would not be put in evidence against the high antiquity of the mammoths, among whom these men lived. And however great may be the merit and use of calculations based on the Bible, they carry upon their face the confession of their indefiniteness, and obviously cannot be taken as binding upon men's faith." p. 439.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The General Convention of the Episcopal Church of the United States and the New Dominion was opened at New York on the 7th of October. There were 320 delegates present, and forty-two bishops. A proposal for union with the Wesleyans appears to have met with more success in America than here. The New York Churchman says:

"The Methodist Conference has appointed a commission of seven to confer with a like commission from our General Convention, in regard to the re-union of the Methodists with the Church. The act is one that deserves our gravest and kindest consideration."

An American paper tells the following story of a clergyman to whom a farmer complained that ministers earned money much faster than he did. "Now," said the farmer, "when you are called upon to marry a couple, you never expect a less sum than three dollars, and you sometimes get ten dollars. This is only for a few minutes' service." "Pooh!" replied the doctor; "I would agree to give you half my next marriage-fee for a bushel of potatoes." "Very well," said the farmer, "I'll take your offer, and send you the potatoes." A few days afterwards, the clergyman was called on to unite a couple at D—, a place about four miles from where he lived. When the ceremony was over, the bridegroom said, "Well, parson, s'pose I must fork out something for your trouble. What say you to taking one of my terrier pups? The best breed, I tell you, in the country. Shocking nice to have in the barn. Worth full five dollars, and I suppose a figure or two would do for the spice, eh?" The doctor took up the pup with joy. The joke was too good; he hastened to the farmer, saying, "Now, friend, here is my fee; how shall we divide it?" The farmer relished the joke so well that he increased the potatoes to half-a-dozen bushels.

The Herald of Gospel Liberty gives this "scrap of a dialogue on a Mississippi steamboat":

"Catholic Priest: But did not Christ say, 'Tell it to the church?' Now what church was this?"

Christian: It was not the Roman Church, for no such church existed then. Not one Roman had yet been converted; but the Romans were Pagans for years afterwards.

Priest: But what church was it?

Christian: Church there is ekklesia, and signifies congregation. It signifies tell it to the church, i.e., congregation of which he is a member. Surely none other.

Priest: But how could he say then, 'What ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven'?"

Christian: Because that if they enforce simply Bible discipline, heaven will approve their action; but you would not tell it to the church, but to the priest or bishop.

Priest: Yes; but I insist upon it that Christ established an earthly tribunal, and those who reject its decisions cannot be saved.

Christian: I think not. Do you really suppose all will be lost who reject the decisions of Rome?

Priest: Certainly. So Jesus said.

Christian: O no. Jesus did not say it. Do you believe that the Greek Church, of ninety millions of people, all of whom reject the authority of Rome, will be lost?

Priest: O no; they are orthodox in faith.

Christian: But they reject your version of the Trinity, and other doctrines; they reject your authority altogether, and yet you admit that they are not lost. So you thus give up the whole question of authority.

Priest: Well, what church do you hold to?

Christian: The church established by Christ before any earthly creed or sect; a church composed of all God's children—of all the good.

Priest: Well, you are more reasonable than any Protestant I have met. They all draw their doctrines and usages from us, yet deny our authority.

Christian: We draw nothing from you.

Priest: Yes, you get the Bible from us.

Christian: No; the Jews, the Greek Church, the Armenians, Abyssinians, and others preserved the Bible, independent of you.

Priest: But you admit that St. Peter founded the Roman Church.

Christian: By no means. Peter never saw Rome. The first church history is the Acts, and that leaves him in Jerusalem. No history extant is old enough to be proof. Paul (Rom. xvi.) names all of note at Rome, but makes no mention of Peter. Your church was founded by Constantine in the fourth century; but your government dates back as far as Numa—eight hundred years before the Christian era."

The New York Times says:

"The Democratic party in England [by which, of course, the Conservatives are meant] argue that if the Episcopal Church be disestablished all the people will turn infidels and Papists. The only thing which holds them to Paul and Luther is the Establishment. Now, why is it that, in this country, where we have no establishment, the people do not turn either to Tom Paine or the Pope, but adhere to Christianity and the Reformation? Will Churchmen acknowledge that it is because the Americans are wiser and better than the English? Or what?"

If we may trust the New York Independent, the Wesleyan Conference of this country has refused, on account of his marriage with the wife of his deceased sister, to accede to the request of the Canadian Conference that Mr. Punshon should be appointed President of its next assembly, and his name will be dropped from the "legal hundred" of next year. The Independent thinks "this shows not a little of the old leaning of the English Wesleyans towards the traditions of Episcopacy; for it is the prohibition of the canon law which gives such a marriage its ill-savour, and the legal statute would have been expunged in England but for the opposition of the bishops."

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1868.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF DISESTABLISHMENT.

OUR correspondent, Mr. GAIRDNER, upon whose arguments against disestablishment we commented last week, returns to the charge in a letter which we print in another column. Into the details of his reasoning we cannot further enter, consisting, as it does, of little more than the reiteration of arguments which we have already noticed—we would say answered—but of this our readers must be the judges. We recur to the subject, however, because the new illustrations adduced, and indeed the whole tenor of the letter, bring out into stronger relief than ever that utterly anomalous state of the Established Church, for which the beginning of any remedy must be disestablishment.

The central difficulty of the whole subject lies in the fact that at present the establishment sustains a two-fold character—is, at once, what has been aptly called "a branch of the civil service," and, an organisation of the religious life. Now these two characters are radically incompatible. For a time, so long as a church is in reality the church of a whole nation, the incompatibility may not be glaringly manifest, though even then we believe that all historical experience tends to show that such a position, as a department of Government, is repressive of anything like high religious life; but when the religious life of a people has passed beyond the initial stage in which alone uniformity is possible, and has developed itself into the infinite diversity of belief, of worship, of activity, which we see in our own country and in every land in which it has free play, then the incompatibility appears in unmistakable ways. It is so at present in regard to the English Establishment. Some uniformity is necessary in any institution for which the whole nation has a certain collective responsibility, yet the day is long past in which either the nation could agree upon any standard of uniformity to enforce, or any large proportion of the nation could accept it, if agreed upon. Thus we have practically come to this—that the nation does not settle any standard of uniformity, and the Church does not accept any. The standard which nominally obtains is the settlement of a long past time. The present nation, as now represented by Parliament, has not settled it, and is notoriously dissatisfied with it, but dare not face the quixotic task of attempting any better settlement. On the other hand, that standard is quite as far from being accepted by the Church. Three great parties, as widely diverse as any three Dissenting sects, habitually drive their respective coaches and six through and through it, making it mean the most ludicrously diverse things and only agreeing in vilifying each other with a license of bitterness unknown in Nonconformist controversies, and—in glorifying the Establishment. Mr. GAIRDNER apprehends that the nation may “renounce the trust” of governing the church. Practically, the nation has renounced it long ago. For a century past there has been nothing that can fairly be called government of the Church of England. The contrast has become too broad between the governing power and the institution to be governed. The church may be a branch of the Civil Service, but the people at large have become too much accustomed to think of churches as free associations and organisations of religious life, to feel easy in treating the Established Church in a way perfectly different from all others. It is true that we Unitarians can agitate for the striking out of the Athanasian Creed (and, by the way, why does our correspondent while affirming this, hit out at the Times for crying down Ritualism?) but surely this is the reductio ad absurdum of his own argument. What right have men to impose conditions upon the profession and working out of other men’s religious life? What right have we to dictate what other men shall or shall not have in their prayer-book? What right have we to insist either upon their being more bigotted or more liberal than their own religious life may lead them to be? Of course, the reply is—the right of the whole nation over one department of its government service; but this only brings out more clearly the unnaturalness of such a status for a church. Here, indeed, is the positive idea upon which the Liberation Society is based—an idea which though it has been sneered at as a mere cover for destruction and spoliation, is beginning to be better appreciated, and must eventually become more and more prominent. The religious life of men must be allowed to work out freely, in such groupings together and in such forms of faith and activity as may be natural. Our Nonconformist churches have fought the battle for this too long and too well to be able to recognise now any other principle. The fact that three great sections of English religious life—Ritualists, Evangelicals, and Broad Church, nominally united into one great organisation—inheriting a position which gives to the nation a right to treat them in quite a different way, involves some difficult complications of property before they can be put in the position of independence essential to real churches, but no way out of these complications can be so utterly hurtful to the religious life of England, and to the vitality of these bodies, as the maintenance of their present position. We are persuaded that the first step towards a right state of things is disestablishment. We will not quarrel over the exact meaning of the word. Our friend says it means that the Church will be freed from State control. As to control in the details of its management, it is free from that already. As to control in the principles of its management, it will be no more free than are hundreds of existing religious trusts, great and small, which are administered according to schemes settled by the State. The real safeguard of the Church of England in the past, alike in the face of party predominance and the inaction and neutrality of the State, has been its parochial independence. And this is a sufficient safeguard for the future. Our friend adopts our statement that the action of the State has uniformly been to broaden religious trusts, and not to narrow them. He relies upon this as ensuring that if we only keep the Church established, the law courts will go on widening in their authoritative interpretations of doctrine. It seems to us that it may be much more safely relied upon to ensure that if the Church be disestablished, whatever parochial independence now exists will be strengthened and enlarged. It is in this direction that the broadening process of Chancery settlements has uniformly proceeded. The State never likes to touch doctrine, but in every change leaves a little more freedom than before to individual ministers and congregations. Grant us this; let the parishes and parish ministers of England be made as free by law as they have already become by the difficulty of enforcing ecclesiastical legislation, and everything else will gradually right itself.

Robert Heywood, Esq.

It is with feelings of deep regret that we announce the loss of another of our honoured worthies—Mr. ROBERT HEYWOOD, of Bolton—whose death took place on Tuesday last, at the age of eighty-two. He was truly one who adorned the doctrine which he professed, and by his upright, benevolent, Christian walk, made it respected even among those who most widely differed from him in religious opinion. Throughout his long life, as a local paper testifies, he was actively engaged in promoting every institution for the intellectual and moral improvement of the people of his native town, and for the alleviation of distress and suffering occasioned by poverty and sickness. From the opening of the Infirmary and Dispensary in 1814, he was not only one of its most earnest and generous supporters, but laboured indefatigably for more than forty years as its honorary secretary, and on tendering his resignation, only last week, presented to it the munificent sum of £1,000. As far back as 1826, Mr. Heywood was elected one of the trustees for Great Bolton, and held the office till their duties lapsed, when a Charter of Incorporation was obtained, in procuring which he took a leading part. He was several times chosen by his fellow-citizens to represent them in the Town Council, and was the second Mayor, succeeding Charles J. Darbshire, Esq., in November, 1839. In the following year he was offered a baronetcy by Her Majesty on the occasion of her marriage, but this honour he respectfully but firmly declined. In 1856 he was elected an alderman, and has continued in the Council uninterruptedly since that time. Mr. Heywood was likewise a borough and county magistrate, being placed on the commission of the peace for the county in 1835, and for the borough in 1839. As an ex-officio member of the Board of Guardians, Mr. Heywood also took an active share in the administration of relief from the formation of the Bolton Poor-law Union, in the year 1838. Besides various other useful works in the promotion and management of which he did much for the benefit of his native town, he specially interested himself in the Public Baths, the Mechanics’ Institution, the Working Men’s Club, and the Poor Protection Society during the distribution of relief to the distressed cotton operatives; and he was a liberal contributor to every benevolent and philanthropic effort which needed his help. He not only presented to the ratepayers a plot of land for a Recreation Ground, which now bears his name, but he also offered £500 towards the purchase of another plot in Little Bolton for a similar purpose, rightly believing that if the people were provided with facilities for innocent enjoyment it would tend greatly to aid the temperance cause, of which he was always a warm and consistent advocate.

As a boy, after leaving the Grammar School, he was placed under the tuition of the Rev. John Holland, minister of Bank-street Chapel, and in its concerns Mr. Heywood, from an early period, took a warm and lively interest. In 1811 he was appointed one of the trustees, and filled the office of treasurer with unwearied care and fidelity for a period of forty years, resigning it so recently as last Christmas. For a great number of years he was also superintendent of the Sunday school, and taught the first class of young men until his marriage in 1848. Towards the rebuilding of the chapel, in 1856, he contributed the sum of £1,000; and he likewise purchased a public-house, fronting the chapel, a few years ago, for £500, with a view to the erection of new schools on the site—a purpose which we feel sure his friends and fellow-worshippers will now be more anxious than ever to carry into effect. He was deeply attached to the faith he professed, which had not been taken up on trust, but made his own by careful thought and study, and he was ever ready to do what he could to recommend it and give it success. For many years, and up to the time of his death, he was treasurer to the Widows’ Fund, connected with the ministers of Lancashire and Cheshire, and to his excellent judgment and prudent management it is not a little indebted for the satisfactory condition in which it is placed.

Only three weeks ago, Mr. Heywood appeared in his usual vigorous health, and took an active part in the arrangements for the approaching political contest. The last occasion on which we met him was at the first committee meeting in Manchester of the friends of Mr. Peel and Mr. Thompson, when he spoke to us in his own cheery way of the rapid progress which the “good cause” had made of late, and augured hopefully of its future triumphs. He was in his usual place at chapel on Sunday, the 4th instant; but afterwards caught a severe cold, which, growing worse, on Thursday last confined him to his room, and early on Tuesday morning he calmly and peacefully passed away.

A good man, whose work has been well and faithfully done, has gone to his rest, and for this we should not grieve; but we cannot help feeling sad to think that the pleasant face and kindly voice, which did so much to enliven our meetings and cheer us on in our good work, will be seen and heard there no more. We can only pray that others equally true-hearted and devout may be raised up to fill the places of those whom we have recently lost, who will “our failing ranks renew.”

THE BISHOPS.

(From the Pall Mall Gazette.)

BISHOPS are having just now a very hard time of it. They are, on the one hand, exalted by a particular school into ineffable functionaries, who are the divinely-appointed channels through which flow all manner of graces to such persons as Mr. Purchas and Mr. Purchas’s congregation. It is indeed awful to reflect that the whole system of which the Ritualists and their allies are the zealous expounders would utterly collapse if it were to be satisfactorily established that Archbishop Parker’s consecration was incomplete, or if a short Act of Parliament were passed providing that in future the bishops should be appointed by letters patent, and that the form of consecration now in use should be discontinued—a method of putting an end to Ritualism like snipping a wasp in two at the thin part, which was proposed with a good deal of grim humour some time ago by a writer in Fraser’s Magazine. Whilst the small knot of gentlemen on the vigour of whose supernatural functions so much depends are thus raised into quasi-divinities, on the one hand, by those on whom they are supposed to confer their principal benefits, they are exposed, on the other hand, like other idols, to a good deal of obfuscation as well. The Ritualists treat their bishops much as Italian brigands are always said to treat their Madonnas. They worship and they whip them with equal vigour. Bishops are dear, but toys with unintelligible names intended for equally unintelligible purposes are still dearer, and if the two come into collision the bishops get the worst of it. The way in which Mr. Purchas set his bishop at defiance, and appealed against him to that wicked but good-natured and convenient guardian, the law of England, is fresh in the minds of all our readers, and we need not dwell upon it. We heartily wish Mr. Purchas and all who may have to take part in his appeal joy of their work.

Whilst the Bishop of Chichester in the south-east is engaged with Mr. Purchas, who again has brought down on the people of Brighton a visitation from Dr. Cumming, the Bishop of Chester in the north-west is issuing exhortations against the Ritualists, which show that he, too, has his Scylla and Charybdis requiring careful steering, and no doubt producing sufficient anxiety. There is something almost grotesque in the enumeration by the bishop of the right-hand defections and left-hand fallings off which disturb his mind and the decency of his diocese. The Ritualists have actually "allowed themselves to speak as if our national Christianity was to be dated from the arrival of the monk Augustine. They forget the presumptive evidence which most impartial writers had recognised of the knowledge of the gospel having reached Britain more or less directly from the east, and not through Rome. They ignored the time little, if at all, short of five centuries of a church which had her martyrs in the persecution of Diocletian, and which was represented by three bishops in three councils." If the Ritualists had never done anything worse than "ignore" the rights and the wrongs of an insoluble and unimportant historical problem about the state of things which existed in these islands 1,300 or 1,400 years ago, few people would care much about them. But this is not all. They use the word "mass" for the communion, which has Popish associations, and, worse than this, they have actually altered the language which they once employed upon these subjects. "There was a time when they were assured that the real super-local presence in the Holy Sacrament was a doctrine taught in their formula; now they were called upon to acknowledge a local objective presence." It is awful to think of. We have got all the way from "real super-local" to "local objective." We used to be told that flesh and blood were really super-locally present on a given occasion. We are now told that bread and wine are flesh and blood. As far as we can judge, the change is simply one from nonsense confessed to falsehood ready upon inquiry to resolve itself into nonsense. The bishop appears to be comparatively tolerant of the first, but to object to the second. On the other hand, the Evangelical clergy are nearly as bad as the "local objective" party. They do not warn people of fast days. "The bread and wine were placed on the holy table by other hands and at another time than was enjoined by the Rubric." Things are very bad on each side. There is something in the bishop's reproof to the Ritualists and their antagonists which reminds us of the lecture which Stephen Jones, in "Crabbe's Tales," received from his grandmother. Stephen, who had once been a very good boy, had fallen into bad company—

The matron told, as tidings sad,
What she had heard of her beloved lad;
How he to graceless, wicked men gave heed,
And wicked books would night and morning read.
Some former lectures she again began,
And begged attention of her little man;
She brought, with many a pious boast, in view
His former studies, and condemn'd the new:
Once he the names of saints and patriarchs old,
Judges and kings, and chiefs and prophets, told;
Then he in winter nights the Bible took,
To count how often in the sacred book
The sacred name appear'd, and could rehearse
Which were the middle chapter, word, and verse,
The very letter in the middle placed,
And so employ'd the hours that others waste.

Stephen Jones's father interrupted his mother's sermon by giving his son a sound flogging, an inhibition of the most practical sort. If bishops are to be of any use, they should go and do likewise. A few lines of manly indignation directed not only against the childish displays which Ritualists love, but against the paltry and degrading superstition which they embody in various shapes would be a relief in a bishop's charge. It would be like opening the windows in a sick room, and letting in the fresh air. The Bishop of Chester, however, like his fellows, is far too much wrapped up in the moderation of the church, and its comprehensiveness, and the existence of various parties in it, to call a spade a spade. The lives of the greater part of the Episcopal bench are indeed devoted not merely to trimming, but to preaching to mankind at large, both by precept and by example, that there is in the whole world no process so admirable, so holy and blessed, as trimming. Whatever we do, let us never sacrifice the comprehensiveness of the Church; let us recollect that it is many-sided, that it represents different schools of thought, that it must on no account be allowed to fall into the hands of one party or to be narrowed to the views of a particular school. This continual anxiety to offend nobody becomes at last exceedingly tiresome. Are we never to have any decided straightforward common sense from the Bishops? If not, they have failed. Their pretensions to be spiritual leaders are mere nonsense. They cannot lead at all, but only trim and beg people of more vigorous ways of thought to behave themselves with decency; and if this is really the result at which we are compelled to arrive, the conclusion is too obvious and too unpleasant to be insisted upon. We all know what becomes, sooner or later, of people who push themselves into places of which they cannot discharge the duties.

A THEATRE SERVICE.

ON Sunday evening last, I was induced to visit the New East London Theatre, better known as the "Effingham Saloon," by the announcement that "Miss M. Harris" would describe her "eight hours' vision of heaven." Her address was delivered under the auspices of the East London Mission, which, under the superintendence of the Rev. W. Booth, professes to preach to the canaille of the district. Let me premise that I was not prejudiced in favour of this Mission. Its startling directions to "Prepare to meet thy God," ad nauseum, had not biased me to regard such labours as judicious, and my religious and aesthetic perceptions did not dispose me to cast in my lot with them, or to believe in the worth of their services.

I was at the theatre before the hour fixed, and found some 2,500 persons already assembled, mostly men; not less than this number of persons had been drawn together long before the time appointed to worship God, or hear the addresses. Certainly the motives which led to the congregating of this enormous mass of human beings could not be such as lead so many of the educated classes to more fashionable places of worship, for here, alas, was no rich apparel or handsome profiles to be displayed, to the contempt of God, and the admiration of self. The audience was of the very lowest class, and, excepting in behaviour, presented little to attract. From first to last, this vast collection of the "swinish multitude" behaved in the most orderly and devout manner, seeming thoroughly to enjoy singing the Revivalist hymns, and to enter in great part into the passionate fervour of the prayers. The reading of the Bible was attentively listened to, and some seemed surprised that the Book contained such good things.

The attention of the audience was thoroughly aroused, and from the beginning to the close of the service there were few that I saw inattentive, and none undevout, at least in comparison with most Christian congregations. In the introductory address there were, beneath much rubbish and verbiage, many gleams of reason, and a rich type of Christian belief.

Miss Harris, however, proved no ordinary woman. Her "vision," in whatever light it be regarded, showed that her mind is of no common order. It was listened to with profound silence, and left an impression on the hearers most favourable to religious emotions. She had, she said, been a great sufferer; for seven years she lay upon a sick bed, subject to fits; for four years of this period she was blind of one eye, and never for the seven years free from fits, or able to leave her bedroom. She lived at that time at Harrow-on-the-Hill, and the Methodists held occasional meetings in her chamber. At the close of a blessed service, she beheld a beautiful cliff, and the form of a departed friend appeared. He took her by the hand, and led her towards the gate of heaven, which at last appeared in view, and seemed of one piece. She wondered how it could ever be opened; but on her guide touching it, it immediately opened, and she then, as she believes, entered heaven. There were rows of streets, but she could see through a great part of the city. As she entered, she wished to see the Saviour; and no sooner had she formed this wish than Jesus appeared, standing at the right of the throne of God, with "crowns" in his hand. He appeared so beautiful that she could not withdraw her gaze for a long time, and she observed that his wounds bled occasionally. This surprised her, till her companion told her that the unfaithfulness of Christ's Church caused those blessed wounds to bleed afresh. As His wounds bled the Saviour smiled, and never till then did she conceive rightly of the depth of His love for man, or of the baseness of sin. The singing of the heavenly host, who were all of one height, was surpassingly beautiful, and she tried to join in it, but the song was unintelligible to her, all of it that she could understand being "the blood of the Lamb." Whenever she desired to see anyone—Wesley or any other, immediately that person appeared to her senses—a coincidence it will be remembered with the teaching of Swedenborg, of whom she can scarcely have heard.

After more of this kind, she proceeded to state that her companion assured her that she would soon be restored to health, and when she returned to consciousness she learned that for the space of eight hours her eyes had remained fixed upon one object, while she had been quite oblivious of all earthly affairs, and that for fifty minutes her arm had been raised in the air. All that her companion had predicted came to pass, and within a short time after her restoration to consciousness.

I have referred to this curious address less for its merit, which to me appeared considerable, than to express the conviction with which I left the assembly—that a great work is being done, and that by such agencies the living bread of heaven is carried to those most in want of its sustaining life, and because I think that if the right representative man were forthcoming, as great a multitude would gather among the poor and destitute to listen to the healthier doctrines of Christian Unitarianism, if the salvation of these perishing classes be deemed worth attempting.

T. C.

AN ELECTION SQUABBLE IN 1734.

THE following letter has been handed to us by a correspondent. In itself it is a curiosity. It throws some light on election matters 130 years ago, especially in relation to Dissenters. The scene is at Dean Row, in the parish of Wilmslow, Cheshire:—"From Wednesday Ap. 3rd to Wednesday Ap. 10th. 1734.

"To the Author of a malicious Reflexion upon the Minister of Dean Row, published in Adam's Courant, March 27th, 1734.

Sir,—I've read yours wherein you lay this to my charge—that I spoke what follows to one of my Communicants. "Friend Isaac, if you refuse to vote for Sir R—t Co—n, you shall be excluded from the Lord's Supper and be turned out of my congregation," and afterwards, on that account, heap a great many vile Reflexions upon me. Now—the chief fault I find with this, which according to the Tories is but a small one, a mere Peccadillo—is that there is not one word of truth in it, from the beginning to the end. The whole of it is a Lie, an abominable Lie, a Spiteful, Malicious Lie; and the worst thing I can say of it (and that truly) 'tis a Tory Lie. Now as I am once again oblig'd to assert my Innocence, I do it here with an Easy Conscience, a Pleasant Cheerfulness, in the Presence of a God of Faithfulness and Truth, who will shortly not only be my Judge, but yours.

"I solemnly affirm that I never said the aforementioned Words laid to my Charge, nor any thing that look'd like them—nay I solemnly appeal to the Searcher of Hearts (as ever I hope for Mercy at the great, the opening day,) I never once entertained a thought that look'd that way. If the thing can be prov'd, why was it not, by the affidavit of the Person you mention'd, taken before one or more of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace—why do you not either prove your Accusation or Recant? As the first is an Impossibility except by Knights of the Post: as I'm afraid the latter is. For if Appelles was alive again, the most surprising Piece he could paint wou'd be a Tory Blushing. I'm apt to think it's not in Rerum Natura. A Tory after all the Villainies he had committed is like the whore xxx Prov. 20 who 'wipeth her Mouth and says I've done no Wickedness.' Above all transgressors I know, they are most like those vi Jeremiah 15 cannot Blush. I'm yet willing to say, as in a letter Writ to a certain Nobleman, that if the Charge can be prov'd against me in one Single instance, whether in an Isaac or in an Ishmael, I'll forfeit the hand I now write with. Give me leave then to use some thing more than an humble boldness, while I tell you, that tho' the Devil might help to contrive this Lie, you, as his faithful Servant, help'd to promote it, for my Bible assures me that both Lies and Lyers are of the Devil. viii John 44.

"Indulge me then a little whilst I tell you a Truth, which perhaps may be something Troublesome to you, that in the late King George's Reign of Blessed Memory, I took the number of the Votes in my Congregation and then had above one hundred and Forty. Since that time several are Dead, but few Estates are sold for want of Heirs and amongst the very many that through mercy are left, I have not (according as I now best Remember) hear of any but one, that is inclined to Vote for Mr. C—y and Mr. C—n, and till the next Election be over, I cannot tell but he may be Misrepresented, but still he is not nor ever was a Communicant with us. We are all (as far as I know) very zealous the other way, I mean for the good old cause, are Careful Volunteers in that Service, and need not be press'd into it by Death and Damnation.

"Truly, Sir, I do not love a fiery hot Dissenter, that would condemn any of the Establishment for their Religious Principles. I hate a Bigot as I do a Persecutor in all shapes, of all sizes, and agreeable to this, I boldly affirm that I have ever practis'd, for I would sooner Die, than deprive any person of the Privilege of the Lord's Supper, only for the sake of an Election. The Thing is a shock upon my Nature and Abominably Loathsome to me, as all that know me will readily Witness. Thus I think all Conscientious Dissenters ought to vote for those candidates, who were against Schism Bill and for the Act of Toleration—otherwise they would not act Consistent with their own Principles. Now upon the whole, what must I say in Respect to yourself? I find in Jude 9 v. and cxx. Psalm 2, 'tis no Railing Accusation to say 'The Lord Rebuke thee, what shall be done unto thee, O thou false Tongue!' Without believing in Purgatory, I'm well assur'd there are only two Different States, viz., Heaven and Hell, and though 'secret things belong unto God,' yet revealed Things belong unto us. I once again take up my Bible and there I find Lyars are put into the Bill of Exclusion from the Kingdom of Heaven xxii. Rev. 15. 'There shall in no wise enter into it, he that loveth and maketh a Lie,' and with Respect to the other places, I find in xxi. Rev. 8 v., 'All Lyars shall have their part in the Lake that Burneth with Fire and Brimstone.' So that I may now, at last, venture to say what I wrote to a certain Nobleman, stands as it was, i.e., I have no ways acted inconsistent with my letter to his Lords—p, you so often refer to. I'm still of the same mind, viz., no Nobleman, no Clergyman, no person whatever has a Right to Lord it over the Consciences of others. May God give you Repentance and Pardon! But let us pray again before we part. God bless King George and all his Royal Family, upon him let the Crown flourish! but Cloath thou his Enemies with shame, O Lord. Let me conclude with Part of my Litany—From High Church Zeal, a Lying Tongue, a Tory Parliament, and a Popish Pretender, Libera Nos, Domine, Good Lord deliver all Honest Men, and amongst them "H. WORTHINGTON."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

TOO LATE.

ELIZABETH D. CROSS.

We have beheld the stern sad face
That men call Fate;
And we have known the kind and fair,
That comes too late.

Have we not seen the sunny sky
After the rain?
But the pale lily by the storm laid low
Rise not again?

The dear light sudden shining from the shore,
For them that roam,
Too late—the good ship strike and sink,
In sight of home?

The perfect work, after long years of pain,
The expectant glow—
The great heart broken, waiting for the praise
That came, too slow?

The cup of costly wine pressed to pale lips,
Fainting for lack,
Too late—an eager hand stretched quick to take,
In death fall back?

The little word of truth so long delayed,
Spoken at last,
But with no power to heal the cruel wound,
Poisoning the past?

The long night cease—dawn break—but on closed eyes,
Too tired to wait—

The love that could have saved from worse than death,
Come, but too late?

WITCHCRAFT.—IV.

In all the stories nearly, vestiges of paganism may be found. The three principal witch gatherings of the year were held on the days of great pagan festivals, which were afterwards adopted by the Church. Maury supposes the "witches' Sabbath" to be derived, though this does not seem probable, from the rites of Bacchus Sabazius, and accounts thus for the Devil's taking the shape of a he-goat. Bodin regards him as identical with Pan; and in both the Teutonic and Celtic mythology there were certain hairy wood demons, called in the latter Dus, and in the former Serat. Our Deuce (as when we say Deuce take it), and Old Scratch are plainly derived from these, and Old Harry may only be a corruption of Old Hairy. Here we have evidently the source of the cloven hoof. The belief in the Devil's appearing to his worshippers as a goat is very old; and the fact that this animal was sacred to Thor may explain it. Certain it is that the traditions of Vulcan, Thor, and Wayland converged at last in Satan. Like Vulcan, he was hurled from heaven, and like him he still limps across the stage in Mephistopheles, though without knowing why. In Germany he has horse's foot, because the horse was a frequent pagan sacrifice, and therefore associated with Devil worship when Christianity began to prevail. The Saxon horse, we know, was sacred to Woden; one of his names was Nikkar, whence our Old Nick; the raven was also his peculiar bird, and this may account for the witch's familiar appearing so often in that shape, though the association of the Evil One with the raven is older, as is shown by a passage in the apocryphal gospel of the "Infancy," when the demoniac son of the Chief Priest puts on his head one of the swaddling-clothes of Christ, which Mary had hung out to dry, and forthwith "the devils began to come out of his mouth and to fly away as crows and serpents."

As the system gradually perfected itself among the least imaginative of men, as the superstitious are apt to be, they could do nothing better than describe Satan's world as in all respects the reverse of that which orthodoxy conceived as divine. So sometimes the witches were baptized anew; sometimes they renounced the Virgin. If the Ave-Mary bell chanced to ring as the demon was carrying home his witch, he was obliged to let her drop. In the confession of Agnes Simpson the meeting place was North Berwick Kirk. "The Devil started up himself in the pulpit, like a meikle black man, and calling the row [roll] every one answered Here. At his command they opened up three graves, and cutted off from the dead corpses the joints of their fingers, toes and nose, and parted them amongst them, and the said Agnes Simpson got for her part a winding-sheet and two joints. The Devil commanded them to keep the joints upon them while [till] they were dry, and then to make powder of them to do evil withal." This confession is sadly memorable, for it was made before James I., then king of Scots, and convinced him of the reality of witchcraft. Hence the Act passed in the first year of his reign in England, and not repealed till 1736, under which, and perhaps in consequence of which, so many poor creatures suffered.

There can be little doubt that the notion of these witch-gatherings was first suggested by secret meetings of persisting or relapsed pagans, or of heretics. Both, perhaps, contributed to it. Sometimes a mountain, sometimes an oak, that had been the scene of pagan rites, and later a wild heath, a place where two roads crossed, a cavern, a quarry, the gallows, or the churchyard, was the spot selected for their diabolic orgies. According to the confession of the Swedish children, before referred to, in 1670, "The diet they did use to have there was broth with colworts and bacon in it, oatmeal-bread spread with butter, milk, and cheese. Sometimes it tasted very well, sometimes very ill. After meals they went to dancing, and in the meanwhile swore and cursed most dreadfully, and afterwards went to fighting one with another." That the witch could be conveyed bodily to these meetings was admitted at first without question. But, as the husbands of accused persons sometimes testified that their wives had not left their beds on the alleged night of meeting, this was accounted for in various ways. Sometimes the devil imposed upon the husband by an ocular deception; sometimes a demon took the wife's place; sometimes the body was left, and the spirit only transported; but the most orthodox opinion was in favour of corporeal deportation. Bodin (in 1557) appeals triumphantly to the case of Habbakuk (in what was once part of the book of Daniel), and that of Philip in the book of Acts; and a later writer argues that as we know that good angels can transport men in the twinkling of an eye, it follows that evil ones may do the same. "No one," he says, "doubts about John Faust, who dwelt at Wittenberg, in the time of the sainted Luther, and who, seating himself on his cloak with his companions, was conveyed away and borne by the Devil through the air to distant kingdoms." Our countryman, Aubrey, too (in 1696), held the same opinion, and tells us that a gentleman of his acquaintance "was in Portugal anno 1655, when one was burnt by the Inquisition for being brought thither from Goa, in East India, in the air, in an incredible short time." Glanvil, "Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty, and Fellow of the Royal Society," (in 1689), inclines rather to the spiritual hypothesis, and suggests that "the Witch's anointing herself before she takes her flight, may perhaps keep her body tenable, and in fit disposition to receive the spirit at its return." As to the conveyance of witches through crevices, key holes, and the like, the juriconsult, Walburger (in 1670) gives grave reasons for supposing that they are deluded by the Devil, and that he makes them fancy that they take the form of flies, cats, locusts, &c., while in reality he goes hidden before them, and opens a way for their passage.

Grimm says he does not know when broomsticks, spits, and similar articles were first assumed to be the canonical instruments for this riding by night; but its origin is not hard to explain. The poor old crones, badgered by inquisitors into confessing that they had been where they never were, had next to tell how they got there. The only steed their parents had been rich enough to keep had been of the domestic sort, their father's staff, or something of the kind, which they had bestriden as children, imagining themselves the grand dames they sometimes saw flash by. Forced to give a how, and unable to conceive of mounting the air without something to sustain them, their bewildered wits naturally took refuge in some such simple subterfuge, and the broomstick was the first that came to hand. If youth and good spirits could put such life into a dead staff once, why not age and evil spirits now? According to some of the Scotch stories, the witch, after bestriding her inexpensive steed, must repeat the magic formula, Horse and Hattock! The flitting of these ill-omened nightbirds, like most of the superstitions relating to witchcraft, mingles with and is lost in a throng of figures, more august. Diana, Bertha, Holda, Abundia, Befana, once beautiful and divine, the bringers of blessings while men slept, became demons haunting the darkness with terror and ominous suggestion. The process of disenchantment must have been a long one, and none can say how soon it became complete.

MAKING THE BEST OF IT.—II.

We have heard very much of the lack of education in this land. We have heard that in every one of our large towns immense numbers of children do not go to school; this is synonymous with saying they cannot read or write. It is not only so in the overgrown centres of population, there is woeful ignorance in the rural districts. Indeed, the ignorance there is more awful than that of towns; in country villages there is often an absence of intelligence which is truly horrifying.

This state of things calls for prompt remedy and for radical cure. Innumerable remedies are proposed. Moral and legislative influence will be brought to bear in this great matter. The brain of this nation, still sound, will find a real solution of the question of education, and we have good reason not to despair. We may properly hope that we shall live to see a far more encouraging state of general intelligence among the people of England than is now visible.

With regard to this subject, no truth is profounder than this—education is an individual concern. Colleges are useless, and professors are imbecile, and books are dumb, apart from personal endeavour on a man's own part to acquire knowledge. No law can force people to be educated. No compulsion is omnipotent here. The motive must come from within.

These are plain and simple truths; and from them it clearly follows that a man may educate himself, if he will. The most hardworking man has some time in the evenings and on Sundays, which he might spend to great profit in trying to learn something of reading, writing, arithmetic, the sciences, history, poetry, &c. The humblest man is not shut out from any of the subjects of study; he may prosecute them all; and it would be well for him if he did. The taste for knowledge is a pure taste. It is better to have a habit of study than a habit of beer-drinking or card-playing. Education—the attempt to instruct one's self—saves from many snares, and elevates a man, and does him real good.

Let us try to make the best of it in this matter of education. We can all educate ourselves, if we perceive the importance of the thing, and make up our minds to do something towards gaining knowledge. Some of us may have to study under difficulties; but no matter; if we are in earnest, we shall overcome the difficulties, and be all the better for the struggle. I firmly believe in this personal effort of a man, whoever he may be, to get knowledge for himself. Much is said about compulsory education; and, no doubt, that is one way of meeting the difficulty, and it may be a blessing to the land when it is worked out in fact; but no law can ever do away with the necessity of each man being personally interested in the matter, and doing what he can to learn for himself, and then endeavouring to teach his children, or, at least, knowing the advantage of possessing knowledge, to see that the children are regularly sent to those who can teach them.

Make the best use of it! Why, it is a universal motto! The man who habitually tries to make the best of his circumstances is, in reality, the only happy man—the only man whose lot is worthy of other men's envy. It is of no use making the worst of it; that is clear. Well, let every one who reads these lines make the best of his opportunity in the direction of personal education. He will find it a living inspiration to him, and a perpetual joy; and it will make him more useful to his fellow-creatures than he can be without it. IRENE.

FLOWERS FROM PERSIAN GARDENS.—No. XI.

THE poor man whose end is good is better than the king whose end is evil.

The sorrow which thou bearest before enjoyment is better than the enjoyment which precedes sorrow.

A holy man in his prayers was wont to say: "O God, have mercy on the bad, for on the good Thou hast already had mercy, in that Thou hast created them good."

Fereedoon ordered his Chinese embroiderers to embroider around his pavilion: "Thou who art of an understanding heart be good to the wicked, for the good are great and happy of themselves."

Two persons died, carrying with them vain regrets; he who had wealth which he never enjoyed, and he who had knowledge of which he made no use.

No one ever saw a man who had merit, but was miserly, that people did not expatiate on his faults; but if a generous man has two hundred defects, his generosity will cover them all.

The truly wise man practises humility; the bough full of fruit inclines its head towards the ground. It is in those of high estate that humility appears to most advantage; in the beggar it is only the mark of his profession.

I asked a wise man to give me a word of counsel. He said to me: "Take heed how you commit yourself with an ignorant man, for if you are possessed of knowledge you will become an ass, and if you are without knowledge your folly will become still greater."

He is not the brave man who in the battle overthrows another brave man. The brave man is he who in the moment of anger masters his passion.

Perchance thou mayst have seen in the garden, or on the foot of a hillock, a small worm, which in the night shines like a lamp. Some one said to it: "O night-illuminating worm, what becomes of thee that thou never comest out during the day?" Hear what that little earth-born fiery worm replied: "In the day, as in the night, I am equally in the field; but I veil my lustre in the presence of the sun."

One Thou exaltest, and givest him dominion; another Thou castest as food to the fishes. One Thou enrichest with treasure like Karoon; another Thou feedest with the bread of affliction. Nor is that a proof of Thy love, or this of Thy hatred; for Thou, the Creator of the world, knowest what is fit for each. Thou assignest to each man his high or low estate; and how shall I describe Thee? THOU ART WHAT THOU ART.

A REASON FOR DRINKING.

THERE have been a great variety of excuses for drinking, but we know of none more thoroughly Irish than this which we meet with in Nassau Senior's recently published Notes. "I reproved," said Bishop — to me, "one of my neighbours in Cork, a respectable man, for having been found drunk in the street." "Sure," he said, "my Lord, it was my wife's wake—would I not get drunk in her honour?"

INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM: "HOSPITAL SUNDAY."—The annual collections at every Unitarian place of worship in the town, for the benefit of the local charities, took place on Sunday last, the General Hospital being the object this year. The following are the amounts collected at the Unitarian chapels:—Old Meeting House, £22. 10s. 8d.; Church of the Messiah, £105. 9s. 1d.; Newhall Hill, £16. 11s. 1d.; Lawrence-street Mission Chapel, £2. 12s.; Free Christian Society, £4. 2s. 6d. No report has been received from Hurst-street Chapel.

DERBY.—The Friargate penny readings (held in the schoolroom of the Unitarian Chapel) were resumed last Saturday evening, when a large audience filled the room. The Rev. William Oates presided, and after a hymn had been sung, made a few encouraging remarks. A long programme was then gone through, including vocal, pianoforte, and flute pieces of music; several didactic and pathetic recitations, with humorous readings from Dickens and other popular authors, all of which were well rendered and received with applause. A very pleasant entertainment was thus given, which the chairman closed with prayer.

KENTISH TOWN, LONDON.—The second course of "penny readings," conducted by members of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, commenced at the Milton Hall, on Tuesday, the 6th inst., with an inaugural tea meeting, which was largely attended. The entertainment which followed, and also those of the succeeding Tuesday evenings, have been, and promise to be, a great success, there being between 500 and 600 persons present.

MANCHESTER: LOWER MOSLEY STREET SCHOOLS. On Sunday morning last, the annual sermon in behalf of these schools was preached in Cross-street chapel, by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A. In the evening Mr. Gaskell delivered an address to the children and their parents. The collections amounted to £104. 3s. 1d.

NOTTINGHAM: HIGH PAYMENT.—On Sunday last, the 18th instant, the anniversary sermons of these schools were preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, of Banbridge, Ireland. In the afternoon of the same day, a large meeting of the present and past teachers, numbering nearly one hundred, was held to present addresses to Mr. William Enfield and Mr. William Richards. Mr. Enfield, who has been connected with the schools for upwards of fifty years, has recently resigned, through illness, his office as teacher of the first class; and Mr. Richards, who has been connected with the schools for upwards of 32 years, has also recently resigned his office as one of the superintendents. Mr. Gill, the senior superintendent, presided, and in a few appropriate introductory remarks, called upon Mr. Collinson, one of the teachers, to read the addresses, and he presented the same.—Mr. Enfield and Mr. Richer is feelingly thanked the teachers, and spoke of the great advantages of Sunday schools, and urged the teachers now engaged in the schools to persevere in their labours.—Messrs. R. Enfield, C. Perry, and R. Keating (formerly a teacher in the schools) also addressed the meeting.—The addresses, which were beautiful specimens of the art of illumination, were prepared by Mr. Collinson.

PAISLEY.—Last Sunday evening, the Rev. H. W. Crosskey concluded a series of three discourses in the Unitarian Chapel here. They were well attended, and the people seemed very earnest and attentive.

ROTHERHAM: The late Francis Brettell, who died October 22nd, 1868, aged 38 years, was the third son of the late Rev. Jacob Brettell, for 43 years Unitarian minister, Rotherham. He was painfully afflicted from birth, and, on account of some spinal affection, it is supposed his growth became totally stunted about his fourth year, so that at his death the number of his years literally exceeded the number of the inches of his height. His mental faculties were mercifully preserved to him, unaffected by his physical infirmities, and to the last his mind was singularly bright and active. He inherited his father's taste for classical study and poetic composition,—in the latter displaying astonishing facility, and was known for miles round as an excellent teacher of phonography. With his diminutive and feeble frame propped up on crutches, he was always to be found at his post in the shop, his little hands working away at the type and paper, or otherwise employed in his brother's stationery business. He was a wonderful lesson of happy faithfulness. His disposition was unselfish, uncomplaining, and constantly cheerful, though he was subject to periodical attacks of distressing illness. There was a fond affection in his heart for the chapel and his father's faith, and he loved nothing better than to pore over the verses of the Greek Testament. His name will be long kindly remembered in the congregation and town, and many old friends of his father, at a distance, will hear with regret of the departure at last of one whose unexampled lot they have frequently helped to cheer and comfort with true Unitarian generosity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors. No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of every letter must append his name for publication.

W. S. P.—We are unwilling at present to admit a correspondence on the subject which you commence. S. S.—Next week.

DISESTABLISHMENT OR NOT?

To the Editors.—In commenting on my plea for maintaining the present relation between Church and State, you inquire why a disestablished Church should necessarily be, as I believe it will be, narrower and more bigoted than the Church which now exists. My answer is, because it will be freed from State control. It will be no longer the Church of the nation. It will, as I have said, be free to make its own laws, and dictate terms of membership, with no more interference on the part of the State than any voluntary association. If it have not this freedom, it will not be disestablished.

For the truth is, establishment is nothing more nor less than the entire subjection of the Church to the national will. It does not consist of "peculiar State privileges." It consists in the fact that the Church is governed by the nation. Any "peculiar privileges" that may co-exist with establishment—as, for instance, the right of bishops to sit in the House of Lords—the nation may take away, and the Church remain established none the less. It is only when the nation gives up its rights over the Church and leaves it to follow its own devices that disestablishment takes place.

If, then, the Church, when disestablished, should prove itself, as you expect, no less liberal than before, it must be because the bonds of a common faith are as little exclusive as those of a common nationality. How entirely this is contradicted by ordinary experience I need not surely be at much pains to prove. You yourself bear witness that the action of the State, whether through the Legislature or the Court of Chancery, has uniformly been to broaden religious trusts and not to narrow them. And this is precisely what might have been expected. The nation at large has clearly no interest but to put the most liberal interpretation upon every trust. It is only a sect or party in the nation that can have any interest to the contrary.

Now the government of the Church is at present vested in the whole nation. How will it be when the nation has renounced that trust? Let us take a practical instance. As matters stand at present, we Unitarians have a right, no less than Churchmen, to protest, say against the Athanasian Creed, and urge upon the Legislature that it should be struck out of the services of the church; nor do I think it altogether Utopian to expect that this will one day be done. But if the Church be disestablished the Legislature will have no more power to remove the Athanasian Creed from their prayer-book than to insert it in ours; the Church itself will do in the matter just what it thinks fit. Or, again, to take the case of restrictions on the clergy which you consider to be mischievous,—those, namely, which prevent them preaching from Non-conformist pulpits; there is no reason why you should not agitate for the removal of these and try if you can turn public opinion in your favour. But if you allow the Church to be disestablished you will have no claim to be heard. The Church will then be sole arbiter whether she shall relax the rule or not; and if, perchance, she allows her clergy to officiate in the chapels of one or two orthodox sects I fear it would not be in those where the greatest amount of freedom is allowed.

I must own I cannot understand the confidence you seem to entertain that the clergy and congregations of the disestablished Church would be as independent as at present. What cries do we not hear in the air even now? "Down with Ritualism!" shouts the Times; "incense is an abomination," "Colenso is deposed," exclaim the bishops, though the law says he is not. "Essayists and Reviewers, avant," cries the Record; "these men have no business in the Church." Every man wants to paint the whole Church over in one uniform coat of his own colour, and will not the majority when they have the power, combine against everything at all exceptional?

But I would not overlook another aspect of the question which, as you truly say, is the most important of all. It is not enough to attain theological freedom, if we have not theological honesty as well. This, gentlemen, I most fully admit; even more, I would earnestly insist upon it. And since the nation are trustees for the national Church, and we are members of the nation, I hold it is incumbent upon us as upon all men—upon Dissenters as upon Churchmen, and upon laymen no less than on clergymen, to consider what changes must be made that the position of a rational and thinking clergy may be made free from every taint of dishonesty or prevarication. For I must say I have often thought on hearing the clergy reproached with insincerity, whose fault is it that they dare not be sincere? The great mass of laymen are apathetic about Church matters. They sneer at the conventional theology and bad logic which they hear on Sundays from their parson, but never think of asking him in private to justify what he has said or explain to them what he means. Perhaps they consider that this would be a cruelty; perhaps they say to themselves, "O, he must talk that way." Are not such men accomplices in the insincerity? For if educated men will not use their influence to encourage sincere speaking on the part of the clergy, the uneducated will assuredly use theirs to prevent it. Their prejudices are against anything newfangled,—anything that has not the old, orthodox ring to which they have always been accustomed. It is their influence, even more than that of creeds and articles, which cramps the liberties of the clergy, and it is their influence that keeps creeds and articles where they are. Nor do I see how that influence should be less in a disestablished Church than it is in the Church that now exists. I am not aware that the members of un-established Churches are, as a rule, less prone to persecute their ministers for speaking what they honestly think right than those of the Church of England.

If, then, we are solicitous for the honesty of the clergy, let us not deprive the State of all power to enlarge their liberties and to protect the conscientious from the attacks of mere ignorance and prejudice.

Craving your indulgence for the length to which this letter has run,—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

JAMES GAIRDNER.

78, Delancey-street, London, N.W.,
24th October, 1868.

THE COMING WEEK.

Hull.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. J. M. Dixon, on "Dr. Priestley."

London: KENTISH TOWN FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. Special services on Sunday morning and evening, by the Rev. J. C. Street.

Pennmaenmawr: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM. On Sunday, Rev. W. B. Hughes.

Stalybridge.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. James Black, M.A. Subject, "Jesus Christ."

Births.

HARBEN.—On the 22nd inst., at 6, Barford-street, Liverpool Road, London, N., the wife of Mr. Frederick Harben of a daughter.

THOMAS.—On the 22nd inst., the wife of the Rev. W. Thomas, M.A., Llwynrhydyowen, Cardiganshire, of a son.

WARD.—On the 17th inst., at Idle, near Leeds, the wife of Mr. William Ward of a son.

Marriages.

HOOPER—GROSE.—On the 10th inst., at Christ Church, Devonport, by the Rev. T. W. Freckleton, Annie, eldest daughter of Mr. H. Grose, Devonport, to Mr. G. L. Hooper, of London.

INGHAM—CROOK.—On the 19th inst., at Bank-street Chapel, Bolton, by the Rev. John Entwistle, Mr. William Ingham to Mrs. Ellen Crook.

PARKER—WRIGHT.—On the 25th inst., at the Great Meeting, Coventry, by the Rev. G. Heavside, B.A., Mr. William Parker to Miss Charlotte Wright, both of Coventry.

Deaths.

BRETTELL.—On the 22nd inst., aged 38 years, Francis Brettell, of Rotherham.

HEYWOOD.—On the 27th inst., at his residence, the Pike, Bolton, Robert Heywood, Esq., in his 83rd year. No cards.

HOME PAGES.—A complete List of the Series, and also of the Tract Covers, with prices, &c., will be forwarded on application.—All orders must now be addressed to Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, Manchester.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Chestnut Hill, at his printing-office, No. 8, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, October 30, 1868.

Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY

REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 393.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing.....	356
What is saying on Church Matters.....	356
Old Testament Chapters for the Sunday Schools.—XXVIII.	357
A Sermon.....	357
The Spiritualists.....	358
Religious Injustice.....	358
The late Robert Heywood, Esq.....	359
Working Men and the Church.....	359
The Spirit of System.....	360
Rev. William Bruce.....	360
Fire-side Readings: The Power of the Dead.....	360
Witchcraft.—V.....	360
Touching Fidelity.....	361
Western Christian Union.....	361
Ministers' Benevolent Society.....	361
Portsmouth.....	361
Intelligence: Birmingham, Derby, Halifax, Manchester, Stockton-on-Tees.....	362
Correspondence.....	362

Sending Stamps for orders for short advertisements, parties must reckon the words for the first line, and eight words for each succeeding line. In cases where the amount sent is insufficient, we leave out unnecessary words to reduce the advertisement.

CHARGE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.
Ten lines and under.....	6d. a line.
After the first ten lines.....	5d. a line.
For 6 consecutive insertions, a reduction of 25 per cent.
Half column.....	1s. 6s. 0d.
A whole column.....	2s. 10s. 0d.
A whole page.....	5s. 5s. 0d.

Post-office Orders to be made payable to Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS 74, Market-street, Manchester, to whom all orders and business communications should be addressed.

HUNSLET UNITARIAN NEW CHURCH.

The public are respectfully informed that a BAZAAR of Useful and Ornamental Articles will be held on Monday and Tuesday, November 9th and 10th (Leeds Fair Days), in the Mill Hill Congregational Hall, Park Row, Leeds. Professor Tasker's Singing Nightingale will be exhibited. Toetropes, Electrical and Galvanic Apparatus, and various other Bazaar amusements will be provided. Music at intervals. From six o'clock until ten, Selections of Music will be given by an efficient choir under the direction of Mr. J. Lancaster. Programmes to be had in the room. Tea each evening at five o'clock, one shilling. First-class refreshments throughout each of the days. Open from ten a.m. until ten p.m. Admission sixpence.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN will preach next Sunday, morning and evening.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH, POOLE.

The Congregation will be grateful for large or small Contributions in aid of their Building Fund. The total cost of the new church will be £1,200. The amount of subscriptions previously advertised, £269 18 6. Friends from Tavistock..... 0 10 0 Rev. W. J. Odgers, Bath..... 1 0 0 Mrs. Pearson..... 1 0 0 British and Foreign Unitarian Association..... 20 0 0 Subscriptions will be thankfully received by either of the following:

H. HAMILTON, Secretary.
A. BALSTON, Treasurer.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE APPEAL FOR EXTENDED EFFORTS AT HOME AND ABROAD.

DONATIONS TOWARDS THE EXTRA £1,000 FUND.
Amount advertised.....	£286 4 0
Fordham H., Royston.....	10 0 0
New Annual Subscriptions, advertised.....	61 7 0
Barley H., Dukinfield.....	0 10 0
Colville M. de, Rev. Stuttgart.....	0 10 0
Earle W., Birmingham, increased to.....	1 1 0
Harrop A., Dukinfield.....	0 5 0
Thackray Jas., York.....	0 5 0
Villar C., London.....	1 1 0
Winer E. J., Flaxton.....	0 10 0
Cooper Rev. Thos., Framlingham.....	0 5 0
Jones Rev. G., Selby.....	0 5 0

INDIAN FUND.

Donations and Subscriptions advertised.....	£257 2 0
Pache Rev. S.....	2 0 0
Swaine E., York.....	1 1 0
Macdonald Rev. A.....	0 10 0
Jones Mrs., Aberdare.....	0 5 0
Smith Rev. J. W., Ipswich.....	0 5 0
Jones Rev. George, Selby.....	0 5 0

Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, } Secretaries.
Rev. R. SPEARS, }

UNITARIAN CHURCH EXTENSION. AN IRON CHURCH FOR OSSETT.

William Smith, Esq., Chatham.....	21 1 0
Mrs. Holt, Liverpool.....	2 0 0
Mrs. Lator, Hamstead.....	0 5 0
T. H. Atkinson, Esq., Leeds.....	1 0 0
A Belfast Friend.....	2 0 0
Birmingham Fellowship Fund.....	5 0 0
William Conyers, Esq., Leeds.....	2 0 0
A Sailor's Widow.....	0 5 0
Collecting cards, Nos. 50-57.....	0 9 0
Collecting cards, Nos. 57-58.....	0 15 0
Subscriptions now acknowledged.....	196 12 8

Collecting cards can be had on application, and further particulars will be thankfully received, and forwarded to the Rev. G. D. W. N. BARNBY, Westgate Parsonage, Wakefield. About £20 more is required.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

WANTED, by a Lady of experience, an Engagement as GOVERNESS in a family. Highest references given.—Address C. L. A., Post-office, Chesterfield.

WANTED, a Situation as GOVERNESS. Resident or Daily. Can teach English, Music, Drawing, and the rudiments of French; four years reference from last situation.—Address, G. H., Herald office.

A LADY, accustomed to tuition, desires a Re-engagement, after Christmas, as RESIDENT GOVERNESS. She is qualified to teach the usual branches of English education, French, acquired in Paris, music, both piano and harmonium, and would devote herself to the general improvement of her pupils. References kindly permitted to the Rev. Brooke Herford, Manchester, Rev. J. Lettis Short, Sheffield, and to others, as may be desired.—Address, E. J., care of Mr. John Phillips, Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, Manchester.

A Widow with a Young Family, is anxious for Employment in DRESSMAKING or Upholstering Sewing.—C. G., 190, Chester Road, Manchester.

WANTED, by a Widow Lady with two children, residing near Alderley, a SERVANT-OF-ALL-WORK.—Apply to Rev. J. HARRUP, 75, Vine Grove, Hulme.

Mr. Harrop would be thankful for recommendations for the Manchester Infirmary and St. Mary's Hospital from any subscribers who may have such at their disposal.

OLLERENSHAW HALL, Whaley Bridge, Stockport.—The above residence will be Opened after Christmas as a Select Unitarian Boarding School for Young Ladies.—For terms, references, and further particulars, address, Mrs. EASTWOOD, Fern Bank, Huxton, Liverpool.

WYTHALL ACADEMY, ALVE-CHURCH, WORCESTERSHIRE.—Principal: C. du G. MAKEPEACE, M.A.—In this healthily-situated establishment Boarders can receive first-class instruction in English, Mathematics, Physics, and Ancient and Modern Classics. Gentlemanly education and the comforts of home. Unitarian Chapel conveniently near.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.

ALTERATION OF TRAINS, NOVEMBER, 1868.

6.30 a.m. Buxton to Derby, will be discontinued.
7.30 a.m. Buxton to Manchester, and 1.45 p.m. Manchester to Buxton, will be discontinued.
12.45 p.m. Manchester to Derby and London, will leave at 12.55 p.m.
4.50 p.m. Manchester to Buxton, will run through to Derby, call at Bakewell and Matlock Bath, and arrive at Derby in time for the Express to Nottingham, Leicester, and London, arriving at St. Pancras at 10.45 p.m.
6.20 p.m. Manchester to Derby, will stop at Bugworth.
12.25 p.m. Derby to Manchester, will discontinue stopping at Darley Dale, Hassop, and Hyde.
3.30 p.m. Derby to Manchester, will stop at Darley Dale.
6.45 p.m. Derby to Manchester, will leave at 7.0 p.m.
8.0 p.m. Buxton to Manchester, will leave at 9.0 p.m.

SUNDAYS.
The Trains running between Buxton and Miller's Dale in connection with the Main Line Trains between Manchester and Derby, will be discontinued.

The New St. Pancras Station, London, is now Open, and the Main Line Trains of the Company run to and from that Station, and are in connection at the Kentish Town Station with Trains from and to Moorgate-street, and the whole of the Metropolitan System.

A New and Improved Service of Express and Fast Trains has been established between London and Manchester, the Express Trains performing the journey in Five hours.

The following table shows the Train Service for NOVEMBER between MANCHESTER and LONDON:

	Fast.	Exp.
Manchester.....	a.m. a.m. a.m. p.m. p.m. p.m.
London (St. Pancras).....	arr. 12.0 1.30 2.45 4.0 6.30 8.30 10.45

	Fast.	Exp.
London (St. Pancras).....	a.m. a.m. a.m. a.m. p.m. p.m.
Manchester.....	arr. 12.15 2.40 2.40 3.0 5.0 8.0 9.40

SUNDAYS.

	Fast.	Exp.
Manchester.....	dep. 4.45
London (St. Pancras).....	arr. 10.0

Through Carriages run between Manchester and London by all Trains.
The Train leaving Manchester at 3.30 p.m., sets down Passengers from Manchester at Luton on Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Third-class Passengers are booked to London by Trains leaving Manchester at 6.55 a.m. and 12.55 p.m., arriving at St. Pancras at 1.30 and 6.30 p.m., respectively; and from St. Pancras to Manchester at 7.45 a.m. and 11.30 a.m., arriving at Manchester at 2.40 and 5.0 p.m., respectively.

JAMES ALLPORT, General Manager.

Derby, October, 1868.

THE "HOME PAGES" TRACT SERIES.

The whole series of 236 Tracts (with the exception of one or two of the earliest) are kept in Stock.

All orders must now be sent direct to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,

Higher Broughton, MANCHESTER.

PRICES.

Single Tracts.	Per dozen.	Per 100.
----------------	------------	----------

4 pp. Tracts.....	4d.	2s.
8 pp. ".....	1s.	4s.
12 pp. ".....	1s.	6s.

The whole series, well bound, in 4 volumes; for 10s., or free by post 11s.

In cases where the Tracts will have to be sent by post, a penny in the shilling must be added for postage.

Mr. Herford will be glad to forward, on application, a complete list of the "Home Pages" Tracts and Covers.

NEW EDITIONS

MEMOIR OF THE OF THE TRAVERS MADGE.

The first edition having been out of print since March last, and many requests having been made for it to be reprinted, A SECOND EDITION, SIMILAR TO THE FIRST,

1 vol., 12mo., cloth, limp, lettered, Price One Shilling and Sixpence, is now in the press, and will be issued at the beginning of December.

A BETTER EDITION will also be issued at the same time, larger in size, better paper, well bound, and with portrait.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

 Of this edition only a very limited number of copies will be prepared, according to the orders actually received for it.

In order to lessen as much as possible the expense and risk of this re-publication, Mr. Herford would be glad to have as many as possible ordered beforehand from himself, so as to save publishing charges upon a portion of the edition. Orders may therefore be sent at once, accompanied with stamps or Post-office order, to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,

Higher Broughton, Manchester.

By whom the book will be sent post free immediately on publication.

Price 1s.

A WORD FOR SCIENTIFIC THEOLOGY.

In Appeal from the Men of Science and the Theologians.

By JAMES MARTINEAU.

London: Williams and Norgate; Whitfield. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. Liverpool: Ellerbeck.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.

THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, compiled by JOSEPH LANCASTER.

Containing Tunes to all Martin's Hymns.

London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester: Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6, Commercial-street; and of all music and booksellers.

Congregations and choirs supplied at low rates.

DINNER SHERRY.

Quarter casks, £10. 10s.; Octaves, £5. 10s. nett.

C. J. HERFORD, 17A, Cooper-street.

WHITFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS, CASH and DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c.

Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.

WHITFIELD & SONS,

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

ABEL MORRALL'S EGG-EYED AND OTHER NEEDLES.

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS,

FURNISHING IRONMONGERS and CUTLERS, 23, SNOW HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

Have one of the best Stocks of useful Ironmongery in the Midland Counties.

"GO TO SPACKMAN, MERCHANT

CLOTHIER, HATTER, & OUTFITTER, BELFAST.

"For all you want in CLOTHING. I get all I possibly can from him myself. He has the largest, best, most fashionable, and cheapest Stock of READY-MADE CLOTHING in the WORLD."—Extract from a recommendation to an American friend visiting Europe, by Mr. Cook, the Great European and Transatlantic "Excursionist."

S. WHITFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS

of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application.

VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8, Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.

Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Beard.

COALS! COALS!!—NOTICE OF REMOVAL.—JAMES WELLS, Coal and Coke Merchant, Keeper Wharf, Ratcliffe, E. Office: 23, Coborn-street, Bow Road, E.

J. W. takes this opportunity of informing his numerous customers, friends, and the public generally, that he has REMOVED to the above address, where he hopes, by strict attention to business, to merit a continuance of their favours.

He would remind them that Coals are now at the lowest prices for the present season, and would advise them to purchase as soon as possible. A trial is solicited. Quality guaranteed. Best Wallendens, 23s. per ton; best Inlands, 23s. per ton for cash.—Orders by post punctually attended to.

CARLOWITZ,

22, PER DOZEN.

This excellent HUNGARIAN WINE is now greatly recommended for its nourishing and sustaining properties. As we import it direct from Hungary, without any intermediate agency, and bottle it under our own personal inspection, purchasers can rely upon its genuineness.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY, WINE MERCHANTS.

MANCHESTER.....26, Market-street.

Liverpool.....11, Lord-street.

Birmingham.....29, High-street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Letters from Madagascar state that a religious crisis seems likely to occur, as the Protestant missionaries are making great progress, a strong native party at present representing that profession of faith, even among the heads of the Government. The people are in expectation of a measure which, according to them, is imminent—namely, a conversion en masse to Protestantism.

The attack on the China missionaries at Yungchau, to which we referred in our last, appears to have been of a most outrageous character. About eight or ten thousand men rose in a mass, broke into the mission-house, and destroyed the whole of the property. The ladies belonging to the mission all more or less suffered from wounds and bruises, and the Rev. Mr. Reid had his eye so severely injured that there are serious doubts of his ever recovering his sight. The Chinese mob set fire to the house, and did all they could to burn the inmates out of it. They were driven to such extremities that they were forced to throw the children from the upper windows; and the ladies, one of them within a month of her confinement, were obliged to follow at the risk of their lives. The outrage was caused by the literary class, who spread a report to the effect that the missionaries boiled up children to use them for medicine. The authorities seem to have known of the difficulty fully a week beforehand, but instead of taking steps to prevent a breach of the peace, encouraged it by their indifference, if not actually by their connivance.

We have from Valparaiso an extraordinary account of the election of a patron saint to one of the churches there, which was concluded on the 6th of September. The Mercurio says the favourite candidate was "the Adorable Saviour of the World," who polled 19,946 votes; "the Most Holy Virgin" had 4,132; sundry odd saints put in a poor show, polling in the aggregate 384 votes. After the election a "Te Deum" was sung and a sermon pronounced in celebration of the joyful event.

As we suspected would be the case, the Pope's letter to the bishops of the Eastern Church, inviting them to the Ecumenical Council, has occasioned some warm debates among the Greek clergy at Constantinople. After the Patriarch had held several conferences to decide what reply should be returned, it was ultimately resolved by a large majority that the letter is an insult to the Eastern Church, and that it should not be answered at all. Upon this the Patriarch gave an audience on the 17th inst. to the Catholic Archbishop, Monsignor Hassoun, through whom the Pope's letter had been transmitted, and told him that he could not accept a letter written in such objectionable terms.

A curious contest on the religious difficulties in Austria took place not long ago between the Bishop and a printer of Passau. The latter edits an ultra-orthodox paper, the Donau Zeitung. The Bishop objected to the printer's ignorant and offensive excess of zeal, whereupon the printer retorted, and finally appealed to the Holy Father. The Holy Chair has pronounced against the Bishop, and has shewn its approval of the printer, Joseph Bucher, by conferring upon him the high distinction of the Order of St. Gregory.

It is stated that the Roman Catholic clergy of Cronstadt (Transylvania), who had been invited by their Bishop to make known their views as to whether it was advisable to introduce any reforms into the Church, replied that the suppression of celibacy seemed to be the most useful change and most urgent, as the prohibition of marriage had consequences most detrimental to the clergy in public opinion.

The communities of the Cistercian order in England and Belgium, which have hitherto been left independent, are, by a decree of the Pope, united to those of the same profession in France, and placed under the general of the order residing in Rome.

According to the Church News, the Pope recently intimated to a distinguished Roman Catholic peer that Archbishop Manning and Bishop Ullathorne would soon receive the cardinal's hat, and that the Scottish hierarchy is about to be restored, with the Right Rev. James Laird Batterson, sometime curate of St. Thomas the Martyr, Oxford, as Archbishop of Glasgow and Primate of all Scotland.

It is not for archheretics like ourselves to meddle with archbishops, but if we may rely on what we hear from those who are generally well-informed upon such matters, it is the wish of the highest personage in the realm that Dr. Selwyn, the bishop of Lichfield, should be raised to the Primacy. But the Record says, that "the two suggestions which are received with the greatest favour, as to the probable successor of the departed Archbishop, point to Lincoln or Dublin."

The Establishment seems likely to furnish a good deal of work for the lawyers in the coming term. Besides the great Colenso case, there is that of St. Albans, the appeal on which from the Arches Court the Lord Chancellor has fixed to hear on the 16th of this month; and in a letter to the Bishop of Chichester, the Rev. E. Clay, of Brighton, and four other gentlemen, have not only suggested the best way in which he may prosecute Mr. Purchas for his Ritualistic offences, but have undertaken to pay the costs, so that unless the Bishop sympathises, as some suppose, with the offender, he can hardly refuse to move in the matter.

We have had a printed circular forwarded to us, with a request that we would communicate its contents to our "brethren in the ministry, &c., of any denomination." We can only find room for the following portions:

"THE THREE R'S.—He (the Rev. Rowland Hill) used to like Dr. Ryland's advice to his young academicians: 'Mind no sermon is of any value, or likely to be useful, which has not the three R's in it—

Ruin by the fall.

Redemption by Christ.

Regeneration by the Holy Spirit.'

'Said a minister once, when I gently hinted to him that he had not preached the Gospel that morning. "No," said he, "I did not mean to preach to sinners in the morning, but I will preach to them in the evening." Ah! said I, but what if some of your congregation of the morning should be in hell before the evening?'—Spurgeon.

It appears that Mr. [Bright, late Tutor in the Scotch Episcopal Church College of Glenalmond, near Perth, has been nominated to succeed Dr. Mansel as Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford. Mr. Bright belongs to the High Church school, and was joint editor with the Rev. P. G. Medd of the Latin Prayer-book, which some regarded as a feeler to try how far there was a chance of bringing back the use of the Romish Missal.

The question of patronage is at present causing great debate in the Established Church of Scotland. The last General Assembly sent to Presbyteries a number of queries, wishing to know whether they considered an alteration of the present system to be desirable, and if so what they would recommend. As might be expected, a great variety of answers have been returned; but it appears to be generally admitted that the present system by no means gives satisfaction, and that the spirit of the times renders it necessary that there should be such a modification of the rights of the patron as would secure that the male communicants at least, in vacant congregations, should be able to take an initiative part in the calling of their future minister. The question will come up before the General Assembly in May, and cannot fail to lead to a good deal of warm discussion.

On Sunday evening Father Ignatius told his congregation at St. Edmund's, Lombard-street, that the offertory on an average was £5 a week. That was not sufficient for him, and unless they gave more he should leave that church and preach elsewhere. In one church where he used to preach they always gave £20, and it was not a rich congregation. The result of this statement was an offertory of £63. 13s. 6d.

The Morning Advertiser states that the Rev. J. M. Belieu and his wife have seceded to the Church of Rome.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

The Times correspondent in Spain, discussing the chances of freedom of conscience and religious reform there, says that one of the Liberal journals has begun the publication of Renan's "Life of Jesus" in its feuilletons, adding, there is no doubt that the liberty of the press will be unlimited; and General Prim has declared that any agent of a Bible society shall be allowed to walk about the Madrid streets with a copy of the Spanish Testament under each arm. Protestants and Jews will have their chapels and synagogues as they have in Rome, and the Government may not deem it necessary to keep spies and gendarmes at the door to see that no orthodox sheep should stray into the heretic fold. Whatever, in short, has been achieved in Italy, whatever has been for years the rule in France and Belgium, may be easily obtained in Spain; but there is a long way from all that to free propagandism. A priest converted to the views of what he calls "Anglicanism" came to Madrid with a firm determination to set up as an "Evangelical" preacher. There is another set of men who have signified their intention to open a place for "free Christian worship," and to denounce "the errors and iniquities of the Church of Rome." All these men have their eyes turned to England; they besiege the chaplain at the British Legation; they address the various Bible and missionary societies; they apply for funds, or, as they call them, "subsides." The phenomenon is by no means new. Experiments of Evangelical chapels, schools, and associations have been tried at Turin, at Florence, at Naples, and throughout Italy, and they have all turned out miserable failures, although the Government dealt with sufficient liberality towards them, and although they had the earnest and exemplary set of the Waldenses to supply them with a base of operations. Most perfect freedom was allowed to every Italian to turn Protestant, or "Evangelical" if he so minded; yet this writer questions if a single honest conversion has been achieved during the last ten or twenty years. The reason is that there is in these southern countries no other belief than that of the Church. Inquiry has long been out of the question. There must be either blind submission or open rebellion. Except implicit abnegation of all reason there is only utter scepticism or defiant infidelity. Ecclesiastical reform can only arise in the Church itself. There can be no other movement than that to which the clergy themselves may give the first impulse. There are in Spain, as there were and are in Italy, many priests who would willingly lend themselves to innovation, but there is not anything whatever to be gained by either opening Evangelical chapels, or sowing what are called "Protestant Bibles" broadcast in Italy or Spain. Means must be found to have the Bible read and the Gospel preached in the Catholic churches themselves, and by the Catholic priests themselves.

On Lord Shaftesbury's statement at Bourne-mouth that he, as President of the Bible Society, had written to thank General Prim for the privilege of allowing a Spanish version of the Scriptures to be admitted into Spain, the Pall Mall remarks:

"The paragraph seems to breathe a sort of exultation like that of the smuggler when sudden revolutionary changes in a Government have relaxed the ties of fiscal severity, and a grand occasion offers itself for the introduction of unlicensed silks or cigars to an unlimited amount. If this is not so, what does Lord Shaftesbury mean by thanking General Prim for the 'privilege?' If the introduction of Bibles is now legal, there is no occasion to thank General Prim or any one else for permission to introduce them. But if this is not so, if the meaning is that existing laws have been relaxed by revolutionary authorities through concession to importunity, or desire to please Lord Shaftesbury and his like, or to gratify English opinion generally, we can only hope that the well-known eccentricity of Spanish character and proceedings may save the Protestant cause from the scrape into which the fanatical folly of its advocates would seem likely to lead it, if the matter were judged of according to rules common to mankind in general."

Speaking of Mr. Samuda, the Liberal candidate for the Tower Hamlets, the Jewish Chronicle a short time since laid down the startling doctrine that "no Jew who is not an inmate of a lunatic asylum, or of a refuge for idiots, can suppose that any man born, bred, reared, and educated as a Jew can possibly become a Christian from conviction." To this Mr. Schwartz, the "President of the Hebrew-Christian Alliance," replies very pertinently by asking whether Christianity does not rest altogether on the testimony of converted Jews, and whether the three thousand who formed the nucleus of the Christian Church were not Jews.

A Mr. Birks, who seems utterly blinded by bigotry, has found a fitting medium in the columns of the Record for the most coarse and calumnious representations of all who differ from him with regard to the policy of disestablishing the Irish Church. In the sixth of his letters, after referring to Dr. Raleigh's spirited address at Leeds, he says, "The congregational Union, by their manifesto, are converts to Fenianism pure and simple;" yet he can scarcely be ignorant that the Fenians and the Tories are notoriously in alliance in some parts of Ireland, and that when there Mr. Mason Jones was confronted by a combination of this kind before which he was forced to give way. Even the readers of the Record, we should think, must feel a little disgusted to have men like Dr. Raleigh charged with "helping forward a movement infidel in its principles and Papal in its motive power," and to have their aim represented in terms like these:

"A State without creed, without worship, without faith in God or reverence for His Word, where Christ and Belial go shares by a rule-of-three sum, in the deference of our statesmen, and the religious offerings of past generations, is the noble Utopia to which these theorists aspire. In the new political Gospel, the first and great commandment is, out of charity to Romanists and unbelievers, to shut out God and His truth with all our heart and soul and mind and strength, from the councils of the land. If we believe the manifesto, this is henceforth the only possible basis of our national constitution."

With reference to a correspondence between a clergyman and Mr. Spurgeon, the Church Times, in its usual courteous style, observes:

"Mr. Curling, the Puritan incumbent of St. Saviour's, Southwark, has received a cruel snubbing at the hands of Mr. Spurgeon. It appears that the latter, taking his text from the Ritual movement, had sneered at the idea of the Church of England being the 'bulwark of Protestantism.' Whereupon Mr. Curling writes weepingly to the Baptist pastor, who, he says, 'preaches the Gospel so faithfully,' to ask him if he really believes that the Church of England sanctions what the Ritualists teach and practise. Mr. Spurgeon replies in the affirmative, adding that 'they are the most active and energetic party of your body.' Further the smiter of the Tabernacle informs Mr. Curling with merciless frankness: 'You personally have no more right to be in the Church of England than I have. You, and such as you, I regard as Dissenters who have missed their way.' Mr. Curling will hardly look for sympathy and comfort a second time in that direction."

Men of "science falsely so-called," were disposed to laugh at Pastor Knak, of Berlin, when he recently maintained that the sun moves round the world, or rather over it; but it seems that he might have pleaded in support of his belief the avowal of two learned Jesuits, Le Sueur and Jacquier, who edited a new edition of Newton's "Principia," in 1823, in the preface to which they say, "In adopting the theory of the earth's motion, to explain Newton's propositions, we assume another character than our own, for we profess obedience to the decrees of the Popes against the motion of the earth." We don't know what the feelings of the Jesuits who thus "professed" may have been, but the good Berlin pastor says, "You may laugh at me, but I am as happy as a child."

Mr. Joseph Barker, in the Methodist Times, delivers thus his ex cathedra judgment on the great Baptist preacher of the day:

"Mr. Spurgeon I have heard four times. All his sermons were the sermons of an able, well-informed, and earnest good man. He is quite as clever a man as his friends suppose him to be, and no one need grudge him the praise he receives. He has his defects. He is over-Calvinistic. His sermons are often strange jumbles of Christian truth and Antinomian heresy. And now and then he perpetrates unworthy jokes; and he is prone to be a little too controversial and political. But he is a great and a good man. His defects are but like slight dark specks on a pure white garment: they are hardly worthy of notice. And even when he allows himself to be a medium for Antinomianism as well as for Christianity, he generally allows Christianity to have the last word. Some preachers talk a little Christianity, and then knock it on the head with Antinomianism. Spurgeon talks a little Antinomianism, and then knocks it on the head with Christianity. He is a good deal like Richard Baxter: his education tries hard to make him talk like a consistent Calvinist, but his knowledge of the Gospel and his respect for its Divine Author, aided by his common sense and better nature, interfere, and compel him to preach very much like a Christian."

The Archbishop of Armagh, who has just been making his triennial visitation, looking to the substantial benefit which his family has long derived from the Irish Church, very naturally sees no necessity for making any change. He is firmly convinced that efficiency cannot be secured for a less sum than £580,000 a year, and is fully persuaded, the Royal Commission notwithstanding, that any reduction in the number of bishops would be bad.

The Record seems to have lost faith entirely in the Protestantism alike of Liberals and Tories. It thus vents its complaint:

"If the question of disestablishment stands alone, Mr. Disraeli and Lord Derby, we fear, are nearly as much committed to the policy as Mr. Gladstone and Earl Russell. More than thirty years ago, Lord Derby avowed himself in favour of paying the Romish priests; he has never changed his opinion; he has, on the contrary, said that the two great rival Churches were substantially agreed; and we believe that this is the latent policy which suggested 'the levelling up' programme of Earl Mayo. We have said this, because we do not wish to adopt an electioneering policy, and hide what we believe to be the melancholy truth as to the hollowness of both parties in the State on the Romish question."

A speech made the other night, in support of the Liberal candidates for Weymouth, by the Hon. Evelyn Ashley, son of its great hero, the Earl of Shaftesbury, will scarcely tend to raise the drooping spirits of our afflicted contemporary. He declared that the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church was the first step towards the pacification of Ireland, and without it all other measures would be useless. He had been brought up in the strictest sense of the word as a Protestant; his education tended that way, and his thoughts had completely grounded him in the belief that Protestantism was the only religion for a free country, and the only religion which would accomplish those things which increasing civilisation demanded of them. But fully grounded as he was in that belief, he maintained that the interests of Protestantism demanded the abolition of the Irish Church. The Irish Church had done nothing in Ireland to increase Protestantism, and he believed if it were disestablished and disendowed a great work would have been accomplished.

The bluff Archdeacon of Taunton, who never minces matters, at a meeting to promote the reelection of the Conservative members of East Somersetshire, said, "Nobody had ever heard him say an unkind word against a Dissenter, and no one ever would. But he wanted to tell them something; it was as certain as that the sun was in heaven that if they helped to pull down the Church of England the Church of Rome would sweep over them like a flood. It would pick them up like an ox licketh up the grass!" What a poor opinion the Archdeacon must have of Protestant truth, if he imagines it is no better able to keep itself from being swallowed up than this!

An "Englishman in Spain," writing to the Pall Mall on the remarkable stress which has been laid, in the present revolution, on religious liberty, says:

"In some respects this is one of the most interesting features of the movement, whether we regard the history of Spain or the relation of Protestant countries to it. We must distinguish, however, between the political and the religious elements in this matter. If the Jesuits were kicked out so promptly that many of them left in plain clothes in cabfils for the railway stations, that was not on account of their Catholicism, but of their identifying their Catholicism with the support of absolutism. Indeed, there are complaints in quarters, Catholic but not absolutist, that they were punished too severely; and that the revolution was illiberal in proclaiming freedom of religion, and then exiling one of the most powerful bodies belonging to the religion of the majority. It seems certain, too, that the Jesuit schools were the best in the community, and the Jesuits themselves far better cultivated (though that is not saying much) than the common Spanish clergy, among whom 'little Latin and no Greek' is unfortunately the rule. We shall probably have them back again—as excellent Liberals—by-and-by; and in the meantime our Protestant missionaries had better not be too sanguine as to their particular prospects. Something, I think, has been gained permanently. I think, for instance, that we shall be allowed open liberty of worship, instead of having to meet (so to speak) in the catacombs of a consular parlour, winked at by a good-natured captain-general, to the injury of the consul's furniture and the captain's conscience. But the tendency is to move too fast, to deluge Spain with Bibles before she is fit for them, and to build 'Evangelical' churches which may scandalize the mob, and also lead to those public jealousies between Protestant bodies themselves which have made us ridiculous enough already. Just as in the Reformation the intellectual preceded or accompanied a little in advance the religious movement, so it will be now, if at all. Spain's primary want is education, and the bigotry of the populace, if unlightened, is quite as likely to be lashed into reaction as into conversion by injudicious proselytizing."

FOREST HILL.—On Thursday week the Rev. R. Spears gave a lecture on the subject, "Everlasting Punishment," at the Meeting House, Dartmouth Road. The room was filled, and an animated discussion was raised at the close by those in his favour, who appeared in force.

OLD TESTAMENT CHAPTERS FOR THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.—No. XXVIII.

SUBJECT: "The later Hebrew writers declare that God will have righteousness rather than sacrifices."

Read Isaiah lviii. 1-9. Cry with the throat, spare not, lift up thy voice and shew to my people their transgressions. In verse 3 the people justify themselves to Jehovah as having endeavoured to please Him by keeping their religious fast days. But Jehovah rejects the plea. Behold in the day of your fast ye pursue pleasure and oppress all your labourers. Is this such a fast as I should choose? Nay rather, is not this the fast that I should choose? To loosen the fetters of injustice, to let the oppressed go free, to deal out thy bread to the hungry, to clothe the naked? When thou doest this, continues the writer, then shall thy wounds be healed.

Read Micah vi. 1-8. Pointing out where the speeches divide. Verses 1 and 2, the prophet says, Hear ye now what Jehovah saith; for Jehovah hath a controversy with his people. Verses 3, 4, and 5 Jehovah expostulates with them, O my people, what have I done to thee? After all His kindness they have turned from Him. Verses 6 and 7 the people cry out, Wherewith shall I come before Jehovah? With burnt offerings, with calves of the first year? or, after the superstitions of the nations around, shall I give my first-born son for my transgressions? Not so; the prophet rebukes them in the 8th verse, He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?

Read Exodus xxix. 38-46, for an example of the burnt offerings said to have been commanded to the Israelites by God through Moses, upon Mount Sinai, on the march out of Egypt; and then turn to Jeremiah, chapter vii. 21-24, to see that this writer, like the above quoted prophets, disapproves of the priestly sacrifices, and even takes pains to contradict the old tradition that these sacrifices were commanded by God. I spake not to your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt concerning burnt offerings or sacrifices. But this thing I commanded them, Obey my voice.

A SERMON.

WHEN amongst the Dorset people the other day, a friend said to me, "Mr. Smith, won't you come and hear our new minister this evening? I feel sure you will like him; he is so outspoken and earnest." I went in compliance with my friend's request to hear the new parson. Certainly, the good man was "outspoken and earnest," and by no means substantiated the charge of "cowardice in the pulpit," which S. G. O. and others have been recently urging against ministers. The chapel, an old haunt of mine when in that locality, is a plain, heavy, almost ugly, building, and in no way likely to awaken High Church notions in its attendants. The congregation, was not a numerous one, and consisted mainly of the tradesmen of the village town, their families, servants, and a few labourers. The minister, a man of about thirty-five or thirty-six summers, appears to have known much trouble; to be an earnest man, earnest in pushing forward his own views and own religious party more than in seeking to know what truth exists beyond his own limited ken and his own particular sect. A mannerism characterised him in the pulpit, and added to his somewhat singularly-shaped head, which did not impress me in his favour, or lead to me expect anything out of the common in his sermon.

His prayer was earnest, somewhat long, and consisted less of thanks than of supplication, and partook withal of the sermon type of prayer. We are sinners, but there has been an atonement made, a sacrifice provided. This fact, so strongly believed in by himself, he told to God as a truth for which He had to be thanked, and asked that it might ever be impressed upon the hearts of all. Forgiveness for sin, not help against the power of sin, was the burden of his prayer.

The passage chosen as a text was the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. "I can't think what some of you people are thinking about when you abuse this rich man and call him wicked. He lived well, dressed well, fared well, was clothed in purple and fine linen, gave his parties, and drank his wines. What of that? He was rich and could afford it. He went regularly to his place of worship, just as you do; he gave to the collections, relieved the poor, was kindly-hearted, charitable, and people said of him, as you say of the rich men in your neighbourhood, that he was very good. But he went to HELL, and so may, ay, will some of you, if like that rich man you have all your good things in this life, and think nothing of the life that is to come. The rich man did not go to hell because he was a rich man any more than you poor people will go to heaven because you are poor, but because he made his riches his god." The good brother gave us a bit of this style for some minutes, and then proceeded to consider the conduct of the twain in the other world. "They could see each other, an extraordinary fact this, and one that we may well ponder over." Seeing Lazarus in happiness, whilst he was in misery, the rich man appealed for help and succour, "not to God, but to Father Abraham. He neglected to pray to God all his life, and now in hell he cannot pray to Him. So the poor Papist in yonder village, five or six miles hence, when he lies on his death-bed, sends for his priest to come and administer extreme unction. So, too, the Churchman in this town, an unconverted man, as too many are, sends for his clergyman to administer the sacrament; and you Methodists send for me, as you have sent for me, or the 'leader,' to come and pray for you; you will do anything rather than pray to God." The sermon was mainly of this fashion, simple enough in style, personal enough, and outspoken. I was particularly struck with the dogmatism with which the good man spoke of the other world, and the positive information he appeared to possess with regard to its locality and doings. He spoke as one having authority. Whether his notions are Christian or Pagan may perhaps fairly be questioned. One pleasure of the saints appears to him derivable from the sight of their former friends and companions—those they knew on earth and loved there—in the midst of flames the most torturing. Kindly thoughts these selfish, un-Godlike ones have not—one they only have, the hatred of the wicked, and faith in God's immutable justice. In the friendly regard of the rich man for his brothers on earth, he saw no fraternal affection, but a mere selfish desire to be spared the additional torment which their accession to the damned would give him. "Oh, hell is an awful place! Even the very existence of human affection is unknown there; one only they know—torment and the fear thereof!"

I have given herein to the readers of the Herald another of my waifs and strays from the religious world. SEPTIMUS SMITH.

THE SPIRITUALISTS.

(From the Christian World.)

SOMEHOW or other the Spiritualists are under a cloud in this country, and their leader, Mr. Home, has been compelled, in consequence of the decision of a highly-prejudiced and extremely ignorant jury, to hand over to Mrs. Lyon a very handsome sum of money which she had conveyed to him in consequence of representations made by him to her that such was the desire of her deceased lord and master. Up to that time Spiritualism was making great way, and Mr. Home, as its high-priest and apostle, was in request with the nobility, and was the friend of kings and emperors. He had married a Russian countess; he wore a diamond ring on one hand, given by the Czar, and on the other hand another, the present of the Emperor of France. His speaking eye and melodramatic manner made him in society a really charming man; literary ladies were enthusiastic in his favour. A Spiritual Athenæum was opened in Sloane-street, Chelsea, at which a very eminent man gave the inaugural discourse, and at which there were spirit drawings displayed, and spirit poems read—all suggestive of the fact that the spirits were very ordinary people after all. But it was not so much there as at the houses of his friends that Mr. Home tried best to display his powers. At such times there was a wonderful parade of religion. Previous to his attending a séance, a friend of the author was asked whether he believed in the doctrine of the Trinity, because, said the fair questioner, "we find that the spirits do not like to appear before sceptics;" and the Bible was read, and prayer offered up in apparently the most reverent, and earnest, and occasionally the most tiresome manner. Then came a few childish tricks, such as a handkerchief conveyed by spirits under the table, the accordion played by spirits under the table, and other intimations of what was said to be spiritual agency, but all equally out of sight. A few marvellous things were said by Home—secrets occasionally—which the hearer thought no one knew but himself, but secrets of the most uninteresting and unimportant character, and then the unbeliever passed out, scarcely knowing whether to laugh or weep; whether he had assisted at a religious meeting or a farce; whether he had been in the company of a mortal fitted for a solemn mission to an idle and adulterous generation seeking after a sign, or whether all he had seen and heard was but the clever manoeuvring of a clever professor of Legerdemain. Home has fallen low. Henceforth he will have to take his stand with the Brothers Davenport and other doubtful mediums who have had their day.

The Spiritualists in this country set great store by Home. They have never been able in our cold climate to raise a medium worth talking about. The latter have been chiefly American importations. Mr. Harris came as a preacher of Spiritualism, and, after a few Sundays at Store-street, vanished like a spirit, and was heard of no more. A Spiritual Magazine was started. Mrs. Marshall and her niece, of 22, Red Lion-street, Holborn, were declared by that—we presume official authority—to be "Media." Then came the solid testimony of a learned American judge, declaring "the first thing demonstrated to us is that we can commune with the spirits of the departed—that such communication is through the instrumentality of persons yet living—that the fact of mediumship is the result of physical organisation—that the kind of communion is effected by moral causes, and that the power, like our other faculties, is possessed in different degrees, and is capable of improvement by cultivation." But the sect did not prosper. Then came grotesque indications of spiritual presence. Not content with table-rapping, the spirits must have recourse to all kinds of antics, and the subject of Spiritualism became more and more distasteful to the intelligent, and more and more popular with that large class of idle, wealthy men and women who have no healthy occupation, and are always in search of excitement. The climax was reached when the Cornhill told how Mr. Home floated in the air, how heavy tables would leap from one end of the room to the other, how music was produced on accordions, "grand at times, at others pathological, at others distant and long-drawn," when those accordions were held by no mortal hands. "I can state," wrote Dr. Gully, of Malvern, "that the record made in the article 'Stranger than Fiction' is in every particular correct; that the phenomena therein related actually took place, and moreover that no trick of machinery, sleight of hand, or other artistic contrivance, produced what we heard and beheld. I am quite as convinced of this last as I am of the facts themselves." Well might the Spiritualists crow; had not Robert Owen and Lord Lyndhurst also believed? Was it not uncharitable to say that they were in their dotage? The testimony of such men settled everything.

In America Spiritualism is more prosperous than in England. In the "Plain Guide to Spiritualism," Mr. Clarke tells us there are in that country 500 public mediums who receive visitors; more than 50,000 private ones; 500 books and pamphlets on the subject have been published, and many of them immensely circulated; there are 500 public speakers and lecturers on it, and more than 1,000 occasional ones. There are nearly 2,000 places for public circles, conferences, or lectures, and in many places flourishing public schools. The decided believers are 2,000,000, the nominal ones nearly 5,000,000; in the globe itself it is calculated there are 20,000,000 supposed to recognise the fact of spiritual intercourse. In Paris and the different parts of France the manifestations have been almost of every kind and of the most decisive and distinguished character. "Great numbers of persons have been cured by therapeutic mediums," writes William Howitt, "of diseases and injuries incurable by all ordinary means. Some of these persons are well known to me, and are every day bearing their testimony in aristocratic society." Writing thus, Mr. Howitt defines Spiritualism "as the great theologic and philosophic reformer of the age; the great requickener of religious life; the great consolator and establisher of hearts; the great herald to the wanderers of earth starved upon the husks of mere college dogmas." "I believe," says Mr. S. C. Hall, "that, as it now exists, (it) Spiritualism has mainly but one purpose—to confute and destroy Materialism, by supplying sure, and certain, and palpable evidence that to every human being God gives a soul which He ordains shall not perish when the body dies." This, as good old Izaak Walton says, in narrating Dr. Donne's Vision, "This is a relation that will beget some wonder; and it well may, for most of our world are at present possessed with an opinion that miracles and visions are ceased."

What is Spiritualism? Ask its opponents; they regard it as necromancy, a practice not only forbidden under the Old Testament, but which even in the New we find classed by St. Paul under the general denomination of witchcraft, with such works of the flesh as idolatry, murder, adultery, and drunkenness, concerning all of which the Apostle Paul adds the solemn declaration, "That they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God." Such undoubtedly is the feeling entertained with regard to Spiritualism by the great majority of orthodox Christians, who are quite satisfied by Scripture testimony, who accept what they think God has revealed to them in His Book, and who seek or require nothing more. In a weak, but well-meaning work, just put into my hands, "Spiritualism and other Signs," I read, "The whole system is essentially opposed to faith in, and walking with, Jesus Christ, and the Spiritualist knows it." He quotes the well-known text: "Now, the Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron." At the same time there are many in the Christian Church of undoubted piety and intelligence who are believers in Spiritualism. After all, however, they are the exception rather than the rule. Amongst all sects there is a condemnation of Spiritualism of a very sweeping character. In this one thing Wesleyans, Low Churchmen, and Congregationalists are agreed. The outer world, the Secularists and the Positivists of course regard Spiritualism with the same scorn and unbelief with which they regard all religion whether true or false, whether old as the hills or but yesterday's creation.

In conclusion let me add, as a distinct organisation, hitherto Spiritualism has failed in this country. I hear nothing of the Spiritual Athenæum now, nothing of Mr. Harris, either as preacher or poet, very little even of Mr. Home. Strange that a man who could not write an ordinary note decently should have been the favourite medium of the spirits. I am aware, however, the Spiritualists will extract an argument out of that last remark of mine in favour of Spiritualism. A young Jewish convert it is said would go to Rome. His teacher, a priest, feared, knowing Rome too well. On his return he questioned his pupil as to what he saw in Rome. "Ah!" said he, "I am persuaded now your religion is of God, otherwise it would have perished of the wickedness of its professors."

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1868.

RELIGIOUS INJUSTICE.

It is clear that whatever other vices religious minds may escape by means of their religion, there is one vice which is apt to cling to them, we may almost say on account of their religion. It is an indisposition—perhaps an incapacity—to do justice to persons of religious opinions different from their own. This vice seems to religion what its own blight or fungus is to each plant, and too often seems to eat out its very life.

The struggle of to-day is to shake off this vice, to remedy the sins of the past, and do at last some measure of justice to those who hold a religion from which we greatly differ. But it will be a great and arduous struggle still. We see to what an extent this vice still prevails, not only from such indications as the violence of the well-dressed mob of Lombard-street to Father Ignatius, and the outrages by a more motley mob at Brighton against Mr. PURCHAS, but from the arguments of the great host of members of Parliament and would-be members, of curates, vicars, and bishops who oppose the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Their doctrine seems to be—"The Roman Catholics of Ireland are in deadly error; we hold the saving truth, therefore we ought to use means which might be injustice in other cases, to prevent the error from spreading, and, if possible, to supplant it by our truth." It is no doubt mainly the belief in the infinite importance of religious truth or error which lies at the root of this mental perversion. It is very natural when we think that our fellow-creatures are holding opinions which will doom them to eternal perdition, and are also in danger of propagating those opinions to others, that we should feel that almost any means must be justifiable to heal or hinder so tremendous an evil. All the courtesy, and tolerance, and justice of common life seem to shrink into insignificance before such a fearful crisis. And thus the same feeling that led the monks of old to burn the heretic, in order to check the heresy, lives still in the minds of multitudes, only it is now modified in operation by the general temper of the age. This vice, which spoils religion, is then closely connected with one of its noblest feelings—the intense love of our fellow-creatures, and yearning to save them from the greatest evil, and give them the greatest good; and yet, for all that, we cannot doubt that it is a vice, as much deforming human character, and doing as much harm in the world, as many of the grosser vices which are denounced Sunday after Sunday from ten thousand pulpits.

How it deforms the character of religious persons, obscuring its nobler features and making it almost hateful! You meet in the religious world many a man—especially many a clergyman, pure minded, benevolent, self-denying, and self-devoted, so far as concerns the carrying out his own peculiar aims, tenderly pious and conscientious—indeed with character eminently beautiful on one side, but then on the other side strangely repulsive. He offends your moral taste by an aggravating pride, assuming the perfect infallibility of his own dogmatic opinions. He offends you by his want of candour and truthfulness, denouncing with contemptuous dogmatism conclusions of critics and savans which he has never examined; misrepresenting and stigmatising the creed and character of sects with which he is totally unacquainted. He offends your moral sense again by the apparently perverted character of his moral judgments. He seems to approve men not according to their moral character, their nobleness, or ignobleness, but according to the dogmas which they hold. And generally he offends you by his want of all sense of justice with regard to the mental rights of others, by his imperious and domineering temper, which compels you to regard him as an enemy to your own liberty and the liberties of the human race, who must be watched and circumvented.

It cannot be doubted that it is this vice which makes religion so unattractive to multitudes, for it renders so many of those who seem examples of what religion makes men—repulsive rather than attractive.

What evils this vice has caused in society—hatred, divisions, persecutions, wrongs, cruelties, we need not enumerate. The great question is—How shall the vice be cured? One remedy seems to us the knowledge, which a larger education and experience would give, that the dogmas which Christians are so anxious to inculcate are not of such infinite moment as they now deem them—that the passport to salvation will be not creed, but character, and that again, in the formation of character, dogmas have much less influence than is now supposed—that noble character is formed more by noble ideals than by any dogmas.

But probably it will be a long time before the majority of religious people will learn to see noble ideals as of primary, and correct dogmas only of secondary importance. And therefore the next best truth to reiterate is the obligation of religious justice, even towards those who hold opinions which we may deem fatal to salvation. Men should be reminded that, after all, the final responsibility of saving men's souls is with God, and we must not try to save them by being more anxious than He is, or adopting means which He rejects. He could by force convert all men in an instant, and yet He refrains from the exercise of His omnipotence through respect to man's free-will. He does not require us to succeed in saving others, but he does require us to observe the laws of truth and justice, to respect men's rights, and treat them with all honour and courtesy. If, by using perfect justice, we cannot succeed in propagating our own belief, we must still be just, and leave the rest to God.

THE LATE ROBERT HEYWOOD, ESQ.

RARELY indeed is it that a good man goes to his grave followed by such testimonies of universal respect and regard as have been called forth by the departure of the honoured friend of whom we gave an obituary last week. Though it was the desire of his family that the funeral, in accordance with his own dislike of all show and parade, should be of a strictly private character, the wish was so general, and so strongly expressed, that the representatives of the various charitable and other institutions with which Mr. Heywood was connected, and for which he had done so much, should have the opportunity afforded them of publicly manifesting their sense of his services and the high esteem in which he was held, that this wish, it was felt, could not well be withstood; and on Saturday morning, when his remains were borne to their resting-place in the Cemetery, the mournful procession consisted of nearly forty carriages, in which, besides Mr. Heywood's immediate relatives and friends, there were the Revs. Dr. Beard, G. H. Wells, J. Whitehead, and W. H. Herford, the Mayor and nearly the whole of the Town Council, several of the county and borough magistrates, representatives of the Committee of the Infirmary and Dispensary, of the Poor Protection Society, of the Mechanics' Institution, and of the Industrial School, the present members for the borough and the two other candidates, the Vicar and two other leading clergymen, two Catholic priests, and two Independent ministers, together with the trustees of Bank-street Chapel, and most of the chief citizens of Bolton. Along the whole route of the procession business was entirely suspended, the shops having their shutters closed and the houses their blinds drawn down, while hundreds of persons assembled in the streets to testify their respect for one who had been such a benefactor to their town, and in such a variety of ways made his influence felt for good. At a subsequent part of the day, when moving an address of condolence in the Town Council with Mr. Heywood's family, the Mayor mentioned, among the tributes to his character, certainly none of the least, that as the procession moved slowly on its way "he could not but notice with deep feeling the tears flowing down the cheeks of many poor old men and women; and in the cemetery also, he noticed the tears flowing from the eyes of many young people, no doubt connected with the Sunday schools of which Mr. Heywood was so long a teacher."

The Rev. Jeffery Worthington, by whom the funeral service was conducted, in the course of a solemn address, after touching on the sublime truths contained in the portion of St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians which he had just read, truly observed:

"Opportunity is given to few men to take so active a part as our friend in all the great movements of the last half-century for the advancement of the principles of progress which were dear to his heart. His memory will ever be cherished as one of the most marked and earnest advocates in this district of the cause of education and of civil and religious liberty; while his personal exertions and pecuniary help on behalf of all who needed kindness will be thankfully remembered by countless mourners in this town and neighbourhood. The warmth with which he defended every cause that approved itself to his own conscientious convictions secured respect alike from those who agreed, and from those who differed, in these opinions; for they were assured that it was his wish to act uprightly in every word that he uttered, and in every act that he performed. He rests from his labours and his works do follow him."

On Sunday morning, Bank-street Chapel was densely crowded by a most influential congregation, including the Mayor, Thomas Barnes, Esq., M.P., several of the borough and county magistrates, a number of the members of the Town Council, and representatives from the various charitable institutions of the town. Many of them wore the usual badge of mourning; and the pulpit, as well as the organ gallery, was draped in black. In a very appropriate discourse, founded on the words, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace" (Psalm xxxvii, 37.), Mr. Worthington said, the friend for whom not only a family, but a town, and even a yet wider circle, mourns, would have shrunk from any ascription of "perfectness," for his spirit was too simple, and his ideal too high; nevertheless, it is the lot of few men to pass from the midst of his brethren and neighbours so laden with well-earned honours. Mr. Worthington then went on to point out the various excellences which distinguished the character of him whom they had lost, as one who sought after "perfectness," and thus spoke of his connection with the church to which he belonged:

"For a long series of years, he was treasurer to the funds of this Christian society; the friend of its members; the teacher and superintendent in its Sunday schools; the regular attendant at its public services. In the chapel that formerly stood upon this spot, and in the new building beneath whose roof we are now assembled, he took his place with unflinching regularity; and many here call to remembrance how, but a brief month ago, he worshipped in our midst, and gathered with us before the Table of the Master. Nor can I forget how I then discoursed of the fresh memories that were for ever clustering round the walls of our earthly sanctuaries, imparting new solemnity to the place wherein from week to week we pray, and offer up our praise. On that day was unveiled the monument to your former pastor, lately erected here; and ere he passed away to his home, our venerable friend gazed on the marble, and read the words that he helped to frame, with a pleasure of which he spoke to me in the days that have followed since. His interest on behalf of you and yours, fellow-worshippers, was too well known to you to need elaboration. His help in the erection of this building, his purchase of another nigh at hand for educational purposes, his yearly welcome to hundreds of your number and of your children at Whitsuntide, are but instances of his never-failing good-will. While his beneficence to our less thriving congregations up and down the country, his painstaking regard for the interest of our Ministers' 'Widows' Fund' in the capacity of treasurer, and his care for the interests of every institution connected with the denomination, may be regarded as manifestations of his high appreciation of Nonconformist principles, and of the doctrines commonly called Unitarian."

In the evening, when again there was a very large congregation, Mr. Worthington made special reference to the labours of Mr. Heywood as a Sunday School teacher and superintendent, in which character he set such a praiseworthy example. At the Parish Church, the Rev. Canon Powell, the vicar, also made a feeling reference to Mr. Heywood's death, and the loss which the community had thereby sustained. Most truly might it be said of him,

"Multis ille bonis flebilis occidit."

WORKING MEN AND THE CHURCH.

In a work just published, entitled "The Great Unwashed," that clever specimen of his class, the "Journeyman Engineer," discusses the attitude of working men towards "the Church" in a fair, dispassionate manner. After pointing out the great discrepancies which there are between Church profession and practice, he puts the case thus plainly, in words well deserving the thoughtful consideration of all who really care for the religious welfare of the poor:

"Thus it is that the Church as an institution is powerless to influence the people; the worldliness and corruption that exist under its wing, and which become hideous hypocrites when compared with its professed doctrines, act repellently. And while there is nothing in the Church to attract the working classes on purely religious grounds, those social or conventional reasons which are often the sole inducements to other classes for attending church do not exist in their case. If a working man does not attend a place of worship from an active feeling of religion, he need not do so from any reasons of caste. It has not become a habit with him, nor is it in any degree essential to his maintenance of a character for respectability, that he should be—

'A black-leg saint, a spiritual hedger,
Who backs his rigid Sabbath, so to speak,
Against the wicked remnant of the week.'

while his wife or daughter can sufficiently display such finery as they can get, at market or during a Sunday afternoon walk. But while the working classes as a body can only be considered as not irreligious by a broad and charitable construction of the spirit of religion, as apart from its set doctrines and formal ceremonials, there are, as I have already incidentally mentioned, many men among them who are actively and truly religious in the ordinary acceptance of the term. For these men the Dissenting sects have the greatest attractions. Their services and ministers are considered simpler and more practical than those of the Church; the ministers are paid with a nearer approach to equality, and have, to a far greater extent than those of the Church, entered their profession from personal predilection, or, as they put it, from having 'experienced a call.' There are also working men who attend places of worship from hypocritical motives—to curry favour with employers or ingratiate themselves with clergymen who have the power of distributing charity. A few attend Dissenting bodies on this ground; but when it comes to such motives as these Church pays best, and consequently comes in for the largest share of such pauper-souled worshippers. All this, it may be said, is merely an attack upon the Church, but it is only incidentally that it is so. In order that the relations between the working classes and the Church may be properly understood, it is necessary to show exactly in what estimation these classes hold the Church, and in the foregoing remarks I have embodied the views generally obtaining among them. Looking at these views, I think it must be admitted that the working-class indifference to the Church is ascribable less to an irreligious feeling, than to a contempt for the deprecation of the spirit of religion under the guise of a ceremonial systematisation of it. The Church itself stands is emphatically not the Church of the people. They believe that on truly Christian grounds it has no claim to reverence or authority, while as a social institution it is not suited to their necessities. So long as the relative position of the working classes, and the habits of life to which it gives rise, remain as they are, it is probable that no church, however pure, would in the first instance be able to induce them to habitually attend public worship. But a really apostolic church—a church whose servants practised as well as preached the teachings of the great Founder of Christianity—could do an incalculable amount of good among them, could lead them to a higher, purer, more actively-religious life, which would in its turn lead to their becoming sincere observers of the outward forms as well as of the essentials of religion. But the Established Church is not of this kind; and ere it can hope to influence the working classes in any considerable degree, it must purify itself—must cease to combine the worship of God with that of Mammon."

THE SPIRIT OF SYSTEM.

(By A. H. COQUEREL, Fils.)

"We know not the whole of anything."—Montaigne.

It is natural and legitimate for the human mind to endeavour to link together the scattered facts which it has acquired. It soon perceives that all these partial truths are rays of the same sun, fragments of universal truth; and it forms the noble design of combining and classifying its discoveries, of establishing amongst them as regular an order as possible, and, if it may be, of ascending with each ray to the fire whence they all came, of following all its discoveries back to some common starting-point—in short, of creating a system.

Were the systematisation of facts and laws impossible or illegitimate, science would cease to be. In a certain sense, the spirit of science and the desire to generalise, to ascertain laws, to compare kindred facts, may be considered as identical. It is, therefore, an absurdity to seek, as some would dream, to banish dogma from religion. Theological dogma is religious truth reduced into system. A religion without dogmas would be not only a practice without a theory, but a mere unreflecting sentiment. The only check that can or should be imposed on the teacher of dogma is the forbidding him to treat the results he has obtained as final and obligatory laws. Let systems be freely constructed, and dogmas formulated, so long as the system is imposed upon no one, and the dogma held binding on no conscience, not even its author's. Whoever attempts to force other men to accept his theories—even though they be true—is their common enemy, a usurper of the rights of God, a sacrilegious oppressor of consciences.

A well-linked system, whether of philosophy or theology, is one of the most difficult and brilliant feats of human intellect. It is a feat of mental strength; and many, as Augustine and Calvin, have shown great genius in the effort. Yet the systems of both these writers, though justly ranked amongst the wonders of human thought, contain great faults and many logical errors. Why? Was it for lack of knowledge or talent? Augustine knew, as few have known, alike the greatness and the wretchedness of man. Calvin had a marvellous aptitude for labour, for reasoning, for concentration of mind, a marvellous power of linking together his ideas as firmly as an iron chain.

It has ever been so with all systems of philosophy or theology. Not one but, unless stopped half-way, will end in some vast falsity; not one but, if followed fully out, will lead to an abyss of absurdity.

But why? Is it possible that truths may be contradictory or irreconcilable? No. It is because the human mind fails lamentably when it seeks to embrace all truths together. Not that we possess no truths; we do possess many, well-established and most precious. But we have not arrived at a knowledge of entire and absolute truth. We can decompose a ray of light and study it at will; but our inquiries and our instruments have not yet discovered the common source of all light.

Thus without any scepticism, any fancy that all is doubtful or all is false, our experience of the past justifies our saying whenever a new system of theology, philosophy, political, or social science makes its appearance—lo! another mixture of truth and falsehood!

Hence these systems become useful and really enrich the common stock of wisdom, only when they have been attacked, criticised, reduced to their constituent elements. Then the errors which formed part of them perish, and their new truths, their productive ideas, their unknown methods, live on.

Not indeed but that an absolutely true system, complete and in every part perfect, does exist; but it exists only in God's eternal thought. He has never revealed it in its entirety to any one; nay, though Almighty, he cannot, for so to do were to create a second God. Or rather, he does reveal it in its entirety, and finite spirits grasp each part of it; some a large part, but none the whole, for there is no God but God.

Bossuet has justly said of those seemingly irreconcilable truths—man's freedom and God's foreknowledge—that we cannot deny either, though we cannot reconcile them. They are, adds he, the two ends of a chain which we can grasp, though the point where they meet is too far for us to touch or see.

Science, since Bacon and Descartes, has no longer admitted the a priori method of reasoning. We do not begin with all facts, but only with those which we have been able to observe; when we have carefully observed, described, and compared them, we endeavour to deduce from them laws—that is, to link together facts of the same order—and thus we proceed from discovery to discovery. What right has theology to be an exception to this method? The authority of the Church, says a Catholic, has spoken. I reply: That authority is a supposed fact whose reality has not yet been proved to me; I cannot presume it. The authority of the Bible, cries a Protestant, is sovereign. Does it ever say so itself? Never. Cease to build systems on your own suppositions, and let me open my eyes and ears, listen and observe.

If you see an orthodox displaying itself as a complete system of religious truth, say calmly with the sceptic of Israel, Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.

No system is entirely true; no theology or philosophy fully represents reality; there are always breaks; all our truths are fragments. We know not, as Montaigne says, the whole of anything.

Were Christianity a system, one of two alternatives would be inevitable: either it would be a system of full and absolute truth, and therefore intelligible to God only, the opposite of a revelation, the supreme mystery; or it would be truth as seen in its fulness by a human mind—would be affected by the colouring, the qualities and defects of that mind, and would, like other systems, be full of errors and omissions. Its glory and strength are that it is not a system. The sower has gone forth, scattering to the wind eternal principles of justice, love, truth, piety; he has constantly compared religion to the small seeds that become great trees; he has declared that he had yet many things to say, too difficult for his hearers; he has made that wondrous promise that He that believeth on Him shall do greater works than he; and he has given us as the aim of our labour—the perfection of the Father. Instead of shutting us within a narrow sphere, he has led us onward upon the shining way which goes from worlds to worlds across Infinity and leads to God.

Like Jesus, our Master, who made no system, let us cling to some great and undying truths whereon the soul may feed and live. Our age thirsts not for artificial fountains, but for the sources of the water of life, where it may believe and work, hope and love.

Rev. William Bruce.

THE Northern Whig, in announcing the death of the Rev. WILLIAM BRUCE, of Belfast, which took place on Sunday, the 25th ultimo, in the 79th year of his age, says:

"The name of the deceased has been long and honourably known in connection with Belfast. He was the second son of the Rev. Dr. Bruce, who was minister of the first Presbyterian congregation in Rosemary-street for fifty-one years. His son, now deceased, for fifty-five years filled the same important office, having been appointed in 1812, and continued to discharge his share of the ministerial duties until 1867. The Rev. John Scott Porter was appointed his coadjutor in the year 1831.

"The deceased was an accomplished scholar, and held the professorial chair of Latin and Greek in the collegiate department of the Royal Belfast Academical Institution, from the time it was founded until the establishment of the Queen's Colleges. He had a highly cultivated intellect, and was possessed of very varied literary accomplishments.

"The late Mr. Bruce took an active and prominent part in most of our local charitable institutions. The Belfast Charitable Society in particular was the subject of his constant care and personal supervision. He also was a prominent supporter of the Belfast General Hospital. To the Belfast Library he gave much of his time and attention, a share of which he likewise devoted to the Botanic Gardens, the Belfast Museum, and other local public institutions. The Domestic Mission owed much to Mr. Bruce; and it is, indeed, not too much to say that during a long life he devoted more time and attention to a greater number of the charitable and other organisations of his native town than any other man of his time.

"As a minister, the Rev. Mr. Bruce was highly esteemed by his people. By his fellow-citizens he was universally respected; and by all who are familiar with our local history for the last half century the news of his death will be received with the regret which the close of an honourable and well-spent life deservedly evokes."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

THE POWER OF THE DEAD.

MRS. J. GRAY.

Say not their power is o'er,
Although their lips be mute, their limbs be still;
With might, unknown before,
Those silent forms the living heart may thrill.

Where is the place of graves
We deem not hallowed? There is sanctity
In every wind that waves
Its grasses tall, or stirs its willow tree.

Where'er some lonely mound
Tells of the spot where mortal relics rest,
At once that spot of ground
Our hearts with unseen holiness invest.

Say not they have no power!
Perhaps they were our enemies in life,
But now hath come an hour
When endeth all the tumult and the strife.

Another, mightier hand
Hath stilled the opposer—anger now may cease;
Who can the truth withstand,
That with the dead our hearts should be at peace?

And for the loved and lost,
Their memories move us as naught else may move,
When, wildly tempest-tost,
They to the soul as guiding stars may prove.

And many a gentle word
Of precious counsel, all too long despised,
By memory may be stirred,
Now to be thought upon, and weighed, and prized.

And when the wayward heart
Doubts how it shall some dark temptation shun;
They may decide its part—
"So will we do, for so would they have done."

Say not they are no more,
Those who the heart with reverence thus can fill;
Say not their power is o'er
When thus its traces are around us still!

WITCHCRAFT.—V.

As it is painfully interesting to trace the gradual degeneration of a poetic faith into such vulgar forms as have been exemplified, so it is amusing to see pedantry clinging faithfully to the traditions of its prosaic nature, and holding sacred the dead shells that once housed a moral symbol. How the cast clothes of the mind continue always to be in fashion! We turn our coats without changing the cut of them. But was it possible for a man to change not only his skin but his nature? Were there such things as versipelles, lycanthropi, werwolves, and loup-garous? Take Ovid as a witness, and he testifies distinctly to the fact that King Lycæon, grandson of Oceanus, was converted into a wolf:

Affrighted, then straightway he flies,
The silence of the woods to gain,
And there he howls, and howls, and tries,
To utter words, but all in vain

Does anyone still doubt that men may be changed into beasts? Call Lucian, call Apuleius, call Homer, whose account of the companions of Ulysses turned into swine, says Bodin, "is not a fable." If Wierus, that arch-patron of sorcerers is not unconvinced, what does he say to Nebuchadnezzar? Nay, let St. Austin be subpoenaed, who declares positively that "in his time, among the Alps, sorceresses were common, who, by making travellers eat of a certain cheese, changed them into beasts of burden, and then back again into men." Too confiding tourist, beware of Gruyère, especially at supper! Then there was the philosopher Ammonius, whose lectures were constantly attended by an ass—a phenomenon not without parallel in modern times, and all the more credible to Bodin because he himself had been a professor of civil law.

In one case we have fortunately the evidence of the ass himself. In Germany, two witches, who kept an inn, metamorphosed a young actor into that animal. In his new shape he drew customers in large numbers by his amusing tricks. But one day making his escape (having overheard the secret from his mistresses), he plunged into the water, and was disasinated so far as to recover his original shape. Peter Damianus, a leading man of his time, inquired carefully into the story, both from "the ass" and the women, and convinced Leo the Seventh of its truth. Bodin must have been delighted with this clear case, though perhaps, as a Protestant, he might not be influenced by the infallible decision of the Pope in its favour.

As for lycanthropy, that was too common in Bodin's own time to need any confirmation. It was notorious to all men. On the authority of Gaspar Peucerus, Melancthon's son-in-law, we are told that "in Livonia, during the latter part of December, a villain goes about summoning the sorcerers to meet at a certain place, and if they fail, the Devil scourges them thither with an iron rod, and that so sharply that the marks of it remain upon them. Their captain goes before; and they, to the number of several thousands, follow him across a river, which passed, they change into wolves, and, casting themselves upon men and flocks, do all manner of damage." Moreover, many books published in Germany affirm "That one of the greatest kings in Christendom, not long since dead, was often changed into a wolf." But what need of words? Had not many, being put to the torture, confessed the fact, and been burnt alive accordingly? The maintainers of the reality of witchcraft in the next century seem to have dropped the werewolf, although supported by the same kind of evidence as they relied on in other matters, namely, that of ocular witnesses, the confession of the accused, and general notoriety. So lately as 1765 the French peasants believed "the wild beast of the Gevaudan" to be a loup-garou, which seems to have been his last appearance.

A question much discussed was, could children be born of witches and their familiars? Of course they could, said one party; are there not plenty of cases in authentic history? Who was the father of Romulus and Remus; nay, not so long ago, of Merlin? Another party denied the possibility of such parentage. Among these was Luther, who declared the children to be either supposititious, or else were imps disguised as innocent sucklings, and known as "changelings," who were common enough, as every body must be aware. Of the concubinage, however, he had no doubts; and some Catholics affirmed that he himself was the son of a demon, who lodged in his father's house under the semblance of a merchant. A third party took a middle ground, and believed that vermin and toads might have had this devilish origin.

Another point of interest was, how did the Demon, a mere spiritual essence, take human form? The accepted theory seems to have been that he entered into dead bodies, giving the preference, of course, to those of sorcerers. This had historical evidence in its favour. There was the well-known case of the Bride of Corinth, for example; and but yesterday, as it were, at Crossen, in Silesia, did not Christopher Monig, an apothecary's servant, come back after being buried, and do duty as if nothing particular had happened, putting up prescriptions as usual, and "pounding drugs in the mortar with a mighty noise?" Apothecaries seem to have been special victims of these Satanic pranks, for another appeared at Reichenbach, affirming that "he had poisoned several men with his drugs," which certainly gives an air of truth to the story. In accordance with this dead-body theory, the devil is often represented as being unpleasantly cold to the touch; but in some cases he is described as so hot that his grasp left a scarred spot as black as charcoal.

The witches gave nicknames to their familiars, such as "My little Master," or "My dear Martin"—the latter, probably, after the heresy of Luther, and when the rack was Popish. The famous witchfinder Hopkins enables us to lengthen the list considerably. One witch whom he convicted, after being "kept from sleep two or three nights," called in five of her servitors. The first was "Holt, who came in like a white kiting;" the second, "Jarmara, like a fat spaniel without any legs at all;" the third "Vinegar Tom, who was like a long-tailed greyhound with an head like an ox, with a long tail and broad eyes, who, when this discoverer spoke to and bade him go to the place provided for him and his angels, immediately transformed himself into the shape of a child of four years old, without a head, and gave half a dozen turns about the house and vanished at the door;" the fourth, "Sack and Sugar, like a black rabbit;" the fifth, "News, like a polcat." Other names of his finding were Elemauzer, Pywacket, Peck-in-the-Crown, Grizzel, and Greedygut, "which," he adds, "no mortal could invent." Possessed persons called in higher agencies—Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Powers; and among the witnesses against Urbain Grandier we find the names of Leviathan, Behemoth, Isaacarum, Belaam, Asmodeus, and Beherit, who spoke French well, but were very poor Latinists, knowing, indeed, almost as little of the language as if their youth had been spent in writing Latin verses. A shrewd Scotch physician tried them with Gaelic, but they could make nothing of it.

TOUCHING FIDELITY.

ONE of the duties of the Academy of France is the annual distribution of a number of prizes for intellectual and moral excellence, out of moneys placed at its disposal partly by the State and partly through the bequests of liberal-minded and benevolent private parties. Among these prizes are "les prix de vertu," founded by M. de Montyon, one of the noblest philanthropists France ever possessed, and amounting to 20,000 francs per annum, which sum is annually awarded, according to the terms of his will, in amounts ranging from 3,000 to 1,000 francs, to "those inhabitants of France, in poor circumstances, that have performed the most virtuous action in the course of the year." To carry out the purpose of the testator in the strictest possible manner, the officers of the administrative branch of the Government throughout France are required to report, to the central authorities, all the meritorious deeds of persons of humble station in life that may come to their notice. The public, too, are regularly invited to bring appropriate cases to the attention of the Academy. The test of disinterestedness—the soul of true benevolence—is rigidly applied to all cases thus submitted to that tribunal. No claim to any of the prizes is considered if made, directly or indirectly, by the person to be benefited. The competition takes place, indeed, without the knowledge of the parties interested. The result of this year's concours was the unanimous award by the judges, after a careful examination of many hundred cases, of the first prix de vertu to an old negress, an ex-slave, for self-sacrificing fidelity to her master. The prize has never been more worthily bestowed. The black recipient, a native of Guadeloupe, it appears, was brought to France nearly a generation ago, as the servant of a successful planter, who returned to his native land with a view to passing the remainder of his life in the quiet enjoyment of his fortune. But an ill-turn of fate suddenly deprived him of this, and he found himself in his old age not only without any means of support of his own, but abandoned to starvation by faithless friends and relatives. But for one sympathizing soul he would have been obliged to seek refuge in an almshouse. It dwelt under the dark skin of Nympe, his grey-headed servant. She proved more faithful even in adversity than in prosperity to him. In the day time she waited upon him with the assiduity and tenderness of an own sister. At night she stole away from their lodgings and did all sorts of chores to earn the means necessary to sustain their modest ménage. With the proceeds of her nightly labours, and the charitable help of some benevolent citizens of Marseilles, which city was the scene of her touching devotion, she succeeded in saving her master from the pangs of want. This noble work she carried on unweariedly, not for weeks and months but for many years. With a refined delicacy, not often found amongst her betters, the devoted creature, in order not to humiliate her master, never told him how she passed her sleepless nights. But for the fact that the moving story was told, just as we have related it, by the secretary of the Academy, at the public distribution of the prizes, and is fully authenticated by official evidence, the reality of this example of true heroism might be questioned. In honouring the black heroine, the Academy has honoured itself.

WESTERN CHRISTIAN UNION.

THE Autumnal meeting was held on Wednesday, Oct. 28th, at Colyton, Devonshire, when friends were present from Exeter, Crewkerne, Honiton, Bridport, Bristol, &c. Divine service was conducted in the morning at St. George's meeting; the introductory worship by the Rev. H. Calloway, the sermon being preached by the Rev. T. R. Dobson, of Sidmouth, from John x. 16, "There will be one flock and one shepherd."

At the conclusion of the service the report of the committee was read and adopted, and the officers for the ensuing year appointed. The report was heard with much interest, and a desire was expressed that it should be printed without any curtailment. A collation was provided at two o'clock, after which the usual loyal toasts were given by Sir JOHN BOWRING, who presided. The Rev. R. L. CARPENTER responded to "Civil and religious liberty all the world over," and spoke of the encouragement with which the friends of freedom might regard the progress of opinion both in religion and politics.—The Rev. W. JAMES proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Calloway, for the valuable help he had given in the religious service of the morning, and to the Rev. T. R. Dobson, for the timely and excellent discourse he had delivered. Mr. James said he was glad to welcome so earnest a fellow-labourer into the district as Mr. Dobson, who had brought with him from Yorkshire a reputation which would commend him to the confidence of his brethren in the meeting, as well as to the regard of his flock.—The Rev. H. CALLOWAY and the Rev. T. R. DOBSON responded to the resolution.—JOHN WORSLEY, Esq., spoke on the subject of the Western Union, and its claims to a liberal support.—WILLIAM COLFOX, Esq., proposed the health of the Rev. A. McCombe, and thanks to the Colyton congregation, to which Mr. McCOMBE responded.

The meeting then adjourned to five o'clock, and after tea the large room was completely filled, and Sir John Bowring again kindly consented to take the chair. He opened the proceedings in an address of great power, in which he reviewed the various changes which have recently and are now taking place in Europe and America, speaking of them as eminently favourable to liberty and progress. He referred to the important crisis which had arrived in England, and urged the young, with an energy and earnestness (to which it was very touching to listen from such a veteran in the support and defence of truth and right), to let duty be the polestar of their conduct, and to cherish the broad and Catholic principles for which their fathers battled and suffered.—It was then moved by the Rev. T. R. DOBSON that the words "Free Christian" be added to the present name of the Union. This was done in conformity with a notice which had been given at the spring meeting of the Union. Mr. Dobson said he cordially approved of the spirit of the resolution, feeling that by it a move was made in the direction of that Christian unity of which they had been speaking and hearing so much that day. He might himself think it unnecessary and undesirable to relinquish the Unitarian name, but if there were (as he knew there were) Christian people who believed they could worship God better and more consistently in a place called a "Free Christian Church" than in one called "Unitarian," that was no reason why we should not give them the right hand of fellowship, for, after all, it was only a name which divided us. The doctrines preached in these Free Christian Churches were in all essentials Unitarian doctrines, and the churches were as much Unitarian as our own, except in name. Whether the public understood them or not, they understood each other, and, as this resolution fully proved, were prepared to work with each other as brethren having one aim and object in view.—The Rev. C. MATTHEWS, of Yeovil, seconded the resolution in an interesting and appropriate speech, and it was unanimously adopted.—The Rev. T. W. CHIGNELL moved the following resolution:—"That this meeting desires to express its hearty accordance with the proposal which has been made for the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, and its conviction that such a measure would not only remove many existing causes of discontent and strife, but be eminently favourable to the advancement of enlightened piety and true freedom among the Irish people."—EDWARD BERRY, Esq., of Colyton, seconded the resolution. Having lived some years in Canada, he was able to bear testimony to the beneficial results which had followed disestablishment of the Church there, in calling forth the zeal and faithfulness of its own members, and in promoting peace and charity throughout the community.—Mr. JOHN WORSLEY supported the resolution, which was carried.

The Rev. WILLIAM JAMES then proposed that the members of the association should record their grateful sense of the valuable services of the Rev. Dr. Bellows, of New York, in the cause of liberal Christianity during his recent visit to this country, and their cordial concurrence in the wish so often expressed by him for a closer union between the Unitarian ministers and churches of America and those of this country. Mr. James dwelt upon the kindness of Dr. Bellows in giving up so much of the time which he might have devoted to the various objects which claimed his attention—to communion with our societies; his earnest and brotherly sympathy and his zeal in the maintenance of Unitarian Christianity, and the catholicity of feeling with which he regarded those who differed from him. It should be the aim of the association to seek the attainment of that practical co-operation between the American and English Unitarians which Dr. Bellows so greatly desired, and which it might be hoped his influence would help to realise. Mr. James spoke with much feeling, and his remarks, of which we have been able to give only a slight sketch, were much applauded, and the resolution was carried with acclamation.—Votes of thanks were then given to Sir John Bowring (who had been compelled to leave) and to the Rev. W. JAMES, after which the meeting, the interest of which had been sustained throughout, terminated.

MINISTERS' BENEVOLENT SOCIETY.

THE sixteenth annual meeting of this society was held in Birmingham, on Wednesday, the 28th of October. The president, the Rev. S. BACHE, occupied the chair. There were present, the Revs. J. Wilson, M. Gibson, W. Cochrane, B. Wright, D. Maginnis, C. Clark, H. McKean, J. Gordon; and Messrs. T. Kenrick, J. R. Mott, A. Martin, B. Smith, S. Thornton, T. Warden.

The treasurer's report was of a highly satisfactory character; it showed that the funds of the society were steadily increasing, and that the capital now invested amounts to the sum of £12,154.

Mr. KENRICK, the treasurer, proposed an important alteration in the laws of the society, to the effect that on and after the 1st of September, 1869, no minister shall be eligible for election as a beneficiary member after he has attained the age of fifty-five.

After some discussion, the whole of which was in favour of the principle involved in the motion, Mr. Kenrick's proposal was unanimously adopted.

PORTSMOUTH.

THE third jubilee of their house of prayer was celebrated by the Unitarian congregation, at High-street Chapel, Portsmouth, on Wednesday evening, October 28th. On the previous Sunday evening, a special preparatory service was held, and a sermon preached by the Rev. H. HAWKES, B.A.; the venerable old Bible, which was presented by the congregation the very year of the opening of the chapel in High-street 150 years ago, Oct. 25th, 1718, being used during the services.

After tea in the upper school-room, which was presided over by Mrs. Eveleigh, and numerously attended, the assembly adjourned to the chapel, where, after an introductory prayer, the Rev. H. HAWKES gave a history of the congregation, going back to its commencement in Penny-street, intermingling the history with a graphic account of the persecutions to which its early founders were subject, from the operation of the Conventicle and Five Mile Acts, and the general tyranny and bigotry of the times. The exact period of the formation of the congregation is not known. The first baptism recorded in the chapel register in Penny-street, which had been very regularly kept, was in 1676. The Rev. Robert Clarke, one of the ejected ministers of Goodshill, in the Isle of Wight, was pastor in 1675. His successor, an able and enlightened minister, the Rev. John Hicks, is memorable as being one of the two individuals to whom the martyred Lady Lisle gave a night's lodging at Moyles Court, near Ringwood, after the battle of Sedgemoor, for which act of humanity the infamous Judge Jeffries had her tried at Winchester, and beheaded, notwithstanding the appeals and supplications of all parties on her behalf. Mr. Hawkes gave a most affecting narrative of the melancholy circumstances attending her trial and execution. The Rev. Francis Williams was minister from 1690 to 1703. During his pastorate, the well-known controversy took place between three Baptist and three Pædo-Baptist ministers on adult and infant baptism, which lasted from ten in the morning till between six and seven in the evening. He was succeeded by the Rev. Simon Browne, a poet, and a man of considerable literary reputation. [One of his fine hymns in the collection used at the chapel, viz., Kippis's, No. 26, commencing—

"Eternal God! Almighty cause Of earth and seas and worlds unknown," was then sung with much solemnity by the whole congregation.] Mr. Browne continued minister till 1716, and was succeeded by Mr. Norman, also author of several valuable works. The congregation removed from Penny-street to their new chapel in High-street in 1718. Mr. Norman concluded a very effective ministry in 1756, and was succeeded the following year by Dr. Wren, whose tablet, with that of his friend Dr. Silver, and those of Sir John Carter and the Rev. Russell Scott adorn the venerable chapel. Dr. Wren is perhaps best known as the philanthropist who, at the risk of personal violence to himself, and amidst much political hostility, acted the part of the good Samaritan to the American prisoners in the war of American Independence, who were placed on board ships in Portsmouth harbour, where they were treated with much rigour and harshness. Dr. Wren administered the wine and oil of consolation to the wounded and suffering, and daily carried to them articles of food suited to their condition. On one visit he received a blow on the back of his head, which nearly deprived him of life, from a hostile partizan boatman. For his kind attentions to the prisoners, having refused any pecuniary reward from the American Government, he was honoured by its public thanks and the diploma of D.D. He was succeeded, in 1778, by a gentleman of similar philanthropy and culture—the Rev. Russell Scott, who for the space of forty-five years maintained the high character of his predecessors as an able and enlightened preacher of the Gospel of Christ. With the same generous devotion to the principles of liberty which had distinguished Dr. Wren, he visited Thomas Muir and Mr. Palmer, in their confinement in 1794 on board the convict vessel at Portsmouth, patriots who were transported to New South Wales solely for their advocacy of a peaceable reform of the British House of Commons. Mr. Scott was succeeded, in 1834, by the present pastor, the Rev. Henry Hawkes.

Mr. HAWKES related various other incidents connected with the congregation. Among them he told that on the demise of Queen Anne, a Burgess of Portsmouth, Mr. John Carter, being in London, heard George the First proclaimed king, and as the speediest method in those days of conveying the important news, walked to his native town to impart it. On arriving there, and first making known the intelligence, he was placed in gaol, as a suspicious character, by the governor, who, in the uncertainty that prevailed as to the succession, was fearful of suffering a mistake to be promulgated, and detained Mr. Carter three days in limbo, till he had received from other sources the information of the accession of King George. Mr. John Carter was the grandfather of Sir John Carter, and the ancestor of the lady, Mrs. Eveleigh, who had presided at the tea table that evening.

After this historic paper had been read, the choir sang the anthem "Lord have mercy on us."

Mr. SOTHCOTT, secretary of the congregation, moved, and Mr. REDWARD, one of the trustees, seconded "Prosperity to the congregation."

"The nation's universities, may they be speedily rendered alike available to the whole nation," was proposed by Rev. E. KELL, who congratulated the meeting on the advances which had been made of late years in the admission of Dissenters to the universities, and dwelt on the hardship of their exclusion from any of the privileges possessed by institutions founded for the benefit of the whole people. The Rev. W. J. SMYTH, of Godalming, in responding to the sentiment of "Welcome to our friends from a distance," spoke of the great gratification the proceedings of the evening had afforded to visitors. The Rev. JOHN HILL proposed with much earnestness the sentiment, "May the kingdom of Christ on earth be freed from State subjugation." "Our friendly good wishes to the General Baptists" was responded to in a similar spirit by the Rev. E. R. GRANT. The Rev. W. HARGRAVE, B.A., proposed a sentiment which met with a cordial response from the meeting, with a request that it might be suitably conveyed to our Irish Unitarian friends, "Our hearty congratulations and sympathy with our brethren the Presbyterians of Ireland, who have so readily and so thoroughly concurred in the desire to emancipate Christ's religion in Ireland from all State entanglements and patronage." Mr. HENRY BLESSLY moved thanks to the choir, and also to the chairman for his very valuable and appropriate paper, which was warmly seconded by the Rev. E. KELL, who joined Mr. Blessly in the earnest wish for its publication. Between the addresses the choir, uniting with the rich tones of the organ, sang various anthems. This interesting tri-jubilee closed with the congregation joining in the hymn "From all that dwell below the skies," and with prayer by the pastor.

INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM.—The collection for the General Hospital on Sunday week at Hurst-street Unitarian Chapel was £7. 12s. 3d.

DERBY.—On Monday, October 26th, a farewell tea party to the Rev. W. Oates was held in the Friar-gate schoolroom, to make a presentation to that gentleman on his leaving Derby for Birkenhead, after a ministry of seven years. After tea, G. A. Warwick, Esq., having been unanimously voted to the chair, in the name of the congregation, with many expressions of good wishes for his future welfare and regret at parting, presented to Mr. Oates a valuable gold watch and chain and a purse containing twenty guineas, the watch bearing a suitable inscription. Mr. Oates in reply expressed his warm appreciation of the gift, and briefly reviewed his past ministerial life among them, closing with an earnest appeal to his hearers to be a united people and make every effort to build up a healthy living church. Mr. E. Needham spoke on behalf of the younger members alluding in particular to the influence exerted on the minds of the young by the life and teaching of their late pastor. Mr. T. Broughton, on behalf of the Sunday school teachers, expressed sorrow at parting with so good a friend and zealous a worker in the Sunday school. A vote of thanks having been passed to the working committee, to the choir, and to Mr. Warwick for presiding, a very enthusiastic meeting was brought to a close.

HALIFAX.—On the evening of Tuesday, the 27th ult., the parents of the scholars of Northgate End Sunday School were entertained by the teachers at a social meeting, about 150 sitting down to tea. Mr. Scott, one of the superintendents, occupied the chair. The meeting was addressed by several teachers on topics connected with the relation of parents to a Sunday school. The remarks showed the importance of parents taking an interest in the school and encouraging their children to prize and make the best use of the privileges they enjoy. The meeting was intended as an experiment, being the first of the kind in connection with this school, and was considered to be a decided success.

MANCHESTER: LOWER MOSLEY-STREET SCHOOLS. On Monday evening, the Parents' tea party and that of the Congregational Society were combined, when about 300 persons were present. The Rev. William Gaskell, who presided, adverted to the various improvements which had taken place in the schools since he first became connected with them, when they were carried on in the cellar under the old Mosley-street Chapel, and said he could testify that they were now in a more prosperous condition than they had ever been. He then at some length urged upon parents the importance of attending to the right training of their children, and showed the great and lasting effect, for good or for ill, which the education of home could not fail to have upon them. The meeting was also addressed by the Rev. J. Drummond and Dr. Marcus, and the proceedings were varied by recitations, songs, and glees.

STOCKTON-ON-TYNE.—The organ of the Unitarian Chapel having been considerably enlarged, was reopened on the 1st inst. Mr. F. W. Nicholson, organ builder, Newcastle-on-Tyne, presided at the organ. Rev. T. Timmins preached in the morning, and in the evening the Rev. Wm. Elliott gave a discourse on the "Divine Unity"—the first of a course—to a very large and attentive congregation.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. T. and W. S. P.—Received.
HEAP BRIDGE AND OLDHAM.—Next week.
R. R. J.—The author is understood to be Professor Seeley, of University College, London; the publishers are Longman and Co., and the price is 10s. 6d., or Cheap Edition 6s. 6d.
E. H.—We have not room for your letter, but if you will read T. C.'s article again you will see that the words you complain of are given as a mere quotation to mark the contrast between what is often said of such audiences and what he himself saw.

AN ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

To the Editors.—I need but trouble you with a very few words more, and these shall be to express my satisfaction that my argument is so clearly understood. If my letters have, as you say, brought into strong relief the real nature of an Established Church, and the fact that the whole nation have an interest in it, I am not so much concerned to discuss the question whether such a state of matters be an anomaly or not. It is enough to have warned Dissenters, as well as Churchmen, that disestablishment means simply the destruction of their own legitimate influence.

For my own part, I consider that an Established Church is no anomaly at all. A sect, no doubt, has in it a certain unity of purpose which gives it a greater intensity of religious life; but a sect is not a church. When you ask what right have we to impose conditions on the religious profession of others, I admit that we have none. Any man is free to make what profession of religion he pleases, either with a sect, or by himself alone. But as it is in the very nature of public worship to cultivate sentiments not peculiar to the individual, but common to the whole body of worshippers, I think the larger the basis of that agreement the better; and it is essential that each part of the community should be heard as to the terms on which they can unite in a common profession.—I remain, gentlemen, your obedient servant, JAMES GAIBDNER.

78, Delancey-street, London, N.W.,

1st November, 1868.

P.S.—I do not object to the Times or any one else making a remonstrance against ritualism, provided it be in the way of argument, and not mere clamour. To me it seems rather poor stuff to raise a stir about; but if ritualism be "pernicious" nor, sense, it ought to be shown, first, in what it is pernicious; and, secondly, whether it be against the laws of the Church or not. If it is against the law, or a law can be made against it, well and good; otherwise I object to appeals to mere popular prejudice ending in Lombard-street riots.

ROBERT HEYWOOD, ESQ.

To the Editors.—In your sketch of the life of this honoured and most estimable man, you make no allusion to the prominent part he took in the temperance movement.* In the Bolton Chronicle of last Saturday, two columns are devoted to his memory, and the writer, referring to his magisterial duties, says:—"His decisions, while ever dignified, just, and impartial, were at the same time tempered with mercy, and whenever opportunity occurred, he never failed to raise his voice against the great social curse of this nation—the indulgence in intoxicating drinks. Indeed, in his capacity as a magistrate, he was a tower of strength to the temperance cause, and ever sought to promote its progress both on the bench and on the platform, in the private circle and in public meeting, by his earnest exhortation and the liberal contributions of his purse. A short time before his decease, Mr. Heywood took an active interest in a movement which had for its object the reclamation of those unfortunate females who but too frequently are the victims of the vice of intoxicating drink, and materially assisted the Mayor in providing a home for such as showed evidence of repentance, and a desire to walk once more in the paths of sobriety and virtue." If all were as faithful in carrying out their temperance principles as Mr. Heywood was (whether as "total abstinents" or "moderationists"), intoxication would cease to be our great social curse.—Yours faithfully,

Bridport, Nov. 3rd. RUSSELL L. CARPENTER.

* [We said, "of which" (the "temperance cause") "he was always a "warm and consistent advocate."—EDS. U. H.]

THE COMING WEEK.

Leeds: HUNSLLET.—On Monday and Tuesday, bazaar in the Mill Hill Congregational Hall.

London: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, KENTISH TOWN. On Sunday, the Rev. P. W. Clayden will preach, morning and evening.

London: NEWINGTON GREEN.—On Sunday morning, a discourse by the Rev. J. K. Applebee. Subject: "Conversation with the Woman of Samaria."

Penmaenmawr: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. W. B. Hughes. Service at eleven a.m.

Sheffield: UPPERTHORPE.—On Sunday, morning and evening, organ anniversary; preacher, Rev. F. Bishop.

Stalybridge.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. Francis Revitt. Subject: "Why am I Unitarian?"

Births.

GREEN.—On the 31st ult., at Park-street, Stoke Newington, Mrs. Henry Green, of a son.

HEYWOOD.—On the 2nd inst., at Huddersfield, the wife of Mr. William Heywood, coachbuilder, of a daughter.

Marriage.

ROWLINSON-FENNER.—On the 1st inst., at Stamford-street Chapel, London, by the Rev. R. Spears, Mr. Richard B. H. Rowlinson to Miss Margaret Fenner, both of London.

Deaths.

CROOK.—On the 31st ult., at his residence, Ravenswood, near Bolton-le-Moors, in his 49th year, Henry Crook, Esq.

SHAKESPEARE.—On the 32nd ult., at Oldbury, Benjamin Shakespeare, aged 24 years, secretary of the Oldbury Unitarian Sunday School and librarian to the congregation, deeply regretted by the teachers and members of the congregation.

UNSWORTH.—On the 27th ult., aged 82 years, Jane Unsworth, of Shaw-street, Bolton-le-Moors.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing-office, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, November 6, 1868.

REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

PRICE 1D.

OF THE

MEMOIR OF TRAVERS MADGE.

SECOND-HAND ENGLISH & AMERI-

Beard's Biographical Dictionary	5
Baker's Sermons, 2 vols., good condition	13
Shaw's Discourses, Original Christianity, &c.	4
Walker (Dr.) on Practical Subjects	4
Holland's Sermons, 2 vols.	8
Sydney Smith's Sermons, 2 vols.	8
Cogan's Sermons, 2 vols.	4
Bruce's Sermons, 1 vol.	6
Evanson's Sermons, 2 vols.	4
Beilham's Discourse 5, 2 vols.	4
Wells's Lectures on the Christian's, 1 vol.	4
Lindey's (James), D.D., Sermons, 1 vol.	5
Cappe's Discourses on Practical Subjects	2
Cappe on the Providence, &c., of God, 1 vol.	2
12 Discourses, various, by Beilham and others, 1 vol.	3
Harrison's (Ralph) Sermons, 1 vol.	4
Ree's Practical Sermons, 2 vols.	6
Ethsen's Sermons on Religious Indifference	5
Jay's Discourses, 3 vols.	7
Logg's Sermons, 2 vols.	6
Bugby's Discourses, 1 vol.	3
Giles's Christian Records, 1 vol.	5
Turner's (H.) Sermons, 2d edition, 1 vol.	2
Hinck's (John) Sermons, 1 vol.	6
Kenrick's (T.) Discourses, 2 vols.	7
Houghton's Sermons, 2 vols.	7
Turner's (W.) Sermons, 1 vol.	2
Turner's (W.) Sermons, 2 vols.	3
Simpson's (J.) Sermons, 1 vol.	2
Buckminster's Sermons, 3 vols.	12
Wilson's Spiritual Catholicity	5
Bretland's Sermons, 2 vols.	6
Acton's Memoir and Sermons, 1 vol.	3
Enfield's Sermons, 3 vols.	9
Robinson's Sermons, 1 vol.	3
Rollins's (J.) Sermons, 2 vols.	7
Kethel's Sermons, 1 vol.	4
Hawker (W.) Sermons, 2 vols.	7

A Common-sense View of the Bible.
Are not we Christians Also?
Trying to believe in God.
Servetus the Martyr.
Love to Christ—the true saving faith.
Two Schemes of Salvation.
Common-sense view about Man's Nature.
Saved, yet so as by fire; or the object of future punishment.
Christianity as Christ preached it.
Do Men Mean what they Say?
Christ our Saviour, not our Substitute.
What Christ has done for us.
Think for Yourself.
The Work of the Spirit in Man's Heart.
Not what Men believe, but what they are.
Repentance the true Attainment.
For 2s. a packet containing six of each of the above Tracts.

12
All orders must now be made direct to Rev. BROOKE
HERFORD, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY,
WINE MERCHANTS.

MANCHESTER.....26, Market-street.
Liverpool11, Lord-street.
Birmingham28, High street.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

Religious liberty seems about to take another step in Norway. According to the constitution, the religion of the State is Evangelico-Lutheran, and until 1845 Dissenters were excluded from all public employment, and Jews were not even allowed to enter the kingdom. Some slight modification was made of the law in that year, by which Dissenters were permitted the exercise of Christian worship under certain restrictions, and in 1851 Jews were allowed to reside in the country. Since then three several attempts have been made, and particularly in 1865, to repeal the article which excludes from public offices persons who do not profess the State creed, and these attempts are now about to be renewed with a good prospect of success.

It used to be supposed that Italian brigands had a sneaking affection for the priests, who were ready to give them absolution when they had gone a trifle further in any little matter than was quite proper. But the raid which a band of them have made on the Scotch College, which stands on the slope of the Alban hill, carrying off the Rector, Father Campbell, and threatening to put him to death in eight days unless a ransom of 100,000 francs was forthcoming, must have fluttered the cardinals both within and without the Holy City. Only think if, some night, a body of these desperadoes were to carry off Il Santo Padre himself, what on earth would become of us all!

We are not aware whether infallibility can sink into dotage, but one of the things just reported from Rome would lead us to think so. It seems that there was in the army of General Oudinot a French sergeant named Hardouin, and that as it marched into the Holy City, the Duchess of Gallese saw him from a window, and, attracted by his handsome person, bestowed on him her hand and fortune, together with a Roman Dukedom. Soon afterwards the Duchess died, when the quondam sergeant married the pretty daughter of a shopkeeper, by whom he has a son, now about six years of age. This boy the Pope has raised to the dignity of Prince Assistant of the Throne, though in what he is to assist no one seems to know. The only two Prince Assistants that there have hitherto been were Colonna and Orsini, who held the dignity by hereditary right, and its bestowal on a child of foreign extraction and plebeian blood has given offence not only to those ancient houses, but to the whole Roman nobility, and while the people regard the Pope as a despot, the aristocracy denounce him as a revolutionist.

Considering that the Establishment not only professes to be Protestant, but, according to the Bishop of Oxford, is "the bulwark of Protestantism," some of the things which occur in it are not a little startling. A correspondent of the Times, for instance, furnishes us with a few sentences, which he wrote down at the time, of a sermon preached at St. Paul's, Brighton (Rev. Arthur Wagner's) two Sundays ago:

"Protestantism as a religion is on its death-bed. It is dying of exhaustion. It is dying for want of vital power—from having no system of cohesion in it. We have not persecuted it, as it has persecuted us. We have left it alone. . . . You all know how venomous the Protestant spirit is to all who differ from it. Now its own time has come. . . . Its own children mistrust it. . . . People now find out that to be a member of the Catholic Church is a safer thing than to sit in high places where Protestantism is. . . . The ear of God's mercy is closed to Protestantism. . . . Over the fall of such a system who can weep? It is fast falling, and by God's favour soon will be at an end."

A man named John Thompson has been committed for trial at the Southampton assizes for publishing "a certain scandalous, impious, blasphemous, and profane libel of or concerning the Holy Scriptures and the Christian religion." Better, in our opinion, have left the poor man alone, or taught him better.

We should fancy that even his backers must be getting a little ashamed of their pet, the Rev. Bruin Grant. At Leicester, the Dissenting ministers declined his challenge to a controversy on the Irish Church, intimating that they had "no personal desire to come in contact with him, either in public or private," but that they were willing to meet any other gentleman in discussion. At Whitby, when he attempted to lecture, the audience refused to hear him; whereupon, assuming a fierce pugilistic attitude, he kept bellowing out, in bearish style, "We'll lick you yet!"

It seems to us it would be only prudent for our ecclesiastical authorities to keep an eye on Father Ignatius, since, the other evening, he declared he should like to go into St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, and shatter to pieces those idols raised to earthly glory and the lust of conquest; and if he gets such iconoclastic fancies into his head, there is no saying what mischief he may do."

The newspapers announce the death of a clerical grandee of a type that is fast disappearing. The Rev. Algernon Peyton, who died the other day, had for fifty-seven years occupied a benefice—Doddington, in Cambridgeshire—the annual value of which, as set down in the "Clergy List," is £7,306, but which appears to have been worth not less than £10,000 a year.

The charge against the Rev. W. J. E. Bennett, the Vicar of Frome, of having published a work in which the Real Presence is taught, was heard last week before the Commissioners acting on behalf of the Bishop of London, when their decision was that there existed a prima facie case against the vicar, and the matter will now be carried into the Court of Arches.

The Pall Mall supplies us with this:

"The Ritualists have adopted the word 'Mass' for their celebration of the Communion Service. A near-sighted Roman priest, a stranger to Brighton, mistook S. Michael's for the Catholic Church, where he was going to say a low mass. The two churches are near one another, and both of bright red-coloured stone or brick. Attributing the apparent want of holy water at the entrance to the fault of the architect, or to his own near-sightedness, he went up the side aisle, catching a glimpse of a vested priest at the 'high altar,' and entered the sacristy. Here he asked of an attendant if he could say mass there that morning. The answer was 'that he could.' Now as the priest was unrobing before putting on the chasuble, &c., which were all spread out before him, there enters the sacristy the clergyman fresh from celebrating, attended by a 'server,' and carrying 'paten, chalice, and corporal' in as orthodox a manner as could the Pope himself. Now as the priest turned to look at this gentleman, in whom he expected to find the Parochus of the Catholic community, his eye lighted upon three university hoods. 'Do you wear hoods here?' he inquired. The clergyman answered that such was their custom. 'I was told,' says the priest, hesitating, 'that I could say Mass here this morning.' 'So you can,' returns the clergyman blandly. 'But—ahem—is this a Catholic Church?' 'Yes,' was the calm answer. 'Ah!' says the priest, 'is it the Roman Catholic Church?' 'Oh!' replies the Ritualist meekly, 'you must go lower down for that.'"

The Tablet, which has just been placed under the editorship of Father Vaughan, tells us that in one month of the present year 104 persons were received into the Church of Rome in London alone. Another paragraph, however, in the same paper, makes us a little suspicious of the Father's accuracy, for he informs us that "an invitation to accompany an illustrious bishop as theologian to the Council was declined by F. Newman some months ago," and regrets that F. Newman's "age and health" compelled him to do so. No doubt, F. Newman would be able to counsel the Pope's counsellors on not a few points of importance, but we question whether he has been invited to take the place of his brother Dr. H. Newman.

Signor G. Damiani, "foreign correspondent of the British Association of Progressive Spiritualists," has published a pamphlet, "Spiritualism versus Positivism," in which he offers two challenges to "G. H. Lewes, Esq., Professor Tyndall, et hoc genus cæcorum;" one, to "prove by evidence sufficient to establish any fact in history, or in a criminal or civil court of justice:—1. That intelligent communications and answers to questions put, proceed from dead and inert matter in a manner inexplicable by any generally recognised law of nature. 2. That dead and inert matter does move without the aid of any mechanical or known chemical agency, and in defiance of all the admitted laws of gravitation. 3. That voices appertaining to no one in the flesh are heard to speak and hold rational converse with them." A jury of twenty-four gentlemen, twelve to be chosen by each party, to decide, by a majority, whether these propositions are conclusively proved by witnesses of established character; and if the verdict is that they are not, then, each party having previously deposited 500 guineas in some bank, the whole amount shall belong to the one accepting this challenge; but if the verdict is that the propositions are proved, then the 1,000 guineas to go to Mr. Damiani. The other challenge, with the same conditions, is to establish the facts contained in the above propositions "by experiments conducted in the actual presence" of the twenty-four gentlemen who have decided the previous wager. We don't see why the two challenges should be linked together. If the object is to open the eyes of the "cæci," a decision on the second would be sufficient.

The Free Church Society has issued an address to municipal and parliamentary electors, calling upon them to insist upon the restoration of "absolute freedom of worship—a principle, formerly universal, and a practice injurious to none, but beneficial to all, agreeable to the law of God, and to the precepts of Christ and his apostles."

It is stated that at several places in the rural districts of Westmoreland and Craven, there is a remarkable conversion to the principles of Quakerism going on, the villagers gathering together in considerable numbers to worship in silence, with occasional readings of Scripture and exhortations by six or eight friends who visit them from Kendal, and Bentham (near Lancaster).

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS.

A correspondent of the Pall Mall gives the following gloomy picture of the condition to which the Roman Church has been reduced in Spain:

"Once upon a time it was, I believe, as rich and influential an establishment as the English is at the present day. Unhappily, she has successively lost one by one all the sources of her prestige, and every hold she had upon the conscience of the people, viz., learning, breeding, and wealth, not to speak of exemplary life. From the fact that the Church, of all professions, is the cheapest, shortest, and easiest attainable, and also the most obscure and worst remunerated, the clergy is now recruited from the lower ranks of society. They are taught to read, not to understand, Latin, and to peruse a clumsy compendium of casuistry, called from its author the 'Larraga.' The whole of the Church property having been confiscated, they are, besides, reduced to a condition little removed from beggary. What has, therefore, become of the Spanish Church? She may be said to consist of a small bureau appended to the Ministry of Grace and Justice, headed by a first-class clerk, and of a personnel of Government employés, called curates and bishops, rejoicing in salaries of from £40 to £800 per annum. No such thing as convocation, no ecclesiastical courts or judges, exist in Spain; church rates are unknown, and the correspondence of the Spanish clergy with the See of Rome is an offence punishable by the criminal code. To finish the tableau, the people have become partly enlightened, but still more infected, with French indifference, esprit-fortism, and socialism. Special correspondents, therefore, need not wonder at the deserted state of the Madrid churches, nor seek in the immediate effects of the revolution the explanation of a fact which has a deeper and older origin."

In his visit to Civita Vecchia the other day, Pio Nono made one of those ready little turns of speech for which he is noted. In mounting to the throne on which he was to receive the homage of the French general and other officials, one of the planks which formed the steps gave way and threw the papal chair out of its equilibrium. Not disconcerted by this, the old man rose and said, "The chair of St. Peter sometimes shakes, but never falls."

As illustrative of the superstition of the people about Fontainebleau, which is the most Papist town in the neighbourhood of Paris, a correspondent of the Independent mentions that in one of the avenues of the forest is a chapel erected to the Virgin. In this chapel, as well as in the parish church, a number of blue handbills are posted about, stating that some time ago a gentleman whilst riding through the forest was thrown off his horse and dragged a considerable distance, that having prayed to the Virgin to deliver him, and having promised to build her a chapel if she would do so, the Virgin immediately appeared in a tree, stopped the horse and saved him. This scene is represented on the painted ceiling of the chapel, a great number of the people devoutly believe it, and once a year they have a general holiday, and walk in grand procession to the chapel in honour of it.

Writing on the kind of man needed for the Primacy, the Spectator says:

"It is rather a humiliating consideration, that, if we had a second St. Paul amongst us, he would be the last man any existing Church would be inclined to put in a position of authority,—and we believe this applies not merely to the Establishment, but to the Churches which are pleased to call themselves 'Free.' By common consent he would be voted the most dangerous of men, with 'wild' notions of faith, of charity, and of discipline, with a tendency to transcendental extravagance which the High-and Dry school would deplore, with a tendency to universalism which the Low school would condemn, with a tendency to see a Divine grace in secular institutions at which the Dissenters would stand aghast, and yet a tendency to find God everywhere over which politicians would shrug their shoulders. If such a one should say, in spasmodic apology for an appearance of egotism he detested, 'I speak as a fool,' men of the world would agree with him; and if he talked of the weak things of the world confounding the mighty, and the things which are not bringing to naught the things which are, the whole hierarchy would rise up in horror at his revolutionary sentiments, and be inclined to cry out with the persecutors of the Apostle himself, 'Away with such a fellow from the earth, for it is not fit that he should live!' But we are not recommending the Government to appoint a man of this type, first because we have not, as far as we know, got such a one at all; and secondly, because, if we had, we might as well cry for the moon as ask for so dangerous a person in the see of Canterbury."

To the question, "Why do English people like Dissent?" The Church News gives the following kind and courteous answer:

"There are in every parish which displays any signs of activity various kinds of Dissenters. There are the downright wicked Dissenters, distinguished by their intense hatred to the Church and all authority, by their love of the worst public-house in the parish, and by their attendance at their meeting place once on Sunday. There are the time-serving, poor Dissenters—people who like to have two strings to their bow, who get what they can out of the parish clergy, and also what they can from the minister. They do not oppose the Church—nay, they sometimes go to the church; they do their best to serve God and mammon together. In their heart they despise and look down on the Dissenting gentleman because they know he is a poacher on the Church's preserves, and generally an illiterate, vulgar, and unrefined poacher into the bargain; still he has a shilling or two to spare occasionally, and poor human nature may as well have that shilling if it can. There are the Dissenters who have always been Dissenters, and thank the goodness and the grace which made them not children of Church people. Lastly, there are the people who wish to get to heaven easily, and prefer Dissent because, under that system, self-denial, fasting, prayer, penance, week day religion, or anything opposed to the feelings and wishes of the carnal man, are steadfastly opposed and uniformly rejected. Dissent is eminently a religion of self. Obedience, humility, and charity are virtues unknown to it. Dissenters have nothing, but are merely tolerated in this land of civil and religious liberty; and having nothing, they look with envy on the Established Church, and wish us to lose our tails also."

Dean Alford's "Church of the Future," of course, has exposed him to Tory resentment. Though he does not argue against the principle of religious establishments, Blackwood contends that he is inconsistent in not doing this, and argues that not only do such reasonings and anticipations of the approaching doom of establishments as the Dean indulges in, dishearten the garrison and prepare it to submit rather than to fight, but the effect is that "they prefer to yield, and to console themselves with the vision of happier days, to be spent under the shelter of independence, and under the sway of a rule more purely ecclesiastical. The portentous event has already begun to make its appearance of clergymen calmly meeting to consider, not whether disestablishment is a good or an evil thing, but what organisations the Disestablished Church shall create. In this mood of mind lies the true danger. It is a disintegrating force, and in the long run the action of disintegration is far more powerful than that of violence." Our contemporary even fears that many clergymen will begin to amuse themselves with pleasant dreams of the advantages of independence, till they come almost, if not altogether, to welcome disestablishment. Can it be!

The British Quarterly gives us this pen-and-ink sketch of Neander, "the greatest ecclesiastical historian the world has ever possessed":

"He was by birth a German Jew, and so completely Jewish was his appearance that in the streets of London he would probably have been mistaken for an old clothesman. His short, spare, bent figure, hooked, fleshy nose, bushy eyebrows, thick, black hair, large mouth, high cheekbones, and round chin, all bore witness to his nationality; while his long-tailed coat, shabby brown hat, and unfashionable jack-boots were quite in keeping with his otherwise Israelitish contour. Nevertheless there was in his eye a calm, subdued, and heavenly fire that spoke of divinest thoughts, nobler sentiments, and a higher world than that with which the large majority of his kinsmen are absorbed."

An article on "snipe-shooting" in the Pall Mall concludes thus wickedly:

"The financial crisis which interrupted so many schemes for branch lines and making sugar out of peat occurred providentially for the interest of snipe shooting; and who knows but that the Established Church has had to do with the prospects of our sister isle as a snipe-breeding or snipe-haunted country?"

The same paper comments thus heretically on the principle, which Mr. Bright laid down in one of his speeches at Edinburgh, that "as a whole we are anxious to act honestly and rightly"—an assumption which runs through the whole of his speech, and indeed through the whole of his public life:

"Is it reconcilable with the theology of any Christian Church in the world? Is not the whole fabric of theology based upon the contrary supposition? and does not the cheerful view of human nature which it implies evacuate of all their real meaning such doctrines as eternal punishment, and, in a word, systematic theology in general? If, as a rule, men are rather good than bad, and nothing but a little common sense is required to set everything straight, what is the meaning of a scheme which asserts from first to last that the human race is under an awful curse, from which it can be but partially freed by means the contemplation of which fairly overwhelm the human mind? Such a life as Mr. Bright's is, if we consider it fairly, as strong a protest against the theology which pervades the Westminster Confession, the Thirty-nine Articles, and the decrees of the Council of Trent, as was ever uttered by the Savoyard vicar."

Mr. Joseph Barker has been writing on the Irish Church question in a way which leads some to think that he is looking to an end of his many wanderings in the bosom of the Establishment. He does not condescend to reason on the subject, but considers it enough to state that it is an "erroneous impression" to suppose "that the Church of Ireland is a manifest failure, and always must be till it is disendowed;" "that the Irish Church ought to be abolished because it is a minority;" "that the Irish Church is a very expensive establishment, &c;" and he cautions Dissenters and Methodists against "joining hands with infidels, Romanists, and fanatical revolutionists for the spoliation and humiliation of a hard-working and useful sister Church." This leads a correspondent of the Methodist Times to make some awkward references to Mr. Barker's past career which it would have been wiser in him not to have given occasion for.

In trying to account, at Maidstone, for the Irish Church not having more converts to show, Mr. Gathorne Hardy said the reason was that those who were converted were afraid to avow their conversion; and in proof of this he mentioned that large numbers of Roman Catholics, when they emigrated to America, changed their faith. Retain the Established Church, he says; it makes no converts, but this is owing to the opposition of the priests, as you may learn from the fact that as soon as the Romanists get to America, where there is no Established Church whatever, they turn Protestants directly. Surely, as the Pall Mall observes, "The reasoning points to the very opposite inference. If your object is to get the better of Rome, and if (as you say) the Establishment fails in this, and the voluntary system succeeds, try the latter."

In the John Bull, a Conservative Landlord recommends a method by which "the triumph of the Church and Conservative cause may easily be secured," that looks almost like an imitation of Defoe's fine piece of irony, "The Shortest Way with the Dissenters." He says, Conservative Churchmen hold some fifteen-twentieths of the property of England, and have three-fourths of the expenditure of the country in their hands, and his advice is:

"Let them have no dealings whatsoever with any one but with sound Conservative Churchmen, and they will soon find the consciences of the various sectaries and other Liberals to be of so pliable a character that they will unhesitatingly accede to the wishes of their customers, and to a very great extent let Dissent and Liberalism go to the dogs."

But persons acting thus would be denounced by the Liberal press:

"Let them howl until their throats are sore. They thus show, beyond dispute, the excellency of the system I am advocating. If I had a thousand farms to let, or places for a thousand workmen, I would not have anything to do with any Liberal or liberty-of-conscience Dissenter of any sect whatsoever. They would cover the land with cockatrice's eggs, which would produce discontent, disrespect, disobedience, resistance, and every evil work, according as each man's liberty of conscience might desire or suggest. Let some means be immediately adopted to ascertain the names and residences of tradesmen of Conservative Church principles, and let them be published, and I for one will engage never to spend a farthing with anyone else. Thus fighting our enemies with their own effectual weapons, property and influence will have their influence, and we shall triumphantly succeed."

Although the Establishment has no doubt suffered a good deal lately, we were not aware that it was reduced to such a state of weakness as the Church News supposes, which says that if Mr. Bennett's doctrine be formally and explicitly condemned, the days of the Established Church are infallibly numbered.

In a paper, read at the Dublin Congress, on "The Church and her younger members," and since published in the Fortnightly Review, the Rev. F. W. Farrar, one of the masters at Harrow, spoke out thus plainly and boldly to an audience of Church dignitaries:

"The first principle which I would lay down as essential to win over the generation which is growing up around us is the disavowal of sacerdotalism. By an organised system, by extravagant pretensions, by unflinching dogmatism, by the bold usurpation of an authority which is not ours—partisans may be gained amongst the ignorant and enthusiasts amongst the weak; but he must be blind to every sign of the present and every lesson of the past who does not see unmistakably that there is and must be an ultimate and fatal loss of influence in any teaching which tends to exalt the priest above the people, or to put into sacerdotal hands an uncontrolled authority in spiritual affairs. Christianity can only prevail among the young by being Christianity—that is, by being the religion of the Spirit, the religion whereby every man may have immediate direct personal access to God through Jesus Christ." We, as well as High Churchmen, may be the better for studying these plain yet noble words.

LITERARIA.

MR. WALLIS, the editor of the Tablet, the organ of the Disraelite Romanists, has announced with some satisfaction that in relinquishing the management of that paper he places it in such good hands as Dr. Vaughan's, a Roman Catholic priest, and says:

"It is a satisfaction to me to know that I am handing the Tablet over to one of the 'old English Catholics.' I don't think I would have conveyed it to anybody but an Englishman; and, speaking generally, and allowing for exceptions, I should not be well pleased if I had parted with it to a convert."

It may interest some of our readers to know that the gentleman who has succeeded Mr. J. D. Cook in the editorship of the Saturday Review is Mr. Philip Harwood, formerly minister of the Unitarian congregation at Bridport, and afterwards associated with the late Mr. W. J. Fox. Mr. Harwood is said to have been the working editor of the Saturday almost from its commencement.

Messrs. J. Parker and Co. announce, as "nearly ready," the much-desired "Memoir of the late Rev. John Keble," by Sir John T. Coleridge.

Mr. Scott, of Ramsgate, has issued "Comments on a Pamphlet by Dean Close," in which the Dean's assumption of a quasi infallibility, while condemning Bishop Hind's defence of free inquiry, is vigorously exposed. In the course of it, the Dean is thus sharply, but deservedly, taken to task:

"To prescribe the limits of discussion, is to claim a Papal prerogative—to make oneself Pope among Protestants. Can so well-informed a man as Dean Close, who can reason so keenly against Catholics, forget that Protestants have expurgated the Catholic Bible and ejected the Apocrypha? Is he possibly ignorant that the Pastor Hermas was read in early churches as a sacred book? And now, by what right does he forbid Protestants to carry the expurgation a little further? Nay, he carefully applies the term infidelity to a venerable ex-Bishop for believing that the Articles and Ordination Service leave the question open. The Bishop, is not (in his own belief) opposing, but is only interpreting, the Church. But suppose he were consciously opposing the Church? Is it, then, possible that Dean Close, that eminent Protestant, that Low Church vindicator of Luther and Wickliffe, now in his old age is become a champion of renouncing private judgment and submitting humbly because 'THE CHURCH has spoken?' If he stiffly deny this to be his meaning, we fear he will drive us to infer that Bishop Hind is to submit because 'Dean Close has spoken,' and lest Dean Close call him 'infidel.'"

The Rev. Josiah Bull has just published a fresh life of "John Newton, of Olney," in which there is a good deal that is new and interesting. Mr. Bull, whose father was on intimate terms with Newton is not only the heir of many traditions, and the possessor of a large correspondence, but has been so fortunate as to obtain a diary unknown to previous biographers, and extending over fifty-seven years, in which there is much that serves to make us better acquainted with this remarkable man, and likewise with the times in which he lived. Amid many devout utterances there are inserted a couple of letters addressed to Captain John Newton, promising him as many slave-boys and slave-girls as he needs, as if there were nothing whatever wrong in it. At one time John seems to have felt inclined to throw in his lot with the Baptists or the Independents, instead of with the Church. Like some other successful preachers, we learn, that he broke down in his first sermon, and left the pulpit in great mortification and trouble.

Dr. Rigg, a leading Methodist minister, promises a work on "the Relations of John Wesley and Wesleyan Methodism to the Established Church."

Among Mr. Murray's list of forthcoming publications is "Annals of St. Paul's Cathedral," by the late Dean Milman.

Dr. Halley, formerly minister in Manchester, and now tutor in one of the Independent colleges, is about to publish, in a few weeks, a work, on which he has been engaged for many years, called "Lancashire: its Puritanism and Nonconformity," in which, it is said, he will shew the important influence which Puritan feeling has had in forming the character of the people in the north of England.

We need do little more than draw the attention of our readers to Mr. Martineau's Address at the opening of the present Session of Manchester New College, which has been published under the title of "A Word for Scientific Theology in appeal from the Men of Science and the Theologians." Clearly and beautifully, Mr. Martineau points out that, though "no one would have devised them, or resorted to them, but for a necessity of conscience," yet such Colleges as that with which he is connected have something to plead by way of set-off against the poverty of their resources: "In the spiritual field it is not always the most elaborate husbandry that produces the most ample fruits; and the very self-abnegation which could dispense with the honours, if only it could find the light, of knowledge,—nay, even the struggle to keep pace on foot with the well-mounted official guides on the road of truth,—favoured a manly, strenuous, and disinterested tone of mind, without which the most delicate scholarship becomes a lifeless personal accomplishment." He puts well, too, the plea for still maintaining "our own school" as serving, and as far as he knows, serving alone, "as an asylum for the hunted and banished idea of 'a scientific theology.'" He then goes on to reply, in his own thoughtful and felicitous manner, to the question whether there is such a thing as this; and leaves us well satisfied with the conclusion that "there is a future still for philosophical theology; and the death with which, from the time of Epicurus to that of Comte, it has been so often threatened by the expositors of natural laws and molecular hypotheses, will yet be postponed. 'Modern thought' is strong, but ancient trusts are stronger; and with the vigour of eternal youth they will reassert their moral power, as the inexhaustible springs of noble and reverent action, and vindicate their intellectual place, as the immovable bases of any satisfying philosophy."

BUT FOR MIRACLES JESUS WOULD HAVE PREMATURELY PERISHED.

THE same murderous hand that put John to death would have slain Jesus at the outset of his career, had the latter possessed no other safeguard than moral ascendancy. The priest-craft and king craft that so narrowly watched and so ruthlessly destroyed the Baptist, could not be indifferent to the aims and efforts of Jesus. What, then, shielded Jesus from their wiles? Let us not deal with these matters in the abstract. Let us look at them in the light of modern instances. Jesus was a carpenter, and the son of a carpenter. "Rude in speech" to "ears polite," he was attired meanly, and without "where to lay his head." Learning his employment, he emerges from a cottage in a despised village of a despised province, and begins to travel up and down his native land accompanied by a few persons of a condition similar to his own. As he proceeds, he everywhere scatters words which savour of blasphemy and sedition in the ears of the ecclesiastical and political authorities. At last apprehended, he is tried, and found guilty of those crimes. He is crucified.

This is the end to which he is brought by the rulers of the land. The interval between the opening and the close of his public career is variously estimated. Take the shortest. Then, how during twelve months did Jesus contrive to evade his enemies? Moral ascendancy would have no effect with them? Where could it avail? With the multitude? The Jewish populace were little likely to be deeply and permanently impressed by a lofty example. Capable of enthusiasm they were; but their enthusiasm was only momentary. And such as it was, it sprang not from moral ascendancy, but from fanaticism, partly religious, partly political. This, its origin, occasioned its weakness. It broke down the moment it was undeceived by learning that Jesus was a teaching and suffering servant of God, rather than the long-predicted and now intensely longed for conquering and triumphant prince. The worshipped idol proved a fetich in their judgment, and then they were as indignant and brutal as they before were mean and superstitious. Even among the more soundhearted of the population Jesus had no safe foothold or retreat, for when real peril came his personal associates forsook him and fled. It is in the nature of things that he should have been betrayed and put to death.—Dr. Beard's "Manual of Christian Evidence."

AMERICAN NOTES.

The New York Observer says:—

"About one-fourth of all the clergy of the Episcopal Church in this country have come out of the Methodist Church, and some of these have become eminent and Conservative Bishops."

The Detroit Post, of Oct. 8, says:—

"Yesterday, the Great Western Railway landed 60 Mormons here, where they take the Michigan Central, en route for the valley of Salt Lake. More than 5,000, of whom 3,500 passed through Detroit, of these fresh converts to the Latter Day Saints have gone from European countries to Utah during the past season, but yesterday's lot was the last for 1868. The agent says that during 1869 he will import 10,000 or 12,000 of these people. It is said by those who have seen the Mormons of this year's importations that they are scarcely as intelligent and cleanly in appearance as the other immigrants."

From an article in the Nation, N. Y., on the two Conventions, the Episcopal and the Unitarian, which have been sitting in New York, we take a few extracts, which we think will interest our readers.

"The troubles of the Episcopal Church in America are substantially the same as those of the mother Church in England, barring the connection of the latter with the State. Or, rather, there is only one radical trouble in either, of which all the others are offshoots—and that is, the official character of the clergy. The question which lies at the root of all the questions by which the Anglican Church is agitated is, Is the minister a priest, or only a teacher or pastor? If he is a priest, endowed with supernatural gifts and graces, and his work be the offering of sacrifice, there is nothing to blame in Ritualism, or in the gradual retreat from communion or sympathy with the other Protestant denominations, and in the tendency to assimilation to the Church of Rome both in doctrine and discipline, which the Anglican Church has been displaying for the last forty years. As it is impossible to set limits to the pomps and ceremonies of worship which consists in the offering up of so tremendous a sacrifice as the Eucharist is believed to be, many priests and many worshippers will naturally, after they have exhausted their taste and ingenuity in the devising of dresses and decorations and music, feel that all they have done is still unworthy of the occasion, and a very imperfect expression of the sentiments with which it inspires them. Anybody who considers attentively what Ritualists, or even High Churchmen, mean when they speak of a 'Christian priest,' and what the nature of 'a priest's' functions are, must feel that it would be improper, if not impossible, to attempt to define or regulate his manner of expressing the awe with which he regards his own character and duties.

"If, too, the Anglican clergy are priests and their work be sacrifice, there is, of course, impropriety in their officiating in the churches of other denominations, or in their associating on terms of equality with the clergy of other denominations. To acknowledge the validity, or even the value, of any other ordination than their own is to throw a doubt over the nature of their own. So that the Church which in the severteenth and eighteenth centuries was a portion of the body of European Protestantism, has, as the sacerdotal theory has gained ground in it, been withdrawing from fellowship even with the Protestant churches of the Continent, whom it cannot call Dissenters, and the High Churchmen now repudiate all connection with them, and have been seeking communion with the Greek Church, the more advanced members of the school being nearly ready to seek communion with Rome. The Greek Church has, however, given them plainly to understand that the 'fusion' is not possible, and that nothing in its eyes, any more than in those of the Roman Church, will supply the place of a continuous and unbroken descent from the Apostolic age.

"The trouble is not so serious as yet in America as in England, where social influences aggravate it; but it is growing, and finds expression in various ways.

"The Unitarian difficulty is a somewhat singular one. At every one of their conventions now an attempt is made by the moderates to secure the adoption of a creed or list of fundamental principles, and the attempt is invariably defeated by the radicals, who refuse to be bound; not because there is nothing that they consider fundamental, but because they wish to preserve their intellectual freedom. All, however, wish to keep up the denominational organisation and to see it flourish, and even to give it an aggressive character. They send out missionaries, subscribe for colleges, keep two or three periodicals going, and at this last meeting determined to establish a denominational review. The denomination, nevertheless, is not flourishing. In fact, if closely examined, it would be found that it was declining. Particular churches flourish, owing to the character and ability of particular ministers, but every kind of denominational work languishes. The denominational spirit is one of the feeblest things of the kind in existence—so feeble, in fact, that one would hardly be surprised to hear any day that it was extinct.

"Now, the reason of this is not far to seek. The deduction, both from experience and principles of human nature, that you cannot have a flourishing and aggressive religious organisation without a creed, is simple and impregnable. Whether creeds are good or bad things for the individual man may be a subject of doubt; but that they are to religious denominations the breath of life there can be no doubt whatever. At present the Unitarian body, or rather the radical wing of it, is founded on a negation, and a negation may serve as a basis for a religious organisation, if supported by something in the shape of persecution; but as soon as the majority becomes tolerant, and there is no mixture of sacrifice and suffering in holding to the negation, the organisation has to begin to construct, or it is lost. What aggravates the difficulty in the case before us is, that not only do the Unitarians not agree in affirming anything, but they do not agree in denying anything. Now, a negation which is of universal acceptance is, as we have said, not very useful, but a negation in which there is no general concurrence is worthless. Mere intellectual sympathy, or sympathy of any kind, is too subtle a thing to hold a religious organisation together. You may found a school of philosophy or a society of speculative inquirers on it, but you cannot found a church, and, above all, a church militant, a growing and aggressive church. A French bishop spoke the other day of the phrase, 'I believe,' as a 'grand cri de guerre,' and so it has proved in all ages; but hosts were never led to battle with the cry, 'I deny,' or 'I don't believe.' Protestantism at the Reformation took good care not to content itself with a simple repudiation of Romish doctrines. It denied nothing without supplying an affirmation. It substituted justification by faith for justification by works, and the reading of the Scriptures by the individual believer for oral instruction by the priest. Mr. Collier said, the other day, at the convention, in opposing the adoption of a creed, that 'after having taken his neck out of the collar of one dogmatic church, he was not disposed to insert it in the collar of another,' a sentiment which elicited loud applause. But then the value of this proposition depends on the nature of Mr. Collier's aims. If he wishes simply to be a wild horse, and disport himself in the green pastures of speculative inquiry, of course he need wear no yoke; but if he wishes to form part of a team that is to move anything, the insertion of his neck in the collar is essential. Against anybody's unwillingness to subscribe to a creed we have nothing to say; but the belief which many people seem to entertain that a permanent religious organisation can be based on this unwillingness alone, and needs no substructure of affirmation, always reminds us of the old Scotch judge's account of society in the Highlands, which, he said, was based on 'the grand fundamental principle o' want o' breaks.'"

The Rev. W. M. Punshon writes to the Methodist Recorder:

"I wish your readers to receive 'with becoming diffidence any statements concerning myself or my movements which are not authenticated by my own consciousness. Thus when your exchanges or contemporaries tell you that I am a 'doctor,' that I gave a wonderfully apt reply to a Barnum on a recent occasion; that I take six months to prepare a new lecture; that I received 500 dollars for delivering one in Chicago, and a few other like stories; it is as well that you should know, once for all, that I am conscious of none of these things, and that unless I am a practised somnambulist, they have not happened to me in the flesh."

THE HEADSHIP OF THE CHURCH.

MR. SPURGEON has just published a sermon on this subject, in which we meet with the following characteristic passage:—

"We make no bones about the matter, kings and queens are no heads of the church to us. We will no more brook spiritual domination from an English premier than from a Romish pope; we are equally opposed to both—all human headship must go down. To our well-beloved Queen all honour and reverence as to one of the best rulers in civil affairs, but in spiritual affairs in the church of Christ she has no ruling power; what she may have in the Church of England is another question. To us it makes no matter whether it be man or woman, whether it be prince or priest, we will have neither czar, emperor, queen, pope, seraph or angel to reign in the church of Jesus Christ. The church hath no lawful governor or supreme lord but Jesus Christ himself. Our Lord, as it seems to me, puts this so plainly in the Word, that I marvel men who believe in the Bible should think the State could be at the head of the Church. The State-Church party have placed a Bible with a crown and sceptre upon their bills! It is suggestive that the Bible is closed, for if Englishmen were once to read it, it would be fatal to the cause which now claims it, since one of the truths they would read would be this, 'My kingdom is not of this world;' and they would hear Christ say, 'Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's'—that is, yield all civil obedience to the civil authority, 'but unto God the things that are God's.' Leave the Lord to rule in the kingdom of mind and spirit, and let Cæsar keep his kingdom of civil government; let the State do its work and never interfere with the Church, and let the Church do her work and never interfere with, or be interfered with by the State. The two kingdoms are separate and distinct. Broad lines of demarcation are always drawn, throughout the whole of the New Testament, between the spiritual and the temporal power, and the mischief is when men cannot see this. Christ is the head of the Church, not any one who represents the State. Brethren, just think for a minute what mischief this doctrine of the headship of the State has done. Time was when men could hardly be parish beadies, without coming to take the Sacrament at the Established Church. Oh! the multiplied hypocrisies which were perpetrated every day by graceless men who came to qualify themselves for office by taking the emblems of our holy faith when they knew not Christ! Such things are more or less inevitable to the system. Think again what persecutions have arisen out of this error. You cannot put any sect into a position of ascendancy but it falls into persecution; all sects have persecuted in turn when so tempted. There is not a pin to choose between one and the other, except, as I sometimes say, the Baptists have never persecuted because they have never had an opportunity; but I will not insist even upon that. It is human nature to do ill when the civil arm is ready to crush conscience, and therefore Christ has taken the temptation out of the way, and put it out of the possibility of his people, if they keep close to his rule, so much as to touch the carnal weapon. The weapons of their warfare, he tells them, are not carnal but spiritual, and therefore mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds."

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1868.

ELECTION HONESTY AND INDEPENDENCE.

It is not often we refer to political concerns, but there are points at which great moral principles so clearly touch matters usually considered to lie within the domain of politics, that we cannot withhold our testimony without appearing to shrink from the duty of the hour. No one can help feeling that an important crisis in our national life is at hand. The duty of taking a part in the election of those who for years to come must give the character to the government of this country is falling upon hundreds and thousands that hitherto have had no direct voice in the representation. Among these will probably be some thousands of our own readers, and we cannot refrain from such words of counsel as may perhaps help some of them to see in a more solemn and impressive light the importance of their new part being taken worthily.

We have nothing to say now in favour of the support of this or that party. So far as the great questions of the time involve the broader principles of Church life, we have again and again endeavoured to set forth what we believe to be the truth. But infinitely more important than the speedy triumph of a true policy in Parliament is the prevalence of political honesty and independence among the people. The policy we advocate can wait, and if it is right and true, time will fight for it, and when at last established, it will rest upon a surer basis. But the tricks and deceits, the exaggerations and personalities, the questionable influences, and even the positive corruption into which the advocates of right and just measures sometimes suffer themselves to be drawn in the emergency of a close political contest, these sap the very foundations of political life, and do a mischief which no speedier victory can either remedy or compensate. We hope, indeed, that it is unnecessary to urge upon Unitarians the mere elementary duty of personal honesty in such matters. This is so plain that we can hardly conceive of any right-minded man, who believes in our straightforward views of morality, going astray. One of our laymen being catechised sometime ago as to what Unitarianism is, replied, "A Unitarian is a man who believes in one God, and pays twenty shillings in the pound;" and, in spite of occasional glaring exceptions, we trust that the description, rough and ready though it be, is not altogether wide of the mark, and expresses that general sense of the necessity of a sturdy morality which with all their imputed theological deficiencies is generally ascribed to Unitarians. But there are those who, though they feel bribery and undue influence to be base and mean, and would resent any attempt to tamper with their own independence, content themselves with this, and do not stand out manfully as they ought to do against any resort to such things by their party. They half excuse them as evil necessities of war, or as forced upon them by the unscrupulousness of opponents. We would urge, therefore, the duty—the paramount duty, as we believe, of the present time—of those who feel the wrongfulness of all such things, setting their faces utterly against them—refusing to have any part or lot with those who are guilty of them—marking in the most open way their reprobation of such guilty parties as public enemies, and taking their stand not in boastful self-righteousness, but as men who dare not consent even by silence, to such baseness, for a high, pure standard of political fairness and honour. All the more is this necessary, because our Parliaments, largely composed of members far from clean-handed in the matter, have hitherto shrunk from grappling with the question, and refused to treat those guilty of bribery as the deliberate felons that in God's sight they are. All the more also is it necessary, because every day brings some fresh proof of the laxity in regard to this of the conscience of the middle and upper classes. Only this week an illustration which we cannot forbear noticing comes to us from Lancaster. It might have been hoped that if the Lancaster conscience had not become utterly depraved the exposures of a few years ago would touch it into some sense of shame and propriety, and that henceforth those who had been foremost in bring such lasting discredit on the town, if they did not hide their own heads in decent obscurity would at least not be singled out for public honour. How far this hope has been justified may be gathered from the fact that on Monday last the Lancaster Town Council elected as the chief magistrate for the next year the man who was reported by the commissioners to have been "the most profuse briber on either side." Nor did they do this under the spur of some momentary exigency, or without fair warning of the light in which it must be regarded by all men who are not hopelessly tainted by living in a corrupt political atmosphere. The selection of this man had been made some days previously at one of those semi-private caucus meetings which are expressly justified upon the ground that they enable a corporate body to select their officers with more scrupulous care. Moreover, this semi-private selection got wind in the town, and a number of gentlemen, among whose names we are proud to find those of two of our own ministers, the Revs. J. C. LUNN and DAVID DAVIS, signed a memorial to the council on the subject. The memorial set forth that having heard that at a private meeting the Council had resolved to nominate Mr. Councillor COUPLAND to the office of Mayor for the ensuing year, the memorialists felt "constrained by a sense of public duty to protest against the selection, as first magistrate, of one who, however estimable in other respects, is reported by Her Majesty's Commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at the last election for members to serve in Parliament by the borough, to have been the most profuse of any briber on either side." Assured, moreover, that such a selection would be fatal to every hope for the restoration of the franchise to the borough, it urged a reconsideration of the proposed step, and "the selection of some other recipient of the highest honour a community can confer. How much such a protest was needed, and how great was the moral courage required in making it, may be best gathered from the fact that it was utterly unheeded. We suppose this action on the part of the Council must be reluctantly accepted as symptomatic of the tone of feeling prevalent in the town. No doubt the memorialists will be ridiculed there as puritans, even if not attacked as wanton disturbers of social harmony. We believe, however, that they will receive the honour of all honest men elsewhere, as surely as they have the answer of a good conscience. Such an occurrence, however, sufficiently shows the pressing need of the higher standard of electoral morality which we have urged, and should be some encouragement to other men to bear a like testimony whenever it may be required.

The late Alderman Williams.

THE Unitarian congregation of Sunderland has lost one of its most valued members, and the town one of its greatest benefactors, by the death, on the 1st inst., of Alderman Williams, proprietor of the Sunderland Times. Beginning life in a humble way, he worked himself up by diligence until he came to be recognised as the most energetic spirit in the borough, enshrined in one of the feeblest frames. In early life he was an advocate of the principles of the Charter, and for which he suffered imprisonment, and it was while in prison that he found residing with the governor of the gaol the lady who subsequently became his wife. He entered the Town Council in 1847, and in 1856 was made alderman, and zealously devoted much of his time to sanitary reform. For this he laboured so earnestly during the last twenty years of his life that he had the satisfaction of knowing ere he died that Sunderland was making rapid progress, many of its most miserable hovels having been removed. The funeral took place on Thursday, the 5th instant, when he was interred in the Sunderland Cemetery. The Newcastle Daily Journal says: Men of all classes, creeds, and political beliefs joined in paying their last tribute of respect to him. The streets were lined with thousands of persons to witness the funeral procession; all the shops on the line of route, and many in other parts of the town, were wholly or partially closed; the blinds of all the houses were drawn, and indeed so great a mark of respect has never, but on one occasion, been paid to a deceased townsman. There were present a very large number of gentlemen. Following these came the workmen in the employment of the deceased; then the Mayor and Corporation, nearly all the members of that body being present; the Corporation officials; the committee of the Temperance Society; the committee of the Working Men's Club, and a large body of the most influential gentlemen of Sunderland and the neighbourhood, amongst whom was one of the 'candidates for the borough. After these came a large body of police, and the cortege was wound up by about thirty carriages of the gentry of the neighbourhood. The funeral service was read by the Rev. John Whitworth, the Unitarian minister at Sunderland.

MONKS AND MANUSCRIPTS.

We are constantly told of the love of the monks for literature, and of the ancient classics whose preservation is due to their care. Facts are not always confirmatory of this theory. Witness the famous visit of Boccaccio to the library of the monastery of Monte Cassino, where grass was growing on the earth, and sand had accumulated on the manuscripts. There is a curious passage in the "Literary Journey of Two Benedictines," showing the condition in 1708 of the library of the Saint-Chapelle at Bourges:—"The place where the books were kept was opened for me. I found them in a sad state, for the treasurer of the chapter to whom the key of the place had been entrusted had turned it into a poultry-house; and as the books were laid open on desks, the fowls had covered them with filth."

Take another case. On the death, in 1784, of President Boucher, of Dijon, the Abbot of Clairvaux bought his library. In 1792, the commissioners of national property found the treasures (2,000 manuscripts and 35,000 printed volumes) in the very cases in which they had come from Dijon. They had been left in a place so damp as to spoil some of the finest manuscripts. Three of them, ragged and half rotten, are now in the library at Troyes.

The Oratorians of Troyes, who had inherited a considerable share of the celebrated manuscripts of Pithou, resolved to have them bound economically; and accomplished this desirable end by putting as many as possible into one volume, without any regard to equality of size, and then with their scissors reducing the different parts to uniformity!

But barbarism such as this was not the only, nor the chief, cause of the loss of ancient literature. The high price of parchment in the 11th, 12th, and 13th centuries led to the custom of erasing manuscripts—an act as old as the time of Cicero. The monkish scribes, who have left us such fine missals, with ornamented and illuminated letters very appropriate to the subject—that is to say, often most disgusting—when they wanted materials for their work would disinter from their libraries some precious relic of classic lore. They obliterated, partly or utterly, the old composition, and then wrote their own matter over it. Thus arose those palimpsests which the learned of modern times have spent so much labour in deciphering. On one of these, now in the library at Troyes, and formerly in that of Pithou, some fragments of Terence have been made out. This manuscript, which contains a great many lives of saints and a version of the "Constitutions Novellæ," has on its last leaf, which fortunately had been obliterated only on one side, part of the sixth scene of the "Andria," with many various readings. Another palimpsest, which is in the Montpellier library, contains, beneath the acts of a Roman council, fragments of Pompeius Festus, an ancient grammarian, of whose works the only copy is said to exist at Naples.

But if the monks destroyed books which, after all, probably contained doctrines dangerous to "the faith," is it not at least certain that, through their patient care, the monuments entrusted to their charge have come down to us in perfect preservation—except those which have been destroyed by heretics and rebels? We fear we cannot give the monks credit even for this. Facts, unhappily, are opposed to such a theory, and, for a layman, it is always a matter of difficulty to argue against facts.

The abbey of Long-Pont, to take one example, contained many ancient tombs. After a fire in 1724, the Prior Dubois destroyed them, and turned them into steps.* In 1734, the clergy of Rouen Cathedral, in order to raise the high-altar and the sanctuary, destroyed the tombs of Henry, son of our Henry II.; of Richard Cœur-de-Lion; of William, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet; of Charles V., of France; and of John, duke of Bedford, uncle of our Henry V.† Again, the abbey church of St. Faurin, near Evreux, which contained many valuables, was rifled by the Cardinal d'Annebault, its abbé commendataire. "Abusing his authority, he took away most of the furniture of the abbey and the church, even going so far as to break up the great bell, and sell the metal for his own benefit. Jean-le-Grand, (the then abbé regulier, was so irritated at this, that he died 16th April, 1540.‡ Nor are such doings unknown in our own day. About 1843, the churchwardens of Saint Benoit, in the diocese of Poitiers, sold to a curiosity dealer a pyx and chalice said to have belonged to St. Benedict.§ Touching instance of the respect which pious traditions inspire in those who live by them!

FIRESIDE READINGS.

IN MEMORIAM.

R. H.

None die a nobler death than he whose only aim Through life hath been devoted to his kindred's good.

A nation weeps her loss—a warrior dead, whose fame

Is earned by havoc of his like on fields of blood: So dies the great polemic, mourned throughout a state:

But sadder still is shed the sympathetic tear When one is called away, who during life's career, No aid to suffering want denied, however great. Such is our grief;—we mourn a noble nature gone;—

We feel a hand withdrawn whose warm and genial grasp Bespoke increase of love as o'er him age stole on!

His labour done,—the volume of his deeds we place,

And place, with reverent care, upon his silent tomb As immortelle that never fades, but bears perpetual bloom!

Bolton.

W. W. KAY.

WITCHCRAFT.—VI.

It was only when scepticism had begun to make itself uncomfortably inquisitive, that the Devil had any difficulty in making himself visible. Trithemius tells of a demon who served as cook to the Bishop of Hildesheim, who sometimes "appeared visibly, sometimes invisibly." This feat of "appearing invisibly" would have been worth seeing. In 1554, the Devil came, on a Christmas eve, to Lawrence Doner, a parish priest in Saxony, and asked to be confessed; and after venting horrible blasphemies, he departed leaving an intolerable stench. Splendidly dressed, with two companions, he frequented an honest man's house at Rothenberg, and brought a piper or fidler, and contrived feasts and dances, under pretext of wooing the Goodman's daughter. He boasted that he was a foreign nobleman of vast wealth; but one evening a minister was invited to supper, who entered into conversation with him on the word of God. Whereupon, he tried to turn the talk, and begged that they might be no longer bored with Scripture. This let the worthy minister into the secret, and crying out in Latin, "Begone, ye wicked scoundrels!" the tartarean impostor and his companions vanished at once with a great noise, and leaving behind them a most unpleasant odor and the bodies of three men who had been hanged. Luther tells of a demon who acted as servant in a monastery, fetching beer for the monks, and always insisting on honest measure for his money. There is one case on record where the Devil appealed to the courts for protection in his rights. A monk, going to visit his mistress, fell dead as he was passing a bridge. The good and bad angel came to litigation about his soul. The case was referred by agreement to Richard, Duke of Normandy, who decided that the monk's body should be carried back to the bridge, and his soul restored to it by the claimants. If he persevered in keeping his assignation, the Devil was to have him, if not, the Angel. The monk, thus put upon his guard, turned back and saved his soul, such as it was. Perhaps the most impudent thing the Devil did was to open a school of magic in Toledo, where the senior class, in graduating, had to run through a narrow cavern, and he was entitled to the hindmost if he could catch him. Sometimes he caught merely his shadow, and the one who had been nimble enough to leave him only this, became the greatest magician of his year. Hence our proverb of "the Devil take the hindmost."

Such stories were received undoubtedly by the great majority of men down to the end of the seventeenth century. The Devil was the simple and satisfactory answer to all the conundrums of nature, and what he had not time to attend to the witch was always ready to do for him. Was a doctor at a loss about a case? How could he save his credit more cheaply than by pronouncing it witchcraft, and turning it over to the person to be exorcised? Did a man's cow die suddenly, or his horse fall lame? Witchcraft! Did one of those writers of controversial quartos feel a pain in the small of his back? Witchcraft! Unhappily there were always ugly old women; and if you crossed them they were given to scolding and banning. If within a year or two after, anything happened to you or yours, why, of course, old Mother Bombie, or Goody Blake, must be at the bottom of it. For it was perfectly well known that witches could cast a spell by the mere glance of their eyes; could cause you to pine away by melting an image of wax; could give you a pain wherever they liked by sticking pins into the same; could bring sickness into your house by hiding a devil's powder under the threshold; and who knows what else? Worst of all, they could send a demon into your body, who would cause you to vomit pins, hairs, pebbles, knives, &c., without any fault of yours; utter through you the most impertinent things, and, in short, make you, for the time being, the most important personage in the parish. Meanwhile you were an object of condolence and contribution to the whole neighbourhood. What wonder if a lazy apprentice or servant-maid should prefer being possessed to drudging from morning till night? And to any one who has observed how common a thing, in certain states of mind, self-conviction is, and how near this is to self-deception, it will not be surprising that some were to all intents and purposes, really possessed. The subjects, in cases where there has been over-excitement, have generally been young women or girls. Many of the most remarkable have occurred in convents, and both there and elsewhere, as in other kinds of temporary nervous derangement, have proved contagious. In the dioceses of humanely sceptical prelates the cases of possession were either cured, or at least hindered from becoming epidemic, by episcopal mandate. Cardinal Mazarin, when vice-legate at Avignon, made an end of the trade of exorcising within his jurisdiction. But scepticism, down to the beginning of the eighteenth century, was the exception, and undoubting belief the rule. As Longfellow, in the prologue to one of his just-published "New England Tragedies," says, even of the minister and the magistrate

* Hennin, "Monuments de l'Histoire de France." I. 171. † Hennin, I. 171. ‡ Hennin, I. 152. § Hennin, I. 180.

"They believed devoutly in the Powers
Of Darkness, working in this world of ours,
In spells of Witchcraft, incantations dread,
And shrouded apparitions of the dead."

CHURCH CURIOSITIES.—XIV.

PEEPS INTO PARISH REGISTERS.

A WORK lately published on churches in and round Peterborough, gives some extracts from their registers which present curious little pictures of periods ranging over several centuries, and remind us how much existence has changed for provincial Englishmen. For in those days the registers were not that bare record of baptisms, weddings, and burials which they have now become. They were the chronicle of all such small events as the rector or the parish clerk deemed worthy of relating for the enlightenment of future generations. Thus we learn that in 1712, "Joseph Jennings stole Mrs. Margaret Bellamy at night," in the parish of Stanground; and that in the same place "Hannah Sinke was whipped according to law and sent away with a pass to Sunderland." Sometimes the writer uses the register as a vehicle for expressing his views on the affairs of the day. Thus, at Whittlesey, St. Mary, in 1783, the curate gives vent to his indignation against a law that imposed an unwelcome new tax. He says:

"In the beginning of this month the nasty three-penny tax took place, and as I expect, from the great number of the poor, and the rebellious Humour of the parishioners, to collect but few three-pennies, I shall mark those that pay with V in the Baptisms and Burials. N.B.—As people are most frequently open-hearted on the day of Marriage, I expect most of my parishioners will pay 3d. on that occasion. I shall mark those that do not pay with a V. I squeezed 3d. from many a poor wretch ill able to give even so much to Government I am affraid. I think I ought not to urge quite so hard."

In the Alwalton register we get a pleasant glimpse into the cost of women's clothing a hundred and twenty years ago, when we read that they paid one shilling "for making beuty Sudbury a petecot and Stimpson 2 Shifts & a petecot & threed." A few years later they paid two shillings for "surplos washia and the clothes." An entry in 1763 informs us that the parochial mind was what it is at this day on two important points; farmers encouraged sparrow-killing, and churchwardens helped themselves liberally to the parish rates. Eleven shillings was the modest amount which the man in authority paid to himself as "sparrow-money." One of the oddest things in these accounts is the charge for sundry occasional prayers. Thus, a shilling each is charged for "a prayer for ye takinge Lusiburge," "a prayer for ye takinge Quebec," and "a prayer for overcoming our Eumies by Sea." In 1783 the cost of prayers was the same, though the official spelling had deteriorated; for the churchwarden writes that he "pade for a prear for the Queen, one shilling." But of all the contrasts between the past and the present which these registers supply, none are more curious and suggestive than the entries of the church collections for charitable purposes made in obedience to "briefs." At Elton there seems to have been no end to the variety of objects for which the bounty of the parishioners was asked in those days when the machinery of societies and secretaries was unknown. Collections were made for the Protestant Church in Lithuania, for "the fire at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, London," for "Thomas Sloper, gent.," for "the sad fire at London," for "the English captives under the Hungarians," for "St. Paul's, London," for "redemption of English slaves at Algiers," for "training up ministers for the Protestant Churches in Lower Poland," for "relief of the French persecuted Protestants," for "Kirsanton in Cumberland, damaged by water and sand," &c., &c. At Castor, we learn that in one year 6s. was "paid to the boys for making the Burnfire," on the 5th of November; in another 6d. is charged for "John Clark, for wiping (whipping) on him;" in a third, the churchwarden charges two shillings "for going to Peterborough Myself and Horse to attend the execution of Elizabeth Winchley;" and one shilling for returning a warrant to prevent "ye Cox being holled at on Srove Tewsday." So far the people of Castor were ahead of the age, which still upheld the annual throwing of sticks or stones at cocks, especially in schools, as a fitting preparation for the season of Lent.

INSCRIPTIONS ON BELLS.

The work from which the foregoing bits are taken gives also some of the inscriptions on church bells, which are not a little curious, as showing the state of feeling in Lincolnshire at past periods. At Peterborough St. Mary, for instance, is a peal of eight bells, the inscriptions on which are of the most orthodox Church and State pattern. "Long live King George the Third," says one of them. "Give no offence to the Church," says another. "Our voices shall with joyful sound, make hills and valleys echo round." Equally devoted to the fine old parochial verse-making and to the fine old parochial religion were the authorities at Whittlesey. "The five old bells into six was run, with additional metal near a tun," is clearly from the hand which on another bell gave vent to its owner's orthodoxy in the heart-stirring words, "Prosperity to the Established Church of England, and no encouragement to enthusiasm." At Orton Waterville another spirit was dominant. On a bell, cast in 1606, some terrible Ritualist of the seventeenth century inscribed the following: "Protege prece pia quos convoco, Sancta Maria;" and there the inscription still remains. What if education should make such progress in the fens that the very bell-ringers at Orton Waterville shall come to understand Latin? And is not Mr. Whalley at this very hour member for Peterborough? Possibly, he is so much affected by the inscription on another bell hanging in the same belfry, "Sic fiat inter Christianos concordia," that he has allowed the objectionable motto to rest undisturbed in peace.

WHAT EDUCATING A PARTY DOES.

BOSWELL tells us, apropos of the learned pig, that Dr. Johnson remarked, "We do not allow time for a pig's education; we kill him at a year old." On some one observing that great torture must have been employed ere the idocity of the animal could have been subdued, "Certainly," said the Doctor; "but (turning to me) how old is your pig?" I told him three years. "Then," said he, "the pig has no cause to complain: he would have been killed the first year if he had not been educated, and protracted existence is a good recompense for very considerable degrees of torture."

CHANGES FOR THE BETTER.

In addressing a body of workmen at Dundee, the other day, Dr. Guthrie, when referring to the changes which he had seen during his life, now approaching the threescore years and ten, said: "Fifty-two years ago I came, a boy passing on my way to Edinburgh to the College, from my native town of Brechin. My father was in comfortable and respectable circumstances. How do you think I travelled? I reached Forfar by the coach, but there was nothing between Forfar and Dundee but the carrier's cart, and I was fain to travel by it. I went through Fife, and I paid more for going through Fife on the top of a coach than I would pay now for going almost from Edinburgh to Inverness. Every man now has a covered carriage, and although he may not have coats of arms painted on the outside, he is comfortable within. At the funerals in those days the men's coats were of as many colours as Joseph's coat, and now I do not know a working man who does not have as good a black coat as I have myself. When I was a boy, in the town of Brechin there were only two gold watches, and they were a wonder in the place. Now I fancy there are hundreds. Every working man has a watch, and even my own servants produce their watches, to say nothing of their parasols. I could give hundreds of illustrations. The working man's condition since I was a boy is twice or three times as good as it was then, and I rejoice at it. I rejoice that political power is no longer monopolized by a few classes, but has been given to the people, intrusted to their hands, and they, I am confident, will not abuse it. They say there is a new element, and they say that new brooms sweep clean. So much the better will it be, for there are many cobwebs to be swept away."

FALSE LOVE AND TRUE.

ELIZABETH D. CROSS.

ALICE, the false love fades,—
Falls from the heart like a garment old,
Dies like the dew in the light of the sun,
Is forgot as a tale that is told.
But the power no gold can give,
That over all prevails,
Is the love that lives through sorrow
The faith that never fails;
That many waters cannot quench,
Nor whispering tongues can chill,
Nor doubt, nor any fear come near,
Absence nor death can kill.

AMERICAN NATIONAL CONFERENCE

OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

The third great Conference of "Unitarian and other Christian Churches" was held in New York during the week commencing October 5th. The opening sermon was given in Dr. Osgood's new church—"Church of the Messiah," and a magnificent temple it is, with its grace of outline, its splendour of colour, its variety and yet harmony of ornament, and its grand deep-toned organ. It was the fitting place for an initiative service which was given with no weak or trembling hand, but struck out so boldly as to be almost a war-peal summoning the clans to a fresh battle of ideas. Dr. Osgood led the devotional services himself. The sermon, on Ephesians ii. 19-22, was a summary of the History, Position, Opportunities, and Duties of the Unitarian Denomination, like a battle-hymn; it held the large audience enthralled for more than an hour and a half, the interest growing stronger towards the close, those differing the most from his positions listening with grave and quiet attention. Dr. Osgood said there were 1,400 persons in the church. The following morning the sessions of the Conference began. The number of delegates present was very large, embracing many of the most earnest and devoted members of the denomination, clerical and lay, from all sections of the country where societies of our faith have been established. There was also a good attendance of the general public, who occupied a portion of the hall and the galleries.

After prayer, and an address by the president of the Conference, Hon. T. D. Eliot, the reports of the committees appointed at the last Conference were read, on "Unity and Fraternity," on "Denominational Literature," on an "Endowment Fund for Meadville Theological School," on "Antioch College Endowment," and on "Ministerial Support." The Committee on Denominational Literature, of which the Rev. S. G. Bulfinch was chairman, recommended especially that the Conference should provide "an introduction to the Scriptures, a commentary upon them, and a history of the Christian Church, embracing in popular form the best results of modern scholarship; with works for general use of a meditative and devotional character;" and "consider the expediency of preparing, by the labours of a sufficient number of competent scholars, a Family Bible, with brief notes and introductions to the various books."

After these reports came an interesting discussion of Local Conferences and Itinerant Preaching. At the last Conference it was recommended by the Council that the whole Unitarian domain should be territorially subdivided, so that every church should belong to some association or conference. As a result, fourteen such local conferences have been organised, reaching through Wisconsin, Ohio, Minnesota, the Middle and Southern States, New York, and New England. Mr. Scandlin gave an interesting account of these, which appear to be much the same as our district and missionary societies. The Rev. C. B. Ferry, of Peterboro', New Hampshire, also read a report on the same subject. Mr. Ferry advocated itinerant missionary preaching, framed very much in accordance with the plan of Wesleyan circuits.—After various other addresses, a committee was appointed to form and carry out some plan embodying the principles suggested and for better organisation and "efficiency in doing the work of the denomination."—Dr. Bellows, in an interesting address, in which he expressed his entire approval of the plan of missionary preaching, and his own readiness to be sent forth on the work, moved "That this Conference recommend Unitarian families, living in places where there is no Established Church, to hold regular Sunday services among themselves, without reference to the presence of a minister, and that all parishes that are without a settled pastor should not fail to maintain public religious services on the Lord's Day by lay-services among themselves."

The afternoon's session was very spirited and interesting; the subject, "Theological Schools," being introduced by an able essay from Rev. Laird Collier. The question was brought up of the removal of the Meadville School to Chicago. Dr.

Gannett spoke eloquently in favour of the union of the Boston School for the Ministry (the equivalent of our Home Missionary Board) with the Divinity School at Cambridge. He was listened to with deep attention, and when the ten minutes had expired, and the President's bell gave the notice, the audience indicated their wish to hear him still longer, and at the close he was warmly applauded, though he failed to carry conviction to the minds of the Convention, for after much able argument, some badinage and earnest talk from Messrs. Clarke, Hale, Shippen, and Dr. Lathrop, who spoke with great animation and eloquence for old Cambridge as an undenominational, broad school, the vote was called, and a great majority were for taking no action upon the question of the removal of the Boston School. The subject of Meadville College was afterwards referred to a committee.

In the evening there were two meetings,—one at All Souls' Church. After prayer by Rev. C. Palfrey, of Belfast, earnest speeches were made by Rev. Messrs. Staples, Laird Collier, Mayo, J. F. Clarke, and Mr. Lowe. The meeting at Brooklyn also was a very successful one.

On Thursday there were several very interesting features. A specially important discussion took place on "Our duty towards the part of the population of our cities who have no connection with the churches." Rev. G. H. Hepworth gave an interesting account of the theatre services in Boston, and advocated similar movements. Rev. Robert Collyer, of Chicago, took broader ground at once, and said that it was not enough to go out to the people, that they ought to invite the people into the churches, and that on the only terms on which those outside would come in in any numbers. "A church like that (Dr. Osgood's) was built so that practically they said to the city of New York, 'Unto the poor the Gospel is preached—if they can pay for it at the rate of from seventy-five to three hundred dollars a year.' He thought that was essentially wrong, that they had no business any longer to uphold such a system. They ought to confess that they had been altogether mistaken, and that the surest way for them to get righted was to go back to the primitive spirit of the Gospel of Christ, and to say that in the church of God, in places dedicated to His service, there could be no difference between rich and poor, henceforth and forever, but that the poor man coming within those four walls should come as freely as any man, and should be as welcome to sit down in the best pew as the millionaire." This at once initiated a discussion on the open church system, in the course of which several encouraging utterances were given, capped by the Rev. Jas. Freeman Clarke, who quoted the old story of the practical man who succeeded the orator and said, "What that man says, I have done." "So it was with his church—the 'Church of the Disciples,' in Boston. What the preceding speakers had described as the work which the Christian church ought to do, that church had been doing for twenty-seven years, and he thought they ought to have the credit of it. (Applause.) Their seats had always been free, they had never paid a dollar for music, and the minister had been paid by the voluntary contributions of the people. They had now built a church, at an expense of $50,000, every dollar of which had been given freely, with no expectation of any return, and when they got into it, which they expected to do about the 1st of January, the doors would be thrown open, and all, rich or poor, would be alike welcome." A committee was eventually engaged to organise a plan for theatre services throughout the country. In the evening an interesting discussion took place on methods of raising money, which ended in the adoption of the second Sunday in November as an annual Missionary Sunday, on which collections should be taken in all congregations willing to join in the plan, throughout the states, for the purpose of strengthening the American Unitarian Association. A special feature of the evening's Conference was some very earnest and friendly speaking by two of the coloured bishops of the African Methodist Church—Bishop Paine and Bishop Brown. An address was also given by a Miss Amy Bradley, one of the most active of the northern women who have gone south to labour among the freedmen. She had opened a school at Wilmington, and appealed for aid in her work, whereupon a collection was at once taken up for her, and reached 645 dollars.

Friday morning was largely taken up with business, election of officers, &c. The most important business was the adoption, by a vote of three hundred and twenty-six to twelve, of the following amendment to the constitution:—

Article IX. To secure the largest unity of the spirit and the widest practical co-operation, it is hereby understood that all the declarations of the Conference, including the preamble and constitution, are expressions only of its majority, committing in no degree those who object to them, and dependent wholly for their effect upon the consent they command, on their own merits, from the churches here represented or belonging within the circle of our fellowship.

Afterwards Dr. Bellows gave a very excellent address on "The Relation between our Churches and the Liberal Churches of Europe." One passage is worth reproducing, to show what is the impression of an intelligent observer as to the effect of the State Church system on the free religious life of England. Speaking of the English Unitarian ministers, he said: "Whatever might be their personal worth or their scholarship, I did not see a single man among them who did not seem to be unconsciously more or less overshadowed with the idea that he belonged to a comparatively small and insignificant communion; that it was a great misfortune that he was not attached to the regular establishment; he could not conscientiously be in that establishment, but he considered he was going through a pilgrimage of long-suffering for his devotion to his principles, and it was a very sad thing that he could not be with a people who had social prestige and ecclesiastical authority, and general influence, and unquestioned belief, among the great English people. Now, brethren, we have nothing of that kind in this country, I trust. Perhaps there was a time when we did not quite hold up our heads and feel that we were as good as anybody, but I think that time has so utterly gone by in America that it is hardly remembered by most of us; and it is a beautiful distinction of our body, that we have none of that sense of social ostracism or feeling of inferiority which, to a certain degree, marks the most gifted minds in the English Unitarian ranks."

In general, however, he spoke most hopefully of the state of the Unitarian Churches in England, and of the prospects of liberal Christians in Europe. Later in the day, the Indian Mission was the subject of Conference, and a collection amounting to $2,500 was taken on the spot for it.

Resolutions were also carried in favour of establishing a prominent Missionary Unitarian Church in Paris, and of goodwill and fraternity with the English Unitarians. The question of "the possibility of a literary, critical, scientific, and theological review, which should combine the support of the liberal organisations of America," was also considered, and Dr. Osgood presented a plan for the establishment of such a review, which he explained at some length.

The question was discussed by Rev. W. Sharman, of Washington; Dr. Bellows, Mr. Calthrop, Rev. H. P. Cutting, of Alton; and Mr. T. Cogswell, of Newport; and the plan proposed by Dr. Osgood was adopted. The Conference, which was attended by upwards of 500 delegates, representing 21 associations and 175 congregations, was marked throughout by great unanimity and liberality.

MONTREAL.

THE Montreal Daily News of the 28th ult. contains a report of a congregational meeting of the Unitarian Church there, to take leave of the Rev. John Cordner, who has been their pastor for twenty-five years. Champion Brown, Esq., took the chair, and the following hymn, written for the occasion by Mr. W. N. Evans, was then sung:—

Great God! our times are in Thy mighty hand,
And days and years roll on at Thy command;
Thy mercy spake—our sun of life arose;
That mercy still will bless 'till life shall close.

We thank Thee for the love that gave Thy Son
To teach us choose the good—the evil shun;
We thank Thee for the precepts he has given,
Which raise our longing souls from earth to heaven.

For bright examples in the past, we raise
To Thee our hymns of gratitude and praise;
For loving pastors, who to-day proclaim
Thy truth, and spread the glories of Thy name.

O God! Thy servant bless, whose faithful word
Has long within these hallowed walls been heard;
Guard Thou the precious seed which he has sown
Till gloriously it ripens round Thy throne.

Low at Thy feet we bend—Oh! hear our prayer,
That in this world of change, and toil, and care,
Amid temptation's wiles, our souls may be Fixed, Heavenly Father, evermore on Thee.

An address to Mr. Cordner was then read and presented by Thomas Workman, Esq., M.P., together with a cheque for two thousand dollars, to which the ladies intend adding six hundred more to present to Mrs. Cordner, in order to decorate a new residence in course of preparation. On the previous Sunday Mr. Cordner preached an appropriate sermon, and also announced his intention to present a volume of twenty-five sermons, now in the press, to the congregation. In reply to the address and presentation, Mr. Cordner said such a meeting had more significance to him, from its evident heartiness, and the address just read had more value, from its obvious spontaneity. He thanked them for the kindly expressions of the address, but could not help taking exception to their over-estimate of himself and his services. He was but the instrument of God in any good that had been accomplished. The individual is of small account of himself, and apart from God. Each of us is strong for service to others in proportion to the measure of truth and love by which he is moved. Mr. Cordner then referred to the five members still remaining whose names were among the nineteen that called him across the Atlantic twenty-five years ago: Mr. John White, now venerable with age, the Hon. John Young, Hon. L. H. Holton, Mr. James Douglass, and last but not least Mr. Thomas Workman. "Death and removal have taken the other fourteen from among us. But others have come in to fill their places, and in larger numbers than any dared to hope for when we first met as fellow worshippers a quarter of a century ago. Let us thank God, and take courage, and press on with renewed earnestness in the cause of God and the Gospel of His Son." The volume of sermons to which he referred on Sunday, would be ready, he said, for delivery in about a week. On behalf of Mrs. Cordner he thanked the ladies of the congregation for their proffered gift to her. And now, said Mr. Cordner, let me express my most devout wish suggested by this occasion. I pray that all of us, in our various spheres of duty and activity, may put our Christianity into our life, and let our light shine, according to our Master's injunction, and thus glorify our Father in heaven.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. T. Hirst Smith, of Bradford, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of the Northgate End congregation, Halifax.—We understand, too, that the Rev. J. Russell, late student in Manchester New College, has accepted an invitation to take charge of the congregation at Kendal, and enters on his duties with the New Year.

BIRKENHEAD.—On Tuesday, the 3rd inst., a soiree was held in the Music Hall, Birkenhead, for the purpose of according a welcome to the Rev. William Oates, on his commencing his ministry in the Atherton-street Church. There was a large attendance of the members and their friends. The following ministers were also present:—Revs. Alex. Gordon, M.A.; James Alsop, Thomas Jones, C. B. Upton, M.A.; J. Cuckson, of Liverpool; and the Rev. W. A. Pope, of Birkenhead. Letters were received from the Revs. J. H. Thom, Charles Wicksteed, Charles Beard, B.A.; John Robberds, B.A.; and George Beaumont, expressing their regret at being unavoidably absent, but offering their best wishes to Mr. Oates.—Mr. V. Huxham, who presided, expressed in a few words the great satisfaction felt by the congregation at the appointment of Mr. Oates as their minister, and, on their behalf, cordially welcomed him to Birkenhead. The Rev. William Oates, in reply, acknowledged the cordiality of the welcome which he had received from the congregation. He said that on the two occasions he had visited Birkenhead, he had observed in some parts of the town the evidences of much ignorance, drunkenness, and misery, and that he had felt impressed with the sense of the great work that was to be done. He further dwelt upon the comparative powerlessness of the minister in accomplishing this work, unless aided by his congregation. All should work together hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder. He said that he felt called upon to enter into the work, and that on the earnest co-operation of the church depended its future progress and prosperity. The meeting was also addressed by Messrs. I. B. Cooke and M. Guthrie, and Revs. C. B. Upton, T. Jones, J. Cuckson, and W. A. Pope, who all spoke hopefully and encouragingly of the prospects of the Birkenhead congregation, and much pleasure was expressed at the presence of the Rev. W. A. Pope, minister of Cloughton.

DEVONPORT.—Our friends here have sustained a great loss in the death of Mrs. Alfred Norman, which took place on the 26th ult., after a long and painful illness. She was never tired in promoting, with her husband, every good work in connection with Christ Church, of which she laid the foundation stone; she was beloved by the children of the Sunday school, in which she taught until her strength failed; and by her gentle, cheerful, and affable manners, her purity of thought and earnest work, was an excellent example of the Christian life. Her labours at the Royal Albert Hospital have been recognised by the subscribers naming one of the wards after her, in memory of her constant kindness and attention to the sick patients. In the houses of the poor of Devonport, Mrs. Norman was always a welcome visitor, for she helped them with food when they needed, and with advice full of generous sympathy. All who knew her praise her and lament her loss, and feel that, as has been said by a writer in the Devonport Independent, "She was one of the best souls that ever graced this earth."

FLOWERY FIELD CHRISTIAN CHURCH.—On Sunday evening last, a sermon was preached by the Rev. John Page Hopps, of Dukinfield, in aid of the funds of the above church. Every available seat was occupied. The congregation were most attentive, and the sum of £7. 15s. was collected.

HEAP BRIDGE, NEAR BURY.—The annual congregational social meeting took place on Saturday, the 31st ult., when about fifty sat down to tea. The chair was taken in the first instance by the Rev. Joseph Freeston, afterwards by the Rev. John Wright, B.A. Addresses were delivered by the above ministers, and also by the Rev. John Fox, Mr. Geo. Smith, of Manchester (who represented the Manchester District Sunday-school Association), and by Mr. John Reynolds, of Bury. Afterwards the annual business meeting of the congregation took place.—On Wednesday the 4th inst., a free series of lectures was commenced, when R. H. Alcock, Esq., delivered a lecture on "Economic Botany," with diagrams and specimens. E. H. Grundy, Esq., the president of the society, presided; and, in spite of very adverse weather, the attendance was about 80.

LEEDS.—On Sunday last, the annual sermons on behalf of the Mill-hill Sunday schools were preached by the Rev. S. A. Strachan, of Manchester. Collections were made after each service, when £29. 10s. was realised.

OLDHAM.—On Saturday week the members of the cricket club in connection with the school held their closing tea-party, when upwards of 200 were present.

PERTH.—The Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee, gave a lecture in Perth on the 4th inst., upon "The Unitarian position in theology." There was a good attendance of persons evidently interested in the subject. Questions having been invited, several persons desired expositions of texts. This is the common method in Scotland of controverting Unitarians. The result of the meeting was the formation of a committee to arrange for further lectures.

SHEFFIELD.—On Tuesday evening, the 3rd inst., a meeting of teachers of the Sunday school connected with Upper Chapel, Upperthorpe and Stannington, was held in the schoolroom of Upper Chapel. After tea, in the unavoidable absence of the Rev. J. Lettis Short, president of this District Union, the Rev. J. B. Gardner was called to the chair. A very interesting paper on "The preparation of the teacher necessary to success in teaching" was read by the Rev. Henry Hill, of Stannington; after which the subject was discussed by several of the gentlemen present. A vote of thanks to the writer of the essay, and to the chairman, brought to a close a very pleasant meeting.

NOTICES TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All letters, articles of intelligence, &c., should be addressed to the Unitarian Herald Office, 74, Market-street, and not to the private addresses of the Editors. No anonymous letters inserted: the writer of every letter must append his name for publication.

W. F.—The Sunday-school Hymn Book, published by the Manchester District Sunday-school Association, is only 4d. We know none cheaper except Dr. Bateman's, which is published at 1d.

THE COMING WEEK.

HULL.—On Sunday evening, a discourse by the Rev. J. M. Dixon, on "Bunyan."

LONDON: NEWINGTON GREEN.—On Sunday morning, a discourse by the Rev. J. K. Applebee. Subject: "Conversation with Simon the Pharisee."

MANCHESTER: STRANGEWAYS FREE CHURCH.—On Sunday evening, the last of the four discourses, on Good Measure, viz., "Good measure in the religious life—in worship and work."

PENMAENMAWR: PENDYFFRYN SCHOOLROOM.—On Sunday, Rev. W. B. Hughes. Service at eleven a.m.

Births.

BEARD.—On the 9th inst., at 249, Waterloo-road, the wife of James R. Beard, of a son.

ELLIS.—On the 7th inst., at 20, Crown-street, Exmouth-street, Birkenhead, the wife of Mr. John Ellis, of a son.

JEAVONS.—On the 11th inst., at Camp Hill, Birmingham, the wife of Mr. T. Jeavons, of a son.

TAYLOR.—On the 6th inst., at Elm Terrace, Sale, Mrs. Henry Taylor, of a son.

Marriage.

IRELAND—OGDEN.—On the 11th inst., at Dukinfield, Mr. James Ireland, of Lower Broughton, to Elizabeth, youngest daughter of John Ogden, Esq., of Huntcliffe, Dukinfield. No cards.

Deaths.

COLE.—On the 30th ult., at his residence, 12, Bishop-street, Bristol, after a few days illness of bronchitis, aged 68, Mr. John B. Cole, formerly of Leices'er.

MORRIS.—On the 6th inst., at Union street, Hulme, formerly of Kendal, Isaac Morris, suddenly, aged 44 years.

NORMAN.—On the 26th ult., at Ker-street, Devonport, Mary, the beloved wife of Alfred Norman, Esq., aged 38 years.

WILLIAMS.—On the 1st inst., at his residence, 34, West Sunnyside, Sunderland, Alderman James Williams, aged 57. His loss is deeply felt by all who knew him.

THE following WORK may be procured from JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester, for cash:—

DR. BEARD'S BIBLICAL DICTIONARY (containing above 1,000 engravings, together with maps and plates), a new edition, elegantly got up, large 8vo., 1,200 pages, containing matter equal to eight ordinary 8vo. vols.

PRICES:
Neatly half-bound morocco, gilt edges, 18s.
Full-bound morocco, ditto 22s.
Full-bound morocco, richly gilt 25s.

NEW AMERICAN UNITARIAN BOOKS.

The following New American Books, published by the American Unitarian Association, may be had for Cash from Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester:

Peabody's Sunday-school Teacher	3 0
Clarke's Principles of Prayer	4 6
Ware's Formation of Character	2 6
New Discussion of the Trinity, by various authors	3 0
Clarke's Orthodoxy; its Truths and Errors	7 9
Selections from the Works of Channing	3 0
Hale's Service of Sorrow	8 6
Noyes's Silent Pastor	14 6
Noyes's New Translation of the Hebrew Prophets	7 0
Ditto ditto of the Book of Psalms	7 0
Ditto ditto of Ecclesiastes and the Canticles	7 0
Noyes's Theological Essays, by Stanley, Jewett, &c.	7 6
Barlow's Word of the Spirit to the Church	2 6
Hedge's Reason in Religion	3 6
Furness's Domestic Worship	3 6
Ware's Home Life	6 6
Channing's complete Works, in 3 vols.	15 0
Smith's Christian Lessons	6 0
Norton's Genuineness of the Gospels	7 6

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Aspley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Cheetham Hill, at his printing-office, No. 3, Cross-street, Parish of Manchester; and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, November 13, 1868.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 396.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Churches are Doing.....	380
What is Saying on Church Matters.....	380
Literaria.....	382
"To us there is but One God, the Father".....	382
South Place, Finsbury Square.....	383
Pending the Battle.....	383
American Notes.....	383
Address of the German Protestant Union.....	384
The Unreformed Catholic Church.....	385
Fire-side Readings: A Prayer.....	385
At the Crater of Vesuvius.....	385
Preaching in Jest made earnest.....	385
Purgatory.....	386
Holbeck Domestic Mission.....	386
Intelligence: Ministerial Appointments, Bolton, Ciren- cester, Kingswood, Wakefield.....	386

DOMESTIC MISSION SCHOOLS.
EMBDEN-STREET, OPPOSITE UPPER MEDLOCK-
STREET, HULME.—OPENING SERVICES in connection with the above new buildings will be held on the following Sundays, viz.: November 29th, when the Rev. CHARLES BEARD, B.A., of Liverpool, will preach morning and evening; and December 6th, when the Rev. S. A. STEINCHAL will preach in the morning, and the Rev. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., in the evening. Service to commence at half-past ten am., and at half-past six p.m. A collection after each service.
On Monday, November 30th, a TEA PARTY will be held in the Schoolroom. Tea on the table at half-past six. Chair to be taken at half-past seven. Tickets 1s.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.—A CONFERENCE OF
Sunday-school Teachers and Friends will be held on Saturday, the 28th November 1868, in the Memorial Hall, Albert Square, Manchester, when the following subjects will be brought forward for discussion:—By Messrs. CHADWICK and JACK-SON: "Competitive Examinations in Sunday Schools." By Mr. GEORGE SMITH: "The use that might be made of the Leaflet System in our Sunday Schools." The chair will be taken by the President of the Association, JOHN DINDY, Esq., at six o'clock. Tea will be provided at five o'clock.
Charge, 6d, each person.

JESSE PILCHER, } Hon. secs.
JOHN REYNOLDS, }

OPENING SERVICES.
THE NEW UNITARIAN CHAPEL at CHOPPINGTON will be OPENED for Divine Worship on Saturday, November 28th, 1868. The SERMON will be preached by the Rev. J.
C. STREET, of Newcastle. Services to commence at half-past two o'clock.

A TEA PARTY will be held the same afternoon, at half-past four o'clock. Tickets 1s, each.
CONTINUATION SERVICES will be held on Sunday, November 29th. The Rev. E. W. HOPKINSON will preach in the morning, and the Rev. J. C. STREET in the evening.
Service to begin at 10 45 a.m. and at 6 30 p.m.
Collections will be made after each Service in aid of the Building Fund.

SCOTTISH UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.
The ANNUAL SERMONS will be preached at St. Mark's,
Edinburgh, on Sunday, November 29th, by the Rev. JOHN GORDON, of Evesham. The ANNUAL SOIREE will be held on Monday, November 30th. IVIE MAC KIE, Esq., in the chair.
R. B. DRUMMOND, } Secretaries.

BIRMINGHAM: LAWRENCE-STREET
MINISTRY TO THE POOR.—On Sunday next, November 29th, TWO SERMONS will be preached by the Rev.
WILLIAM JAMES, of Bristol, at the Church of the Messiah, Broad-street, after which Collections will be made on behalf of the above-mentioned Institution. Service to commence in the morning at eleven o'clock, and in the evening at half-past six.
The ANNUAL GENERAL MEETING of the Subscribers and Friends will be held on Monday evening, November 30th, in the Congregational Room of the Church of the Messiah.
Tea will be provided at six o'clock, and the Chair taken at seven o'clock.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLAR-ENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—The Rev. P. W.
CLAYDEN will preach, morning and evening, next Sunday.

OPENING OF THE NEW UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH, POOLE.

The Building Committee are now able to announce the OPENING MEETINGS, which are fixed to take place on Wednesday, the 9th December.
The morning service will commence at eleven o'clock, when prayers will be read by the Rev. EDMUND KELL, M.A., and the sermon preached by the Rev. CHAS. BEARD, B.A.
Dinner will be provided in the Temperance Hall, at two o'clock, and tea in the same place at half-past five; after which a PUBLIC MEETING will be held in the Town Hall.
The chair to be taken at seven o'clock, by W. J. LAM OIKT, Esq., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who has also kindly consented to preside at the dinner.
The Revs R. B. ASPLAND, M.A., R. L. Carpenter, B.A., John Crompter, M.A., H. Hawkes, B.A., R. Yelland, and J. R. Lloyd are also expected to be present, and the congregation hoped to see as many friends from neighbouring towns as can possibly attend.

Tickets for dinner and tea, 3s.; tickets for tea only, 1s.
Admission to Town Hall, free.
On the following Sunday, 18th December, SERMONS will be preached by the Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, M.A., of Hackney.
Morning service at 10 30; evening at 6 15.
Collections in aid of the Building Fund will be made after each of the services, and after the evening meeting at the Town Hall.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH,
POOLE.

The Congregation will be grateful for large or small Contributions in aid of their Building Fund. The total cost of the new church will be £1200.
The amount of subscriptions already advertised..... £704 18 6
S. S. Taylor, Esq., per Rev. R. B. Spears..... 2 0 0 Subscriptions will be thankfully received by either of the following:
H. HAMILTON, Secretary.
A. BALSTON, Treasurer.

CHORLEY.—November 29th, 1868.—
TWO SERMONS by the Rev. H. E. DOWSON, B.A., on behalf of the Chapel Fund. Service at three and at 6 30.
Tea at 4 30, sixpence each.

SPARE HOSPITAL TICKETS, &c.
The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD will be very grateful if friends who have tickets to spare for any of the Manchester or Salford Charities will place some of them in his hands for distribution. Also, he would be glad to recommend some very poor and deserving women for employment in cleaning offices, &c. Through the visiting of the Home Missionary Board students, and other visitors, under his superintendence, he is brought in contact with an amount of hardship and distress quite beyond his private or congregational means to help.
1, Kersal Terrace, Higher Broughton, Nov. 23, 1868.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.
THE APPEAL FOR EXTENDED EFFORTS AT HOME
AND ABROAD.

DONATIONS TOWARDS THE EXTRA £1,000 FUND.
Amount advertised.....	£106 4 0
Shaw D. Park Lane.....	5 5 0
A. B. York.....	10 0 0
Humble E. Chester.....	5 0 0
Humble The Misses, Chester.....	5 0 0
New Annual Subscriptions, advertised.....	65 19 6
Bache Rev. K., Moretonhamstead.....	0 5 0
Beard Rev. Dr., Althamham.....	1 1 0
Burke Rev. J., Alvechurch.....	0 5 0
Chignell Rev. T. W., Exeter.....	0 5 0
Clarke Rev. C., Birmingham.....	0 5 0
Cooper Rev. J.....	0 5 0
Elliot Rev. W., Stockton.....	0 5 0
Gaseigne Rev. M. C., Deptford.....	0 5 0
Hopkins Rev. E. W., Newcastle.....	0 5 0
Hittiger Rev. L., Carlisle.....	0 5 0
Keir Rev. J. F., Billingshurst.....	0 5 0
London W. F., London.....	1 1 0
Maddison Rev. A., High Garrett.....	0 10 0
Maningra H., London.....	1 1 0
McKen Rev. H., Gidbury.....	0 5 0
Montgomery Rev. J. K., Chester.....	0 5 0
Shaw W., London.....	1 1 0
Swanwick Miss, London.....	2 2 0
Swanwick Miss A., London.....	2 2 0
Sutherland Rev. W., Maiton.....	0 5 0
Warren J., London.....	1 1 0
Wilson Rev. J., Birmingham.....	0 5 0
Wooler Rev. G., Thorne.....	0 5 0

INDIAN FUND.
Donations and Subscriptions advertised.....	£260 9 0
Trowers Mr. Cardiff.....	0 4 0
Macnamara H., London.....	2 2 0
Sheppard Mr., Bristol.....	0 10 0
Riches Mr., Bristol.....	0 10 0
Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, } Secretaries. Rev. K. SPEARS, }

173, Strand, London.

WANTED, to place a Young Lady, aged 15, in a good school as Pupil Teacher.—Apply, Y Z, Herald office, Manchester.

A LADY, who has had considerable experience in the education and management of a large family, desires a Re-engagement as RESIDENT GOVERNESS, after Christmas. She is qualified to teach French, Latin, music, singing, drawing, painting, and the usual routine of a good English education.—Address O. S., Post-office, Woodley, near Stockport.

GOVERNESS WANTED for Four Young Children.—Address, Mrs. BROOKES, Chesterfield House, Henbury, near Bristol.

A TRAINED Ladies' and Medical Nurse is desirous of making ENGAGEMENTS for the ensuing year. G. of references.—Address Mrs. INGLETON, care of Mrs. C. W. Roberts, Coburg Villas, Prince's-street, Southport.

CERTIFICATED MASTER.—WANTED, at Christmas, for the Church of the Divine Unity School, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Salary £30 per annum.—Address, Rev. J. C. STREET, 3, Wardo Terrace, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

A LADY, of long experience in tuition, desires to obtain DAILY TEACHING in Bolton or the immediate neighbourhood. She is able to teach English thoroughly, French acquired on the Continent, the Rudiments of German, Latin, and Italian.—Address H., Chronicle office, Bolton.

ASSISTANT TEACHER.—WANTED, a qualified ASSISTANT TEACHER (Female) for a Mixed School, conducted by a Certificated Master. She will be expected to be able to undertake the entire management of the sewing and work classes, and to be competent to assist the master in other portions of the school work.
Application to be made (in the first instance in writing) to the Secretary of the Carter Lane Mission, 54, High Holborn, London, W.C.

CARISBROOKE, ISLE OF WIGHT.—
The Rev. WILLIAM HARGRAVE, B.A., Lond., is desirous of receiving a limited number of Young Gentlemen to board and educate.
Prospectus on application.

LINDOW GROVE SCHOOL, Alderley Edge.—
Postal address, Mr. WOOD, "The College," Wilmslow.

OLD HOVE HOUSE SCHOOL.—Mr.
Hutton RE-OPENS his School after the Christmas Holidays, on Tuesday, February the 2nd. He will have a few VACANCIES.

A SPECIMEN SET of "HOME PAGES,"
Nos. 1 to 236, in separate Tracts, for eight shillings.
Post-free for eight shillings and sixpence.—Address to the Editor, Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, Higher Broughton, Manchester.

SELECTION OF RELIGIOUS POETRY.
Small 8vo., price 6s.; gilt edges, 6s. 6d.

POEMS OF THE INNER LIFE. Selected by ROBERT
CROMPTON JONES, chiefly from Modern Authors, including Wordsworth, Tennyson, Browning, Mrs. Browning, F. Tennyson, C. Turner, Keble, Newman, Faber, M. Arnold, Clough, Patmore, W. C. Roscoe, Ailingham, A. A. Procter, C. Rossetti, J. Ingelow, Macdonald, Trench, Kingsley, De Vere; with thirty-six others.
London: Sampson Low and Co., Fleet-street.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL PENNY
MAGAZINE for DECEMBER contains:—The Silver-dale Goblins: A Christmas Story—The First Christmas
Hymn: A Parable—A New Version of an Old Story—The White Rose—Contents of Vol. XXI.
Published by the Manchester District Sunday-School Association, London: E. T. Whitfield, 173, Strand. Manchester:
Johnson and Rawson, 89, Market-street. General Agent: Mr.
T. P. JONES, Memorial Hall, Manchester.

BAND OF FAITH TRACTS.
RECENT ISSUES.

Each Tract 8d. per doz. 4s. per 100, post free.
"To be Continued." An Address after the Elections, by Goodwyn Barmby.
In Memory of Henry Briggs, Founder of the Co-operative Collieries at Whitworth and Methley.
The Athanasian Creed: Its Origin and Doctrines.
Consider the Orchises, how they grow! A Study after Darwin.
Address, Westgate Parsonage, Wakefield.

THE UNITARIAN POCKET ALMANAC for 1869 will be ready on or about the 27th inst., in three editions, No. 1, price 2d.; No. 2, price 6d.; No. 3, in roan, with tuck and pocket, price 1s.
Give your orders at once to the Agents of the Herald, to Mr.
JOHN PHILLIPS, 74, Market-street, Manchester, or to Mr.
C. Fox, 67, Paternoster Row, London.

NEW EDITIONS
OF THE
MEMOIR OF TRAVERS MADGE.

The first edition having been out of print since March last, and many requests having been made for it to be reprinted,
A SECOND EDITION, SIMILAR TO THE FIRST,
1 vol., 12mo., cloth, limp, lettered,
Price one shilling and sixpence, is now in the press, and will be issued at the beginning of December.

A BETTER EDITION
will also be issued at the same time, larger in size, better paper, well bound, and with portrait.

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.
* * Of this edition only a very limited number of copies will be prepared, according to the orders actually received for it.
In order to lessen as much as possible the expense and risk of this re-publication, Mr. Herford would be glad to have as many as possible ordered beforehand from himself, so as to save publishing charges upon a portion of the edition. Order may therefore be sent at once, accompanied with stamps or Post-office order, to

Rev. BROOKE HERFORD,
Higher Broughton,
Manchester.
By whom the book will be sent post free immediately on publication.

Just published, price 4s. 6d.
THE LEEDS TUNE BOOK, compiled by
JOSEPH LANCASTER,
Containing Tunes to ALL Martin's Hymns.
London: Novello and Co., 1, Berners-street, W. Manchester:
Johnson and Rawson. Leeds: Hopkinson Brothers, 5 and 6,
Commercial-street; and of all music and booksellers.
Congregations and choirs supplied at low rates.

M. STOBV invites the attention of friends and the public to her New Stock of Ladies' and Gentlemen's WINTER HOSIERY, in English, Scotch, and Welsh Wools. Also, a choice stock of Combs, Brushes, and Sponges, which she is selling at reduced prices.
2, ST. ANN'S PLACE, MANCHESTER.

WILLIAM A. & SYLVANUS SMEE,
Cabinet Makers, Upholsters, Bedding Warehousemen, and Appraisers, 6, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.
Ask the favour of a call to look through their stock.

STEPHEN ROBINSON, Distributor of
S. Stamps, Insurance and Estate Agent, and Accountant, STOCKPORT.

TEVERSHAM'S Boarding House, commercial and private, 22, Ironmonger Lane, Cheap-side, London

KNEEBONE & TIMMIS, 23, Snow Hill,
Birmingham, are Manufacturers of TEA URNS for Tea Parties. Their Stock of HOUSE FURNISHING IRONmongery is one of the best in the Midland counties. K. and T. sent out a good article, and are careful to be moderate in their charges. Friends out of Birmingham may save from 15 to 20 per cent. by purchasing what they may require at KNEEBONE & TIMMIS'S.

WHITFIELD'S PATENT LOCKS and
SAFES, IRON DOORS, BANKERS' STRONG ROOMS,
CASH and DEED BOXES, STREET DOOR LATCHES, &c., &c.
Illustrated Price Lists Post-free on application.
WHITFIELD & SONS,
VIADUCT WORKS, OXFORD-STREET,
EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE,
BIRMINGHAM.

WHAT THE CHURCHES ARE DOING.

At the Semi-Annual General Conference of the Mormon Church, held at Salt Lake City, from October 6th to 8th, a successor was elected to Heber C. Kimball, one of the three of the "First Presidency." The choice fell upon George A. Smith, a cousin of the original prophet, Joseph Smith, and who has been a Mormon from the organisation of the denomination. George A. Smith has for many years been one of the twelve Apostles and Church historian. The latter position he still retains, but his seat among the Apostles was filled by the selection of Brigham Young, jun. The Union Pacific Railroad seems to meet with the approbation of the Mormons, as Brigham Young, sen., stated that in 1869 emigrants would pass between Europe and Salt Lake City in twenty days, instead of being six months on the way.

The operations of the "Palestine Exploration Fund," under the direction of Lieutenant Warren, have led to several interesting results. On the site of Jerusalem three strata of ruins may be said to lie: first, what remains of Solomon's city; secondly, Herod's city; and thirdly, the mediæval or Saracenic city. In order, consequently, to get at traces of Solomon's capital, it is necessary to dig through the rubbish which covers that of Herod. The two problems which most engage the interest of those who explore the Holy City are, the position of the Temple, and the ancient system of water supply. In respect to the former, various opinions have been entertained. All agree in recognising the area now called "Haram," as the spot in some part of which both Solomon's and Herod's Temple stood. As this area is sacred, Lieutenant Warren is not suffered to dig in it, but he is allowed to excavate around it; and according to recent accounts from him, nearly the whole of the south wall has been explored to the rock on which it stands, and passages have been found at the very lowest point up which he has crawled several hundred feet. The disputed valley of the Tyropeon has been ascertained to have run, not by the west wall, as was previously supposed, but across and under a corner of the west wall, its lowest point being in the south wall, at a depth of ninety feet below the present level of the ground, and a hundred and eighty from the top of the wall. The causeway which spanned the gully here and connected Mount Zion with Mount Moriah has been established by the shafts sunk by Lieutenant Warren to have consisted of a road forty feet wide built on arches, and the ruins and piers of these arches have been found. The valley of the Kedron has also been explored, and the ancient bed of the river has been discovered, forty feet lower than the present bed.

Several of Theodore Parker's works have been translated into Swedish, and appear to be exciting considerable interest in Stockholm.

The contest between the civil and ecclesiastical authorities in Austria still continues, and the tribunal of Prague has condemned a priest named Hauseka, secretary to the Archbishop, and preacher to the University, to a fortnight's imprisonment for exciting his congregation to revolt by a sermon against civil marriage.

One effect of the abolition of the Concordat in Austria may be to make marriage cheap. In Gratz a man wanted to marry his deceased wife's sister, which canonically is not permitted, except on payment of 300 florins, the dispensation tax. This was considered too high by the young couple, and they determined, since the church dignitary would not abate his price, to be married by the registrar. Whereupon the usual public notice was affixed at the town-house. This, however, was too much for the bishop of the diocese. He not only sent a vehement letter to the magistrate, demanding the instant removal of this "placard of notification," but declared himself ready to marry the couple himself, free of expense. The magistrate replied that he was very happy to hear it, and under those circumstances, he would, provided the parties consented, order the removal of the obnoxious document which he had caused to be affixed in obedience to the laws of the country. And so they were married free of expense under the auspices of the Church.

It is said that the Spanish bishops are about to assemble a general council at Toledo, to deliberate on the new position in which the church is placed by the revolution, and the proposed proclamation of religious liberty; and that each bishop is afterwards to communicate to his clergy, in a sort of provincial synod, the decisions that have been arrived at.

According to accounts from Rome, the Consistory for the creation of Cardinals, which was to have been held next month, is put off till March, when a batch of ten prelates, one of whom is Dr. Manning, are to receive the purple at once. Although the Pope is disappointed at the way in which his invitation to the Œcumenical Council has been treated by the Patriarch of Constantinople and by several Protestant dignitaries, he is said to have received favourable answers from many influential Protestant ecclesiastics both in England and America, but their names are kept secret.

The Turque gives an account of the interview between the Greek Patriarch at Constantinople and the four Papal envoys sent to invite him to the Œcumenical Council. The Patriarch explained the reasons why he could not accept the invitation. He had already, he said, been made acquainted by the newspapers with the principles expressed in the letter of convocation; and as they were diametrically opposed to those of the orthodox Eastern Church, it was with sincere sorrow that he was unable to subscribe to them. Already, in 1848, his Holiness had sent a similar invitation, and the Eastern Church had met it by an encyclical explaining how widely its principles differed from those of Rome; and this explanation had greatly afflicted his Holiness, as his reply sufficiently indicated. "As, moreover, his Holiness does not seem to have deviated from his principles," added the Patriarch, "and as we on our side, thanks be to God, have not deviated from ours, we have as little desire to vainly cause him fresh sorrows as to open old sores." A discussion then followed, in which the Patriarch maintained that it was not the Greek Church, but the Roman Church, which had departed from apostolical doctrine, and denied the right of the Pope even to summon an Œcumenical Council on his own authority. At the conclusion of the interview the invitation was handed back to the Papal envoys, who thereupon took their leave.

In the action brought against Mr. Baxter Langley, to recover penalties for having violated an Act of George III. by holding the "Sunday Evenings for the People" at St. James's Hall, Lord Chief Justice Bovill and three other judges gave judgment for the defendant, stating that, while the court were fully sensible of the value of the statutes for preventing the desecration of the Lord's Day, they would be unduly stretching a penal enactment if they applied the statute of George III. to the case under consideration.

Can this be true, which is vouched for by a correspondent of the Northern Press?

"A clergyman living within a few miles of the residence of the Bishop of Manchester lately wrote that he had 150 catechumens waiting for Confirmation, and that as it was a long time since that rite had been administered in his parish, he hoped his diocesan would pay him a visit as soon as possible. The Bishop replied that he should take the parish in question in due course, and be there towards the end of 1869. The rector wrote back calling attention to the extreme rarity of Confirmation, begging that an exception might be made in his case, as the population was extremely migratory, and hinting at the hardship of keeping so many persons back from Holy Communion. The Bishop wrote a reply of four lines, in which he said that in all probability he would not get so far as the parish referred to before June or July, 1870! Since then several of the candidates have left, unconfirmed."

The Rev. W. H. Ridley, of Henley-on-Thames, considering that "there is a very wide-spread feeling in the Church that everything has not been done which might be done to bring Bishop Colenso and his teachings before the ordinary courts of the kingdom," suggests that the opinion of the greatest legal authorities should be got on the following points, viz.:

1. Whether everything that is possible has been done?
2. If not, what remains to be tried?
3. How shall this be attempted?

And he asks, "might not the Bishop of London become the prosecutor, as in the case of Mr. Bennett?"

The Daily News draws attention to an advertisement in the Church News, in which a colonial missionary makes fervent appeals for aid. It will interest non-ritualistic readers to know what the objects are that the fervent missionary who goes forth as a fisher of men is chiefly bent on securing, so as to enable him to fling out his nets where good draughts of fishes may be secured. "Anything almost," he writes, "will be useful, but try and send me three corporals and chalice veils, and two amices. I greatly want Gregorian tunes, and music generally; a white silk chasuble, dossal, or hangings for altars; white silk palls for altar vessels, a brass cross processional, and also for the altar, &c."

The Tablet records the reception into the Romish Church of a Protestant community in Market Harborough, Leicestershire. Four pious ladies, devoting themselves to the education of a number of orphan girls, after having carefully examined their religious difficulties, were received into the Church, by the Rev. F. Buckler, O.P. The brother of one of these ladies, Mr. Douglas, a clergyman of the Church of England, hastened to remonstrate with them on the step they had taken; but, upon further examination of their motives, he ended by taking the step himself. He has now entered the English College, at Bruges. The ladies offered to send home the fourteen orphans under their charge; but their guardians and relatives declined to receive them, expressing their perfect satisfaction that they should be brought up in the faith of their teachers. We should think even the Bishop of Oxford will begin soon to feel some doubts whether the Anglican Church is that "bulwark of Protestantism," which he declared it to be.

WHAT IS SAYING ON CHURCH MATTERS

In a paper on Missions in India, read at the Church Congress in Dublin, Dr. Kay said he deemed it one of the greatest of providential mercies, that a land which has been for three thousand five hundred years occupied by the best organised and solidest system of paganism the world has seen—the land over which, only one hundred and seventy years ago one of the most fanatical of Moslem rulers held absolute sway—should be traversable by Christian ministers. That considerable Christian congregations should have been formed at many points of the country; that eminent men, both Hindoos and Mussulmans, should have embraced Christianity at the sacrifice of their dearest earthly interests; and that around the chief foci of mission work, a large amount of knowledge of Christianity should have been diffused—were facts to be gratefully recognised. Still the labour of the present generation is chiefly of a preparatory kind. And those who think that little progress is made should consider that there are some things in Hinduism which tend to give it far more coherency than the idolatrous system of Greece or Rome possessed; especially the veneration of their books of unquestioned antiquity, from which their rites, laws, institutions, and philosophic systems either have been or are supposed to have been derived; and the existence of the priestly caste, and the absolute submission of the reason and conscience which they require. It is easy to conceive what the effect of this has been on the great mass of the people. They believe themselves to be in the midst of a system of things which has been going on for millions of years. Their future destiny is in the hands of the all-powerful "gods upon earth," the wielders of divine authority. To rebel against the Brahman, and so bring down his curse upon them, would (at any rate might, they think) consign them to ages of hopeless misery. Their policy, then, is to remain quiet. Accordingly, when the missionary addresses them, he frequently hears remarks of this kind, "What do I know? Go to the pundits, they know all;" or, "It is all very fine, probably, but it was not written on my forehead;" that is, "Destiny made me a Hindu; I have no right to be anything else!" As for the Brahman, he rejects with scorn the notion that one not born on the sacred soil of India, should have anything to teach him about religion. And even if he be prevailed on to listen, he does not readily see anything attractive in the outlines of Christian doctrine. From childhood upwards his thoughts have been cast in a pantheistic mould. He views himself as a particle of the divine essence that has to rise to reunion with deity by means of prescribed ritual, and mantras, and philosophic study. To tell such a one of man's state of guilt in the sight of the all-holy God, of the necessity of repentance and conversion, of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ, the only Son of God—this is to undeify him, this is to bind him for ever in the bonds of that finite existence from which it has been his great object all along to escape. Those who know what strong fascination Spinozism has exercised on many fine intellects in modern Germany, England, and America, will more easily understand what a hindrance this Brahmanism must present to the progress of Indian evangelisation.

The Church Times thus gives its view of the Ecumenical Council, to which it will "look with intense interest," as it will represent such a large portion of Christendom:

"All England, we are sure, will be ready to sympathise with his Holiness in his desire and wish for re-union, but it is saddening to us that his advisers in this country should have been listened to and have caused him to commit the lamentable mistake of identifying the Anglican branch of the Catholic Church with Cumming, Spurgeon, and Co., and such sectaries. The Roman Church will be represented grandly, no doubt. Perhaps some portion of the Greek Church may be present. But just as no combination of colours will make a white light if one of the primary ones be omitted, so the Pope may promulgate any amount of fresh dogma, which will not be binding on Christendom, because the infallible light of God's Holy Spirit cannot emanate and be visible to the world, from decisions come to with, as it were, the coloured rays only of the yellow of the Greek Church, and the blue of the Roman Church, but without the red of the Anglican Church."

Mr. Joseph Barker's communications to the Methodist Times in favour of the State Church (in which, one of the writers who replies to him is informed that "he had taken orders"), have drawn down upon him a good deal of sharp rebuke. One correspondent says, "his first letter was written in such bad taste, in the remembrance of his antecedents, that he could only expect a little recrimination," and evidently regrets that "Mr. Barker's history must be excluded from the controversy," as "it is a very tempting theme when he talks about his opinions." The editor of the Times, too, is rather severe upon him in saying,

"Several of our esteemed correspondents complain of this controversy on the Irish Church falling into the hands of Mr. Barker. They are unanimous in their fears of his 'sincerity.' We think, however, that a ventilation of his opinions, as held at present, will injure none, but be somewhat serviceable at a future period, as data from which to quote his reveries."

Mr. Skinner, of Crewe, thus puts Mr. Barker right in regard to one point which he attempted to make:

"According to Mr. Barker the enemies of establishments say 'that an Established Church renders other Churches less powerful for good.' He replies, Did it render Wesley powerless? Let me help you, Mr. Barker, to state the case fairly, 'Did a persecuting State Church render Wesley less useful than he otherwise would have been?' Or better still, does a persecuting State Church render Nonconformists in general less useful than they would be if they 'had a fair field and no favour?' This will also apply to what Mr. Barker says about the successes of the 'Primitive Methodists.' Many a Primitive Methodist in town and village could a tale unfold of country squire and parson who have quietly but systematically interfered with the usefulness of his people. Mr. Barker, we want you to distinguish between being 'less powerful' and being 'powerless.'"

After noticing that the Scotch burghs invariably send an unbroken phalanx of Liberals to Parliament, the London Review justly observes that there is no country in the world so absolutely Protestant as Scotland; but there is no Protestant country in the world politically so liberal to Catholics. Why is this? It is because Scotchmen have learnt the great lesson and principle of the time, which is not temporising Erastianism, not latitudinarian comprehension, not indifference as essential to liberality; but perfect equality, social and political, among religious sects—the existence of free Churches within free States.

The Rev. P. Hammond, an American minister, has been holding a "children's revival" in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, at which large numbers were congregated, and the usual kind of unhealthy excitement took place. It is not often that we agree with the Standard, but we do in believing that such revivals are in every sense and on every ground to be deprecated. The children at these services hear strange words; they are told of marvels; they are moved by awful exhortations; in one breath they are told of hopes not to be surpassed, in another they are menaced with depths of misery beyond the power of their young fancies to conceive; then they are invoked, as though they were bound to enlist in some army of sacrifice; their little imaginations are made "foul with woe;" and, the excitement having been worked up to fever heat, there are sobs, and tears, and hysterics. Now, however well meant, all this is radically bad. It is not the right method of teaching the young to be religious.

The Athenæum characterises the new volume of Church Essays entitled "Principles at Stake" as a "new armament fitted out against Ritualism;" and adds that the higher clergy should make public profession of Protestantism, if they still continue to hold it; for "though the Roman section may as yet be small, it is active and energetic, and the laity begin to imagine that it is very widely spread." The reviewer thinks that it is idle to treat the Ritualists as anything but adherents of the Papal system, looking forward to union with Rome. "To all appearance, this maintenance of doctrines so completely at variance with the articles and the subscriptions is not honest. But before we pronounce this sentence we must remember that, in whatever sense dishonesty may be predicated, we cannot refuse to say that it is of a sort which has long flourished in the English Establishment." For ourselves, we must say we cannot help calling to mind in this connection what Punch's Mrs. Laundry says: "But whilst themselves they crosses, and like Popish Priests mutters, None on 'em, mind you, quarrels with their precious bread and butters; They all bides where they be, although to be at Rome they wishes, For why? They can't make up their minds to leave the loaves and fishes."

We have another proof in the following letter from Dr. Littledale to the Guardian, how much unity of feeling, as well as of belief, exists between the members of the High Church and Low Church parties:

"In a lecture which I delivered at Liverpool some months ago, which elicited a little comment, I stated, in dwelling on the executions under Mary Tudor, that the spirit of persecution was just as strong now amongst Puritans, and that they lacked only power, not will, to be more destructive than she was. I alleged in proof that a certain popular preacher of that school, since rather inappropriately advanced to a deanery, had expressed a desire to put to death every clergyman who heard a confession. This charge was repudiated by the rev. gentleman, but in terms not much more explicit than those of Mr. J. S. Mill's late reply to the constituent who inquired into his religious opinions. Accordingly, I put a note to the reprint of my lecture, offering to withdraw the charge if I did not receive, within a reasonable time, the precise reference to a fact which was too deeply rooted in my memory for me to hesitate as to its general correctness. A friend has just sent me the reference, and as it is to your own columns, I venture to trouble you with this letter in vindication of myself. In the Guardian of December 18th, 1850, p. 918, there is an account of a sermon preached by Dr. McNeill, wherein he said that capital punishment was the only proper way of dealing with English clergymen who heard confession. Transportation would not be enough, for that would merely transfer the evil to flourish elsewhere. Death was the only thing for it, and that was his solemn conviction. Your account goes on to say that the preacher, on being remonstrated with, publicly retracted these words, but a second friend tells me that he subsequently withdrew this retraction. And I have a strong impression that the same mild suggestion was made during the anti-Confessional agitation of 1858."

The Rev. J. Hannah, of Glenalmond College, is very wroth with Mr. Farrar, Master at Harrow, for what he calls "the sweeping charges against his brother clergymen of being 'wholly out of sympathy' with the spirit of the age." He tells him that he "is thoroughly overmastered by an impetuous rhetoric," "damages his own cause by his glaring exaggerations," and "thinks he is simply showing a loving zeal for their improvement when he accuses his brethren of all kinds of ignorance, prejudice, and injustice," &c., &c. And then he adds:

"A man must indeed be blinded by the dust of his own rapid driving who can allege that one of the most learned Churches of a learned age, the Church of Milman and Merivale, of Wordsworth and Pusey, of Ellicott and Alford, is still offering 'to our most brilliant and earnest youths nothing better than the philosophy of Paley and the chronology of Ussher, or the criticism of D'Oyley and Mant;' that the Church which has given birth to Whately and Arnold, and all the chief leaders of free thought, as well as their opponents, is determined to array its 'splendid authority against any concession to liberty, against any advance of knowledge, against any measure of justice which' the laity think right and good; that the age of Whewell and Herschel, of Airy and Forbes, of a hundred others scarcely less famous, who have been equally devoted to science and religion, is in danger of seeing science finally arrayed against 'the accredited representatives of that majestic society' to which most of them belong; that a clergy which helps every scientific association, and has contributed many of the foremost men of science of the period, can be justly described as 'wholly out of sympathy with science, in many instances suspicious of it, in many more its bitter and ignorant opponents.'"

The Church News thus lets us into the tactics by which it and the Romanizing party in the Establishment propose to bring England once more in subjection to Rome:

"We must insist that, humanly speaking, the ultimate success of the movement depends on our maintaining the union of Church and State. We do not wish to Catholicise a few persons here and there, but we aim at Christianising the masses. We have to reach them, and we have hitherto failed to reach them, from prejudice on their part and mediocrity-inclined stiffness on our side. But dissolve the union betwixt Church and State and the national Catholic revival ceases. Of course High-Church people, and priests, and worship will remain, as the Irvingites exist, a small community by themselves. But the small new High Church sect would infallibly be in full communion with Rome in five years' time. And the people will be Dissenters or heathens; why not Roman Catholics? some may ask. Simply because England will never become Catholic through the Roman part of the Church. The Roman Catholics minister to their own people and to the Irish, and make a good many converts from the upper classes, but they can never leaven the lump and touch the people as we hope and intend to do with the blessing of God. What Cardinal Wiseman said was this—England must return to Catholic unity through the Established Church. The Established Church, then, must get hold of the people, and not only get hold of them but Catholicise them. As we move onward, and restore again the sacrifice of the mass, the confessional, the seven sacraments, the veneration of Mary and the saints, prayers for the departed, the Catholic doctrine of purgatory, and the like, we must remember that we have to restore these rites, beliefs, and practices, not as luxuries for a few, but as living realities to be held and used by all."

The current number of the Bookseller says:

"It will be remarked as somewhat singular that, at a time when a most momentous change is looming in the future of the Irish Church, not a single work upon her history, usefulness, missionary labours and successes, distinguished prelates and ministers, nor upon any other subject connected therewith, should be found in the following long list [of books for the present season]. If we remember rightly, when her temporalities only were menaced, Bishop Mant and Mr. King, of Armagh, came to the rescue with histories and primers. Now all her advocates are dumb, or we have missed the notice of their labours. It may be that the church was slow to recognise the value of good Dr. Mant's ponderous tomes, and that the remembrance of this want of recognition has deterred others. Nevertheless, the absence of such works is remarkable."

Mr. J. M. Capes, so well known to the readers of the Pall Mall, writing on the musical aspects of Ritualism, which he regards with much disfavour says:

"In its essence, Ritualism as now cultivated, both in its milder and its more audacious forms, is an æsthetic movement. It is a protest against the miserable meagreness and ugliness of the old-fashioned puritanical rigorism. Its connection with the Roman eucharistic dogmas, and Roman Mariolatry and saint worship in general, is little more than accidental. Undoubtedly the æsthetic system of public worship finds in sacramentalism, and especially in the doctrine of the real presence, a splendid opportunity for its development. But that is all. The spirit of Ritualism—that is, a love for something more than the bare decorum in public services—is everywhere at work. It has covered the country with restorations of churches, cathedrals, and chapels, and with new churches and chapels almost innumerable. High Church, Low Church, Middle Church, Wesleyan, Independent, Baptist, Unitarian, ultra-Protestant, and ultra-Roman alike—every branch of the Christian Church has caught the soft infection. The enormous sums which have been spent during the last thirty or forty years in painted glass windows alone, both within and without the Establishment, are such as would have been set down as incredible a generation ago. Surely it is hardly philosophical to identify with a rank sacerdotalism a love for external beauty and religious expressiveness, a passion which kindles the souls and opens the purses, alike of the adherents of every school of thought, save, perhaps, the Quakers. I have not, indeed, as yet heard, that the meeting-houses of the Society of Friends are beginning to be constructed on the most correct models of thirteenth-century Gothic. But now that 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' are to be heard in some of the most rigidly Protestant homes of Nonconformity, and that painted windows are popular among the descendants of the atrocious iconoclasts of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, we should hardly be surprised at finding that the followers of Fox were turning their attention towards the beautifying of their 'places of worship,' as well as of their comfortable and hospitable drawing-rooms and dining-rooms."

The Dublin Review, in an attempt to rehabilitate the old worn-out legend of Glastonbury Abbey having been founded by Joseph of Arimathea, rests its argument mainly on the ground that the monastery must have been founded by somebody—"which nobody can deny"—and why should anyone have thought of Joseph of Arimathea unless it was he? It would be interesting to apply this mode of reasoning in various other cases. For instance, up and down the country there are "Devil's Bridges;" these must have been made by somebody, and why should anyone have fixed on his Satanic majesty unless because he was the true Pontifex?

In a letter to the parishioners of St. Luke's, Berwick-street, Westminster, the Rev. Harry Jones, the vicar, referring to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, in a wise and Christian spirit says:

"I deplore the bitterness of the strife which the question arouses, especially as shown in the cry of 'No Popery!' and 'Church in danger!' I dislike Popery, but I fear that in some instances—I will not say all, or anything like all—but in some instances, those who raise the 'No Popery,' cry are guilty of that which is the very essence of Popery, i.e., preferring the maintenance of an ecclesiastical form to the doing of justice. Popery will never be mitigated by intolerance."

We notice with pleasure that the Inquirer has come round at last to the view which the Herald from the first has always expressed with regard to the union of Church and State, and we trust that in future it will no longer misrepresent the opinion of the great majority of Unitarians on the subject. As is often the case with converts, it seems now disposed to speak somewhat hardly of its former errors, and in awarding just praise to Mr. Miall, it says, "he has laboured to upset one strong national superstition, and has in consequence aroused all the mindless prejudices associated with it." "But Miall's day is coming, when intelligence will lessen prejudices, and do full justice to the great question of ecclesiastical equality and its noble promoter."

As we predicted would be the case, the elevation of Dr. Tait to the Primacy, spite of John Bull's and other papers' warnings, has roused the ire of the High Church party in no ordinary degree. "A Peer of the Realm," in Wednesday's Church News, goes so far as to declare, with a want of loyalty very unbecoming his order, that the appointment was "in no sense Mr. Disraeli's" (this is printed in italics), and that the Premier was "commanded to offer the vacant See to Bishop Tait, and had no alternative but resignation or obedience." As the Archbishop does not recognise the validity of the Bishop of Natal's deposition, the Church News submits that on his "first overt act of communion" with "the infidel Colenso," it will be the duty of all true Churchmen, "at whatever cost," to treat His Grace also as excommunicated! What a united and happy family the Establishment just now presents!

LITERARIA.

DR. NORMAN MACLEOD has published the substance of his speech on Indian Missions, delivered before the General Assembly of the Kirk of Scotland in May last, with a good deal of additional matter that is interesting and suggestive. One paragraph is encouraging, and makes us feel more deeply the wisdom and importance of the work which Miss Carpenter, in the true spirit of Christian enterprise, has undertaken. He says:

"There is no movement in India at this moment of greater interest or more hopeful in its results than that of female education, whether in schools or in the Zenana. I believe that India is on the eve of great changes, or rather of rapid progress in this department, and that the Church ought by means of female schools and admission to the Zenanas, to take an earnest and active share in aiding it."

Dr. Littledale has printed his lecture, with the title of "Innovations," in which occurred the strong sentences, that we gave at the time of its delivery, respecting Cranmer and the other leaders of the English Reformation. In long, elaborate notes, he endeavours to establish the correctness of his view. He fails, however, to justify the black representations which he gave of the character of Cranmer, and does little more than show, what Lord Macaulay and others had shown before, that he was a trimmer and a time-server, and was guilty of sinful compliances under imminent fear of death.

We were not aware till a few days since what a prolific writer Dr. Pusey was. The list of his various pamphlets and other publications—including some which are only privately printed—occupies no less than twenty-four pages in the catalogue of the British Museum.

If we may trust several of our contemporaries, a well-known Ritualistic publisher advertises a little work on "The Sin of the Age," which sin turns out on inquiry to be—Evening Communion!

In an essay with the startling title "The Devil's Miracles and how to Know them," the Rev. P. Carlyon informs us of the kind of signs, magical and the like, which will be wrought by Antichrist, and by which he will seek to impose upon us. The author's intention no doubt is good—that being forewarned we may be forearmed; but we fear the effect of his essay will hardly be such as he desires.

In a pamphlet entitled "Spiritualism and Common Sense," R. J. H. examines, in a candid and careful manner, the chief hypotheses on which spiritualists ordinarily rest their belief, and shews how untrustworthy and unphilosophical they are. The charges that he makes against the system, if system it can be called, which he undertakes to expose, are these:

"(1.) The tendency of Spiritualism leads to a species of feeble superstition. (2.) It tends to a fanciful and sensuous sentimentality, and that at the expense of weakening our reason, judgment, and our common moral sense. (3.) It tends to the doing away of the spirituality of religion, the need of faith, and reduces all to sense and irreverent transaction. (4.) It tends to trifling and frivolity in matters beyond the warrant of human knowledge and power. All kinds of people, under all conditions, in all relations, and having all kinds of motives, turn tables, which, according to Spiritualism, is nothing less than invoking and communing with the spirits of the dead. It may be that it is an exercise after the dinner-party, under the influence of things which do not always make people grave and wise; young women and young men practise it to try their power and skill, when time is heavy on their hands, whether or not they can charm some spirit to obey their invocation. And if such things are not trifling about matters beyond the business of men on earth, it is hard to tell in what it consists. . . . I cannot persuade myself that the person or persons who think that spirits will appear by feeling of tables and other matters of the kind, can have great reverence and high esteem for the dead, or of the laws that permit or appoint it. (5.) It tends to a species of clumsy materialism. It reduces the spiritual world and its inhabitants to the level of this; it makes them even lower; for the spirits can only knock tables and play tricks of that kind; whilst we can express ourselves in language and other superior forms. The dead commune with us in spiritual sympathies, invisible and unknown as our sympathies are to them, which are not expressed so cheap and common as the spiritualism of these latter days would have us to believe. (6.) It tends to an assumption of power which would prove unwarrantable and dangerous if believed in. A man who professes to have power over the mystery of the spiritual world becomes deluded himself, and has, in the degree he is believed in, power to sway others, and always some will believe in such a thing. Such a person may mislead many, and destroy happiness, and lead to distress, and ruin many a blind follower."

Dr. Schenkel has published a "Life of Schleiermacher," as a centenary offering to his memory. It is spoken of as having been prepared for the purpose of showing Schleiermacher's general antagonism to the orthodoxy of his day.

The same author, with a considerable body of free-thinking assistants, among whom are Bruch, Schweizer, Gass, Hitzig, Schwarz, Lepsius, and Reuss, has edited a "Popular Dictionary of the Bible," in which, of course, their own views are set forth.

In "Annals of the Bodleian Library," by the Rev. W. D. Macray, a curious story is told of the copy on vellum, with illuminated initials, of the first volume of the Vulgate Bible, printed by Faust and Scheffer, in 1462, which was bought in 1750 for two pounds ten shillings. The volume was imperfect at the end, ceasing at Job xxxii. 5, and seven leaves followed in contemporary and beautiful manuscript, which also ended imperfectly at Psalms xxxvi. 9, with one leaf wanting at the end of Job. In 1817 the Bodleian Library became the purchaser (for more than five thousand pounds), of a large collection of manuscripts formed by Matteo Luigi Canonisi, a Jesuit father, who died in Venice about 1805. His manuscripts were received at Oxford in 1818, and among some fragments which were found in one of the boxes were fourteen leaves of a manuscript Bible, which were at once recognised as being part of those wanted to complete this book, and which left only four still deficient. The volume came to the library from the collection of N. J. Foucault, but through how many hands the missing leaves had passed in the seventy subsequent years ere they were thus marvellously restored to their place, it is impossible to tell.

"TO US THERE IS BUT ONE GOD, THE FATHER."

WHILE others sing a Triune God
Of Three in One and One in Three;
In Reason's temple we have trod,
Where reigns an only Deity;
We sing the great Creator's praise
Who hung the starry worlds on high;
Whose wisdom shines thro' all his ways,
Whose goodness is for ever nigh.

While others sing a dying God,
And to his blood for shelter fly,
In Reason's temple we have trod,
Where He who reigns can never die.
Yet when they sing Jehovah's blood
That clears the penalties of sin,
We ask (tho' long their faith has stood),
Could Reason e'er such faith begin?

While others sing a vengeful God,
And deem His love is theirs alone,
In Reason's temple we have trod,
A God so partial we disown.
Arouse, perplexed or downcast souls,
Our Father has no aimless hell;
The knell of Superstition tolls,
'Tis Reason tolls her passing knell.*

SOUTH PLACE, FINSBURY SQUARE.

THE following, from the series of articles which have, from time to time appeared in the Christian World, on "Heretical London," though it contains several inaccuracies, will not be without interest to many of our readers:

The religion of humanity has been for a time dominant in South-place, Finsbury-square. Its oldest and original teacher in connection with the place was the late W. J. Fox, M.P., a popular writer and eloquent orator, who did much in his day and generation on behalf of freedom in trade, in politics, and religion, and did it well. Nor did he labour in vain as regards himself. Born in an humble position, he became a student at Homerton College and an orthodox dissenter. In a little while he joined the Unitarians, and then left them for a freer and fuller [?] religious creed and form of worship. He had many friends. His letters, signed Publicola, in the Weekly Dispatch, were the delight of the working classes; and his anti-corn-law orations charmed all, and there were tens of thousands who had the pleasure of listening to them. He was returned to Parliament by the electors of Oldham, and a monument erected to his memory there still perpetuates his name. He died at a ripe old age, ever having preserved the character of an independent and honourable man. As a religious teacher he was no extraordinary success. It was rarely indeed that South-place was very full. Of course the hearers were the very élite of the human race. Wherever you go—especially among sects not particularly orthodox or popular—the men and women with whom you come in contact are no ordinary men and women. By a happy dispensation of Providence they fail to see themselves as others see them, and are as firmly convinced of their own intellectual superiority over a benighted British public as they are of the truth of their principles and of their ultimate success.

"There is a religion of humanity," said Mr. Fox, "though not enshrined in articles and creeds, though it is to be read merely in sacred books, and yet it may be read in all wherever they have anything in them of truth and moral beauty—a religion of humanity which goes deeper than all because it belongs to the essentials of our moral and intellectual constitution, and not to mere external accidents, the proof of which is not in historical agreement or metaphysical deduction, but in our own conscience and consciousness,—a religion of humanity which unites and blends all other religions, and makes one the men whose hearts are sincere, and whose characters are true, and good, and harmonious, whatever may be the deductions of their minds or their external profession,—a religion of humanity which cannot perish in the overthrow of altars or the fall of temples, which survives them all, and which, were every derived form of religion obliterated from the face of the earth, would re-create religion as the spring re-creates the fruits and flowers of the soil, bidding it bloom again in beauty, bear again its rich fruits of utility, and fashion for itself such forms and modes of expression as may best agree with the progressive condition of mankind." It was in accordance with these ideas that the Sunday morning services in South-place were carried on.

After Mr. Fox came Mr. Ierson, and a nearer approximation to regular Unitarianism. But the place did not prosper; there were far too many empty benches. He was succeeded by a gentleman formerly a Baptist minister, but who had outgrown his sect, and for a little while there was harmony and progress. Again there was an interregnum. "Seekers are," said old Oliver Cromwell, "next best to finders." In London, especially in these unsettled days of free inquiry, are many such, and to such the pulpit of South-place was freely offered. I don't fancy as a rule seekers are good preachers. To say anything effectually you must have something to say. To make others weep you must weep yourself. With mere negations you can never sway the minds or influence the lives of men. In orthodox places of worship there is often much of dreariness. The clergyman whose heart is not in his work is a miserable spectacle for gods and men, but the dreariness of heterodoxy is infinitely greater; and of all things under the sun the most miserable in the clerical way is the sight of a would-be philosopher feebly diluting or expanding, as the case may be, windy platitudes or transcendental moonshine. Under such an inflection, as it may well be imagined, South-place did not flourish greatly. At length, in due course, a man appeared to continue the work which Mr. Fox had originated. His name is Mr. M. D. Conway; I believe he is of American origin, and according to all accounts the cause is in a prosperous state. When I say prosperous the term is not to be understood as it would be in orthodox circles. The latter class of religionists when they say that a place is prosperous imply by the use of such language that a place of worship is well filled; that men are turned from sin to holiness, from serving the devil to serving God, that the place is a centre of religious life and activity, and that all, young and old, rich and poor, are to the best of their power and means co-operating in Christian work. Prosperity in this sense cannot be predicated of South-place. Its doors are only opened once a week. There is no religious, or educational, or philanthropic agency connected with the chapel; but there are more attendants than there were, and that encourages Mr. Conway and his friends. Indeed, there is a talk amongst them of establishing a Sunday-school. At the same time it seems to me that the class of people who go to South-place are not socially or intellectually what they were in Mr. Fox's time—when the Courtaulds would come up all the way from Braintree to hear Mr. Fox, when city lawyers like the late Mr. Ashurst, and city magnates like the late Mr. Dillon were amongst the audience; when on a Sunday morning might be seen there such men as Sir John Bowring, or Macready, or Charles Dickens, and others equally well known to fame. They left when Mr. Fox left. I believe Mr. Peter Taylor, M.P., still keeps up a connection more or less fitful or uncertain with the place. Sir Sydney Waterlow also still retains a couple of sittings, but he is rarely there; and the little congregation, now very seldom much more than a hundred, is certainly neither numerous nor select. Still they use the little book of hymns and anthems collected by Mr. Fox; and the musical part of the service, always a great matter at South-place, is as well conducted as ever.

* Altered from a Philadelphian contribution to the Freethinking Christians' Magazine of fifty years ago. I. 248.

I may be mistaken, though Mr. Conway is a very advanced thinker, but it seems to me that the character of the preaching and praying is less purely simply pantheistic than it was; that there is an increase of devotional feeling; that the service is more, for instance, in accordance with the spirit and teaching of George Dawson, of Birmingham, than of the late Mr. Fox, whose fascinating oratory owed very little of its charm to that which orthodox Unitarians or orthodox Christians hold highest and holiest; whose aim was more to pull down than to build up, and who had a greater faculty for the exposition of Christian fallacies and weaknesses and errors than he had for the enunciation of truths and principles needful to humanity in its hour of temptation, distress, danger, or death. Few have his exquisite humour, his power of sarcasm, his acquaintance with modern literature, his copious command of polished language, his expressive yet calm delivery, his gentleness almost as touching as that of woman; but that which was lacking in him often made men his inferiors in intellect his superiors in the art of arousing the spiritually dead, or in giving to the moral wastes in our midst the vigour, the beauty, the fertility of life.

The Unitarian Herald.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1868.

PENDING THE BATTLE.

THERE can be no disguising the fact that there has been a great battle waged through these kingdoms during the last ten or eleven days—a battle between two great parties for mastery over the country, and power to dictate its future policy. The battle has raged with various success in different quarters of the field, and is not yet decided. Here the party of progress, and here the standstill party has proved the stronger. On the whole, the tide of success is largely with the Liberals. But their future, though matter for congratulation, has not corresponded to their own prognostications. To their surprise, they have been defeated in many points where they made sure of success, as in the boroughs and county divisions of Lancashire; while in other places, as in such a cathedral town as Durham, where the Tory interest might be supposed to be predominant, they have come off triumphant.

Those who have been in the thick of the fight, and noticed the party feeling and party passion called forth on both sides, must have been irresistibly carried back to times when, as in the wars of the Roses, and the wars of the Revolution, the two great parties into which English society has ever seemed divided, strove for mastery on many a bloody field—and have felt how fortunate it is for us that the factions have found a more peaceable mode of trying their strength. Certainly there has been in many quarters as good sound hate as ever there could have been in the armies of CHARLES or CROMWELL, of EDWARD of YORK or HENRY of LANCASTER. Men have been led by their party passion to paint their opponents quite as monstrous as the Lancasterians painted RICHARD III., and then, having made them hateful, to think themselves justified in hating them accordingly. Curious is the pertinacity, for example, with which Mr. GLADSTONE has been painted as a Papist in disguise; and the most abominable aims—overturning religion, plundering property, profaning the sanctity of the marriage tie, &c., &c., attributed to the Liberals.

Sometimes one can well believe that men have become intoxicated with party rage, and, blinded by their fury, have struck out wildly at the phantom of their own insanity. But often it seems impossible to believe that some who utter these absurd slanders really believe them, or to avoid the sad conviction that while not believing them for themselves, they utter them for the purpose of stirring up party hatred in others. We see the way in which these "irritamenta odii" are got up and manipulated in the course taken by the Tories in Dumfriesshire, in regard to Sir SIDNEY WATERLOW. These, according to the Pall Mall, were the instructions given by one of their agents to a detective officer in town: "One of your city men, Alderman or Sir SIDNEY WATERLOW, has come here to oppose a friend of mine, Major WALKER, for the representation of this county. He is, of course, a complete stranger to us, and we want to know something about him. In particular, we have heard a rumour that he is a Unitarian, and connected with Finsbury Place Chapel, which is said to be a Unitarian place of worship. Now I want you to find out and let me know if this is the case—if he has a pew there. Does he subscribe to the funds of the chapel, and does he attend it regularly? He is at present in London. Ascertain, if you can, if he attends there to-morrow; in fact, all you can about him in regard to this point."

It was discovered that Sir SIDNEY was a Unitarian, and the supposed damaging fact was published in Dumfriesshire accordingly. However, it was found that not even in Scotland was the word "Unitarian" the spell that was supposed, to raise the devil of bigotry and distrust, for Sir SIDNEY was returned.

It is no doubt largely owing to the industrious use of irritamenta like these to stir up the logical fear and antipathy of their people—by a large party of the clergy of the Established Church, that the Liberals have sustained such large and unexpected defeats. It is really not to be wondered at when we think to what a large portion of the population the clergy have access, and how large is their influence over certain classes. For, the clergy feel the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church to be something like the question of committing sacrilege, and touching the things consecrated to God; and further they believe, as we think correctly, that the disestablishment of the Irish Church will be sure to be followed by the attempt to disestablish the English Church—which will be like pulling down the temple itself. But, in addition to all this, think of the blind fear so many of the clergy have of Popery, and the assurance they feel that, in Ireland at least, if the establishment is removed, that terrible "Popery" will become rampant over the land. Think of all these feelings and persuasions—panics we may call them—of the clergy, and remember that now for many months they have left no stone unturned to instil their own panics into the minds of their people, and to assure them that to support the Liberal movement was to betray their church and their religion. In reality, it is astonishing, with such a phalanx of enemies working perpetually against them the Liberals should have gained so much. Their defeats in Lancashire are partly due, no doubt, to the fact that here the English part of the constituency have a large element of Irish in the midst of them, and have therefore all the less sympathy with them, and all the greater readiness to be roused by their clergy into even Murphyite "No Popery" feelings.

However, there is one comfort. The clergy have put forth all their strength and are greatly defeated. Henceforth they may depend upon it their power will be less dreaded, while there will be a sterner determination on the part of many Liberals to do all they can to break their power still more. And thus the very measures which the church party have used to ward off disestablishment will only tend to bring it more certainly upon themselves.

AMERICAN NOTES.

The Editor of the Monthly Journal of the American Unitarian Association devotes nearly forty pages to the proceedings of the recent National Conference, from which we make such extracts as we think will interest our readers.

Alluding first to the attendance, he says:

"The cost of the journey to New York, and of spending several days at an hotel, was a more serious obstacle than perhaps, the managers of the Conference were aware. We received many letters from ministers and delegates most deeply interested in the Conference, who were absolutely prevented, by this consideration, from being present at the meeting. Taking this fact into view, the unprecedentedly large attendance may be regarded as the most unqualified testimony to the active interest on the part of our people in the affairs of the denomination, and their deep sense of the importance of the opportunities which it was the purpose of the Conference to discuss. We have called the meeting unprecedentedly large, because, whatever may be the official return in regard to the number of delegates present, no one can doubt, that, including representatives of our parishes who attended, not as delegates, but simply as spectators, and who were drawn to New York by their interest in the occasion, the assembly was larger than on either of the previous meetings of the Conference."

Of Dr. Bellows's sermon on "The History, Position, Opportunities, and Duties of the Unitarian Denomination," he remarks:

"The preacher, by his choice of subject, harmonised with the whole spirit of the Convention, which, in every way, evinced that matters of speculation, however important, were, on this occasion, to be held subordinate to the great practical issues and duties of the day; and the sermon rapped directly and fearlessly with the topics which were to be mainly discussed."

In a paper on "Itinerant Missionary Preaching," the Rev. C. B. Ferry, secretary of the New Hampshire Association, made the startling declaration that in that State, according to his estimate, two-thirds of the people are wholly outside of existing churches. He proposed "to bring about a change for the better, by giving the Gospel feet, and sending it forth in the true simplicity of Christ." He said:

"The Methodists have set us an example in missionary enterprise to which we shall do well to give heed. And now that Liberal Christianity is coming out from the half-a-dozen cities in which it has been nursed and confined for the last half century; out from its parlours and studies, where it has grown a whitened and delicate thing; out from the hands of the few, and is fast assuming the character and proportions of a faith for the millions, and a hope and consolation for a nation of fainting and dying men and women,—it becomes us to adopt such methods for its wider diffusion in the world as shall be in keeping with the commission we have received by virtue of possessing it from the Master of souls."

The plan which he recommended was that of a "circuit ministry," by which the demands of both people and ministers should be met. The people should have ministers whom they would love to hear, and therefore would be willing to support liberally; and the ministers should receive a sufficient compensation. He said:

"Let three or four, or even more towns, unite themselves into one parish, and call a good, strong man to preside over them, and break the bread of life to them,—preach in each town once a fortnight, or once a month, as circumstances would permit,—and let him be the recognised minister or bishop of that district. I would not call him a missionary, or, at least, I would avoid the meaning usually attached to that word; for it does not give us sufficiently the idea of permanency. I would have the circuit preacher just as permanently settled, by ordination or installation, over his charge, as any minister among us is over his city or country parish; the only difference being that the circuit minister's parish extends over a wider territory than that of the local minister."

The Editor of the Journal suggests that the Secretary of every Local Conference should act as a general superintendent and missionary for his district, receiving for this service a salary from the Unitarian Association, and giving to this work a stated portion of his time. In some cases this has been done, and where this officer has no other charge it is easily arranged; but as matters now stand, with the dearth of suitable men, the secretaries will generally be settled pastors; and the difficulty presents itself that the parishes will not wish their minister to attend to other than their own work, and that ministers themselves have not the time or strength for this added service. The editor, therefore, suggests that every secretary thus engaged shall have associated with him an assistant, who shall be competent to supply his place when he is absent from his own pulpit, shall preach in the new places where services are organised, shall attend to the circulation of literature, and, in general, under the direction of the secretary, shall assist him in the work as opportunity may offer. We have sometimes thought that a plan not very dissimilar to this might be adopted here with advantage. As it is, settled ministers have so many claims on their time and attention, that it is impossible for them to give that help in missionary labours which they wish.

The next subject taken up was "Our Theological Schools," when the Rev. R. Laird Collier advocated the removal of the Meadville Institution to Chicago, and his proposition was referred to a committee who will give it immediate attention. Dr. Gannett, then, on behalf of the committee appointed at the meeting of the Alumni of Cambridge Divinity School, presented a plan for combining that school and the "Boston School for the Ministry;" but this was voted, the editor thinks too hastily, to be inexpedient. In favour of the union, he says:

"We want able theologians of course, as truly as we want preachers or pastors; but there is no necessity for such differences in method and surroundings as some suppose. We do not believe that Channing, or Parker, or Edwards were any less able as theologians because of any practical sight they had of the application of theology to the life. Nor that John Wesley was any poorer preacher or less fervent worker because of his having ranked among the first in the studies at the University.

When it comes to the period after leaving the school it is different. The distractions of an active ministry may prevent such a close devotion of all the faculties to study and thought as this great subject of theology demands; and we hope the time may come when those who are fitted for it may be enabled to give their lives unreservedly to its pursuit. But there is no need of counting years so closely as to begin this exclusiveness in the schools. Besides, it frequently happens, and perhaps it is usually the case, that those beginning their preparation do not know whether their tastes will lead them to the one or the other direction. This, however, would only show the needlessness or the embarrassment of such separate and distinct methods of training. We go further, and say that the separation would be injurious. The two classes of men would act healthily on each other. The future theologians would be helped by the warmth and the practical earnestness and aims of those who were trying to fit themselves to be useful pastors and ministers. And, on the other hand, it is a wholesome thing for those who are to be chiefly engaged in practical work to learn respect for those studies which they themselves are never to have the opportunity to pursue."

The most important debate of the whole Conference, and which occupied three hours, related to its constitution, but issued in a resolution which really made no difference in it whatever, but while still maintaining the Christian character of the Conference, left any minority in it to the free and unrestricted enjoyment of their own opinions. As the Editor of the Journal puts it:

"These two things were shown, as clearly as words could show, to be the purpose and meaning of the Conference; namely, 1st, to hold the organisation unequivocally to the Christian basis; and, 2nd, to guard by all means, and against every possible infringement, the principle of Congregationalism and of individual liberty. We would go before the world with the verbatim report of that morning's discussion, and we would challenge any one to declare whether that body, of which these were the free utterances, is not Christian; and we would challenge anyone to declare if it is not also liberal!"

ADDRESS OF THE GERMAN PROTESTANT UNION.

We translate the following portions of an address of the German Protestant Union, for the benefit of our readers, feeling sure that they will be pleased by the free spirit which breathes through it.

After the tercentenary of the Reformation, held in Bremen at Whitsuntide, a large number of pastors published a declaration condemning the members of the Protestant Union, as "having broken with the Evangelical Church, and deserted the faith in which they were baptised." Unmindful of the warning, "Judge not that ye be not judged," and without authority from any one, these ministers assumed to themselves the office of judges in regard to the Protestant Union, and after the manner of the Romish court issued a bull of excommunication against it. And this was done in the kingdom of the Hohenzollern, which has always maintained religious and spiritual freedom against the passion for condemnation of narrow-minded zealots. In Berlin, the capital of the North German Union, where for a generation Frederick Schleiermacher before all shone as a teacher of the clergy and led back the cultivated to Christianity—there a body of pastors make bold to exclude the disciples of Schleiermacher, as infidels, from Church fellowship. This unchristian and unprotestant conduct induces us, the sub-committee of the German Protestant Union, to offer a public reply, not to these pastors, but to the community whom they have warned against us.

With great struggles of soul, and perilling her very existence for it, the German nation in the 16th century undertook to combat the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and carried the movement victoriously through. From that time the Protestant spirit of conscientiousness and religious freedom has remained active in the German people. Verily, not for this did Christ free humanity from both the "divine" law of Moses and that of the Jewish priesthood, that it might be enslaved by the dogmatism of Christian theology. Not for this did Luther free the Christian conscience from the despotism and anathemas of Pope, and Councils, and Bishops, that it might fall afresh under the despotism and anathemas of pastoral conferences.

Besides this first religious and ecclesiastical possession, the German nation has also a second, an intellectual and temporal one, to guard and cherish—the riches of her literature, and the treasures of her knowledge. Scientific freedom is the younger, equal-born sister of religious freedom—the perfect truthfulness of the rational mind—the necessary complement of liberty of conscience. To this hundreds and thousands of the noblest sons of our nation have devoted all the energies of their lives.

In the presence now of the unhappy separation which has taken place between the pastors' theology, on the one side, which is reactionary partly through custom, partly through a new impulse, and the mode of thought and speech of modern civilisation, on the other, the German Protestant Union was formed, with a view "to strive after a revival of the Protestant Church, in the spirit of evangelical freedom, and in harmony with the general development of culture, on the basis of evangelical Christianity."

The authority also of that contracted and hierarchical tendency among the Protestant clergy, which for a generation, after the type of the kindred Jesuit tendency in the Catholic Church, has stolen into the theological faculties and into church government, and has done so much to ruin science and learning, evidently drives the cultivated classes more and more away from the church. We regard this estrangement as a national calamity, because it leaves the deep religious wants of the German people unsatisfied, and seduces them into the way of error. Were it to go much further in this direction, the Church would shrivel to a mere sect, and culture would renounce altogether the Christianity thus contracted. To obviate this threatened danger the German Protestant Union considered their chief task. Those Berlin pastors accuse us now of no longer believing in the Gospel as "the word of God." There has been untold abuse in the Protestant Church of this "word of God." In consequence, faith in it can be stretched till it holds the fancy (which an orthodox Berlin pastor, to the amazement of the educated world, has lately avowed) that the naive, child-like conception of nature in the Bible, which considers the great immovable centre of the universe to be in our world, round which revolves the vault of heaven with its host of wandering little constellations, is true, all the revelations of astronomy being mere error. . . . We honour the Bible as "The most sacred record of divine revelation," but at the same time we see in every unscientific restriction on investigation into the Book, an outrage on evangelical truth, and a violation of Protestant freedom.

These Berlin pastors further make bold to measure our faith by the scale of the Trinity formula, which sprang up during the fruitless controversies of Byzantine theology. Opinions on these dogmatic questions often vary amongst us. Even the faith which these pastors avow is neither excluded nor condemned in our Union. But we are one in this, that the modern world will be no more agitated in its religious feelings by that strife which distracted the Greco-Roman empire in its decline, and brought it to swifter destruction. Our time makes a point, not of theological dogma, but of a Christian life. It values a Christian love of God and man far above orthodoxy. The German Protestant Union defends the right of the modern Protestant world so to do and so to think, and does not let itself be terrified from this by any bull of "excommunication."

With indignation we repudiate the calumny that we no longer believe in a living, creative God. But when a large number of modern Christians refuse to think of God as in opposition to the divine laws of nature, and as such working preternatural miracles, then we maintain their right to express this opinion in the Protestant Church. We believe that the living God exhibits himself in the development of intellect, and we see in the weak attempts made to cramp this back into the bondage of former centuries, a grievous misconception of the Divine guidance of the world.

We do not allow these Berlin pastors the right to cross-examine us as to whether we believe that Jesus Christ was "very God" or not. Still less are they authorised to answer the question in our name. But we will not conceal the incontestable fact, that the ancient heathen world learnt more readily to believe in Christ glorified to them as God, while the modern world of to-day, with its wider consciousness of God and conceptions of nature, is sooner won and inspired with love of Christ if he is represented to them humanly as a man. We maintain here, too, the full right of the present Protestant world, to view Christ historically, and conceive of him as human. Whoever denies this right drives a great number of the enlightened either into public hypocrisy, or to a renunciation of Christianity. We will use our endeavours that they may remain upright men and Christians.

These Berlin pastors further throw in our teeth, that we do not believe in the Holy Spirit as "the third person of the Trinity." Whether or no they themselves believe in this, or what they think about it, we know not; but we know that to the modern world the old theological controversy on the nature of the Holy Spirit has become unintelligible, and therefore uninteresting. We know, moreover, that the spirit of hypocrisy, of spiritual pride, of intolerance, and of orthodox charges of heresy, is no holy spirit. We know that in the earnest striving after truth, in the spirit of free inquiry, in the spirit of knowledge, is a holy spirit. Wherefore, we labour that this Holy Spirit may remain active and honoured in the Protestant Church, and we trust in the community that they will never banish this spirit from the midst of them, nor let themselves be removed away from its guidance.

HORSHAM: SUSSEX.—A lecture on the Established Church in Ireland was given in the Music Hall, on Friday evening last, by the Rev. Jas. W. Braithwaite. There was an audience of about 150, who listened very attentively.

* The Protestant assembly at Bremen.

THE UNREFORMED CATHOLIC CHURCH.

THOSE of our Anglican friends who are so fond of abusing Protestantism, and who insist on calling the Anglican Church the Catholic Church, would do well to remember that, in many points, it rather deserves to be called, if Catholic at all, the Un-reformed Catholic Church. The Rev. Dr. Goss, Roman Catholic Bishop of Liverpool, in preaching, last year, at the opening of the church of the English Martyrs, in Preston, put this point clearly and well:

"All the abuses that existed in the [Roman Catholic] Church prior to the Reformation exist still in the Established Church of this country, for the latter is not the Catholic Church reformed, it is the Catholic Church unrefined. When the bishops of the Catholic Church met at Trent, and held what was generally known as the Council of Trent, they swept away many of the abuses which had excited the indignation of good men. The Established Church, on the other hand, was formed before the Council of Trent had purified the Catholic Church, and thus inherited the very evils of which they had sought to rid themselves by the Council referred to. These were the plurality of benefices, and also simony, by which many noblemen and others sought to find a place for their illegitimate offspring, and sought to bring into the Church those who were not lawfully born. They sought to provide a living, so to speak, at the public expense for those who were illegitimately born; so poor benefices were joined together, and thus they formed an ample revenue, and to those they presented their illegitimate children. In addition to that, moreover, those who had the presentation of Churches did not give them to the best, but to the highest bidder; and so the benefices were sold at that time just as they are at the present day in the Established Church of England. Those abuses the [Roman] Catholic Church was freed from by the Council of Trent."

And subsequently he said:

"On the accession of Elizabeth, after waiting a short time, probably to see whether she would be acknowledged by the Holy See, she restored the faith which her sister had set aside, and took to herself, as her father had done, the rights which belonged to the Pope; and thus the Queen, at the present time has the same power over the Church of England as the Pope has over the Catholic Church. Although the Church of England does not lay a claim to infallibility, she exercises the power of infallibility, just as she cast out the Dissenters, because they would not agree with her principles."

FIRESIDE READINGS.

A PRAYER.

Vouchsafe me Faith, O Lord,
The faith that conquers fear,
Which, tho' dark shadows close me round,
Still feels Thy presence near.

Vouchsafe me Peace, O Lord,
The peace no storms can shake,
Which, centred in our souls, the world
Can neither give nor take.

Vouchsafe me Patience, Lord,
To bear my cross of care,
And yield, without a pang, the joys
That fall to others' share.

Vouchsafe me Hope, O Lord,
To cheer dark sorrow's night,
And whisper to the weary heart,
"The gloom shall turn to light."

In calm submission to Thy will,
Alone is perfect rest;
Thus only can we feel and know
That all is wisest—best. E. H.

AT THE CRATER OF VESUVIUS.

WE take the following description (which those who have ascended Vesuvius will be able in several respects to verify), considerably abridged, from a recent number of the Pall Mall Gazette:

When the volcano is in its normal state of tranquillity, there is comparatively little to be seen; and on those rare occasions when it breaks out, the eruption goes on with such violence as to preclude all possibility of a near approach to the scene of action. Fortunately there is an intermediate stage of eruption between this and absolute repose. There are beforehand minor symptoms of disturbance which, in a measure, lead up to the grand climax which is to come; there is afterwards a period of gradual decline before the agitation altogether subsides. In one sense the eruption may be said to be over; that is, it has been what for the present it will not be again; but when all seems to be settling down into tranquillity there follow others not so violent or so grand as the first—just furious enough, in fact, as to make approach tolerable. It was at such a time, when crash was following crash in a manner that was quite sufficiently terrible, and when all the suffocating steams and vapours were being driven to one side of the mountain by a strong wind, that we were able to go up from the windward side, stand upon the lip of the crater, look down into the roaring abyss, and see what an eruption looks like on the spot. This is, in truth, the only way of realizing what a repository of horrors a volcano is.

As you quit the road and emerge upon the slopes of Vesuvius proper, you begin to have some idea of the desolation with which a volcano surrounds itself. You find yourself in a vast black plain of hardened lava, some of it in the form of enormous boulders and some of it pounded to the finest dust. Of course the sense of desolation increases as you ascend. Yet it is long before all traces of life disappear. Almost up to the foot of the cone itself there are, here and there, struggling specimens of vegetation just peering above the surface of the lava. By the time you reach the foot of the cone, after some two hours or more of rough pony-riding, you have got into a region where no bird is heard, no plant is seen; and you have become fully possessed by a deep impression of savage loneliness. At this point the real hard work of the expedition begins. Till now the ascent has been rough, but gradual; here, the walls of the cone start up at an inclination which is, perhaps, a trifle less steep than the sides of a grocer's sugarloaf. The difficulty of such a climb would be sufficiently great under any circumstances; but it is here increased by the nature of the foothold. You have always your choice either to walk upon the loose cinders, which are sent rolling in bushels down the mountain by every movement of the foot, or upon the scarcely less precarious lava, all jagged, angular, and honeycombed, with a fair prospect of a twist of your ankle. Go which way you will, it is severe work.

In about an hour from this point you arrive at the edge of the crater, and there you behold a scene full of awe and majesty. The suddenness with which you come upon it is quite startling. Going up you neither see nor hear anything. One moment you are clambering up the side of the cone amid profound silence; the next moment, as your head rises above the crater lip, you encounter a roar and a blaze which make you shrink back a little. This surprise is occasioned by the formation of the crater. It is a huge bowl which comes up to quite a sharp lip, about half a mile in diameter and some hundred yards in depth. Towards the bottom on the opposite side to where we stood, was a great hole, from which all the projectiles of the eruption were shot; the surface of the bowl being composed of lumps of lava, stones, and cinders, all of them smeared with sulphur, precisely like those upon which we were standing. As you mount the cone there is between you and the gulf an enormous wall, which dulls everything alike—for eye and ear. Even while on the steep of the cone itself you might be unaware that the mountain was disturbed. But a single step seems almost enough to transfer you from the most death-like stillness to the grandest exhibition of force it is possible to conceive. Instead of the monotonous dull black of congealed lava on the lower levels, you have the deep brick-red of stones that have been under the action of fire, the brightest vermillion, and every imaginable shade of orange and yellow that sulphur deposits are capable of taking. The ground is hot too; so hot, indeed, that you cannot keep your foot on the same spot for many seconds together. Between the chinks of the stones you can see that a few inches below the surface it is actually red hot. You thrust in the end of your stick for a moment and you pull it out charred. Over the farther half of the crater there hangs a dense cloud of smoke and vapour; all around you there is an atmosphere of sulphur which sets you coughing; from numberless small holes about your feet there issue, with a hiss, sulphureous jets of steam which nearly choke you as you pass over them; and then as you look down into the actual abyss you are face to face with the most appalling phenomena both of sight and sound which the whole of Europe has to offer. What meets the ear is, if anything, even more terrific than what meets the eye. Even to sight the eruption is not exactly what the imagination paints it beforehand. It does not consist, as the pictures necessarily lead one to suppose, of a continuous shower at all. Still less does it consist of a continuous shower of black ashes shot out from a fire blazing on the top of the mountain; it is rather a series of explosions. But the roar and glare of the great abyss is continuous. You look into the pit and though you see no actual flame, yet its sides are in a state of constant incandescence; from the mouth of it there roars up incessantly a dense cloud of steam; and in the depths of it below you hear the noise of preparation for the outburst that is next to come. Then you hear a sharper crackle, and then without further warning follows a loud explosion, which shoots into the air a torrent of white-hot missiles of every shape and size. So enormous are the forces at work that not only small pieces of stone and sulphur, such as you might carry away as mementoes of your visit, but huge blocks of mineral, each enough to load a railway ballast wagon, and all in a state of perfectly white heat, are tossed up as though they were so many cricket balls. The explosion lasts, perhaps, no longer than a minute; and then there is a cessation of some seconds with the noise only of internal preparation once more, after which the explosion is repeated. So it goes on again and again as long as the eruption continues. The noise that accompanies the projection of these enormous missiles, which from below seem to be shot up in profound silence, is something quite without a parallel in ordinary experience. One of our party said he had been shipwrecked three times, and the crash of the waves against the timbers of a helpless ship was one of the most terrible accompaniments of such scenes; yet that was nothing to the almost stupefying din that was going on before us—moments when the daylight was over, and the world below could no longer be distinguished—when we had nothing but the clear starlight overhead, and were truly alone with the mountain; when the varied colouring of the ground had disappeared in the darkness, and nothing could be seen but the gleam of the burning earth through the chinks at our feet; while the white-hot glaring ribbon of molten lava glided languidly down the mountain at our side, and before us was the flashing of the inner fire upon the cloud of vapour overhanging the abyss.

In regard to the stream of lava, two peculiarities were observable. One was the slowness of its motion. In the early part of its descent the incline over which it had to pass was precipitous; yet so slowly did this mass of liquid fire move within its bed that its current was only just perceptible. Perhaps in some degree connected with the same cohesion which this languor of movement indicated, was the other peculiarity of the lava stream—the tenacity of its surface. In appearance as we stood above it, it was in a perfectly liquid state; it looked as though you might ruffle its surface with the point of your stick. Great, accordingly, was our surprise at finding that even with the greatest force we could make not the slightest impression upon it. The largest masses of mineral that we could lift we dashed down from above upon the burning stream; but they simply bounced across its face, like a ball upon a floor, without producing the faintest apparent indentation. Moreover, it is commonly supposed that lava is always projected from the crater, and the language commonly used in description encourages the idea. "A stream of lava was seen to issue from the crater" is the sort of phraseology with which one is most familiar in accounts of eruptions which took place in bygone days. I am not sure that this is ever strictly accurate; but with the crater in anything like its present form it hardly seems probable. It would take a vast quantity of molten lava to fill that great bowl of half a mile diameter, before any of it would run over down the sides of the mountain. I saw no indication that this ever took place. In every case the source of the lava stream seemed to have been lower down. Certainly this was the case with the fine one which burst out just before our visit. As we stood upon the lip of the crater it was below us throughout its whole length. The lava was issuing from a great fissure which it had made for itself some distance down in the side of the cone. The guides hurried us away from the neighbourhood of its source, because, they said, it was quite possible another orifice might open at any moment, and then it would be all over with us. Their experience clearly led them to regard this as the normal mode of the emission of lava. In the case before us, it was being poured forth evenly and continuously in a molten state from the fissure; it descended for a short distance in a broad stream to a point where a bifurcation took place; and then the burning mineral went down to the base of the mountain in two streams of perhaps twenty feet each in width, looking in the darkness like two broad ribbons of fire stretching down into the plain.

PREACHING IN JEST MADE EARNEST.

IN the Rev. J. G. Miall's recently published "Congregationalism in Yorkshire," we have the following curious account of the way in which the father of the Rev. W. Thorpe, the well-known Independent minister at Bristol, was turned into a preacher:

"John Thorpe, and three of his companions, carousing together in an alehouse, undertook, by way of diversion and for a wager, to mimic Whitfield's preaching. This they proposed to do by opening, in turns, the Bible at random, and speaking, in turn, from the first text that occurred. After Thorpe's companions had exhibited, Thorpe himself took the place, exclaiming (for he had considerable talent at mimicry), 'I shall beat you all.' His eye fell upon the text, 'Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.' He spoke like one inspired, followed the passage into suitable divisions, and though aware that every word he spoke was condemning himself, and though his hair stood on end at the terrors which his own tongue was pronouncing, he pursued the subject to a close. His hearers listened awe-struck and spell-bound. No one ventured to interrupt the sermon; in the strong excitement of the moment the wager was forgotten. Thorpe withdrew after his extraordinary exhibition in the deepest agitation. 'If ever I preached a sermon in my life by the assistance of the Spirit of God,' he frequently said afterwards, 'it was at that time.' His debauched companions were forsaken; the alehouse was deserted; and from that time the mimic became a changed man. He soon after joined the Methodist Society, and attached himself to Mr. Ingham, by whom he was afterwards sent out to preach the Gospel of which he had so singularly experienced the power. As his views of Divine truth became matured, however, he forsook his first connection, and became ultimately pastor of an Independent church at Rotherham."

PURGATORY.

ONE of the articles of the Creed of Pope Pius IV., which non-Catholics, on their admission into the Romish Church, publicly repeat and testify their assent to, without restriction or qualification, is: "I strenuously maintain that there is a purgatory, and that the souls detained there are assisted by the prayers of the faithful." Mr. Nassau Senior, in his "Journals, &c.," relating to Ireland," thus refers to the views entertained on the subject:

"There are different opinions respecting Purgatory in the Roman Catholic Church. The Gallican Church believes it to be a place; that it is a department of hell, and that the devils are allowed to enter it to torment the souls—in fact, that the souls in purgatory suffer for a time the pains of the damned. The Ultramontane Church believes it to be a status, and that the souls subject to it are not necessarily confined to any particular place. Dr. Doyle, in his Catechism, calls it 'a state or place of punishment.' The Irish generally adopt the Ultramontane opinion. The common people in Galway believe that the souls wander near their former habitations: that they frequent churchyards, and nestle like bats in porches, under the eaves of houses, and in ruins. In a stormy night they often say, 'God help the poor souls!' They believe that on one night alone in the year, All Souls' night, they are allowed to enter the houses; and on that night people put their rooms in order, have good fires, and open the windows, in order that the souls may come in and warm themselves."

HOLBECK DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE twenty-fourth anniversary of the Holbeck Domestic Mission was held on Monday evening last, in the Congregational Hall, Park Row, Leeds. Mr. R. M. CARTER, M.P., who occupied the chair, said that, coming as he did fresh from a political contest, they would scarcely expect that he was very well prepared to talk to them about religion. He would remark that during the last two months he, for one, had been seeking to elevate politics into the region of religion. He had been doing that on the principle that politics were a part of religion, and that a man could scarcely be said to be doing his duty to his fellows if he took no part in politics. He was glad that his friend Mr. Luccock had asked him to attend that meeting, because it was the first he had had the honour of attending since this large constituency had elected him as one of its representatives in Parliament. He was glad because through that contest he had been designated an infidel, and so designated because he held Unitarian views. He did not feel that he was justified when the question was put to him at one of the public meetings—"Are you an infidel?"—in answering that question. He felt he was justified in answering it now, and in that place, because he was amongst men who believed in the same doctrine, and who, generally speaking, followed the same practice. He held as sincerely and as faithfully as anyone that there was one God and Father and one Lord Jesus Christ, our Saviour, sent by God to be the Saviour of man. If to hold these views be infidelity, then he was an infidel; but he thought no one with such a belief could justly and fairly be called an infidel. He held further that the enlightened views which they entertained on religious matters would be the views and the convictions of the future. (Applause.)

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT read the report of the Mission Committee, and Mr. W. D. CLEGG, the treasurer, produced statements which showed that the income of the year had been £209. 4s. 5d., and the expenses £239. 12s. 2d., leaving a balance due to the treasurer of £30. 7s. 9d.

The Rev. R. WILKINSON, the Missionary of the Institution read a report of the work done during the year, from which we make the following extracts:

It will not be my duty to-night to point out to you any very rapid advance, or great improvement that your mission has experienced during the past year. For, as an institution, formed for a specific object, it has long since reached its maturity. But I have to speak of its steady and continuous prosperity, in nearly if not all its numerous agencies. In drawing your attention to some of the features of the mission, I would first of all speak of the facts which rise out of the specific work I am called upon to engage in as a domestic visitor. As usual, by far the largest portion of my time has been taken up in visiting the homes of the people. For the year, as near as I can calculate, I have made about 4,000 visits. And the more I mix with the people in their homes, the deeper becomes my conviction that the work of true elevation and moral reform must be carried on there. This must be so for two reasons: First, because it is on the hearth alone that you can get fairly and freely to the minds and hearts of the people, and learn their difficulties, so as to know how to meet their wants and doubts. And further, the best way to gain an influence over any one for good is first of all to convince him of your personal interest in him, and nothing will be so likely to produce such a conviction as a visit to his home. This year has been one of great hardship and trial. Introduced by a very severe and lengthy winter, and attended throughout by an unusual depression of the iron trade, I have been called upon to witness a vast deal more of the sufferings of poverty than generally falls to the lot of the domestic visitor in our district. You will not be surprised to hear that during the winter months a great proportion of my time was given up to the assistance of the various agencies, public and private, that were instituted for the alleviation of the general distress which obtained in our midst. And it is with much pleasure that I can bear testimony to the readiness with which many of the more fortunate in life rendered whatever assistance lay in their power for the mitigation of the sufferings of the poor.

There is one feature, however, which has given me the greatest joy to witness throughout the whole of this crisis, which is, that while there has been an amount of suffering which was painful to behold, in not a single instance do I remember to have heard anything of those murmurings and railings against the richer classes and employers of labour which would have been indulged in some years ago, but a degree of intelligence and calm discernment have been manifested, which have clearly proved to me how great has been the advance made by the popular mind in respect to such times as these that are upon us. Among the numerous agencies called into operation for relieving the really needy cases, and which I found of great service indeed, I would mention that of the "Public Soup Kitchen." I am aware that there was much abuse of the "Kitchen," but such abuse need not have obtained, had there been a more careful distribution of the tickets. I gave in all about 1,400 tickets, and never in a single instance did I venture to give one without a personal visitation having been made. And here I would say to those who are in the habit of indiscriminate alms-giving, that by so doing you are rather encouraging the already lucrative calling of the professional beggar, than mitigating the distress of your neighbouring poor. Never trust to the pitiful and well got up story of the street beggar. In my intercourse with the people it must not for a moment be imagined that I ever lost sight of the higher and more spiritual purposes the mission has in view, in seeking to press its claims upon the district. To disseminate the seeds of moral and religious truth is its grand and primary object, and no matter under what circumstances I have been in the homes of the people, whether in company with the healthy, reckless, and indifferent, or by the bedside of the sick and dying, I have at all times made it my endeavour to lead such to the consciousness of their relationship to the infinite Father of all, and of the moral and spiritual obligations binding them to His loving will.—The report concluded by referring to the prosperous condition of the various agencies connected with the Mission—such as the Chapel services, the Sunday schools, the Teacher's class, and the Sewing and Singing classes.

Mr. JOSEPH LUPTON moved the adoption of the report.—Mr. Councillor CRAYEN seconded the resolution, which was adopted.—Mr. JOSEPH BUCKTON moved a list of the committee for the ensuing year; and Mr. CHARLES WURTEMBERG seconded it. The list was adopted.—Dr. GREENHOW moved the next resolution, by which the meeting acknowledged the continued success of the mission under the care of the Rev. R. Wilkinson, and desired to assure him of their warm sympathy in a work which entailed so much labour and so many anxieties. (Applause.)—Mr. SHACKLETON MATHERS seconded the resolution, which was also unanimously adopted.—Mr. WILKINSON acknowledged this kind expression of sympathy, and stated that he would begin the work of another year with renewed vigour and renewed faith in the result.—Mr. ALDERMAN LUCOCK then took the chair, and a vote of thanks having, on the motion of Mr. CLIFF, seconded by Mr. JAMES KITSON, jun., been given to Mr. Carter for presiding, the meeting was brought to a close.

INTELLIGENCE.

MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS.—The Rev. Robert Crompton Jones, formerly of Bristol, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Friargate Chapel congregation at Derby to become their minister, and enters upon his duties at the beginning of the new year.—We are glad to hear that the Rev. Wm. Sharman, formerly of Aberdeen, and who has been temporarily supplying the pulpit at Washington, U.S., has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to continue the pastoral charge of the congregation for the ensuing year.

BOLTON.—At a meeting of the town council, held on Wednesday morning last, a letter was read from Mr. Robert D. Darbshire to the mayor, expressing the desire of his father and uncle—Messrs. S. Dukinfield and Charles J. Darbshire—to present to the town a plot of land, containing about 12,000 square yards, for use as a public recreation ground. The ground is in Little Bolton, near Folds-road; at a considerable distance both from the public Park and from the Recreation Ground presented to the town by the late Mr. Robert Heywood. The mayor estimated the value of the property at about £3,000. In the course of the proceedings, the fact was mentioned that the late Mr. Heywood was very anxious that Little Bolton should have a playground, and had offered £500, if other friends would come forward and furnish the necessary amount. Another gentleman had offered an additional £200; but hitherto, a further prosecution of the undertaking had been in abeyance.

CIRENCESTER.—On Sunday, the 15th inst., the anniversary of the Free Christian Church was commemorated by special services; Rev. T. J. Read, of Cirencester, preaching in the morning; Rev. H. Austin in the afternoon; and Rev. W. S. Smith, of Doncaster, in the evening. On the 19th, a tea meeting was held, at which J. Worsley, Esq., of Bristol, and Mr. and Mrs. Nicholas, of Fairford, were present. The sentiments spoken to were those relating to liberty, charity, and pure Christianity. The preachers of the previous Sunday, and Mr. Worsley and Mr. Nicholas, were the chief speakers. Selections of sacred music were sung by the choir, and the meeting was a pleasant one.

KINGSWOOD.—The first literary and musical entertainment for the season was held on Tuesday last, and was a great success. The schoolroom was crowded. The Rev. John Birks presided. The readings, songs, glees, &c., gave unbounded satisfaction.

WAKEFIELD.—On Sunday last, the annual sermons on behalf of the funds of the Central Organisation of the Band of Faith were preached at Westgate Chapel, by the Rev. W. A. Clarke, minister of the Bradford Free Church. The collection was £7. 3s. 6d.

THE COMING WEEK.

Birmingham: LAWRENCE-STREET MISSION.—On Sunday, morning and evening, sermons by the Rev. Wm. James. On Monday evening, the annual meeting of subscribers and friends.

Choppington.—On Saturday afternoon, opening of the new chapel, preacher, Rev. J. C. Street. At four a tea party. Continuation Services by the Revs. E. W. Hopkinson and J. C. Street on Sunday, morning and evening.

Chorley.—On Sunday, afternoon and evening, services on behalf of the chapel funds by the Rev. H. E. Downson, B.A.

Edinburgh: THE SCOTTISH UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION. Annual sermons on Sunday, by the Rev. John Gordon. Annual Soirée on Monday.

Hull.—On Sunday evening, a lecture by the Rev. J. M. Dixon on "Mahomet."

London: FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE-ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—On Sunday, morning and evening, the Rev. P. W. Clayden will preach.

London: NEWINGTON GREEN.—On Sunday morning, a discourse by the Rev. J. K. Applebee. Subject: "Conversation with the mother of Zebedee's children."

Manchester DISTRICT SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION. On Saturday evening, a conference of teachers and friends at the Memorial Hall.

Manchester: HUMLE MISSION, EMBDEX-STREET.—Opening Services.—The Rev. Charles Beard, B.A., will preach on Sunday, morning and evening. On Monday, a tea party.

Shrewsbury.—On Sunday, morning and evening, school sermons by the Rev. Wm. Gaskell, M.A.

Birth.

JEVONS.—On the 23rd inst., at No. 1, Cavendish Terrace, Prince's Park, Liverpool, Mrs. Frederick Jevons, of a daughter.

Marriage.

CLIFF-TALBOT.—On the 24th inst., at Mill-Hill Chapel, Leeds, by the Rev. M. Gibson, of Dudley, brother-in-law of the bride Joseph, third son of Joseph Cliff, Esq., Wortley, Leeds, to Ada Elizabeth, youngest daughter of the late George Talbot, Esq., of Southfield, Burley, Leeds, and formerly of Honeybrook, Worcestershire.

Deaths.

ANDERTON.—On the 17th inst., at Bradley's Farm, Rivington, near Bolton, in her 74th year, Mary, the wife of Mr. Bennett Anderton.

COE.—On the 21st inst., aged 63 years, James Coe, of Bridgman-street, Bolton.

GRUNDY.—On the 23rd inst., Frederick Herbert, aged 3 years, second son of E. Herbert Grundy, Esq., of The Wylds, Bury.

A BEL MORRALL'S DOUBLE-EYED NEEDLES, 51, Piccadilly, Manchester.

DINNER SHERRY.
Quarter casks, £10. 10s.; Octaves, 25. 10s. nett.
C. J. HERFORD, 17A, Cooper-street.

COALS! COALS!!—NOTICE OF REMOVAL.—JAMES WELLS, Coal and Coke Merchant, Keeper Wharf, Ratcliffe, E. Office: 23, Coborn-street, Bow Road, E.

J. W. takes this opportunity of informing his numerous customers, friends, and the public generally, that he has REMOVED to the above address, where he hopes, by strict attention to business, to merit a continuance of their favours.

He would remind them that Coals are now at the lowest prices for the present season, and would advise them to purchase as soon as possible. A trial is solicited. Quality guaranteed. Best Wallends, 25s. per ton; best Inlands, 23s. per ton for cash.—Orders by post punctually attended to.

SCARLET FEVER, &c.

S. WHITEFIELD & SONS, PURIFIERS of BEDDING and WEARING APPAREL, by Chemical Process. Purifiers to the Birmingham General Hospital. Testimonials and Terms Post-free on application. VIADUCT WORKS, EXCHANGESTREET, EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, STEPHENSON PLACE, BIRMINGHAM.

"GO TO SPACKMAN, MERCHANT CLOTHIER, HATTER, & OUTFITTER, BELFAST." "For all you want in CLOTHING. I get all I possibly can from him myself. He has the largest, best, most fashionable, and cheapest stock of READY-MADE CLOTHING in the WORLD."—Extract from a recommendation to an American friend visiting Europe, by Mr. Cook, the Great European and Transatlantic "Excursionist."

MR. HENRY PLANCK, DENTIST, 8, Lever-street, Piccadilly, Manchester.—Mr. Planck was formerly pupil and for several years principal assistant to Mr. Cornelius Carter, the eminent dentist of 77, Lower Grosvenor-street, London, W.—Reference kindly permitted to the Rev. Dr. Heard.

CARLOWITZ, 22s. PER DOZEN.
This excellent HUNGARIAN WINE is now greatly recommended for its nourishing and sustaining properties. As we import it direct from Hungary, without any intermediate agency, and bottle it under our own personal inspection, purchasers can rely upon its genuineness.

JAMES SMITH & COMPANY, WINE MERCHANTS.

MANCHESTER.....26, Market-street.
Liverpool.....11, Lord-street.
Birmingham.....25, High street.

Printed for the Proprietors, by WILLIAM EVANS, of Apsley Villa, 377, Waterloo Road, Chesham Hill, at the printing-office, 3, Cross-street, BIRMINGHAM, and Published by JOHN PHILLIPS, at 74, Market-street, in said Parish of Manchester.—London Agent: C. Fox, Paternoster Row.—Friday, November 27, 1863.

The Unitarian Herald.

EDITED BY
REV. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., & REV. BROOKE HERFORD.

VOL. VIII.—No. 397.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1868.

PRICE 1D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
What the Church is doing	288
What is saying on Church Matters	288
The Schleiermacher Festival	289
American Notes	290
Wesley's Views on the Pr.	290
Literary	291
Drummers' Societies	291
A Damaging Plea for the Irish Church	291
Fire-side Readings: Helmweh	292
A Donkey Preaching Philosophy	292
An Unfortunate Scribble	292
The Rest-day	292
Tentorider District Meeting	292
Birmingham: Ministry to the Poor	293
London Auxiliary Sunday-school Association	293
Chopping on	293
Manchester: Hulme Domestic Mission	293
Intelligence: An Impostor, Ministerial Appointment	294
Belfast, Leeds, Hulme Mission, Stoke Newington Green	294
Correspondence	294
The Coming Week	294

In sending Stamps for orders for short advertisements, parties must reckon five words for the first line, and eight words for each succeeding line. In cases where the amount sent is insufficient, we leave out unnecessary words to reduce the advertisement.

CHARGE FOR ADVERTISEMENTS.

Ten lines and under	6d. all line.
After the first ten lines	5d. a line.
For 6 consecutive insertions, a reduction of 25 per cent.
13	50 per cent.
Half column	41. 6s. 0d.
A whole column	82. 10s. 0d.
A whole page	25. 5s. 0d.

Post-office Orders to be made payable to Mr. JOHN PHILLIPS 74, Market-street, Manchester, to whom all orders and business communications should be addressed.

DOMESTIC MISSION SCHOOLS, EMBDEN-STREET, OPPOSITE UPPER MEDLOCK-STREET, HULME.

CONTINUATION OF OPENING SERVICES.

SERVICES will again be held on Sunday, December 6th, when the Rev. S. A. SPENHAL will preach in the morning, and the Rev. WILLIAM GASKELL, M.A., in the evening. Service to commence at half-past ten a.m., and at half-past six p.m. A collection after each service.

GORTON SCHOOLS.—Sunday Evening

LECTURES by the Rev. G. H. WELLS, M.A.
Dec. 6. The Bible.
13. The Power of the Gospel.
20. The Object of the Gospel.
27. The Faith of the Gospel.
Jan. 3. The Progressive Character of the Gospel.
10. The Fulness of Christ.
Service at 6.30.

THE Rev. H. IERSON, M.A., will preach at 245, Mile End Road, near Globe Road, on Sunday morning, December 13th, at eleven.

THE Rev. J. K. APPEBEE preaches every Sunday evening at 245, Mile End Road, near Globe Road. Morning Service, 11; Evening, a quarter to 7.

FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, CLARENCE ROAD, KENTISH TOWN.—The Rev. P. W. CLAYDEN will preach, morning and evening, next Sunday.

LIVERPOOL: HOPE-STREET CHURCH.—SUNDAY EVENING LECTURES on the Early History of the Christian Church in this Country, by the Rev. CHARLES WICKSTEAD, B.A.
Dec. 6. Christianity in Britain before Augustine.
13. The Mission of Augustine and its Results.
Divine Service at half-past six.

OPENING OF THE NEW UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH, POOLE.

The Building Committee are now able to announce the OPENING MEETINGS, which are fixed to take place on Wednesday, the 9th December.

The morning service will commence at eleven o'clock, when prayers will be read by the Rev. EDMUND KELL, M.A., and the sermon preached by the Rev. CHAS. BEARD, B.A. Dinner will be provided in the Temperance Hall, at two o'clock, and tea in the same place at half-past five; after which a PUBLIC MEETING will be held in the Town Hall. The chair to be taken at seven o'clock, by W. J. LAMPORT, Esq., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, who has also kindly consented to preside at the dinner. The Revs R. B. Aspland, M.A., R. L. Carpenter, B.A., John Cropper, M.A., H. Hawkes, B.A., R. Yelland, and J. B. Lloyd are also expected to be present, and the congregation hope to see as many friends from neighbouring towns as can possibly attend.

Tickets for dinner and tea, 3s.; tickets for tea only, 1s.

Admission to Town Hall, free.

On the following Sunday, 13th December, SERMONS will be preached by the Rev. R. B. ASPLAND, M.A., of Hackney.

Morning service at 10.30; evening at 6.15.

Collections in aid of the Building Fund will be made after each of the services, and after the evening meeting at the Town Hall.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN CHURCH, POOLE.

The Congregation will be grateful for large or small Contributions in aid of their Building Fund. The total cost of the new church will be £1,200.

The amount of subscriptions already advertised

Samuel Sharpe, Esq., London

John Murch, Esq., Houlton

Miss White, Mortonsampstead

A Friend

Subscriptions will be thankfully received by either of the following:

H. HAMMILL, Secretary.

A. BALSTON, Treasurer.

SPARE HOSPITAL TICKETS, &c.—

The Rev. BROOKE HERFORD will be very grateful if friends who have tickets to spare for any of the Manchester or Salford Charities will place some of them in his hands for distribution. Also, he would be glad to recommend some very poor and deserving women for employment in cleaning offices, &c. Through the visiting of the Home Missionary Board students, and other visitors, under his superintendence, he is brought in contact with an amount of hardship and distress quite beyond his private or congregational means to help.

1, Kersal Terrace, Higher Broughton, Nov. 25, 1868.

WANTED, WORK, by a good Tailor, who can alter and repair neatly, and make men's and boys' clothes.—Address Mrs. COLLINS, 5, Picton-street, King-street, Salford.

WANTED, a Young Person of good education, to take charge of Three Young Children in the nursery, with the assistance of a nurse. She must be a Unitarian, and a good needlewoman.—Address, giving references and stating salary expected, to Mrs. HERBERT DARBISHIRE, Antrimville, Belfast.

ATRAINED Ladies' and Medical Nurse is desirous of making ENGAGEMENTS for the ensuing year. Good references.—Address Mrs. INGLETON, care of Mrs. C. W. Robbards, Coburg Villas, Princes-street, Southport.

